W. W. NORTON & COMPANY | New York • London

W. W. Norton & Company has been independent since its founding in 1923, when William Warder Norton and Mary D. Herter Norton first published lectures delivered at the People's Institute, the adult education division of New York City's Cooper Union. The firm soon expanded its program beyond the Institute, publishing books by celebrated academics from America and abroad. By midcentury, the two major pillars of Norton's publishing program—trade books and college texts—were firmly established. In the 1950s, the Norton family transferred control of the company to its employees, and today—with a staff of four hundred and a comparable number of trade, college, and professional titles published each year—W. W. Norton & Company stands as the largest and oldest publishing house owned wholly by its employees.

Preface

They arrive in boats, men exhausted from years of warfare and travel. As they approach the shore, their leader spots signs of habitation: flocks of goats and sheep, smoke rising from dwellings. A natural harbor permits them to anchor their boats so that they will be safe from storms. The leader takes an advance team with him to explore the island. It is rich in soil and vegetation, and natural springs flow with cool, clear water. With luck, they will be able to replenish their provisions and be on their way.

In the world of these men, welcoming travelers is a sacred custom, sanctioned by the gods themselves. It is also good policy among seafaring people. Someday, the roles may very well be reversed: today's host may be tomorrow's guest. Yet the travelers can never be certain whether a particular people will honor this custom. Wondering what to expect, the thirteen men enter one of the caves dotting the coastline.

The owner isn't home, but the men enter anyway, without any compunction. There are pens for sheep and goats, and there is plenty of cheese and milk, so the men begin eating. When the owner returns, they are terrified, but their leader, boldly, asks for gifts. The owner is not pleased. Instead of giving the intruders what they demand, he kills two of them and eats them for dinner. And then two more the next day. All the while, he keeps the men trapped in his cave.

A wily man, the leader devises a scheme to escape. He offers the owner wine, enough to make him drunk and sleepy. Once he dozes off, the men take a staff that they have secretly sharpened and plunge it into the owner's eye, blinding him. Without sight, he cannot see the men clinging to the undersides of his prized sheep as they stroll, one by one, out of the cave to graze, and cleverly the men cling only to the male sheep, not the females, which get milked.

This story of hospitality gone wrong comes from the Odyssey, one of the best-known works in all of world literature. We learn of this strange encounter of Greek soldiers with the one-eyed Cyclops named Polyphemus from Odysseus, the protagonist of the epic, when he recounts his exploits at the court of another host, the king of the Phaeacians. Unsurprisingly, Polyphemus isn't presented in the best light. Odysseus describes the Cyclopes as a people without a "proper" community, without agriculture, without hospitality. Is Odysseus, who has been wined and dined by his current host, trying to curry favor with the king of the Phaeacians by telling him how terribly he was treated by these non-Greek others? Reading the passage closely, we can see that Polyphemus and the other Cyclopes are adroit makers of cheese, so they can't be all that lazy. When the blinded Polyphemus cries out for help, his associates come to help him as a matter of course, so they don't live quite as isolated from one another as Odysseus claims. Even though Odysseus asserts that Polyphemus is godless, the land is blessed by the gods with fertility, and Polyphemus's divine father comes to his aid when he prays. Odysseus says that the Cyclopes lack laws and custom, yet we are also shown the careful, regular, customary way that Polyphemus takes care of his household. In a touching scene toward the end of his encounter with Odysseus, after he is blinded, Polyphemus speaks gently and respectfully to his favorite ram, so he can't be all that monstrous. The one-eyed giants assist one another, they are shepherds and artisans, and they are capable of kindness. The passage's ambiguities suggest that perhaps it was partly Odysseus's fault that this encounter between cultures went so badly. Were he and his companions simply travelers badly in need of food, or were they looters hoping to enrich themselves? The passage suggests that it's a matter of narrative perspective, from whose point of view the story is told.

Scenes of hospitality (or the lack thereof) are everywhere in world literature, and questions about hospitality, about the courtesies that we owe to strangers and that strangers owe to us (whether we are guests or hosts), are as important today as they were in the ancient world. Although many writers and thinkers today are fond of saying that our era is the first "truly global" one, stories such as this episode from Homer's Odyssey remind us that travel, trade, exile, migration, and cultural encounters of all kinds have been features of human experience for thousands of years.

The experience of reading world literature, too, is a form of travel—a mode of cultural encounter that presents us with languages, cultural norms, customs, and ideas that may be unfamiliar to us, even strange. As readers, each time we begin to read a new work, we put ourselves in the role of a traveler in a foreign land, trying to understand its practices and values and hoping to feel, to some degree and in some way, connected to and welcome among the people we meet there. The Epic of Gilgamesh, for example, takes its readers on a tour of Uruk, the first large city in human history, in today's Iraq, boasting of its city walls, its buildings and temples with their stairways and foundations, all made of clay bricks. Like a tour guide, the text even lets its readers inspect the city's clay pits, over one square mile large, that provided the material for this miraculous city made from clay. The greatest marvel of them all is of course The Epic of Gilgamesh itself, which was inscribed on clay tablets—the first monument of literature.

Foundational Texts

From its beginnings, The Norton Anthology of World Literature has been committed to offering students and teachers as many complete or substantially represented texts as possible. This Shorter Fourth Edition emphasizes the importance of foundational texts as never before by offering new translations of some of the best-known and most-loved works in the history of world literature. The Epic of Gilgamesh stands first in line of these foundational texts, which capture the story of an entire people, telling them where they came from and who they are. Some foundational texts become an object of worship and are deemed sacred, while others are revered as the most consequential story of an entire civilization. Because foundational texts inspire countless retellings—as Homer did for the Greek tragedians—these texts are reference points for the entire subsequent history of literature.

Perhaps no text is more foundational than the one with which we opened this preface: Homer's Odyssey. In this Shorter Fourth Edition, we feature the Odyssey in a new translation by our classics editor, Emily Wilson. This version captures the fast pace and rhythmic regularity of the original and offers a fresh perspective on cultural encounters such as the one between Odysseus and Polyphemus that is described above. Astonishingly, Wilson's translation is the first translation of the Odyssey into English by a woman. For centuries, commentators have remarked that the Odyssey is unusually attuned to the lives of women, especially in its portrait of Odysseus's wife, Penelope, a compelling and powerful character who cunningly holds a rowdy group of suitors at bay. Wilson's translation pays special attention to the poem's characterization of this remarkable woman, who is every bit as intriguing as the "complicated man" who is the eponymous hero of the tale. Other female characters, too, are given a new voice in this translation. For example, Helen, wife of the Greek king Menelaus and (according to legend) possessor of "the face that launched a thousand ships," is revealed through Wilson's translation to speak of herself not as a "whore" for whose sake so many young Greek men fought, suffered, and died (as she does in most other translations) but instead as a perceptive, clever person onto whom the Greeks, already eager to fight the Trojans, projected their own aggressive impulses: "They made my face the cause that hounded them," she says. The central conflicts of the epic, the very origin of the Trojan War, appear here in a startling new light.

This example highlights an exciting dimension of our emphasis on new translations. The first half of this anthology has always been dominated by male voices because men enjoyed privileged access to literacy and cultural influence in the centuries prior to modernity. Our focus on new translations has allowed us to introduce into these volumes more female voices—the voices of translators. So, for example, we present Homer's Iliad in a new translation by Caroline Alexander and Euripides' Medea in a new, specially commissioned translation by Sheila H. Murnaghan, and we continue to offer work in the first volume translated by female translators such as Dorothy Gilbert (Marie de France's Lais), Sheila Fisher (Chaucer's Canterbury Tales), and Rosalind Brown-Grant (Christine de Pizan's Book of the City of Ladies), among others. This commitment to featuring the work of female translators extends beyond these early centuries as well, for example in the brilliant new translation by Susan Bernofsky of a foundational text of literary modernity—Kafka's Metamorphosis. The result throughout the anthology is that these works now speak to today's readers in new and sometimes surprising ways.

Our emphasis in this edition on new translations is based on and amplifies the conviction expressed by the original editors of this anthology over fifty years ago: that world literature gains its power when it travels from its place of origin and speaks to people in different places. While purists sometimes insist on studying literature only in the original language, a dogma that radically shrinks what one can read, world literature not only relies on translation but actually thrives on it. Translation is a necessity; it is what enables a worldwide circulation of literature. It also is an art. One need only think of the way in which translations of the Bible shaped the history of Latin or English or German. Translations are re-creations of works for new readers. This edition pays keen attention to translation, featuring new translations that make classic texts newly readable and capture the originals in compelling ways. With each choice of translation, we have sought a version that would spark a sense of wonder while still being accessible to a contemporary reader.

Among other foundational texts presented in new translations and selections is the Qur'an, in a verse translation that is the product of a collaboration between M. A. Rafey Habib, a poet, literary scholar, and Muslim, and Bruce Lawrence, a renowned scholar of Islam. Their team effort captures some of the beauty of this extraordinary, and extraordinarily influential, sacred text. Augustine's Confessions are newly presented in a version by Peter Constantine, and Dante's Inferno is featured in the long-respected and highly readable translation by the American poet John Ciardi.

We have also maintained our commitment to exciting epics that deserve wider recognition such as the Maya Popol Vuh and Sunjata, which commemorates the founding of a West African empire in the late Middle Ages. Like the Odyssey, Sunjata was transmitted for centuries in purely oral form. But while the Odyssey was written down around 800 B.C.E., Sunjata was written down only in the twentieth century. We feature it here in a new prose translation by David C. Conrad, who personally recorded this version from a Mande storyteller, Djanka Tassey Condé, in 1994. In this way, Sunjata speaks to the continuing importance of oral storytelling, the origin of all foundational epics, from South Asia via Greece and Africa to Central America. Throughout the anthology, we remind readers that writing has coexisted with oral storytelling since the invention of literature and that it will continue to do so in the future.

A Network of Stories

In addition to foundational texts, we include in this edition a great number of stories and story collections. The origins of this form of literature reach deep into the ancient world, as scribes collected oral stories and assembled them in larger works. Consider what is undoubtedly the most famous of these collections, The Thousand and One Nights, with its stories within stories within stories, all neatly framed by the overarching narrative of Shahrazad, who is telling them to her sister and the king to avoid being put to death. What is most notable about this story collection is that it draws its material from India, Persia, and Greece. There existed a continent-spanning network of stories that allowed storytellers and scribes to recycle and reframe what they learned in ever new ways; it proved so compelling that later writers, from Marie de France to Chaucer, borrowed from it frequently.

Expanded Selections

Along with our focus on making foundational texts and story collections fresh and accessible, we have pruned the overall number of authors and are therefore able to increase our offerings from major texts that feature in many world literature courses. Don Quixote now includes the compelling "Story of Captivity in North Africa,” in which Cervantes draws on his own experiences as a slave in Algiers, where he spent five years after having been captured by pirates. Other major texts and authors with increased selections include the Iliad, Sappho, Ovid, the Qur’an, Murasaki’s Tale of Genji, Machiavelli’s The Prince, Baudelaire, Tagore, and Borges, and we have introduced complete new texts, such as Aphra Behn’s Oroonoko, Wole Soyinka’s Death and the King’s Horseman, Mo Yan’s “The Old Gun,” and Orhan Pamuk’s “To Look Out the Window.” We are particularly excited to now close the anthology with a story by the Nigerian writer Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie called “The Headstrong Historian,” which, since its publication in 2008, has already become a favorite in world literature classrooms. This compact work introduces us to three generations of Nigerians as they navigate a complicated series of personal and cultural displacements. A thought-provoking exploration of the complex results of cultural contact and influence, this probing, searching journey seemed to us the most fitting conclusion to the anthology’s survey of 4,000 years of literature.

The Birth of World Literature

In 1827, a provincial German writer, living in small-town Weimar, recognized that he was in the privileged position of having access not only to European literature but also to literature from much further afield, including Persian poetry, Chinese novels, and Sanskrit drama. The writer was Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, and in 1827, he coined a term to capture this new force of globalization in literature: “world literature.” (We now include the “prologue” to Goethe’s play Faust, which he wrote after encountering a similar prologue in the classical Sanskrit play Śhakuntalā.)

Since 1827, for less than 200 years, we have been living in an era of world literature. This era has brought many lost masterpieces back to life, including The Epic of Gilgamesh, which was rediscovered in the nineteenth century, and the Popol Vuh, which languished in a library until well into the twentieth century. Other works of world literature weren’t translated and therefore didn’t begin to circulate outside their sphere of origin until the last 200 years, including The Tale of Genji. With more literature becoming more widely available than ever before, Goethe’s vision of world literature has become a reality today.

In presenting world literature from the dawn of writing to the early twenty-first century, and from oral storytelling to the literary experiments of modernism, this anthology raises the question not only of what world literature is but also of the nature of literature itself. Greek tragedies are experienced by modern students as a literary genre, encountered in written texts; but for the ancient Athenians, they were primarily dramas, experienced live in an outdoor theater in the context of a religious and civic ritual. Other texts, such as the Qur’an or the Bible, are sacred pieces of writing, central to many people’s religious faith, while others appreciate them primarily or exclusively as literature. Some texts, such as those by Laozi or Augustine, belong in philosophy, while others, such as Machiavelli’s The Prince, are also political documents. Our modern conception of literature as imaginative literature, as fiction, is very recent, about 200 years old. We have therefore opted for a much-expanded conception of literature that includes creation myths, wisdom literature, religious texts, philosophy, and political writing in addition to poems, plays, and narrative fiction. This speaks to an older definition of literature as writing of high quality or of great cultural significance. There are many texts of philosophy or religion or politics that are not remarkable or influential for their literary qualities and that would therefore have no place in an anthology of world literature. But the works presented here do: in addition to or as part of their other functions, they have acquired the status of literature.

This brings us to the last and perhaps most important question: When we study the world, why study it through its literature? Hasn't literature lost some of its luster for us, we who are faced with so many competing media and art forms? Like no other art form or medium, literature offers us a deep history of human thinking. As our illustration program shows, writing was invented not for the composition of literature but for much more mundane purposes, such as the recording of ownership, contracts, or astronomical observations. But literature is writing's most glorious by-product. Literature can be reactivated with each reading. Many of the great architectural monuments of the past are now in ruins. Literature, too, often has to be excavated, as with many classical texts. But once a text has been found or reconstructed it can be experienced as if for the first time by new readers. Even though many of the literary texts collected in this anthology are at first strange, because they originated so very long ago, they still speak to today's readers with great eloquence and freshness. No other art form can capture the human past with the precision and scope of literature because language expresses human consciousness. Language shapes our thinking, and literature, the highest expression of language, plays an important role in that process, pushing the boundaries of what we can think and how we think it. This is especially true with great, complex, and contradictory works that allow us to explore different narrative perspectives, different points of view.

Works of world literature continue to elicit strong emotions and investments. The epic Rāmāyaṇa, for example, plays an important role in the politics of India, where it has been used to bolster Hindu nationalism, just as the Bhagavad-gītā continues to be a moral touchstone in the ethical deliberation about war. The so-called religions of the book, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, make our selections from their scriptures a more than historical exercise as well. China has recently elevated the sayings of Confucius, whose influence on Chinese attitudes about the state had waned in the twentieth century, creating Confucius Institutes all over the world to promote Chinese culture in what is now called New Confucianism. World literature is never neutral. We know its relevance precisely by the controversies it inspires.

There are many ways of studying other cultures and of understanding the place of our own culture in the world. Archaeologists can show us objects and buildings from the past and speculate, through material remains, how people in the past ate, fought, lived, died, and were buried; scientists can date layers of soil. Literature is capable of something much more extraordinary: it allows us a glimpse into the imaginative lives, the thoughts and feelings of humans from thousands of years ago or living halfway around the world. This is the true magic of world literature as captured in this anthology, our shared human inheritance.

About the Shorter Fourth Edition

New Selections and Translations

Resources for Students and Instructors

Norton provides students and instructors with abundant resources to make the teaching and study of world literature an even more interesting and rewarding experience.

With the Shorter Fourth Edition, are pleased to launch the new Norton Anthology of World Literature website, found at digital.wwnorton.com/worldlit4pre1650 (for volume 1) and digital.wwnorton.com/worldlit4post1650 (for volume 2). This searchable and sortable site contains thousands of resources for students and instructors in one centralized place at no additional cost. Following are some highlights:

- A series of eight brand-new video modules are designed to enhance classroom presentation and spark student interest in the anthology's works. These videos, conceived of and narrated by the anthology editors, ask students to consider why it is important for them to read and engage with this literature.
- Hundreds of images—maps, author portraits, literary places, and manuscripts—are available for student browsing or instructor download for in-class presentation.
- Several hours of audio recordings are available, including a 10,000-term audio glossary that helps students pronounce the character and place names in the anthologized works.

The site also provides a wealth of teaching resources that are unlocked with an instructor's log-in:

- "Quick read" summaries, teaching notes, discussion questions, and suggested resources for every work in the anthology, from the much-praised Teaching with The Norton Anthology of World Literature: A Guide for Instructors

- Downloadable Lecture PowerPoints featuring images, quotations from the texts, and lecture notes in the notes view for in-class presentation

In addition to the wealth of resources in The Norton Anthology of World Literature website, Norton offers a downloadable Coursepack that allows instructors to easily add high-quality Norton digital media to online, hybrid, or lecture courses—all at no cost. Norton Coursepacks work within existing learning management systems; there's no new system to learn, and access is free and easy. Content is customizable and includes over seventy reading-comprehension quizzes, short-answer questions, links to the videos, and more.

Acknowledgments

The editors would like to thank the following people, who have provided invaluable assistance by giving us sage advice, important encouragement, and help with the preparation of the manuscript: Sara Akbari, Alannah de Barra, Wendy Belcher, Jodi Bilinkoff, Daniel Boucher, Freya Brackett, Psyche Brackett, Michaela Bronstein, Rachel Carroll, Sookja Cho, Kyeong-Hee Choi, Amanda Claybaugh, Lewis Cook, David Damrosch, Dick Davis, Burghild Denecke, Amanda Detry, Anthony Domestico, Megan Eckerle, Marion Eggert, Merve Emre, Maria Fackler, Guillermina de Ferrari, Alyssa Findley, Karina Galperín, Stanton B. ## Ancient Mediterranean and Near Eastern Literature

THE INVENTION OF WRITING AND THE EARLIEST LITERATURES

The word literature comes from the Latin for “letters.” “Oral literature” is therefore a contradiction in terms. Most modern Westerners assume that literature is something we read in books; it is, by definition, written language. But people told stories and sang songs long before they had any means to record them. Oral types of poetry and storytelling are quite different from those produced by writing, and it is difficult for us, living in an age dominated by printed and digital language, to imagine a world where nobody could read or write. Preliterate societies had different intellectual values from our own. We tend to think that a “good” story or essay is one that is neatly organized, original, and free from obvious repetition; we think of clichés as a mark of bad writing. But people without literacy tend to love stock phrases, traditional sayings, and proverbs. They are an essential mechanism by which cultural memory is preserved. Before writing, there was no such thing as an “author”—a single individual who, all alone, creates a text to be experienced by a solitary, silent reader. Instead, poets, singers, and storytellers echoed and manipulated the old tales and the inherited wisdom of their people.

Of course, without either writing or recording equipment, all oral storytelling is inevitably lost. The tales that were told before there was writing cannot be collected in any anthology. But they left their mark on the earliest works of written literature—and many subsequent ones as well. As one would expect, literacy did not take hold all at once; the transition was partial and gradual, and in much of the ancient world, poetry and storytelling were less closely associated with written texts than they are for us.

Writing was not originally invented to preserve literature. The earliest written documents we have contain commercial, administrative, political, and legal information. It was in the region of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, Mesopotamia (which means “the place between the rivers”), that writing was first developed; the earliest texts date from around 3300 to 2990 B.C.E. The characters of this writing were inscribed on tablets of wet clay with a pointed stick; the tablets were then left in the sun to bake hard. The characters are pictographic: the sign for ox looks like an ox head and so on. The bulk of the texts are economic—lists of food, textiles, and cattle. But the script is too primitive to handle anything much more complicated than lists, and by 2800 B.C.E. scribes began to use the wedge-shaped end of the stick to make marks rather than the pointed end to draw pictures. The resulting script is known as cuneiform, from the Latin word cuneus, “a wedge.” By 2500 B.C.E. cuneiform was used for many things beyond administrative lists: the texts preserved historical events and even, finally, literature. It was on clay tablets and in cuneiform script that the great Sumerian epic poem Gilgamesh was written down. This writing system was not, however, designed for a large reading public. Each sign denoted a syllable—consonant plus a vowel—which meant that the reader had to be familiar with a large number of signs. Furthermore, the same sign often represented two or more different sounds, and the same sound could be represented by several different signs. It is a script that could be written and read only by experts, the scribes, who often proudly recorded their own names on the tablets.

There was one ancient writing system that, unlike cuneiform, survived, in modified forms, until the present day. It was developed by the Phoenicians, a Semitic trading people. The script consisted of twenty-two simple signs for consonantal sounds. Through trade, the Phoenician script spread all over the Mediterranean. It was adopted by the ancient Hebrews, among others. The obvious advantage of this system was that it was so easy to learn. But there was still one area of inefficiency in this system: the absence of any notation for the vowels made for ambiguity. We still do not know, for example, what the vowel sounds were in the sacred name of God, often called the Tetragrammaton (“Four Letters”). In our alphabet the name is written as YHWH. The usual surmise is Jahweh (yá-way), but for a long time the traditional English-language version was Jehovah.

One thing was needed to make the script fully efficient: signs for the vowels. This was the contribution of the Greeks, who, in the eighth or possibly the ninth century B.C.E., adopted the Phoenician script for their own language, but used for the vowels some Phoenician signs that stood for consonantal combinations not native to Greek. They took over (but soon modified) the Phoenician letter shapes and also their names: alpha, a meaningless word in Greek, represents the original aleph (“ox”), and beta represents the original beta (“house”). The Greeks admitted their indebtedness; Greek myths told the story of Cadmus, king of Tyre, who taught the Greeks how to write, and, as the historian Herodotus tells us, the letters were called Phoenician. The Romans, who adapted the Greek alphabet for their own language, carved their inscriptions on stone in the same capital letters that we still use today.

ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN AND MEDITERRANEAN CULTURES

Modern, postindustrial societies depend, economically, on machines and sources of energy to power them. We use complex devices to produce food and clothes, to build roads and cities, to excavate natural resources (such as oil and coal), to construct nonnatural materials (such as plastics), to get from place to place, and to communicate with others across the globe. In the ancient world, most of these machines did not yet exist. Though metal was mined and worked, there was no heavy industry as we know it. Coal and oil were not exploited for energy. War galleys were propelled by sail and human oarsmen; armies moved, sometimes vast distances, on foot. People therefore relied far more heavily on the kind of natural resources that can be easily accessed by human labor: no ancient city could be built far from fresh water and fertile soil on which to grow crops and graze animals for meat and wool. Where we use machines and fossil fuel, all the advanced civilizations of the ancient world depended for their existence on slaves, who worked the land; took care of animals and children; dug the mines; built houses, temples, pyramids, and cities; manufactured household goods (ranging from basic tableware to decorative artwork); performed housework; and provided entertainment. Modern Western societies exploit natural resources and harness them by using the cheap human labor available in less “developed” countries; most of the time, we do not even think about the people who make our clothes, phones, or cars or about the energy it takes to produce them and dispose of them. Similarly, elite ancient Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans seem to have taken slaves almost entirely for granted. The existence of ancient slavery should remind us not to idealize ancient cultures (even those of the “great Western tradition”) and to remember how easily human beings, ourselves included, can be blinkered about the forms of injustice and exploitation that are essential to their cultural existence.

Because ancient societies depended on the proximity of natural resources, especially well-irrigated, fertile soil, the first civilizations of the Mediterranean basin developed in two regions that were particularly receptive to agriculture and animal husbandry. These areas were the valley of the Nile, where annual floods left large tracts of land moist and fertile under the Egyptian sun, and the valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris rivers, which flowed through the Fertile Crescent, a region centered on modern Iraq. Great cities—Thebes and Memphis in Egypt and Babylon and Nineveh in the Fertile Crescent—came into being as centers for the complicated administration of the irrigated fields. Supported by the surplus the land produced, they became centers also for government, religion, and culture.

Later, from the second millennium B.C.E. onward, more cultures developed around the Mediterranean, including those of the Hebrews, the Greeks, and the Romans. These societies remained distinct from one another, and each included many separate social groups; we should be wary of generalizing about what “people in antiquity” believed or did. But it does make sense to consider the ancient Mediterranean and Near East as a single, albeit complex, unit, because there were large-scale cultural exchanges between these various peoples as a result of trade, colonization, and imperialism. Greek sculpture and architecture of the seventh century B.C.E., for instance, owes a heavy debt to Egypt, and striking similarities between Greek and Middle Eastern myths are probably the result of Mesopotamian influence.

Most ancient cultures were polytheistic (they believed in many gods); and since crosscultural religious influence was common, gods from one place were often reinvented in another. Ancient texts that emphasize a single deity over all others are rare: the most important exceptions to the polytheistic rule are the Egyptian Great Hymn to the Aten, composed at a time when the Egyptian monarchy was developing a new cult to the sun god; and the Hebrew Bible, which featured the singular and “jealous” god who is now worshipped by many of the world’s populations. But neither of these texts suggests that other gods do not exist—only that the creator deity is by far the most important and powerful. The Hebrew Bible is also unusual in suggesting, in the Ten Commandments, that religious observance is closely connected with the observance of a code of behavior. Ethics and religion were not necessarily linked in the ancient world, and gods of ancient literature often behave in obviously immoral ways. In many ancient cultures, religious practice (“orthopraxy”) was more important than religious belief (“orthodoxy”). Religion involved a shared set of rituals and practices that united a community in shared activities such as festivals and song; few ancient cultures would have understood the idea of a religious “creed” (a formal statement outlining the specific beliefs of a particular religious community, to which all members must subscribe). Cult practices were often highly localized. We should, then, be wary of assuming that the stories about gods that appear in ancient literary texts are necessarily a record of the religious beliefs of a whole culture. Myths circulated in many different forms, changing from one place and time to another; in most ancient cultures, composing alternative stories about the gods does not seem to have been regarded as “heretical,” as it might seem to a modern Jewish, Christian, or Muslim reader.

THE GREEKS

The origin of the peoples who eventually called themselves Hellenes is still a mystery. The language they spoke belongs clearly to the Indo-European family (which includes the Germanic, Celtic, Italic, and Sanskrit language groups), but many of the ancient Greek words and place names have terminations that are definitely not Indo-European—the word for “sea” (thalassa), for example. The Greeks of historic times were presumably a blend of native tribes and Indo-European invaders.

In the second millennium B.C.E., a brilliant culture called Minoan, after the mythical king Minos, flourished on the large island of Crete. It was centered around enormous palace structures, and the citadel of Mycenae and the palace at Pylos show that mainland Greece, in that same period, had a comparably rich culture that included knowledge of a writing system called Linear B. But sometime in the last century of the millennium, the great palaces were destroyed by fire. With them disappeared not only the arts and skills that had created Mycenaean wealth, but even the system of writing. For the next few hundred years, the Greeks were illiterate and so no written evidence survives for this time, known as the Dark Ages of Greece. During this period, the Greeks developed the oral tradition of poetry that would culminate in the Iliad and the Odyssey.

The Dark Ages ended in the eighth century B.C.E., when Greece again became literate—but with a quite different alphabet, borrowed, as noted earlier, from the Phoenicians. Greece was still highly fragmented, made up of many small independent cities. These were known as “city-states” (a rendering of the Greek term polis, from which we get “politics”), because they were independent political and economic entities—not, like modern cities, ruled by a centralized national government. The geography of Greece—a land of mountain barriers and scattered islands—encouraged this fragmentation. The cities differed from each other in their customs, political constitutions, and even dialects: they were rivals and fierce competitors with one another. In the eighth and seventh centuries B.C.E., Greeks founded many new cities all over the Mediterranean coast, including some along the coast of Asia Minor. Many of these new outposts of Greek civilization experienced a faster economic and cultural development than the older cities of the mainland. It was in the cities founded on the Asian coast that the Greeks adapted to their own language the Phoenician system of writing, adding signs for the vowels to create their alphabet. The Greeks probably first used their new written language for commercial records and transactions, but as literacy became more widespread all over the Greek world in the course of the seventh century B.C.E., treaties and political decrees were inscribed on stone, and literary works were written on rolls of paper made from the Egyptian papyrus plant.

In the sixth century B.C.E., the Persian Empire dominated the Middle East and the eastern Mediterranean Sea, eventually becoming one of the largest empires in the ancient world. Millions of people lived under Persian control, and the ruling dynasty of Persia (the Achaemenids) conducted an expansionist policy, extending their domain from their capitals in Pasargadae, Susa, and finally Persepolis (in modern Iran) eastward, as far as the Indus river, and westward, into Egypt and Libya, as well as into the eastern parts of Greece, such as the cities of Ionia (in Asia Minor). The Persians had a sophisticated and globalized culture, influenced by elements from many of the other cultures they had encountered; their art was rich and intricate, and their architecture was impressively monumental. The empire was governed by a complex and highly developed political system, with the emperor at the top. The Persian army was huge and expertly trained, and it included vast numbers of skilled cavalrymen and archers. By the beginning of the fifth century B.C.E., the Persian Empire must have seemed all but unstoppable; it would have been reasonable for the Persians to assume that they could dominate the remaining parts of Greece. But surprisingly, the Greeks—led by Athens and Sparta—managed to repel repeated Persian invasions in the years 490 to 479 B.C.E., winning decisive land and sea battles at Marathon, Salamis, and Plataea. Their astonishing victories over Persia boosted the confidence of the Greek cities in the fifth century. In the wake of this success, the Athenians produced their most important literary and cultural achievements.

Sparta was governed by a ruling elite, an oligarchy (“rule of the few”) that used strict military discipline to maintain control over a majority underclass. By contrast, Attica—the city-state of which Athens was the leading city—was at this time a democracy, one of the first such states in the world. Democracy, which means “rule by the people,” did not imply that all adult inhabitants had the chance to vote; “the people” were a small subset of the population, since women, slaves, and metics (resident aliens) were all excluded from the rights of citizenship. The citizens of Attica in the fifth century B.C.E. probably numbered only about thirty thousand, while the total population may have been ten times that. Slaves had no rights at all; they were the property of their masters. Women, even free-born women, could not own property, hold office, or vote. The elite women of Athens had less autonomy than those in most Greek city-states, including Sparta

(where women were allowed to exercise outside in the gymnasium); in Athens, they were expected to remain inside the house except for funerals and religious festivals, and were rarely seen by men other than their husbands or male relatives. Moreover, even among citizens who participated in civic life on a roughly equal political footing, there were marked divisions between rich and poor, and between the rural peasant and the city dweller. Still, Athenian democracy represented a bold achievement of civic equality for those who belonged. Since the voting population was so small, it was possible for the city to function as a direct, not representational, democracy: any citizen could attend assembly meetings and vote directly on the issues at hand, rather than electing a representative to vote in his place.

Athens's power lay in the fleet that had played such a decisive role in the struggle against Persia. The city rapidly became the leader of a naval alliance that included most of the islands of the Aegean Sea and many Greek cities on the coast of Asia Minor. This alliance, formed to defend Greece from Persia, soon became an empire, and Athens, with its formidable navy, received an annual tribute from its "allies." Unlike Athens, Sparta was rigidly conservative in government and policy. Because the individual citizen was reared and trained by the state for the state's business, war, the Spartan land army was superior to any other in Greece, and the Spartans controlled, by direct rule or through alliances, a majority of the city-states in the Peloponnese. Athens and Sparta, allies in the war of liberation against Persia, became enemies when the external danger was eliminated. As the years went by, war between the two Greek powers came to be accepted as inevitable by both sides, and in 431 B.C.E. it began. The war ended in 404 B.C.E. with the total defeat of Athens.

During the fifth century, Athens changed culturally and politically, as the self-confidence roused by Persian victories, and celebrated by monumental displays of civic pride (such as the famous Parthenon temple to the city's patron goddess, Athena, completed in 438 B.C.E.), gave way to increasing social tensions and anxieties during the war years. But throughout this century, Athenian democracy provided its citizens with a cultural and intellectual environment that was without precedent in the ancient world. In the sixth century, Greeks on the Ionian coast had already begun to develop new, protoscientific ideas, alternatives to the old myths about how the world was made and how it functioned. Now many of the most original thinkers and writers from all over the Greek world began to gather in Athens. The fifth century was also the great age of Athenian theater: both tragedy and comedy developed and flourished at this time, and drama provided an essential outlet for the cultural confusions of the age.

In the fourth century B.C.E., the Greek city-states became involved in constant internecine warfare. Politically and economically bankrupt, they fell under the power of Macedon in the north, whose king, Philip, combined a ferocious energy with a cynicism that enabled him to take full advantage of the disunity of the city-states. Greek liberty ended at the battle of Chaeronea in 338 B.C.E., and Philip's son Alexander inherited a powerful army and political control of all Greece. He led his Macedonian and Greek armies against Persia, and in a few brilliant campaigns became master of an empire that extended into Egypt in the south and to the borders of India in the east. He died at Babylon in 323 B.C.E., and his empire broke up into a number of independent kingdoms ruled by his generals; modern scholars refer to the period that followed (323–146 B.C.E.) as the Hellenistic age. One of these generals, Ptolemy, founded a Greek dynasty that ruled Egypt until after the Roman conquest and ended only with the death of Cleopatra in 30 B.C.E. The results of Alexander's fantastic achievements were surprisingly durable. Into the newly conquered territories came thousands of Greeks who wished to escape from the political futility and economic crisis of the homeland. Wherever they went, they took with them their language, their culture, and their most characteristic buildings—the gymnasium and the theater. The great Hellenistic cities, though now part of kingdoms, grew out of the earlier city-state model and continued many of the city-state's civic and political institutions. At Alexandria, in Egypt, the Ptolemies formed a Greek library to preserve the texts of Greek literature for the scholars who studied and edited them, a school of Greek poetry flourished, and Greek geographers and mathematicians made new advances in science. The Middle East became, as far as the cities were concerned, a Greek-speaking region; and when, some two or three centuries later, the first accounts of the life and teaching of Jesus of Nazareth were recorded, they were written in the simple vernacular Greek known as koine (“the common language”), on which the cultural homogeneity of the whole area was based.

ROME

When Alexander died in 323 B.C.E., the city of Rome was engaged in a struggle for control of the surrounding areas. By the middle of the third century B.C.E., Rome dominated most of the Italian peninsula. Expansion southward brought Rome into collision with Carthage, a city in North Africa that was then the greatest power in the western Mediterranean. Two protracted wars resulted (264–241 and 218–201 B.C.E.), and it was only at the end of a third, shorter war (149–146 B.C.E.) that the Romans destroyed their great rival. The second Carthaginian (or Punic) War was particularly hard fought, both in Spain and in Italy itself. The Carthaginian general Hannibal made a spectacular crossing of the Alps, and remained in the peninsula for years, while Rome’s southern Italian allies defected to Carthage and had to be slowly won over again. Rome, however, emerged from these wars not merely victorious but a world power. The next two decades saw frequent wars—in Spain, in Greece, and in Asia Minor—that laid the foundations of the Roman Empire.

Unlike Athens, Rome was never a democracy. Instead, from around 509 B.C.E.—when, according to legend, the last tyrannical king of Rome had been overthrown—the state was governed by a complex political system (which changed and developed over time) known as a republic. Power was shared among several different official groups of people, which included the Senate, a body that controlled money and administration, traditionally dominated by the upper classes; the Assemblies, gathered from the people, including lower-class or “plebeian” citizens; and elected officials called Magistrates, the most important of whom were the two Consuls, elected every year. The system (one of the most important models for the United States Constitution many centuries later) was designed above all to prevent any single person or group from seizing total control. The republic would last until the time of the Roman civil wars, in the first century B.C.E.

The Greeks believed that arguing, strife, and competition can be good, since they inspire us to outdo others and improve ourselves. The Romans, by contrast, saw conflict as deadly: it was what, in Roman mythology, led the founder of their city, Romulus, to kill his twin brother, Remus. Whereas the Athenians prided themselves on adaptability, versatility, and grace, the Roman idea of personal and civic virtue was based on a sense of tradition, a myth of old Roman virtue and integrity. “By her ancient customs and her men the Roman state stands,” wrote Ennius, a Roman epic poet, capturing an ethos that emphasized tradition (known as the mos maiorum, the custom of predecessors) and commended “seriousness” (gravitas), “manly courage” (virtus), “industry” (diligentia), and above all, “duty” (pietas). Roman power was built on efficiency, and strength through unity. The Romans organized a complicated yet stable federation that held Italy loyal to them in the presence of invading armies, and they developed a legal code that formed the model for all later European and American law. The achievements of the Romans, in conquest and in organizing their empire after victory, were due in large part to their talent for practical affairs. They built sewers, baths with hot and cold water, straight roads, and aqueducts to last two thousand years.

Given the Romans' pragmatism and adherence to tradition, one might expect their literature to be very dull. But this is not true at all. Roman poets often struggled with, or frankly rejected, the moral codes of their society. The poems of Catullus, an aristocratic young man who lived in the last years of the Roman Republic (first century B.C.E.), suggest a deliberate attempt to thumb his nose at the serious Roman topics of politics, war, and tradition. Instead, Catullus writes about love, sex, and feelings and satirizes the people he finds most annoying. A generation or two later, both Virgil and Ovid also question—in very different ways—whether unthinking loyalty to the Roman state is a desirable goal.

By the end of the first century B.C.E., Rome was the capital of an empire that stretched from the Straits of Gibraltar to Mesopotamia and the frontiers of Palestine, and as far north as Britain. While Greek history began with the epics of Homer (instrumental in creating a sense of Greek national identity that transcended the divisions of the many city-states), the Romans had conquered half the known world before they began to write. Latin literature started with a translation of the Odyssey, made by a Greek prisoner of war; and, with the exception of satire, the model was always Greek. Roman authors borrowed wholesale from Greek originals, not furtively but openly and proudly, as a tribute to the source. But this frank acknowledgment of indebtedness should not blind us to the fact that Latin literature is original, and sometimes profoundly so. Catullus translated the Greek lyric poet Sappho, but he added to her evocation of agonizing jealousy a distinctively Roman anxiety about idleness. Ovid retold Greek myths, making them funnier by giving them a Roman rhetorical punch. Virgil based his epic, the Aeneid, on Homer, but he chose as his theme the coming of the Trojan prince Aeneas to Italy, where he was to found a city from which, in the fullness of time, would come “the Latin race . . . and the high walls of Rome.”

The institutions of the Roman city-state proved inadequate for world government. The second and first centuries B.C.E. were dominated by civil war fought by various factions vying for power: generals against senators and populists against aristocrats. Coalitions were formed, but each proved unstable. Julius Caesar, a successful Roman general, seized power (although he refused the title “king”); but he was assassinated in 44 B.C.E. by a party hoping to restore the old system of shared rule. More years of civil war followed, until finally, in 31 B.C.E., Julius’s adoptive nephew, Octavian—who later titled himself Augustus—managed to defeat the ruler of the eastern half of the empire, Mark Antony, along with Antony’s ally and lover, Cleopatra, queen of Egypt. Augustus played his hand carefully, claiming that he was restoring the Republic; but he assumed primary control of the state and became the first in the long line of Roman emperors.

For the next two hundred years, the successors of Augustus, the Roman emperors, ruled the Mediterranean and Middle Eastern world. The empire covered a vast area that included Britain, France, all southern Europe, the Middle East, and the whole of North Africa. Some native inhabitants in all these areas were killed by the Romans; others were enslaved; many, both slave and free, were Romanized, acculturated into the norms of the Roman people. Roman culture stamped this whole area of the world in ways that can still be discerned today: the Romans built roads, cities, public baths, and theaters, and they brought their literature and language—Latin—to the provinces they ruled. All modern Romance languages, including Spanish, French, and Italian, developed from the language spoken throughout the Roman Empire.

But controlling so many people, in so many different areas, from the central government in Rome was difficult and expensive. It could not be done forever. Marcus Aurelius (121–180 C.E.), who in his spare time wrote a beautiful book of thoughts about his struggle to live a good life (the Meditations), was the first emperor to share his power with a partner; this was the first official recognition that the empire was too big to be ruled by one man. The Romans fought a long losing battle against invading tribes from the north and east. When it finally fell, the empire left behind it the idea of the world-state, later adopted by the medieval church, which ruled from the same center, Rome, and which claimed a spiritual authority as great as the secular authority it replaced.

THE EPIC OF GILGAMESH

The Epic of Gilgamesh is the greatest work of ancient Mesopotamia and one of the earliest pieces of world literature. The story of its main protagonist, King Gilgamesh, and his quest for immortality touches on the most fundamental questions of what it means to be human: death and friendship, nature and civilization, power and violence, travel adventures and homecoming, love and sexuality. Because of the appeal of its central hero and his struggle with the meaning of culture in the face of human mortality, the epic spread throughout the ancient Near East and was translated into various regional languages during the second millennium B.C.E. As far as we know, no other literary work of the ancient world spread so widely across cultures and languages. And yet, after a long period of popularity, Gilgamesh was forgotten, seemingly for good: after circulating in various versions for many centuries, it vanished from human memory for over two thousand years. Its rediscovery by archaeologists in the nineteenth century was a sensation and allows us to read a story that for many centuries was known to many cultures and people throughout the Near East but has come down to us today only by chance on brittle clay tablets.

KING GILGAMESH AND HIS STORY

Gilgamesh was thought to be a priest-king of the city-state of Uruk in southern Mesopotamia, the lands around the rivers Euphrates and Tigris in modern-day Iraq. He probably ruled around 2700 B.C.E. and was remembered for the building of Uruk's monumental city walls, which were ten kilometers (six miles) long and fitted with nine hundred towers; portions of these walls are still visible today. We will never know for sure how the historical king compares to the epic hero Gilgamesh. But soon after his death, he was venerated as a great king and judge of the Underworld. In the epic he appears as “two-thirds . . . divine” and “one-third . . . human,” the offspring of Ninsun, a goddess in the shape of a wild cow, and a human father named Lugalbanda. By some accounts, Gilgamesh means “the offspring is a hero,” or, according to another etymology, “the old man is still a young man.”

Gilgamesh was not written by one specific author but evolved gradually over the long span of a millennium. The earliest story of Gilgamesh appears around 2100 B.C.E. in a cycle of poems in the Sumerian language. Sumerian is the earliest Mesopotamian language. It is written in cuneiform script—wedge-shaped characters incised in clay or stone—and has no connection to any other known language. About six hundred years after Gilgamesh's death, kings of the third dynasty of Ur, another Mesopotamian city-state, claimed descent from the legendary king of Uruk and enjoyed hearing of the great deeds of Gilgamesh at court; the earliest cycle of Gilgamesh poems was written for these rulers. As in the later epic, in the Sumerian cycle of poems Gilgamesh is a powerful king and an awe-inspiring warrior. Gilgamesh's shattering realization that he will die and can attain immortality only by making a name for himself appears already in this earliest version of the Gilgamesh story, where he exclaims:

I have peered over the city wall,
I have seen the corpses floating in the river's water.
So too it will come to pass for me,
so it will happen to me . . .
Since no man can avoid life's end,
I would enter the mountain land and set up my name.

The Sumerian poetry cycle became the basis for the old version of Gilgamesh, written in Babylonian, a variant of the Akkadian language—a transnational written language that was widely used throughout the ancient Near East. The traditional Babylonian epic version of Gilgamesh, which adapted the Sumerian poems into a connected narrative, circulated for more than fifteen hundred years. It was read widely from Mesopotamia to Syria, the Levant, and Anatolia and was translated into non-Mesopotamian languages such as Hittite, the language of an empire that controlled Turkey and northern Syria in the latter half of the second millennium B.C.E.

The definitive revision of the epic is attributed to a Babylonian priest and scholar named Sin-leqi-unninni. He lived around 1200 B.C.E., and by his time King Gilgamesh had been dead for about fifteen hundred years. He carefully selected elements from the older traditions, inserted new plot elements, and added a preface to the epic. His version, included here in translation, is divided into eleven chapters recorded on eleven clay tablets. New fragments of Gilgamesh continue to surface from archaeological excavations; some pieces are still missing, and some passages are fragmentary and barely legible, but thanks to the painstaking work of scholars of ancient Mesopotamia we can today read an extended, gripping narrative.

THE WORLD'S OLDEST EPIC HERO

The Gilgamesh of the epic is an awe-inspiring, sparkling hero, but at first also the epitome of a bad ruler: arrogant, oppressive, and brutal. As the epic begins, the people of Uruk complain to the Sumerian gods about Gilgamesh's overbearing behavior, and so the gods create the wild man Enkidu to confront Gilgamesh. While Gilgamesh is a mixture of human and divine, Enkidu is a blend of human and wild animal, though godlike in his own way. He is raised by beasts in the wilderness and eats what they eat. When he breaks hunters' traps for the sake of his animal companions he becomes a threat to human society and Gilgamesh decides to tame him with the attractions of urban life and civilization: for seven days Enkidu makes love to a harlot (prostitute), sent out for the purpose, and at her urging he takes a cleansing bath and accepts clothing and a first meal of basic human foodstuff, bread and beer. Shamhat, the prostitute, leads him to the city of Uruk. Although he and Gilgamesh are at first bent on competing with each other, they quickly develop a deep bond of friendship.

Their friendship established, Gilgamesh proposes to Enkidu the first of their epic adventures: to travel to the great Cedar Forest and slay the giant Humbaba, who guards the forest for the harsh god Enlil. With the blessing of the sun god Shamash they succeed, and they cut down some magnificent trees that they float down the Euphrates River to Mesopotamia. But their violent act has its consequence: the dying giant curses them and Enlil is enraged. Their second adventure leads to a yet more ambiguous success, which will set in motion the tragic end of their friendship. Gilgamesh, cleansed from battle and radiant in victory, attracts the desire of Ishtar, goddess of love and warfare. Instead of politely resisting her advances, Gilgamesh makes the fatal error of chiding her for her fickle passions and known cruelty toward her lovers, and heaps insults on the goddess. Scandalized by Gilgamesh's accusations, she unleashes the Bull of Heaven against the two friends, and it wreaks havoc in Uruk. After the heroic duo kills the Bull of Heaven, a council of the gods convenes to avoid further disaster. In a gap in the text, the gods decide that Gilgamesh and Enkidu have gone too far; one of them must die. The lot falls to Enkidu, because Gilgamesh is the king.

Enkidu's death brings Gilgamesh face to face with mortality. He mourns for Enkidu bitterly for seven days and nights and only when a worm creeps out of the corpse's nose does he accept that his friend is dead. Terrified that he too will die, Gilgamesh forsakes the civilized world to find the one human being known to have achieved immortality: Utanapishtim, survivor of the Great Flood. Like Enkidu in his days as a wild man, Gilgamesh roams the steppe, disheveled and clad in a lionskin, and sets out on a quest to ask Utanapishtim for the secret of eternal life. He braves monsters, runs along the sun's path under the earth at night, encounters a mysterious woman who keeps a tavern at the edge of the world, passes a garden of jeweled trees, crosses the waters of death, and finally arrives at the doorstep of Utanapishtim and his wife. Utanapishtim's dramatic account of their experience and survival of the flood resembles the biblical story of Noah and the Great Flood in Genesis. At his wife's request, Utanapishtim gives Gilgamesh the chance to attain immortality by eating a magic plant, but he is afraid to try it and a serpent steals the magic plant and gains the power of immortality for itself. In the end Gilgamesh returns to Uruk, empty-handed. Although in the final moments of the epic he proudly surveys the mighty city walls of his making, he is a profoundly changed man.

AN ANCIENT EPIC

The word epic is originally Greek and refers to a long poem narrating important historical or cosmic events in elevated language and involving a panoramic sweep of action and a cast of protagonists who straddle the human and divine worlds. Some epics, like Homer's *Iliad, tell of the foundation or destruction of civilizations or cities, featuring noisy battle scenes, in which the heroes can prove their strength, wisdom, and understanding of the workings of the divine order. Other epics, like Homer's *Odyssey, focus on the travels and adventures of a central protagonist. Greek epics usually invoke the Muses, goddesses in charge of the arts and a poet's inspiration, who inform the poets of past events and the world of the gods. Epics often include long speeches, in which protagonists remember past events or justify future actions. And they rely heavily on the repetition of lines with variation and on a rhetoric of parallels and contrasts. Scholars of Homeric epic have argued that repetition and formulaic expression helped the bards to remember and recite extensive storylines and pointed to the poems' oral and performative roots.

Gilgamesh shares a few fundamental features with Greek epic. True, there was no concept in Mesopotamia corresponding to the Western literary genre "epic," and Gilgamesh has no equivalent to the strict hexameter of Greek epic. A verse line in Gilgamesh is not defined by a fixed number of syllables or stresses but varies in length, which can only be inferred by context, such as patterns of parallelism. Still, in contrast to the literary works of other civilizations of the ancient world that had no epic, like China and East Asia, Gilgamesh can be considered part of a larger Near Eastern and Mediterranean epic tradition. Although Gilgamesh was only translated into cuneiform languages and never directly entered the epic repertoire of alphabet languages like Greek, it shared with the Greek tradition a number of classically epic motifs. In Achilles' mourning for his friend Patroclus (in Homer's Iliad) we can recognize Gilgamesh's desperation at the loss of Enkidu. Just as Gilgamesh finally returns to Uruk after challenging adventures, Odysseus (in Homer's Odyssey) returns to Ithaca from the Trojan War in the guise of a destitute stranger after performing dangerous feats. In Gilgamesh and Greek epics, scenes featuring councils of the gods who decide the fate of their heroes reflect religious beliefs about the intersection between human limitations and divine powers but are also astute plot devices that sharpen the profile of the heroes and their ways of confronting divine antagonism. We can see a parallel to the willingness of the Greek gods and their personal preferences in the opposition of Shamash and Enlil, in particular in Enlil's argument that Enkidu should be sacrificed and Gilgamesh spared.

In contrast to the orally rooted Homeric epic, Gilgamesh was from the outset conceived as a literary work. With its elevated style, geometrically parallel phrases, and moments of complex word play, Gilgamesh was addressed to the sophisticated ears and minds of scholars and members of the royal court. We know that it was used in Babylonian schools to teach literature. This hypothesis is further supported when we look at the nuanced use of speech registers in the epic's portrayal of its protagonists. Utanapishtim speaks in an obscure archaic style that befits a sage from before the Great Flood, and he has a solemn way of rolling and doubling his consonants. The goddess Ishtar appears in an unfavorable light, talking like a low-class streetwalker. In contrast, Shamhat, the prostitute who brings Enkidu to the city, speaks with unexpected eloquence and distinction.

Shamhat is a thought-provoking example of the several powerful female protagonists in Gilgamesh. Much of what Gilgamesh accomplishes is ultimately due to women: his mother's pleas with the sun god Shamash allow him to kill Humbaba; the wife of the scorpion monster persuades her husband to give Gilgamesh entrance to the tunnel leading to the jeweled garden; and the mysterious woman he finds at the end of the world, the tavern keeper Siduri, helps him find Utanapishtim, whose wife persuades her husband to give Gilgamesh the plant of rejuvenation. In some of Gilgamesh's encounters there are touches of wit and parody. It is stunning to find this blend of epic grandeur and comic sobriety in the world's earliest epic. Part of the epic's subtlety is invisible today, because we know so much less about the historical and literary context of Gilgamesh than we know about the context of Greek epic. Still, the glimpses we get show the sophistication of the early Mesopotamian states and the art of literary narrative they developed.

Like Mesopotamian civilization and its cuneiform writing system, Gilgamesh eventually disappeared. In the seventh century B.C.E., when an invading force of ancient Iranian people called Medians sacked Nineveh, one of the capitals of the Assyrian Empire, copies of the epic written on clay tablets, which had been preserved in the palace library of Ashurbanipal, the last great Assyrian king (reigned 668–627 B.C.E.), vanished in the destruction. Although the epic did not disappear completely and still circulated until the third century B.C.E., it was only rediscovered in the 1850s, when an English explorer, Austen Henry Layard, dug up thousands of tablets from the site at Nineveh. They were later deciphered at the British Museum in London, and when the young curator George Smith made the stunning discovery that this epic contained a version of the biblical story of the flood, which had hitherto been considered unique to the book of Genesis, this challenged conceptions about the origin of biblical narrative. Gilgamesh was suddenly propelled into the canon of world literature.

The Epic of Gilgamesh took shape many centuries before the Greeks and Hebrews learned how to write, and it circulated in the Near East and Levant long before the book of Genesis and the Homeric epics took shape. The rediscovery of the names of the gods and humans who people the epic and of the history of the cities and lands in which they lived is a gradual, ongoing process. And the meaning of the epic itself is tantalizingly ambiguous. Has Gilgamesh succeeded or failed in his quest? What makes us human? Can civilization bring immortality? Whatever we decide to believe, the story of Gilgamesh and his companion Enkidu, of their quest for fame and immortality, speaks to contemporary readers with an urgency and immediacy that makes us forget just how ancient it is.

The Epic of Gilgamesh<sup>1</sup>

Tablet I

He who saw the wellspring, the foundations of the land,
 Who knew the ways, was wise in all things,
 Gilgamesh, who saw the wellspring, the foundations of the land,
 He knew the ways, was wise in all things,
 He it was who inspected holy places everywhere,

1. Translated by and with footnotes adapted from Benjamin R. Foster.

Full understanding of it all he gained,
 He saw what was secret and revealed what was hidden,
 He brought back tidings from before the flood,
 From a distant journey came home, weary, at peace,
 Engraved all his hardships on a monument of stone, 10
 He built the walls of ramparted Uruk,<sup>2</sup>
 The lustrous treasury of hallowed Eanna!
 See its upper wall, whose facing gleams like copper, Gaze at the lower course, which nothing will equal,
 Mount the stone stairway, there from days of old, 15 Approach Eanna, the dwelling of Ishtar,
 Which no future king, no human being will equal.
 Go up, pace out the walls of Uruk,
 Study the foundation terrace and examine the brickwork.
 Is not its masonry of kiln-fired brick? 20
 And did not seven masters lay its foundations?
 One square mile of city, one square mile of gardens,
 One square mile of clay pits, a half square mile of Ishtar's dwelling,
 Three and a half square miles is the measure of Uruk!
 Search out the foundation box of copper, 25
 Release its lock of bronze, Raise the lid upon its hidden contents,
 Take up and read from the lapis tablet
 Of him, Gilgamesh, who underwent many hardships.
 Surpassing all kings, for his stature renowned, 30 Heroic offspring of Uruk, a charging wild bull,
 He leads the way in the vanguard,
 He marches at the rear, defender of his comrades.
 Mighty floodwall, protector of his troops,
 Furious flood-wave smashing walls of stone, 35
 Wild calf of Lugalbanda, Gilgamesh is perfect in strength, Suckling of the sublime wild cow, the woman Ninsun,<sup>3</sup> Towering Gilgamesh is uncannily perfect.
 Opening passes in the mountains,
 Digging wells at the highlands' verge, 40
 Traversing the ocean, the vast sea, to the sun's rising, Exploring the furthest reaches of the earth,
 Seeking everywhere for eternal life,
 Reaching in his might Utanapishtim the Distant One, Restorer of holy places that the deluge had destroyed, 45
 Founder of rites for the teeming peoples,
 Who could be his like for kingly virtue?
 And who, like Gilgamesh, can proclaim, "I am king!"
 Gilgamesh was singled out from the day of his birth,

2. City-state ruled by King Gilgamesh. It was the largest city of Mesopotamia at the time and among its important temples featured Eanna, a sanctuary for the goddess of love and warfare, Ishtar.

3. Lugalbanda, Gilgamesh's father, was an earlier king of Uruk. His mother was Ninsun, a goddess called "the wild cow."

Two-thirds of him was divine, one-third of him was human! 50
 The Lady of Birth drew his body's image,
 The God of Wisdom brought his stature to perfection.

He was perfection in height,
 Ideally handsome

In the enclosure of Uruk he strode back and forth, 55
 Lording it like a wild bull, his head thrust high.
 The onslaught of his weapons had no equal.
 His teammates stood forth by his game stick,
 He was harrying the young men of Uruk beyond reason.
 Gilgamesh would leave no son to his father, 60
 Day and night he would rampage fiercely.
 This was the shepherd of ramparted Uruk,
 This was the people's shepherd,
 Bold, superb, accomplished, and mature!
 Gilgamesh would leave no girl to her mother! 65
 The warrior's daughter, the young man's spouse, Goddesses kept hearing their complaints.
 The gods of heaven, the lords who command,
 Said to Anu:<sup>4</sup>

You created this headstrong wild bull in ramparted Uruk, 70
 The onslaught of his weapons has no equal.
 His teammates stand forth by his game stick,
 He is harrying the young men of Uruk beyond reason.
 Gilgamesh leaves no son to his father!
 Day and night he rampages fiercely. 75
 This is the shepherd of ramparted Uruk,
 This is the people's shepherd,
 Bold, superb, accomplished, and mature!
 Gilgamesh leaves no girl to her mother!

The warrior's daughter, the young man's spouse, 80
 Anu kept hearing their complaints.

Let them summon Aruru,<sup>5</sup> the great one,
 She created the boundless human race.
 Let her create a partner for Gilgamesh, mighty in strength,
 Let them contend with each other, that Uruk may have peace. 85

They summoned the birth goddess, Aruru:

You, Aruru, created the boundless human race,
 Now, create what Anu commanded,

4. The sky god who is supreme in the pantheon but remote from human affairs. Uruk was known for its temples for Anu and Ishtar.

5. Goddess of birth.

To his stormy heart, let that one be equal,
 Let them contend with each other, that Uruk may have peace. 90

When Aruru heard this,
 She conceived within her what Anu commanded.
 Aruru wet her hands,
 She pinched off clay, she tossed it upon the steppe,
 She created valiant Enkidu in the steppe, 95
 Offspring of potter's clay, with the force of the hero Ninurta.<sup>6</sup> Shaggy with hair was his whole body,
 He was made lush with head hair, like a woman,
 The locks of his hair grew thick as a grainfield.
 He knew neither people nor inhabited land, 100
 He dressed as animals do.
 He fed on grass with gazelles,
 With beasts he jostled at the water hole,
 With wildlife he drank his fill of water.

A hunter, a trapping-man, 105 Encountered him at the edge of the water hole.
 One day, a second, and a third he encountered him at the edge of the water hole.
 When he saw him, the hunter stood stock-still with terror,
 As for Enkidu, he went home with his beasts.
 Aghast, struck dumb, 110
 His heart in a turmoil, his face drawn,
 With woe in his vitals,
 His face like a traveler's from afar,
 The hunter made ready to speak, saying to his father:

My father, there is a certain fellow who has come from the uplands, 115
 He is the mightiest in the land, strength is his,
 Like the force of heaven, so mighty is his strength.
 He constantly ranges over the uplands,
 Constantly feeding on grass with beasts,
 Constantly making his way to the edge of the water hole. 120
 I am too frightened to approach him.
 He has filled in the pits I dug,
 He has torn out my traps I set,
 He has helped the beasts, wildlife of the steppe, slip
 from my hands,
 He will not let me work the steppe. 125

His father made ready to speak, saying to the hunter:

My son, in Uruk dwells Gilgamesh,
 There is no one more mighty than he.
 Like the force of heaven, so mighty is his strength.

6. A god of agriculture and war. Son of Enlil.

Take the road, set off towards Uruk, 130
 Tell Gilgamesh of the mightiness-man.
 He will give you Shamhat the harlot, take her with you,
 Let her prevail over him, instead of a mighty man.
 When the wild beasts draw near the water hole,
 Let her strip off her clothing, laying bare her charms. 135
 When he sees her, he will approach her.
 His beasts that grew up with him on the steppe will deny him.

Giving heed to the advice of his father,
 The hunter went forth.
 He took the road, set off towards Uruk, 140
 To the king, Gilgamesh, he said these words:

There is a certain fellow who has come from the uplands,
 He is mightiest in the land, strength is his,
 Like the force of heaven, so mighty is his strength.
 He constantly ranges over the uplands, 145
 Constantly feeding on grass with his beasts, Constantly making his way to the edge of the water hole.
 I am too frightened to approach him.
 He has filled in the pits I dug,
 He has torn out my traps I set, 150
 He has helped the beasts, wildlife of the steppe, slip
 from my hands,
 He will not allow me to work the steppe.

Gilgamesh said to him, to the hunter:

Go, hunter, take with you Shamhat the harlot,
 When the wild beasts draw near the water hole, 155
 Let her strip off her clothing, laying bare her charms.
 When he sees her, he will approach her,
 His beasts that grew up with him on the steppe will deny him.

Forth went the hunter, taking with him Shamhat the harlot,
 They took the road, going straight on their way. 160
 On the third day they arrived at the appointed place.
 Hunter and harlot sat down to wait.
 One day, a second day, they sat by the edge of the water hole,
 The beasts came to the water hole to drink,
 The wildlife came to drink their fill of water. 165
 But as for him, Enkidu, born in the uplands,
 Who feeds on grass with gazelles,
 Who drinks at the water hole with beasts,
 Who, with wildlife, drinks his fill of water, Shamhat looked upon him, a human-man, 170
 A barbarous fellow from the midst of the steppe:

There he is, Shamhat, open your embrace,
 Open your embrace, let him take your charms!
 Be not bashful, take his vitality!

When he sees you, he will approach you, 175
 Toss aside your clothing, let him lie upon you, Treat him, a human, to woman's work!
 His wild beasts that grew up with him will deny him,
 As in his ardor he caresses you!

Shamhat loosened her garments, 180
 She exposed her loins, he took her charms.
 She was not bashful, she took his vitality.
 She tossed aside her clothing and he lay upon her,
 She treated him, a human, to woman's work,
 As in his ardor he caressed her. 185
 Six days, seven nights was Enkidu aroused, flowing into Shamhat.
 After he had his fill of her delights,
 He set off towards his beasts.
 When they saw him, Enkidu, the gazelles shied off,
 The wild beasts of the steppe shunned his person. 190
 Enkidu had spent himself, his body was limp,
 His knees stood still, while his beasts went away.
 Enkidu was too slow, he could not run as before,
 But he had gained reason and expanded his understanding.

He returned, he sat at the harlot's feet, 195
 The harlot gazed upon his face,
 While he listened to what the harlot was saying.
 The harlot said to him, to Enkidu:

You are handsome, Enkidu, you are become like a god,
 Why roam the steppe with wild beasts? 200
 Come, let me lead you to ramparted Uruk,
 To the holy temple, abode of Anu and Ishtar,
 The place of Gilgamesh, who is perfect in strength,
 And so, like a wild bull, he lords it over the young men.

As she was speaking to him, her words found favor, 205
 He was yearning for one to know his heart, a friend.
 Enkidu said to her, to the harlot:

Come, Shamhat, escort me
 To the lustrous hallowed temple, abode of Anu and Ishtar,
 The place of Gilgamesh, who is perfect in strength, 210
 And so, like a wild bull, he lords it over the young men.
 I myself will challenge him, I will speak out boldly,
 I will raise a cry in Uruk: I am the mighty one!
 I am come forward to alter destinies!
 He who was born in the steppe is mighty, strength is his! 215

[Shamhat speaks.]

Come then, let him see your face,
 I will show you Gilgamesh, where he is I know full well.
 Come then, Enkidu, to ramparted Uruk,

Where fellows are resplendent in holiday clothing,
 Where every day is set for celebration, 220
 Where harps and drums are played.
 And the harlots too, they are fairest of form,
 Rich in beauty, full of delights,
 Even the great gods are kept from sleeping at night!
 Enkidu, you who have not learned to live, 225
 Oh, let me show you Gilgamesh, the joy-woe man.
 Look at him, gaze upon his face,
 He is radiant with virility, manly vigor is his,
 The whole of his body is seductively gorgeous.
 Mightier strength has he than you, 230
 Never resting by day or night.
 O Enkidu, renounce your audacity!
 Gilgamesh is beloved of Shamash, Anu, Enlil, and Ea broadened his wisdom.<sup>7</sup>
 Ere you come down from the uplands, 235
 Gilgamesh will dream of you in Uruk.

[The scene shifts to Uruk.]

Gilgamesh went to relate the dreams, saying to his mother:

Mother, I had a dream last night:
 There were stars of heaven around me,
 Like the force of heaven, something kept falling upon me! 240
 I tried to carry it but it was too strong for me,
 I tried to move it but I could not budge it.
 The whole of Uruk was standing by it,
 The people formed a crowd around it,
 A throng was jostling towards it, 245
 Young men were mobbed around it, Infantile, they were groveling before it!
 [I fell in love with it], like a woman I caressed it,
 I carried it off and laid it down before you,
 Then you were making it my partner. 250

The mother of Gilgamesh, knowing and wise,
 Who understands everything, said to her son,
 Ninsun the wild cow, knowing and wise,
 Who understands everything, said to Gilgamesh:

The stars of heaven around you, 255
 Like the force of heaven, what kept falling upon you,
 Your trying to move it but not being able to budge it,
 Your laying it down before me,
 Then my making it your partner,
 Your falling in love with it, your caressing it like a woman, 260

7. Shamash was god of the sun and of oracles, overseeing matters of justice and right dealing; Enlil was supreme god on earth; Ea, a god of wisdom and magic, is known for his beneficence to the human race.

Means there will come to you a strong one,
 A companion who rescues a friend.
 He will be mighty in the land, strength will be his,
 Like the force of heaven, so mighty will be his strength.
 You will fall in love with him and caress him like a woman. 265
 He will be mighty and rescue you, time and again.

He had a second dream,
 He arose and went before the goddess, his mother,
 Gilgamesh said to her, to his mother:

Mother, I had a second dream. 270
 An axe was thrown down in a street of ramparted Uruk,
 They were crowding around it,
 The whole of Uruk was standing by it,
 The people formed a crowd around it,
 A throng was jostling towards it. 275
 I carried it off and laid it down before you,
 I fell in love with it, like a woman I caressed it,
 Then you were making it my partner.

The mother of Gilgamesh, knowing and wise,
 Who understands everything, said to her son, 280
 Ninsun the wild cow, knowing and wise,
 Who understands everything, said to Gilgamesh:

My son, the axe you saw is a man.
 Your loving it like a woman and caressing it,
 And my making it your partner 285
 Means there will come to you a strong one,
 A companion who rescues a friend,
 He will be mighty in the land, strength will be his,
 Like the strength of heaven, so mighty will be his strength.

Gilgamesh said to her, to his mother: 290

Let this befall according to the command of the great counselor Enlil,
 I want a friend for my own counselor,
 For my own counselor do I want a friend!

Even while he was having his dreams,
 Shamhat was telling the dreams of Gilgamesh to Enkidu, 295
 Each was drawn by love to the other.

Tablet II

While Enkidu was seated before her,
 Each was drawn by love to the other.
 Enkidu forgot the steppe where he was born,
 For six days, seven nights Enkidu was aroused and flowed into Shamhat.
 The harlot said to him, to Enkidu:

You are handsome, Enkidu, you are become like a god,
 Why roam the steppe with wild beasts?
 Come, let me lead you to ramparted Uruk,
 To the holy temple, abode of Anu,
 Let me lead you to ramparted Uruk, 10
 To hallowed Eanna, abode of Ishtar,
 The place of Gilgamesh, who is perfect in strength,
 And so, like a wild bull, he lords it over the people.
 You are just like him,
 You will love him like your own self. 15
 Come away from this desolation, bereft even of shepherds.

He heard what she said, accepted her words,
 He was yearning for one to know his heart, a friend.
 The counsel of Shamhat touched his heart.
 She took off her clothing, with one piece she dressed him, 20
 The second she herself put on.
 Claspng his hand, like a guardian deity she led him,
 To the shepherds' huts, where a sheepfold was,
 The shepherds crowded around him,
 They murmured their opinions among themselves: 25

This fellow, how like Gilgamesh in stature,
 In stature tall, proud as a battlement.
 No doubt he was born in the steppe,
 Like the force of heaven, mighty is his strength.

They set bread before him, 30
 They set beer before him.
 He looked uncertainly, then stared,
 Enkidu did not know to eat bread,
 Nor had he ever learned to drink beer!
 The harlot made ready to speak, saying to Enkidu: 35

Eat the bread, Enkidu, the staff of life, Drink the beer, the custom of the land.

Enkidu ate the bread until he was sated,
 He drank seven juglets of the beer.
 His mood became relaxed, he was singing joyously, 40
 He felt lighthearted and his features glowed.
 He treated his hairy body with water,
 He anointed himself with oil, turned into a man,
 He put on clothing, became like a warrior.
 He took his weapon, hunted lions, 45
 The shepherds lay down to rest at night.
 He slew wolves, defeated lions,
 The herdsmen, the great gods, lay down to sleep.
 Enkidu was their watchman, a wakeful man,
 He was tall. 50

He was making love with Shamhat.
 He lifted his eyes, he saw a man.
 He said to the harlot:

Shamhat, bring that man here!
 Why has he come? 55
 I will ask him to account for himself.

The harlot summoned the man,
 He came over, Enkidu said to him:

Fellow, where are you rushing?
 What is this, your burdensome errand? 60

The man made ready to speak, said to Enkidu:

They have invited me to a wedding,
 Is it not people's custom to get married?
 I have heaped high on the festival tray
 The fancy dishes for the wedding. 65
 People's veils are open for the taking.
 For Gilgamesh, king of ramparted Uruk, People's veils are open for the taking!
 He mates with the lawful wife,
 He first, the groom after. 70
 By divine decree pronounced,
 From the cutting of his umbilical cord, she is his due.<sup>8</sup>

At the man's account, his face went pale.

Enkidu was walking in front, with Shamhat behind him.

When he entered the street of ramparted Uruk, 75
 A multitude crowded around him.
 He stood there in the street of ramparted Uruk,
 With the people crowding around him.
 They said about him:

He is like Gilgamesh in build, 80
 Though shorter in stature, he is stronger of frame.
 This man, where he was born,
 Ate the springtime grass,
 He must have nursed on the milk of wild beasts.

The whole of Uruk was standing beside him, 85
 The people formed a crowd around him,
 A throng was jostling towards him,
 Young men were mobbed around him,
 Infantile, they groveled before him.

8. This means that by his birthright Gilgamesh can take brides on their wedding nights, then leave them to their husbands.

In Uruk at this time sacrifices were underway, 90
 Young men were celebrating.
 The hero stood ready for the upright young man,
 For Gilgamesh, as for a god, the partner was ready.
 For the goddess of lovemaking, the bed was made, Gilgamesh was to join with the girl that night. 95

Enkidu approached him,
 They met in the public street.
 Enkidu blocked the door to the wedding with his foot,
 Not allowing Gilgamesh to enter.
 They grappled each other, holding fast like wrestlers, 100
 They shattered the doorpost, the wall shook.
 Gilgamesh and Enkidu grappled each other,
 Holding fast like wrestlers,
 They shattered the doorpost, the wall shook!
 They grappled each other at the door to the wedding, 105
 They fought in the street, the public square.
 It was Gilgamesh who knelt for the pin, his foot on the ground.
 His fury abated, he turned away.
 After he turned away,
 Enkidu said to him, to Gilgamesh: 110

As one unique did your mother bear you,
 The wild cow of the ramparts, Ninsun,
 Exalted you above the most valorous of men!
 Enlil has granted you kingship over the people.

They kissed each other and made friends. 115

[Gilgamesh speaks.]

Enkidu has neither father nor mother,
 His hair was growing freely,
 He was born in the steppe.

Enkidu stood still, listening to what he said,
 He shuddered and sat down. 120
 Tears filled his eyes,
 He was listless, his strength turned to weakness.
 They clasped each other,
 They joined hands.

Gilgamesh made ready to speak, 125
 Saying to Enkidu:

Why are your eyes full of tears,
 Why are you listless, your strength turned to weakness?

Enkidu said to him, to Gilgamesh:

Cries of sorrow, my friend, have cramped my muscles, Woe has entered my heart. 130

Gilgamesh made ready to speak,
Saying to Enkidu:

There dwells in the forest the fierce monster Humbaba,
You and I shall kill him 135
And wipe out something evil from the land.

Enkidu made ready to speak,
Saying to Gilgamesh:

My friend, I knew that country
When I roamed with the wild beasts. 140
The forest is sixty double leagues in every direction,
Who can go into it?
Humbaba's cry is the roar of a deluge,
His maw is fire, his breath is death.
Why do you want to do this? 145
The haunt of Humbaba is a hopeless quest.

Gilgamesh made ready to speak,
Saying to Enkidu:

I must go up the mountain forest,
I must cut a cedar tree 150
That cedar must be big enough
To make whirlwinds when it falls.

Enkidu made ready to speak,
Saying to Gilgamesh:

How shall the likes of us go to the forest of cedars, my friend? 155
In order to safeguard the forest of cedars,
Enlil has appointed him to terrify the people,
Enlil has destined him seven fearsome glories.<sup>9</sup>
That journey is not to be undertaken,
That creature is not to be looked upon. 160
The guardian of [. . .], the forest of cedars, Humbaba's cry is the roar of a deluge,
His maw is fire, his breath is death.
He can hear rustling in the forest for sixty double leagues.
Who can go into his forest? 165
Adad is first and Humbaba is second.
Who, even among the gods, could attack him?
In order to safeguard the forest of cedars,
Enlil has appointed him to terrify the people,
Enlil has destined him seven fearsome glories. 170
Besides, whosoever enters his forest is struck down by disease.

9. It was believed that divine beings were surrounded by an awe-inspiring radiance. In the older versions of Gilgamesh, this radiance was considered removable, like garments or jewelry.

Gilgamesh made ready to speak,
Saying to Enkidu:

Why, my friend, do you raise such unworthy objections?
Who, my friend, can go up to heaven? 175
The gods dwell forever in the sun, People's days are numbered,
Whatever they attempt is a puff of air.
Here you are, even you, afraid of death,
What has become of your bravery's might? 180
I will go before you,
You can call out to me, "Go on, be not afraid!"
If I fall on the way, I'll establish my name:
"Gilgamesh, who joined battle with fierce Humbaba," they'll say.

You were born and grew up on the steppe, 185
When a lion sprang at you, you knew what to do.
Young men fled before you

You speak unworthily,
How you pule! You make me ill.
I must set my hand to cutting a cedar tree, 190
I must establish eternal fame.
Come, my friend, let's both be off to the foundry,
Let them cast axes such as we'll need.

Off they went to the craftsmen,
The craftsmen, seated around, discussed the matter. 195
They cast great axes,
Axe blades weighing 180 pounds each they cast.
They cast great daggers,
Their blades were 120 pounds each,
The cross guards of their handles thirty pounds each. 200
They carried daggers worked with thirty pounds of gold, Gilgamesh and Enkidu bore ten times sixty pounds each.

Gilgamesh spoke to the elders of ramparted Uruk:

Hear me, O elders of ramparted Uruk,
The one of whom they speak 205
I, Gilgamesh, would see!
The one whose name resounds across the whole world,
I will hunt him down in the forest of cedars.
I will make the land hear How mighty is the scion of Uruk. 210
I will set my hand to cutting a cedar,
An eternal name I will make for myself!

The elders of ramparted Uruk arose,
They responded to Gilgamesh with their advice:

You are young, Gilgamesh, your feelings carry you away, 215
You are ignorant of what you speak, flightiness has taken you,

You do not know what you are attempting.
 We have heard of Humbaba, his features are grotesque,
 Who is there who could face his weaponry?
 He can hear rustling in the forest for sixty double leagues. 220
 Who can go into it?
 Humbaba's cry is the roar of a deluge,
 His maw is fire, his breath is death.
 Adad is first and Humbaba is second.
 Who, even among the gods, could attack him? 225
 In order to safeguard the forest of cedars,
 Enlil has appointed him to terrify the people,
 Enlil has destined him seven fearsome glories.
 Besides, whosoever enters his forest is struck down by disease.

When Gilgamesh heard the speech of his counselors, 230
 He looked at his friend and laughed:

Now then, my friend, do you say the same:
 "I am afraid to die"?

Tablet III

The elders spoke to him, saying to Gilgamesh:

Come back safely to Uruk's haven,
 Trust not, Gilgamesh, in your strength alone,
 Let your eyes see all, make your blow strike home.
 He who goes in front saves his companion, 5
 He who knows the path protects his friend.
 Let Enkidu walk before you,
 He knows the way to the forest of cedars,
 He has seen battle, been exposed to combat.
 Enkidu will protect his friend, safeguard his companion, 10
 Let him return, to be a grave husband.<sup>1</sup>
 We in our assembly entrust the king to you,
 On your return, entrust the king again to us.

Gilgamesh made ready to speak,
 Saying to Enkidu: 15

Come, my friend, let us go to the sublime temple,
 To go before Ninsun, the great queen.
 Ninsun the wise, who is versed in all knowledge,
 Will send us on our way with good advice.

1. "Grave husband" plays on the words for "bride" and "interment" (grave); the phrase seems to portend Enkidu's death.

Clasping each other, hand in hand, 20
 Gilgamesh and Enkidu went to the sublime temple,
 To go before Ninsun, the great queen.
 Gilgamesh came forward and entered before her:

O Ninsun, I have taken on a noble quest, 25
 I travel a distant road, to where Humbaba is,
 To face a battle unknown,
 To mount a campaign unknown.
 Give me your blessing, that I may go on my journey,
 That I may indeed see your face safely again,
 That I may indeed reenter joyfully the gate of ramparted Uruk, 30
 That I may indeed return to hold the festival for the new year,
 That I may indeed celebrate the festival for the new year twice over.
 May that festival be held in my presence, the fanfare sound!
 May their drums resound before you!

Ninsun the wild cow heard them out with sadness, 35
 The speeches of Gilgamesh, her son, and Enkidu.
 Ninsun entered the bathhouse seven times,
 She bathed herself in water with tamarisk and soapwort.<sup>2</sup>
 She put on a garment as beseemed her body,
 She put on an ornament as beseemed her breast, 40
 She set [. . .] and donned her tiara.
 She climbed the stairs, mounted to the roof terrace,
 She set up an incense offering to Shamash.
 She made the offering, to Shamash she raised her hands in prayer:

Why did you endow my son Gilgamesh with a restless heart? 45
 Now you have moved him to travel
 A distant road, to where Humbaba is,
 To face a battle unknown,
 To mount an expedition unknown.
 Until he goes and returns, 50
 Until he reaches the forest of cedars,
 Until he has slain fierce Humbaba,
 And wipes out from the land the evil thing you hate,
 In the day, when you traverse the sky,
 May Aya,<sup>3</sup> your bride, not fear to remind you, 55
 “Entrust him to the watchmen of the night.”

While Gilgamesh journeys to the forest of cedars,
 May the days be long, may the nights be short,
 May his loins be girded, his arms strong!
 At night, let him make a camp for sleeping, 60 Let him make a shelter to fall asleep in.
 May Aya, your bride, not fear to remind you,

2. A medicinal plant used in cleansing and magic.

3. Goddess of dawn and wife of Shamash, the sun god, often called upon in prayers to intercede with her husband.

When Gilgamesh, Enkidu, and Humbaba meet, Raise up for his sake, O Shamash, great winds against Humbaba,
 South wind, north wind, east wind, west wind, moaning wind, 65
 Blasting wind, lashing wind, contrary wind, dust storm,
 Demon wind, freezing wind, storm wind, whirlwind:
 Raise up thirteen winds to blot out Humbaba's face,
 So he cannot charge forward, cannot retreat,
 Then let Gilgamesh's weapons defeat Humbaba. 70
 As soon as your own [radiance] flares forth,
 At that very moment heed the man who reveres you.
 May your swift mules [. . .] you,
 A comfortable seat, a bed is laid for you,
 May the gods, your brethren, serve you your favorite foods, 75
 May Aya, the great bride, dab your face with the fringe of her spotless garment.

Ninsun the wild cow made a second plea to Shamash:

O Shamash, will not Gilgamesh [. . .] the gods for you?
 Will he not share heaven with you?
 Will he not share tiara and scepter with the moon? 80
 Will he not act in wisdom with Ea in the depths?
 Will he not rule the human race with Irnina?<sup>4</sup>
 Will he not dwell with Ningishzida<sup>5</sup> in the Land of No Return?

[Ninsun apparently inducts Enkidu into the staff of her temple.]

After Ninsun the wild cow had made her plea, Ninsun the wild cow, knowing and wise, who understands everything, 85
 She extinguished the incense, [she came down from the roof terrace],
 She summoned Enkidu to impart her message:

Mighty Enkidu, though you are no issue of my womb,
 Your little ones shall be among the devotees of Gilgamesh,
 The priestesses, votaries, cult women of the temple. 90

She placed a token around Enkidu's neck:

As the priestesses take in a foundling,
 And the daughters of the gods bring up an adopted child,
 I herewith take Enkidu, as my adopted son, may Gilgamesh treat him well. 95

His dignitaries stood by, wishing him well,
 In a crowd, the young men of Uruk ran along behind him,

4. Another name for Ishtar and a local form of the goddess.

5. Literally "Lord of the Upright Tree," a netherworld deity.

While his dignitaries made obeisance to him:

Come back safely to Uruk's haven!
 Trust not, Gilgamesh, in your strength alone, 100
 Let your eyes see all, make your blow strike home.
 He who goes in front saves his companion,
 He who knows the path protects his friend.
 Let Enkidu walk before you,
 He knows the way to the forest of cedars. 105
 He has seen battle, been exposed to combat.
 Enkidu will protect his friend, safeguard his companion,
 Let him return, to be a grave husband.
 We in our assembly entrust the king to you,
 On your return, entrust the king again to us. 110

The elders hailed him,
 Counseled Gilgamesh for the journey:

Trust not, Gilgamesh, in your own strength,
 Let your vision be clear, take care of yourself.
 Let Enkidu go ahead of you, 115
 He has seen the road, has traveled the way.
 He knows the ways into the forest
 And all the tricks of Humbaba.
 He who goes first safeguards his companion,
 His vision is clear, he protects himself. 120
 May Shamash help you to your goal,
 May he disclose to you what your words propose,
 May he open for you the barred road,
 Make straight the pathway to your tread,
 Make straight the upland to your feet. 125
 May nightfall bring you good tidings,
 May Lugalbanda stand by you in your cause.
 In a trice accomplish what you desire,
 Wash your feet in the river of Humbaba whom you seek.
 When you stop for the night, dig a well, 130
 May there always be pure water in your waterskin.<sup>6</sup>
 You should libate cool water to Shamash
 And be mindful of Lugalbanda.

Tablet IV

At twenty double leagues they took a bite to eat,
 At thirty double leagues they made their camp,
 Fifty double leagues they went in a single day,
 A journey of a month and a half in three days.
 They approached Mount Lebanon. 5 Towards sunset they dug a well, Filled their waterskin with water.

6. Travelers carried drinking water in leather bags.

Gilgamesh went up onto the mountain,
He poured out flour for an offering, saying.

O mountain, bring me a propitious dream! 10

Enkidu made Gilgamesh a shelter for receiving dreams,
A gust was blowing, he fastened the door.
He had him lie down in a circle of flour,
And spreading out like a net, Enkidu lay down in the doorway.
Gilgamesh sat there, chin on his knee. 15
Sleep, which usually steals over people, fell upon him.
In the middle of the night he awoke,
Got up and said to his friend:

My friend, did you not call me? Why am I awake?
Did you not touch me? Why am I disturbed? 20
Did a god not pass by? Why does my flesh tingle?
My friend, I had a dream,
And the dream I had was very disturbing.

The one born in the steppe,
Enkidu explained the dream to his friend: 25

My friend, your dream is favorable,
The dream is very precious as an omen.
My friend, the mountain you saw is Humbaba,
We will catch Humbaba and kill him,
Then we will throw down his corpse on the field of battle. 30
Further, at dawn the word of Shamash will be in our favor.

 My friend, I had a second dream,
 And the dream I had was very disturbing.
 A mountain was in my dream, an enemy. 55
 It threw me down, pinning my feet,
 A fearsome glare grew ever more intense.
 A certain young man, handsomest in the world, truly handsome he was,
 He pulled me out from the base of the mountain,
 He gave me water to drink and eased my fear, 60
 He set my feet on the ground again.

The one born in the steppe,
 Enkidu explained the dream to his friend:

My friend, your dream is favorable,
 The dream is very precious as an omen. 65
 My friend, we will go [. . .]
 The strange thing was Humbaba,
 Was not the mountain, the strange thing, Humbaba?
 Come then, banish your fear.

The heavens cried out, the earth was thundering, Daylight faded, darkness fell,
 Lightning flashed, fire shot up, 95
 The flames burgeoned, spewing death.
 Then the glow was dimmed, the fire was extinguished,
 The burning coals that were falling turned to ashes.
 You who were born in the steppe, let us discuss it.

Enkidu [explained], helped him accept his dream, 100
 Saying to Gilgamesh:

[Enkidu's explanation is mostly lost, but perhaps it was that the volcanolike explosion was Humbaba, who flared up, then died.]

Humbaba, like a god [. . .]
 [. . .] the light flaring [. . .]
 We will be victorious over him.
 Humbaba aroused our fury, 105
 we will prevail over him.

 Did you not touch me? Why am I disturbed?
 Did a god not pass by? Why does my flesh tingle?
 My friend, I had a [fourth] dream,
 The dream I had was very disturbing.
 My friend, I saw a fourth dream, 130
 More terrible than the other three.

7. Mountain ranges along the Mediterranean coast of present-day Lebanon.

I saw the lion-headed monster-bird Anzu<sup>8</sup> in the sky.
 He began to descend upon us, like a cloud.
 He was terrifying, his appearance was horrible!
 His maw was fire, his breath death.

[Enkidu explains the fourth dream.]

The lion-headed monster-bird Anzu who descended upon us, like a cloud,
 Who was terrifying, whose appearance was horrible,
 Whose maw was fire, whose breath was death,
 Whose dreadful aura frightens you.
 The young man you saw was mighty Shamash.

[It is not clear how many dreams there were in all though one version refers to five. A poorly preserved manuscript of an old version includes the following dream that could be inserted here, as portions of it are fulfilled in Tablet VI.]

I was grasping a wild bull of the steppe!
 As it bellowed, it split the earth,
 It raised clouds of dust, blotting out the sky.
 I crouched down before it,
 It seized my hands, pinioned my arms.
 Someone pulled me out,
 He stroked my cheeks, he gave me to drink from his waterskin.

145

[Enkidu explains the dream.]

It is the god, my friend, to whom we go,
 The wild bull was no enemy at all,
 The wild bull you saw is Shamash, the protector,
 He will take our hands in need.
 The one who gave you water to drink from his waterskin
 Is your god who proclaims your glory, Lugalbanda.
 We should rely on one another,
 We will accomplish together a deed unheard of in the land.

[Something has happened to discourage Gilgamesh, perhaps an unfavorable oracle. Shamash comes to their aid with timely advice, just before they hear Humbaba's cry.]

Remember, stand by me, hear [my prayer],
 Gilgamesh, scion of [ramparted Uruk]!

8. Monstrous bird with the head of a lion. He appears in a mythological story, where he steals power from the god Enlil but is defeated in battle by Enlil's son Ninurta.

Shamash heard what he said,
From afar a warning voice called to him from the sky: 160

Hurry, confront him, do not let him go off into the forest,
Do not let him enter the thicket!
He has not donned all of his seven fearsome glories,
One he has on, six he has left off!

They charged forward like wild bulls. 165
He let out a single bloodcurdling cry,
The guardian of the forest shrieked aloud, Humbaba was roaring like thunder.

Gilgamesh made ready to speak,
Said to Enkidu: 170

Humbaba [. . .]
We cannot confront him separately.

Gilgamesh spoke to him, said to Enkidu:

My friend, why do we raise such unworthy objections?
Have we not crossed all the mountains? 175
The end of the quest is before us.
My friend knows battle,
You rubbed on herbs, you did not fear death,
Your battle cry should be dinning like a drum!
Let the paralysis leave your arm, let weakness quit your knees, 180
Take my hand, my friend, let us walk on together!
Your heart should be urging you to battle.
Forget about death,
He who marches first, protects himself,
Let him keep his comrade safe! 185
Those two will have established fame down through the ages.

The pair reached the edge of the forest,
They stopped their talk and stood there.

Tablet V

They stood at the edge of the forest,
They gazed at the height of the cedars,
They gazed at the way into the forest.
Where Humbaba would walk, a path was made,
Straight were the ways and easy the going. 5
They saw the cedar mountain, dwelling of the gods, sacred to the goddess Irnina.
On the slopes of that mountain, the cedar bears its abundance, Agreeable is its shade, full of pleasures.
The undergrowth is tangled, the [thicket] interwoven.

Humbaba made ready to speak, saying to Gilgamesh:

How well-advised they are, the fool Gilgamesh and the yokelman!
 Why have you come here to me?
 Come now, Enkidu, small-fry, who does not know his father, Spawn of a turtle or tortoise, who sucked no mother's milk!
 I used to see you when you were younger but would not go near you. 15
 Had I killed the likes of you, would I have filled my belly?
 You have brought Gilgamesh before me,
 You stand there, a barbarian foe!
 I should cut off your head, Gilgamesh, throat and neck,
 I should let caving buzzard, screaming eagle, and vulture feed on your flesh. 20

Gilgamesh made ready to speak, saying to Enkidu:

My friend, Humbaba's features have grown more grotesque,
 We strode up like heroes to vanquish him.

Enkidu made ready to speak, saying to Gilgamesh:

Why, my friend, do you raise such unworthy objections? 25
 How you pule! You make me ill.
 Now, my friend, this has dragged on long enough.
 The time has come to pour the copper into the mold.
 Will you take another hour to blow the bellows,
 An hour more to let it cool? 30
 To launch the flood weapon, to wield the lash, Retreat not a foot, you must not turn back,
 Let your eyes see all, let your blow strike home!

[In the combat with Humbaba, the rift valley of Lebanon is formed by their circling feet.]

He struck the ground to confront him.
 At their heels the earth split apart, 35
 As they circled, the ranges of Lebanon were sundered!
 The white clouds turned black,
 Death rained down like fog upon them.
 Shamash raised the great winds against Humbaba,
 South wind, north wind, east wind, west wind, moaning wind, 40
 Blasting wind, lashing wind, contrary wind, dust storm,
 Demon wind, freezing wind, storm wind, whirlwind:
 The thirteen winds blotted out Humbaba's face,
 He could not charge forward, he could not retreat.
 Then Gilgamesh's weapons defeated Humbaba. 45

Humbaba begged for life, saying to Gilgamesh:

You were once a child, Gilgamesh, you had a mother who bore you,
 You are the offspring of Ninsun the wild cow.
 You grew up to fulfill the oracle of Shamash, lord of the mountain:
 “Gilgamesh, scion of Uruk, is to be king.”

O Gilgamesh, spare my life!
 Let me dwell here for you [as your . . .],
 Say however many trees you [require . . .],
 For you I will guard the myrtle wood [. . .].

Enkidu made ready to speak, saying to Gilgamesh:

55

My friend! Do not listen to what Humbaba says,
 Do not heed his entreaties!

[Humbaba is speaking to Enkidu.]

You know the lore of my forest,
 And you understand all I have to say.
 I might have lifted you up, dangled you from a twig at the entrance to my forest,
 I might have let cawing buzzard, screaming eagle, and vulture feed
 on your flesh.
 Now then, Enkidu, mercy is up to you,
 Tell Gilgamesh to spare my life!

Enkidu made ready to speak, saying to Gilgamesh:

My friend! Humbaba is guardian of the forest of cedars, Finish him off for the kill, put him out of existence.
 Humbaba is guardian of the forest of cedars,
 Finish him off for the kill, put him out of existence,
 Before Enlil the foremost one hears of this!
 The great gods will become angry with us, Enlil in Nippur, Shamash in Larsa.<sup>9</sup>
 Establish your reputation for all time:

70

May the pair of them never reach old age!
 May Gilgamesh and Enkidu come across no graver friend to bank on!<sup>1</sup>

9. Nippur and Larsa are cities in Babylonia with important temples to Enlil and Shamash, respectively.

1. This is one of the elaborate, sometimes obscure wordplays in Gilgamesh. In Humbaba's curse, cross sounds like friend and bank echoes grave, so that the giant's words can mean either “May they not cross water safely to the opposite bank” or “May they not find a friend to rely on.”

Gilgamesh said to Enkidu:

Now, my friend, let us go on to victory!
The glories will be lost in the confusion,
The glories will be lost and the brightness will [. . .].

Enkidu said to him, to Gilgamesh:

My friend, catch the bird and where will its chicks go?
Let us search out the glories later,
They will run around in the grass like chicks.
Strike him again, then kill his retinue.

[Gilgamesh kills Humbaba. In some versions he has to strike multiple blows before the monster falls.]

Gilgamesh heeded his friend's command,

He raised the axe at his side,
He drew the sword at his belt.

Gilgamesh struck him on the neck,

Enkidu, his friend, [. . .].

They pulled out [. . .] as far as the lungs, 90

He tore out the [. . .],

He forced the head into a cauldron.

[. . .] in abundance fell on the mountain,

He struck him, Humbaba the guardian, down to the ground.

His blood [. . .]

For two leagues the cedars [. . .].

He killed the glories with him.

He slew the monster, guardian of the forest,

At whose cry the mountains of Lebanon trembled,

At whose cry all the mountains quaked.

He slew the monster, guardian of the forest,

He trampled on the broken [. . .],

He struck down the seven glories.

The battle net [. . .], the sword weighing eight times sixty pounds,

He took the weight of ten times sixty pounds upon him,

105

He forced his way into the forest,

He opened the secret dwelling of the supreme gods.

Gilgamesh cut down the trees,

Enkidu chose the timbers.

Enkidu made ready to speak, said to Gilgamesh:

110

You killed the guardian by your strength,
Who else could cut through this forest of trees?

My friend, we have felled the lofty cedar,

Whose crown once pierced the sky.

I will make a door six times twelve cubits high, two times twelve cubits wide, 115

One cubit shall be its thickness,
 Its hinge pole, ferrule, and pivot box shall be unique.<sup>2</sup>
 Let no stranger approach it, may only a god go through.
 Let the Euphrates bring it to Nippur, Nippur, the sanctuary of Enlil.
 May Enlil be delighted with you,
 May Enlil rejoice over it!

They lashed together a raft Enkidu embarked
 And Gilgamesh [. . .] the head of Humbaba.

125

Tablet VI

He washed his matted locks, cleaned his head strap,
 He shook his hair down over his shoulders.
 He threw off his filthy clothes, he put on clean ones,
 Wrapping himself in a cloak, he tied on his sash, Gilgamesh put on his kingly diadem.
 The princess Ishtar coveted Gilgamesh's beauty:

Come, Gilgamesh, you shall be my bridegroom!
 Give, oh give me of your lusciousness!
 You shall be my husband and I shall be your wife.
 I will ready for you a chariot of lapis and gold,
 With golden wheels and fittings of gemstones,
 You shall harness storm demons as if they were giant mules.
 Enter our house amidst fragrance of cedar,
 When you enter our house,
 The splendid exotic doorsill shall do you homage,
 Kings, nobles, and princes shall kneel before you,
 They shall bring you gifts of mountain and lowland as tribute.
 Your goats shall bear triplets, your ewes twins,
 Your pack-laden donkey shall overtake the mule,
 Your horses shall run proud before the wagon,
 Your ox in the yoke shall have none to compare!

20

Gilgamesh made ready to speak,
 Saying to the princess Ishtar:
 What shall I give you if I take you to wife?
 Shall I give you a headdress for your person, or clothing?
 Shall I give you bread or drink?
 Shall I give you food, worthy of divinity?
 Shall I give you drink, worthy of queenship?
 What would I get if I marry you?
 You are a brazier that goes out when it freezes,

2. Mesopotamian doors did not use hinges but were made of a panel attached to a post. It was this post, or "hinge pole," that rotated when the door was opened or closed, sometimes on a piece of metal, or "ferrule," at the bottom. The top of the post was cased or enclosed so the hinge pole would not slip off its pivot point.

A flimsy door that keeps out neither wind nor draught,
 A palace that crushes a warrior,
 A mouse that gnaws through its housing,
 Tar that smears its bearer,
 Waterskin that soaks its bearer, 35
 Weak stone that undermines a wall, Battering ram that destroys the wall for an enemy,
 Shoe that pinches its wearer!
 Which of your lovers lasted forever?
 Which of your heroes went up to heaven? 40
 Come, I call you to account for your lovers:
 He who had jugs of cream on his shoulders and [. . .] on his arm,
 For Dumuzi,<sup>3</sup> your girlhood lover,
 You ordained year after year of weeping.
 You fell in love with the brightly colored roller bird, 45
 Then you struck him and broke his wing.
 In the woods he sits crying "My-wing!"
 You fell in love with the lion, perfect in strength,
 Then you dug for him ambush pits, seven times seven.
 You fell in love with the wild stallion, eager for the fray, 50
 Whip, goad, and lash you ordained for him,
 Seven double leagues of galloping you ordained for him,
 You ordained that he muddy his water when he drinks,
 You ordained perpetual weeping for his mother, divine Silili.
 You fell in love with the shepherd, keeper of herds, 55
 Who always set out cakes baked in embers for you, Slaughtered kids for you every day.
 You struck him and turned him into a wolf,
 His own shepherd boys harry him off,
 And his own hounds snap at his heels! 60
 You fell in love with Ishullanu,<sup>4</sup> your father's gardener,
 Who always brought you baskets of dates,
 Who daily made your table splendid.
 You wanted him, so you sidled up to him:
 "My Ishullanu, let's have a taste of your vigor! 65 Bring out your member, touch our sweet spot!" Ishullanu said to you,
 "Me? What do you want of me?
 Hath my mother not baked? Have I not eaten?
 Shall what I taste for food be insults and curses? 70
 In the cold, is my cover to be the touch of a reed?"
 When you heard what he said,
 You struck him and turned him into a scarecrow,
 You left him stuck in his own garden patch,
 His well sweep goes up no longer, his bucket does not descend. 75

3. Shepherd god. He was a youthful lover of Ishtar, who let him be taken to the nether-world when she had to provide a substitute for herself.

4. According to a Sumerian myth, Ishtar seduced a gardener named Ishullanu whom she then sought to kill.

As for me, now that you've fallen in love with me, you will treat me like them!

When Ishtar heard this,
Ishtar was furious and went up to heaven,
Ishtar went sobbing before Anu, her father,
Before Antum, her mother, her tears flowed down:

Father, Gilgamesh has said outrageous things about me, Gilgamesh's been spouting insults about me,
Insults and curses against me!

Anu made ready to speak,
Saying to the princess Ishtar:

85

Well now, did you not provoke the king, Gilgamesh,
And so Gilgamesh spouted insults about you, Insults and curses against you?

Ishtar made ready to speak,
Saying to Anu, her father:

90

Well then, Father, pretty please, the Bull of Heaven,
So I can kill Gilgamesh on his home ground.
If you don't give me the Bull of Heaven,
I'll strike [. . .] to its foundation,
I'll raise up the dead to devour the living,
The dead shall outnumber the living!

Anu made ready to speak,
Saying to the princess Ishtar:

If you insist on the Bull of Heaven from me,
Let the widow of Uruk gather seven years of chaff,
Let the farmer of Uruk raise seven years of hay.

Ishtar made ready to speak,
Saying to Anu, her father:

The widow of Uruk has gathered seven years of chaff,
The farmer of Uruk has raised seven years of hay.
With the Bull of Heaven's fury I will kill him!

When Anu heard what Ishtar said,
He placed the lead rope of the Bull of Heaven in her hand, Ishtar led the Bull of Heaven away.

When it reached Uruk,
It dried up the groves, reedbeds, and marshes,
It went down to the river, it lowered the river by seven cubits.
At the bull's snort, a pit opened up,
One hundred young men of Uruk fell into it.
At its second snort, a pit opened up,
Two hundred young men of Uruk fell into it.

115

At its third snort, a pit opened up, Enkidu fell into it, up to his middle.
 Enkidu jumped out and seized the bull by its horns,
 The bull spewed its foam in his face, 120
 Swished dung at him with the tuft of its tail.
 Enkidu made ready to speak,
 Saying to Gilgamesh:

I have seen, my friend, the strength of the Bull of Heaven,
 So knowing its strength, I know how to deal with it. 125
 I will get around the strength of the Bull of Heaven,
 I will circle behind the Bull of Heaven,
 I will grab it by the tuft of its tail,
 I will set my feet on its [. . .],
 Then you, like a strong, skillful slaughterer, 130
 Thrust your dagger between neck, horn, and tendon!

Enkidu circled behind the Bull of Heaven,
 He grabbed it by the tuft of its tail,
 He set his feet on its [. . .],
 And Gilgamesh, like a strong, skillful slaughterer, 135 Thrust his dagger between neck, horn, and tendon!

After they had killed the Bull of Heaven,
 They ripped out its heart and set it before Shamash.
 They stepped back and prostrated themselves before Shamash,
 Then the two comrades sat down beside each other. 140
 Ishtar went up on the wall of ramparted Uruk,
 She writhed in grief, she let out a wail:

That bully Gilgamesh who demeaned me, he's killed the Bull of Heaven!

When Enkidu heard what Ishtar said,
 He tore off the bull's haunch and flung it at her: 145

If I could vanquish you, I'd turn you to this,
 I'd drape the guts beside you!

Ishtar convened the cult women, prostitutes, harlots,
 She set up a lament over the haunch of the bull.

Gilgamesh summoned all the expert craftsmen, 150
 The craftsmen marveled at the massiveness of its horns,
 They were molded from thirty pounds each of lapis blue,
 Their outer shell was two thumbs thick!
 Six times three hundred quarts of oil, the capacity of both,
 He donated to anoint the statue of his god, Lugalbanda. 155
 He brought them inside and hung them up in his master bedroom.

They washed their hands in the Euphrates, Claspings each other, they came away,

Paraded through the streets of Uruk.
 The people of Uruk crowded to look upon them. 160
 Gilgamesh made a speech
 To the servant-women of his palace:

Who is the handsomest of young men?
 Who is the most glorious of males?
 Gilgamesh is the handsomest of young men! 165
 Gilgamesh is the most glorious of males!
 She at whom we flung the haunch in our passion, Ishtar, she has no one in the street to satisfy her.

Gilgamesh held a celebration in his palace.
 The young men slept stretched out on the couch of night. 170
 While Enkidu slept, he had a dream.

Tablet VII

My friend, why were the great gods in council?

Enkidu raised, spoke to the door as if it were human:<sup>5</sup>

O bosky door, insensate,
 Which lends an ear that is not there, 5
 I sought your wood for twenty double leagues, Till I beheld a lofty cedar.
 No rival had your tree in the forest.
 Six times twelve cubits was your height, two times twelve cubits was your width,
 One cubit was your thickness, 10
 Your hinge pole, ferrule, and pivot box were unique.
 I made you, I brought you to Nippur, I set you up.
 Had I known, O door, how you would requite me,
 And that this your goodness towards me [. . .],
 I would have raised my axe, I would have chopped you down, 15
 I would have floated you as a raft to the temple of Shamash,
 I would have set up the lion-headed monster-bird Anzu at its gate, Because Shamash heard my plea
 He gave me the weapon to kill Humbaba.
 Now then, O door, it was I who made you, it was I who set you up. 20
 I will tear you out!
 May a king who shall arise after me despise you,
 May he alter my inscription and put on his own!<sup>6</sup>

5. Because there is a gap in the text, it is unclear why Enkidu curses the door so violently. Since it is made of cedar wood from the forest, it might embody the adventure that results in Enkidu's death.

6. These concluding words of Enkidu's curse of the cedar door parody traditional Mesopotamian inscriptions affixed to monuments, which called the wrath of the gods upon anyone who damaged, removed, or usurped the monument.

He tore out his hair, threw away his clothing.

When he heard out this speech, swiftly, quickly his tears flowed down, 25
When Gilgamesh heard out Enkidu's speech, swiftly, quickly, his tears flowed down.

Gilgamesh made ready to speak, saying to Enkidu:

My friend, you are rational but you say strange things,
Why, my friend, does your heart speak strange things?
The dream is a most precious omen, though very frightening, 30
Your lips are buzzing like flies.
Though frightening, the dream is a precious omen.
The gods left mourning for the living,
The dream left mourning for the living,
The dream left woe for the living! 35
Now I shall go pray to the great gods,
I will be assiduous to my own god, I will pray to yours,
To Anu, father of the gods,
To Enlil, counselor of the gods,
I will make your image of gold beyond measure. 40
You can pay no silver, no gold can you [. . .],
What Enlil commanded is not like the [. . .] of the gods,
What he commanded, he will not retract.
The verdict he has scrivened, he will not reverse nor erase.
People often die before their time. 45

At the first glimmer of dawn,
Enkidu lifted his head, weeping before Shamash,
Before the sun's fiery glare, his tears flowed down:

I have turned to you, O Shamash, on account of the precious days of my life,
As for that hunter, the entrapping-man, 50
Who did not let me get as much life as my friend,
May that hunter not get enough to make him a living.
Make his profit loss, cut down his take,
May his income, his portion evaporate before you,
Any wildlife that enters his traps, make it go out the window! 55

When he had cursed the hunter to his heart's content,
He resolved to curse the harlot Shamhat:

Come, Shamhat, I will ordain you a destiny,
A destiny that will never end, forever and ever!
I will lay on you the greatest of all curses, 60
Swiftly, inexorably, may my curse come upon you.
May you never make a home that you can enjoy,
May you never caress a child of your own,
May you never be received among decent women.
May beer sludge impregnate your lap, 65
May the drunkard bespatter your best clothes with vomit.

May your swain prefer beauties,
 May he pinch you like potter's clay.
 May you get no alabaster,
 May no table to be proud of be set in your house. 70
 May the nook you enjoy be a doorstep,
 May the public crossroads be your dwelling,
 May vacant lots be your sleeping place,
 May the shade of a wall be your place of business.
 May brambles and thorns flay your feet, 75
 May toper and sober slap your cheek.<sup>7</sup>
 May riffraff of the street shove each other in your brothel,
 May there be a brawl there.
 When you stroll with your cronies, may they catcall after you.
 May the builder not keep your roof in repair, 80
 May the screech owl roost in the ruins of your home.
 May a feast never be held where you live.

 May your purple finery be expropriated,
 May filthy underwear be what you are given,
 Because you diminished me, an innocent, 85
 Yes me, an innocent, you wronged me in my steppe.

When Shamash heard what he said,
 From afar a warning voice called to him from the sky:

O Enkidu, why curse Shamhat the harlot,
 Who fed you bread, fit for a god, 90
 Who poured you beer, fit for a king,
 Who dressed you in a noble garment,
 And gave you handsome Gilgamesh for a comrade?
 Now then, Gilgamesh is your friend and blood brother!
 Won't he lay you down in the ultimate resting place? 95
 In a perfect resting place he will surely lay you down!
 He will settle you in peaceful rest in that dwelling sinister,
 Rulers of the netherworld will do you homage.
 He will have the people of Uruk shed bitter tears for you,
 He will make the pleasure-loving people burdened down for you, 100
 And, as for him, after your death, he will let his hair grow matted,
 He will put on a lion skin and roam the steppe.

When Enkidu heard the speech of the valiant Shamash, His raging heart was calmed, his fury was calmed: 105

Come, Shamhat, I will ordain you a destiny,
 My mouth that cursed you, let it bless you instead.
 May governors and dignitaries fall in love with you,
 May the man one double league away slap his thighs in excitement,
 May the man two double leagues away let down his hair. 110

7. That is, may anyone hit her, drunk or not.

May the subordinate not hold back from you, but open his trousers,
 May he give you obsidian, lapis, and gold,
 May ear bangles be your gift.
 To the man whose wealth is secure, whose granaries are full,
 May Ishtar of the gods introduce you, 115
 For your sake may the wife and mother of seven be abandoned.

Enkidu was sick at heart,
 He lay there lonely.
 He told his friend what weighed on his mind:

My friend, what a dream I had last night! 120
 Heaven cried out, earth made reply,
 I was standing between them.
 There was a certain man, his face was somber,
 His face was like that of the lion-headed monster-bird Anzu,
 His hands were the paws of a lion, 125
 His fingernails were the talons of an eagle.
 He seized me by the hair, he was too strong for me,
 I hit him but he sprang back like a swing rope,
 He hit me and capsized me like a raft.
 Like a wild bull he trampled me, 130
 “Save me, my friend!”—but you did not save me!
 He trussed my limbs like a bird’s.
 Holding me fast, he took me down to the house of shadows,
     the dwelling of hell,
 To the house whence none who enters comes forth,
 On the road from which there is no way back, 135
 To the house whose dwellers are deprived of light,
 Where dust is their fare and their food is clay.
 They are dressed like birds in feather garments,
 Yea, they shall see no daylight, for they abide in darkness.
 Dust lies thick on the door and bolt, 140
 When I entered that house of dust,
 I saw crowns in a heap,
 There dwelt the kings, the crowned heads who once ruled the land,
 Who always set out roast meat for Anu and Enlil, Who always set out baked offerings, libated cool water from waterskins. 145
 In that house of dust I entered,
 Dwelt high priests and acolytes,
 Dwelt reciters of spells and ecstasies,<sup>8</sup>
 Dwelt the anointers of the great gods, Dwelt old King Etana<sup>9</sup> and the god of the beasts, 150 Dwelt the queen of the netherworld, Ereshkigal.<sup>1</sup>

8. Reciters of spells were learned scholars, while prophets, or “ecstasies,” were people who spoke in a trance without having studied their words. Ecstasies were sometimes social outcasts or people without education.

9. Ancient king who was said to have flown up to heaven on an eagle to find a plant that would help him and his wife have a child.

1. Queen of the netherworld and jealous sister of the goddess Ishtar.

Belet-seri,<sup>2</sup> scribe of the netherworld, was kneeling before her,
 She was holding a tablet and reading to her,
 She lifted her head, she looked at me:
 “Who brought this man?” 155
 I who went with you through all hardships, Remember me, my friend, do not forget what I have undergone!
 My friend had a dream needing no interpretation.

The day he had the dream, his strength ran out.
 Enkidu lay there one day, a second day he was ill, 160
 Enkidu lay in his bed, his illness grew worse.
 A third day, a fourth day, Enkidu's illness grew worse.
 A fifth, a sixth, a seventh,
 An eighth, a ninth, a tenth day,
 Enkidu's illness grew worse. 165
 An eleventh, a twelfth day, Enkidu lay in his bed.
 He called for Gilgamesh, roused him with his cry:

My friend laid on me the greatest curse of all!
 I feared the battle but will die in my bed, 170
 My friend, he who falls quickly in battle is glorious.

[Enkidu dies.]

Tablet VIII

At the first glimmer of dawn,
 Gilgamesh lamented his friend:

Enkidu, my friend, your mother the gazelle,
 Your father the wild ass brought you into the world,
 Onagers raised you on their milk, 5
 And the wild beasts taught you all the grazing places.
 The pathways, O Enkidu, to the forest of cedars,
 May they weep for you, without falling silent, night and day.
 May the elders of the teeming city, ramparted Uruk, weep for you,
 May the crowd who blessed our departure weep for you. 10
 May the heights of highland and mountain weep for you,
 May the lowlands wail like your mother.
 May the forest of balsam and cedar weep for you,
 Which we slashed in our fury.
 May bear, hyena, panther, leopard, deer, jackal, 15
 Lion, wild bull, gazelle, ibex, the beasts and creatures of the steppe, weep for you.<sup>3</sup> May the sacred Ulaya River<sup>4</sup> weep for you, along whose banks we once strode erect,
 May the holy Euphrates weep for you,
 Whose waters we libated from waterskins.

2. Literally “Lady of the Steppe,” scribe and bookkeeper in the netherworld.

3. This refers to an episode that does not appear in the extant portions of the epic.

4. Karun River in the southwest of modern Iran.

May the young men of ramparted Uruk weep for you, 20
 Who watched us slay the Bull of Heaven in combat.
 May the plowman weep for you at his plow,
 Who extolled your name in the sweet song of harvest home.
 May they weep for you, of the teeming city of Uruk,
 Who exalted your name at the first [. . .]. 25
 May the shepherd and herdsman weep for you,
 Who held the milk and buttermilk to your mouth,
 May the nurse weep for you,
 Who treated your rashes with butter.
 May the harlot weep for you, 30
 Who massaged you with sweet-smelling oil.
 Like brothers may they weep for you,
 Like sisters may they tear out their hair for your sake.
 Enkidu, as your father, your mother,
 I weep for you bitterly. 35

Hear me, O young men, listen to me, Hear me, O elders of Uruk, listen to me!
 I mourn my friend Enkidu,
 I howl as bitterly as a professional keener.
 Oh for the axe at my side, oh for the safeguard by my hand, 40
 Oh for the sword at my belt, oh for the shield before me, Oh for my best garment, oh for the raiment that pleased me most!
 An ill wind rose against me and snatched it away!
 O my friend, swift wild donkey, mountain onager, panther of the steppe, O Enkidu my friend, swift wild donkey, mountain onager, panther of the steppe! 45
 You who stood by me when we climbed the mountain, Seized and slew the Bull of Heaven, Felled Humbaba who dwelt in the forest of cedar,
 What now is this sleep that has seized you?
 Come back to me! You hear me not. 50

But, as for him, he did not raise his head.
 He touched his heart but it was not beating.
 Then he covered his friend's face, like a bride's.
 He hovered round him like an eagle,
 Like a lioness whose cubs are in a pitfall, 55
 He paced to and fro, back and forth,
 Tearing out and hurling away the locks of his hair, Ripping off and throwing away his fine clothes like something foul.

At the first glimmer of dawn,
 Gilgamesh sent out a proclamation to the land: 60

Hear ye, blacksmith, lapidary,<sup>5</sup> metalworker, goldsmith, jeweler!
 Make an image of my friend,
 Such as no one ever made of his friend!

5. Gem carver.

I will lay you down in the ultimate resting place,
 In a perfect resting place I will surely lay you down. 65
 I will settle you in peaceful rest in that dwelling sinister, Rulers of the netherworld will do you homage.
 I will have the people of Uruk shed bitter tears for you,
 I will make the pleasure-loving people burdened down for you,
 And, as for me, now that you are dead, I will let my hair grow matted, 70
 I will put on a lion skin and roam the steppe!

He slaughtered fatted cattle and sheep, heaped them high for his friend,
 They carried off all the meat for the rulers of the netherworld.
 He displayed in the open for Ishtar, the great queen, Saying: "May Ishtar, the great queen, accept this, 75
 May she welcome my friend and walk at his side."

He displayed in the open for Ninshuluhha,<sup>6</sup> housekeeper of the netherworld, Saying: "May Ninshuluhha, housekeeper of the crowded netherworld, accept this,
 May she welcome my friend and walk at his side.
 May she intercede on behalf of my friend, lest he lose courage." 80
 The obsidian knife with lapis fitting,
 The sharpening stone pure-whetted with Euphrates water,
 He displayed in the open for Bibbu, meat carver of the netherworld, Saying: "May Bibbu, meat carver of the crowded netherworld,
 accept this,
 Welcome my friend and walk at his side." 85

Tablet IX

Gilgamesh was weeping bitterly for Enkidu, his friend,
 As he roamed the steppe:

Shall I not die too? Am I not like Enkidu?
 Oh woe has entered my vitals!
 I have grown afraid of death, so I roam the steppe. 5
 Having come this far, I will go on swiftly Towards Utanapishtim,<sup>7</sup> son of Ubar-Tutu.
 I have reached mountain passes at night.
 I saw lions, I felt afraid,
 I looked up to pray to the moon, 10
 To the moon, beacon of the gods, my prayers went forth:
 "Keep me safe!"

6. A netherworld deity in charge of ritual washing.

7. Akkadian name for the sage who, together with his wife, survived the Great Flood and became immortal. He resembles the biblical Noah and his name literally means "He Found Life." He is called "Ziusudra" in Sumerian and "Ullū" in Hittite.

[At night] he lay down, then awoke from a dream.
 He rejoiced to be alive.
 He raised the axe at his side,
 He drew the sword from his belt,
 He dropped among them like an arrow,
 He struck the lions, scattered, and killed them.

15

[Gilgamesh approaches the scorpion monsters who guard the gateway to the sun's passage through the mountains.]

The twin peaks are called Mashum.
 When he arrived at the twin peaks called Mashum,
 Which daily watch over the rising and setting of the sun,
 Whose peaks thrust upward to the vault of heaven,
 Whose flanks reach downward to hell,
 Where scorpion monsters guard its gateway,
 Whose appearance is dreadful, whose venom is death,
 Their fear-inspiring radiance spreads over the mountains,
 They watch over the sun at its rising and setting,
 When Gilgamesh saw their fearsomeness and terror,
 He covered his face.
 He took hold of himself and approached them.

30

The scorpion monster called to his wife:

This one who has come to us, his body is flesh of a god!

The wife of the scorpion monster answered him:

Two-thirds of him is divine, one-third is human.

The scorpion monster, the male one, called out,
 To Gilgamesh, scion of the gods, he said these words:

35

Who are you who have come this long way?

[The scorpion monster apparently warns Gilgamesh that he has only twelve hours to get through the sun's tunnel before the sun enters it at nightfall.]

The scorpion monster made ready to speak, spoke to him,
 Said to Gilgamesh, [scion of the gods]:

Go, Gilgamesh!

40

He opened to him the gateway of the mountain, Gilgamesh entered the mountain.
 He heeded the words of the scorpion monster,
 He set out on the way of the sun.
 When he had gone one double hour,

45

Dense was the darkness, no light was there,
 It would not let him look behind him.
 When he had gone two double hours,
 Dense was the darkness, no light was there,
 It would not let him look behind him. 50
 When he had gone three double hours,
 Dense was the darkness, no light was there,
 It would not let him look behind him.
 When he had gone four double hours,
 Dense was the darkness, no light was there, 55
 It would not let him look behind him.
 When he had gone five double hours,
 Dense was the darkness, no light was there,
 It would not let him look behind him.
 When he had gone six double hours, 60
 Dense was the darkness, no light was there,
 It would not let him look behind him.
 When he had gone seven double hours,
 Dense was the darkness, there was no light,
 It would not let him look behind him. 65
 When he had gone eight double hours, he rushed ahead,
 Dense was the darkness, there was no light,
 It would not let him look behind him.
 When he had gone nine double hours, he felt the north wind,
 Dense was the darkness, there was no light, 70
 It would not let him look behind him.
 When he had gone ten double hours,
 The time for the sun's entry was drawing near.
 When he had gone eleven double hours, just one double hour was left,
 When he had gone twelve double hours, he came out ahead of the sun! 75
 He had run twelve double hours, bright light still reigned!
 He went forward, seeing the trees of the gods.
 The carnelian bore its fruit,
 Like bunches of grapes dangling, lovely to see,
 The lapis bore foliage, 80
 Fruit it bore, a delight to behold.

Tablet X

[Gilgamesh approaches the tavern of Siduri, a female tavern keeper who lives at the end of the earth. This interesting personage is unknown outside this poem, nor is it clear who her clientele might be in such a remote spot.]

Siduri<sup>8</sup> the tavern keeper, who dwells at the edge of the sea,
 For her was wrought the cuprack,<sup>9</sup> for her the brewing vat of gold, Gilgamesh made his way towards her,
 He was clad in a skin,
 He had flesh of gods in his body. 5
 Woe was in his vitals,
 His face was like a traveler's from afar.
 The tavern keeper eyed him from a distance,
 Speaking to herself, she said these words,
 She debated with herself: 10

This no doubt is a slaughterer of wild bulls!
 Why would he make straight for my door?

At the sight of him the tavern keeper barred her door,
 She barred her door and mounted to the roof terrace.
 But he, Gilgamesh, put his ear to the door, 15
 He lifted his chin.

Gilgamesh said to her, to the tavern keeper:

Tavern keeper, when you saw me why did you bar your door,
 Bar your door and mount to the roof terrace?
 I will strike down your door, I will shatter your doorbolt, 20

Gilgamesh said to her, to the tavern keeper:

I am Gilgamesh, who killed the guardian,
 Who seized and killed the bull that came down from heaven,
 Who felled Humbaba who dwelt in the forest of cedars,
 Who killed lions at the mountain passes. 25

The tavern keeper said to him, to Gilgamesh:

If you are indeed Gilgamesh, who killed the guardian,
 Who felled Humbaba who dwelt in the forest of cedars,
 Who killed lions at the mountain passes,
 Who seized and killed the bull that came down from heaven, 30
 Why are your cheeks emaciated, your face cast down,
 Your heart wretched, your features wasted,
 Woe in your vitals,
 Your face like a traveler's from afar,

8. Literally, "Maiden" in Hurrian, a language of northern Syria and northern Mesopotamia that was not related to Sumerian or Akkadian.

9. Some Mesopotamian drinking cups were conical, with pointed bottoms, so they were set on a wooden rack to hold them up.

Your features weathered by cold and sun,
Why are you clad in a lion skin, roaming the steppe? 35

Gilgamesh said to her, to the tavern keeper:

My cheeks would not be emaciated, nor my face cast down,
Nor my heart wretched nor my features wasted,
Nor would there be woe in my vitals, 40
Nor would my face be like a traveler's from afar,
Nor would my features be weathered by cold and sun,
Nor would I be clad in a lion skin, roaming the steppe,
But for my friend, swift wild donkey, mountain onager, panther
of the steppe,
But for Enkidu, swift wild donkey, mountain onager, panther 45
of the steppe,
My friend whom I so loved, who went with me through every hardship, Enkidu, whom I so loved, who went with me through every hardship,
The fate of mankind has overtaken him.
Six days and seven nights I wept for him,
I would not give him up for burial, 50
Until a worm fell out of his nose.
I was frightened.
I have grown afraid of death, so I roam the steppe,
My friend's case weighs heavy upon me.
A distant road I roam over the steppe, 55
My friend Enkidu's case weighs heavy upon me!
A distant road I roam over the steppe,
How can I be silent? How can I hold my peace?
My friend whom I loved is turned into clay,
Enkidu, my friend whom I loved, is turned into clay! 60
Shall I too not lie down like him,
And never get up forever and ever?

[An old version adds the following episode.]

After his death I could find no life,
Back and forth I prowled like a bandit in the steppe.
Now that I have seen your face, tavern keeper, 65
May I not see that death I constantly fear!

The tavern keeper said to him, to Gilgamesh:

Gilgamesh, wherefore do you wander?
The eternal life you are seeking you shall not find.
When the gods created mankind, 70
They established death for mankind,
And withheld eternal life for themselves.
As for you, Gilgamesh, let your stomach be full,
Always be happy, night and day.
Make every day a delight, 75
Night and day play and dance.

Your clothes should be clean,
 Your head should be washed,
 You should bathe in water,
 Look proudly on the little one holding your hand, 80
 Let your mate be always blissful in your loins,
 This, then, is the work of mankind.

Gilgamesh said to her, to the tavern keeper:

What are you saying, tavern keeper?
 I am heartsick for my friend. 85
 What are you saying, tavern keeper?
 I am heartsick for Enkidu!

[The standard version resumes.]

Gilgamesh said to her, to the tavern keeper:

Now then, tavern keeper, what is the way to Utanapishtim?
 What are its signs? Give them to me. 90
 Give, oh give me its signs!
 If need be, I'll cross the sea,
 If not, I'll roam the steppe.

The tavern keeper said to him, to Gilgamesh:

Gilgamesh, there has never been a place to cross, 95
 There has been no one from the dawn of time who could ever cross this sea.
 The valiant Shamash alone can cross this sea,
 Save for the sun, who could cross this sea?
 The crossing is perilous, highly perilous the course,
 And midway lie the waters of death, whose surface is impassable. 100
 Suppose, Gilgamesh, you do cross the sea,
 When you reach the waters of death, what will you do?
 Yet, Gilgamesh, there is Ur-Shanabi,<sup>1</sup> Utanapishtim's boatman,
 He has the Stone Charms with him as he trims pine trees in the forest.
 Go, show yourself to him, 105
 If possible, cross with him, if not, then turn back.

[Gilgamesh advances and without preamble attacks Ur-Shanabi and smashes the Stone Charms.]

When Gilgamesh heard this,
 He raised the axe at his side,
 He drew the sword at his belt,
 He crept forward, went down towards them, 110
 Like an arrow he dropped among them,
 His battle cry resounded in the forest.
 When Ur-Shanabi saw the shining [. . .],

1. Servant of Utanapishtim, ferryman who crosses the ocean and the waters of death.

He raised his axe, he trembled before him,
 But he, for his part, struck his head [. . .] Gilgamesh, 115
 He seized his arm [. . .] his chest.
 And the Stone Charms, the protection . . . of the boat, Without which no one crosses the waters of death,
 He smashed them and threw them into the broad sea,
 Into the channel he threw them, his own hands foiled him, 120
 He smashed them and threw them into the channel!

Gilgamesh said to him, to Ur-Shanabi:

Now then, Ur-Shanabi, what is the way to Utanapishtim?
 What are its signs? Give them to me,
 Give, oh give me its signs! 125
 If need be, I'll cross the sea,
 If not, I'll roam the steppe.

Ur-Shanabi said to him, to Gilgamesh:

Your own hands have foiled you, Gilgamesh, You have smashed the Stone Charms, you have thrown them into the channel. 130

The Stone Charms, Gilgamesh, are what carry me, Lest I touch the waters of death.
 In your fury you have smashed them,
 The Stone Charms, they are what I had with me to make the crossing!

Gilgamesh, raise the axe in your hand, 135 Go down into the forest, cut twice sixty poles each five times twelve cubits long,
 Dress them, set on handguards,
 Bring them to me.

When Gilgamesh heard this,
 He raised the axe at his side, 140
 He drew the sword at his belt,
 He went down into the forest, cut twice sixty poles each five times twelve cubits long,
 He dressed them, set on handguards,
 He brought them to him.

Gilgamesh and Ur-Shanabi embarked in the boat, 145
 They launched the boat, they embarked upon it.
 A journey of a month and a half they made in three days!
 Ur-Shanabi reached the waters of death,
 Ur-Shanabi said to him, to Gilgamesh:

Stand back, Gilgamesh! Take the first pole, 150
 Your hand must not touch the waters of death,
 Take the second, the third, the fourth pole, Gilgamesh,
 Take the fifth, sixth, and seventh pole, Gilgamesh,

Take the eighth, ninth, and tenth pole, Gilgamesh,
Take the eleventh and twelfth pole, Gilgamesh. 155

With twice sixty Gilgamesh had used up the poles.
Then he, for his part, took off his belt,
Gilgamesh tore off his clothes from his body,
Held high his arms for a mast.
Utanapishtim was watching him from a distance, 160
Speaking to himself, he said these words,
He debated to himself:

Why have the Stone Charms, belonging to the boat, been smashed,
And one not its master embarked thereon?
He who comes here is no man of mine. 165

Utanapishtim said to him, to Gilgamesh:

Why are your cheeks emaciated, your face cast down,
Your heart wretched, your features wasted,
Woe in your vitals,
Your face like a traveler's from afar, 170
Your features weathered by cold and sun,
Why are you clad in a lion skin, roaming the steppe?

Gilgamesh said to him, to Utanapishtim:

My cheeks would not be emaciated, nor my face cast down,
Nor my heart wretched, nor my features wasted, 175
Nor would there be woe in my vitals,
Nor would my face be like a traveler's from afar,
Nor would my features be weathered by cold and sun,
Nor would I be clad in a lion skin, roaming the steppe,

But for my friend, swift wild donkey, mountain onager, panther
of the steppe, 180

But for Enkidu, my friend, swift wild donkey, mountain onager, panther
of the steppe,

He who stood by me as we ascended the mountain,
Seized and killed the bull that came down from heaven,
Felled Humbaba who dwelt in the forest of cedars, Killed lions at the mountain passes, 185

My friend whom I so loved, who went with me through every hardship, Enkidu, whom I so loved, who went with me through every hardship,
The fate of mankind has overtaken him.

Six days and seven nights I wept for him,
I would not give him up for burial, 190
Until a worm fell out of his nose.

I was frightened.

I have grown afraid of death, so I roam the steppe,

My friend's case weighs heavy upon me.
 A distant road I roam over the steppe, 195
 My friend Enkidu's case weighs heavy upon me!
 A distant path I roam over the steppe,
 How can I be silent? How can I hold my peace?
 My friend whom I loved is turned into clay,
 Enkidu, my friend whom I loved, is turned into clay! 200
 Shall I too not lie down like him,
 And never get up, forever and ever?

Gilgamesh said to him, to Utanapishtim:

So it is to go find Utanapishtim, whom they call the "Distant One,"
 I traversed all lands, 205
 I came over, one after another, wearisome mountains,
 Then I crossed, one after another, all the seas.
 Too little sweet sleep has smoothed my countenance,
 I have worn myself out in sleeplessness,
 My muscles ache for misery, 210
 What have I gained for my trials?
 I had not reached the tavern keeper when my clothes were worn out,
 I killed bear, hyena, lion, panther, leopard, deer, ibex, wild beasts of the steepe,
 I ate their meat, I [. . .] their skins.
 Let them close behind me the doors of woe, 215
 Let them seal them with pitch and tar.

Utanapishtim said to him, to Gilgamesh:

Why, O Gilgamesh, did you prolong woe,
 You who are formed of the flesh of gods and mankind,
 You for whom the gods acted like fathers and mothers? 220
 When was it, Gilgamesh, you [. . .] to a fool?

You strive ceaselessly, what do you gain?
 When you wear out your strength in ceaseless striving,
 When you torture your limbs with pain,
 You hasten the distant end of your days. 225
 Mankind, whose descendants are snapped off like reeds in a canebrake!
 The handsome young man, the lovely young woman, death [. . .]
 No one sees death,
 No one sees the face of death,
 No one hears the voice of death, 230
 But cruel death cuts off mankind.
 Do we build a house forever?
 Do we make a home forever?
 Do brothers divide an inheritance forever?
 Do disputes prevail in the land forever? 235
 Do rivers rise in flood forever?
 Dragonflies drift downstream on a river,
 Their faces staring at the sun,

Then, suddenly, there is nothing.
 The sleeper and the dead, how alike they are! 240
 They limn not death's image,
 No one dead has ever greeted a human in this world.
 The supreme gods, the great gods, being convened, Mammetum, she who creates destinies, ordaining destinies with them,
 They established death and life, 245
 They did not reveal the time of death.

Tablet XI

Gilgamesh said to him, to Utanapishtim the Distant One:

As I look upon you, Utanapishtim,
 Your limbs are not different, you are just as I am.
 Indeed, you are not different at all, you are just as I am!
 Yet your heart is drained of battle spirit, 5
 You lie flat on your back, your arm idle.
 You then, how did you join the ranks of the gods and find eternal life?

Utanapishtim said to him, to Gilgamesh:

I will reveal to you, O Gilgamesh, a secret matter,
 And a mystery of the gods I will tell you. 10
 The city Shuruppak,<sup>2</sup> a city you yourself have knowledge of,
 Which once was set on the bank of the Euphrates,
 That aforesaid city was ancient and gods once were within it.
 The great gods resolved to send the deluge,
 Their father Anu was sworn, 15
 The counselor the valiant Enlil,
 Their throne-bearer Ninurta,
 Their canal-officer Ennugi,<sup>3</sup>
 Their leader Ea was sworn with them.
 He repeated their plans to the reed fence: 20
 "Reed fence, reed fence, wall, wall!
 Listen, O reed fence! Pay attention, O wall!
 O Man of Shuruppak, son of Ubar-Tutu, Wreck house, build boat,
 Forsake possessions and seek life, 25
 Belongings reject and life save!
 Take aboard the boat seed of all living things.
 The boat you shall build,
 Let her dimensions be measured out:
 Let her width and length be equal, 30
 Roof her over like the watery depths."
 I understood full well, I said to Ea, my lord:
 "Your command, my lord, exactly as you said it,

2. City in Babylonia reputed to antedate the flood, long abandoned at the time the epic was written.

3. Minor deity in charge of water courses.

I shall faithfully execute.
 What shall I answer the city, the populace, and the elders?" 35
 Ea made ready to speak,
 Saying to me, his servant:
 "So, you shall speak to them thus:
 'No doubt Enlil dislikes me,
 I shall not dwell in your city. 40
 I shall not set my foot on the dry land of Enlil,
 I shall descend to the watery depths and dwell with my lord Ea.
 Upon you he shall shower down in abundance,
 A windfall of birds, a surprise of fishes,
 He shall pour upon you a harvest of riches, 45
 In the morning cakes in spates,
 In the evening grains in rains.'"

At the first glimmer of dawn,
 The land was assembling at the gate of Atrahasis:<sup>4</sup>
 The carpenter carried his axe, 50
 The reed cutter carried his stone,
 The old men brought cordage,
 The young men ran around,
 The wealthy carried the pitch,
 The poor brought what was needed. 55
 In five days I had planked her hull:
 One full acre was her deck space,
 Ten dozen cubits, the height of each of her sides,
 Ten dozen cubits square, her outer dimensions.<sup>5</sup>
 I laid out her structure, I planned her design: 60
 I decked her in six,
 I divided her in seven,
 Her interior I divided in nine.
 I drove the water plugs into her,
 I saw to the spars and laid in what was needful. 65
 Thrice thirty-six hundred measures of pitch I poured in the oven, Thrice thirty-six hundred measures of tar I poured out inside her.
 Thrice thirty-six hundred measures basket-bearers brought aboard for oil,
 Not counting the thirty-six hundred measures of oil that the offering consumed,
 And the twice thirty-six hundred measures of oil that the boatbuilders made off with. 70
 For the builders I slaughtered bullocks,
 I killed sheep upon sheep every day,
 Beer, ale, oil, and wine
 I gave out to the workers like river water,
 They made a feast as on New Year's Day, 75

4. Literally, "Super-wise," another Akkadian name of the immortal flood hero Utanapishtim.

5. The proportions of the boat suggest standard measures of both ship building and the construction of ziggurats, pyramidal temple towers.

I dispensed ointment with my own hand.
 By the setting of Shamash,<sup>6</sup> the ship was completed.
 Since boarding was very difficult,
 They brought up gangplanks, fore and aft,
 They came up her sides two-thirds of her height. 80
 Whatever I had I loaded upon her:
 What silver I had I loaded upon her,
 What gold I had I loaded upon her,
 What living creatures I had I loaded upon her,
 I sent up on board all my family and kin, 85 Beasts of the steppe, wild animals of the steppe, all types of skilled craftsmen I sent up on board.
 Shamash set for me the appointed time:
 "In the morning, cakes in spates,
 In the evening, grains in rains,
 Go into your boat and caulk the door!" 90
 That appointed time arrived,
 In the morning cakes in spates,
 In the evening grains in rains,
 I gazed upon the face of the storm,
 The weather was dreadful to behold! 95
 I went into the boat and caulked the door.
 To the caulker of the boat, to Puzur-Amurri the boatman,
 I gave over the edifice, with all it contained.

 At the first glimmer of dawn,
 A black cloud rose above the horizon. 100
 Inside it Adad<sup>7</sup> was thundering,
 While the destroying gods Shullat and Hanish<sup>8</sup> went in front, Moving as an advance force over hill and plain.
 Errakal<sup>9</sup> tore out the mooring posts of the world, Ninurta<sup>1</sup> came and made the dikes overflow. 105
 The supreme gods held torches aloft, Setting the land ablaze with their glow.
 Adad's awesome power passed over the heavens,
 Whatever was light was turned into darkness.
 He flooded the land, he smashed it like a clay pot! 110
 For one day the storm wind blew, Swiftly it blew, the flood came forth,
 It passed over the people like a battle,
 No one could see the one next to him,

6. The references to Shamash here and below suggest that in some now lost version of this story, Shamash, the god of justice, rather than Ea, the god of wisdom, warned Utanapishtim of the flood and told him how much time he had to build his ship. This substitution of one god for the other might be due to Shamash's role in the epic as protector of Gilgamesh. In the oldest account of the Babylonian story of the flood, Ea sets a timing device, apparently a water clock, to inform Utanapishtim of the time left before the onset of the deluge.

7. God of thunder.

8. Gods of destructive storms.

9. God of death.

1. God of war.

The people could not recognize one another in the downpour. 115
 The gods became frightened of the deluge,
 They shrank back, went up to Anu's highest heaven.
 The gods cowered like dogs, crouching outside.
 Ishtar screamed like a woman in childbirth,
 And sweet-voiced Belet-ili<sup>2</sup> wailed aloud: 120
 "Would that day had come to naught,
 When I spoke up for evil in the assembly of the gods!
 How could I have spoken up for evil in the assembly of the gods,
 And spoken up for battle to destroy my people?
 It was I myself who brought my people into the world, 125
 Now, like a school of fish, they choke up the sea!"
 The supreme gods were weeping with her,
 The gods sat where they were, weeping,
 Their lips were parched, taking on a crust.
 Six days and seven nights 130
 The wind continued, the deluge and windstorm leveled the land.
 When the seventh day arrived,
 The windstorm and deluge left off their battle,
 Which had struggled, like a woman in labor.
 The sea grew calm, the tempest stilled, the deluge ceased. 135

I looked at the weather, stillness reigned,
 And the whole human race had turned into clay.
 The landscape was flat as a rooftop.
 I opened the hatch, sunlight fell upon my face.
 Falling to my knees, I sat down weeping, 140
 Tears running down my face.
 I looked at the edges of the world, the borders of the sea,
 At twelve times sixty double leagues the periphery emerged.
 The boat had come to rest on Mount Nimush,<sup>3</sup>
 Mount Nimush held the boat fast, not letting it move. 145
 One day, a second day Mount Nimush held the boat fast, not letting it move.
 A third day, a fourth day Mount Nimush held the boat fast, not letting
 it move.
 A fifth day, a sixth day Mount Nimush held the boat fast, not letting
 it move.

When the seventh day arrived,
 I brought out a dove and set it free. 150
 The dove went off and returned,
 No landing place came to its view, so it turned back.
 I brought out a swallow and set it free,
 The swallow went off and returned,
 No landing place came to its view, so it turned back. 155

2. A goddess of birth, who in one version of the flood story was said to have collaborated with the god Ea in creating the human race.

3. High peak sometimes identified with Pir Omar Gudrun in Kurdistan. Landing place of the ark in the Gilgamesh epic.

I brought out a raven and set it free,
 The raven went off and saw the ebbing of the waters.
 It ate, preened, left droppings, did not turn back.
 I released all to the four directions,
 I brought out an offering and offered it to the four directions. 160
 I set up an incense offering on the summit of the mountain,
 I arranged seven and seven cult vessels,
 I heaped reeds, cedar, and myrtle in their bowls.
 The gods smelled the savor,
 The gods smelled the sweet savor, 165
 The gods crowded round the sacrificer like flies.

As soon as Belet-ili arrived,
 She held up the great fly-ornaments that Anu had made in his ardor:
 "O gods, these shall be my lapis necklace, lest I forget,
 I shall be mindful of these days and not forget, not ever! 170
 The gods should come to the incense offering,
 But Enlil should not come to the incense offering,
 For he, irrationally, brought on the flood,
 And marked my people for destruction!"
 As soon as Enlil arrived, 175
 He saw the boat, Enlil flew into a rage,
 He was filled with fury at the gods:
 "Who came through alive? No man was to survive destruction!"
 Ninurta made ready to speak,
 Said to the valiant Enlil: 180
 "Who but Ea could contrive such a thing?
 For Ea alone knows every artifice."

Ea made ready to speak,
 Said to the valiant Enlil:
 "You, O valiant one, are the wisest of the gods, 185
 How could you, irrationally, have brought on the flood?
 Punish the wrongdoer for his wrongdoing,
 Punish the transgressor for his transgression,
 But be lenient, lest he be cut off,
 Bear with him, lest he [. . .]. 190
 Instead of your bringing on a flood,
 Let the lion rise up to diminish the human race!
 Instead of your bringing on a flood,
 Let the wolf rise up to diminish the human race!
 Instead of your bringing on a flood, 195
 Let famine rise up to wreak havoc in the land!
 Instead of your bringing on a flood,
 Let pestilence rise up to wreak havoc in the land!
 It was not I who disclosed the secret of the great gods,
 I made Atrahasis have a dream and so he heard the secret 200 of the gods.
 Now then, make some plan for him."
 Then Enlil came up into the boat,

Leading me by the hand, he brought me up too.
 He brought my wife up and had her kneel beside me.
 He touched our brows, stood between us to bless us: 205
 "Hitherto Utanapishtim has been a human being,
 Now Utanapishtim and his wife shall become like us gods.
 Utanapishtim shall dwell far distant at the source of the rivers." Thus it was that they took me far distant and had me dwell at the source of the rivers.
 Now then, who will convene the gods for your sake, 210
 That you may find the eternal life you seek?
 Come, come, try not to sleep for six days and seven nights.

As he sat there on his haunches,
 Sleep was swirling over him like a mist.
 Utanapishtim said to her, to his wife: 215

Behold this fellow who seeks eternal life!
 Sleep swirls over him like a mist.

[Utanapishtim's wife, taking pity on Gilgamesh, urges her husband to awaken him and let him go home].

His wife said to him, to Utanapishtim the Distant One:

Do touch him that the man may wake up,
 That he may return safe on the way whence he came, 220
 That through the gate he came forth he may return to his land.

Utanapishtim said to her, to his wife:

Since the human race is duplicitous, he'll endeavor to dupe you.
 Come, come, bake his daily loaves, put them one after another by his head,
 Then mark the wall for each day he has slept. 225

She baked his daily loaves for him, put them one after another by his head, Then dated the wall for each day he slept.
 The first loaf was dried hard,
 The second was leathery, the third soggy,
 The crust of the fourth turned white, 230
 The fifth was gray with mold, the sixth was fresh,
 The seventh was still on the coals when he touched him, the man woke up.

Gilgamesh said to him, to Utanapishtim the Distant One:

Scarcely had sleep stolen over me,
 When straightaway you touched me and roused me. 235

Utanapishtim said to him, to Gilgamesh:

Up with you, Gilgamesh, count your daily loaves,
 That the days you have slept may be known to you.
 The first loaf is dried hard,

The second is leathery, the third soggy, 240
 The crust of the fourth has turned white,
 The fifth is gray with mold,
 The sixth is fresh,
 The seventh was still in the coals when I touched you and you woke up.

Gilgamesh said to him, to Utanapishtim the Distant One: 245

What then should I do, Utanapishtim, whither should I go,
 Now that the Bereaver has seized my flesh?
 Death lurks in my bedchamber,
 And wherever I turn, there is death!

Utanapishtim said to him, to Ur-Shanabi the boatman: 250

Ur-Shanabi, may the harbor offer you no haven,
 May the crossing point reject you,
 Be banished from the shore you shuttled to.
 The man you brought here, 255
 His body is matted with filthy hair, Hides have marred the beauty of his flesh.
 Take him away, Ur-Shanabi, bring him to the washing place.
 Have him wash out his filthy hair with water, clean as snow,
 Have him throw away his hides, let the sea carry them off, Let his body be rinsed clean. 260
 Let his headband be new,
 Have him put on raiment worthy of him.
 Until he reaches his city,
 Until he completes his journey,
 Let his garments stay spotless, fresh and new. 265

Ur-Shanabi took him away and brought him to the washing place.
 He washed out his filthy hair with water, clean as snow,
 He threw away his hides, the sea carried them off,
 His body was rinsed clean.
 He renewed his headband, 270
 He put on raiment worthy of him.
 Until he reached his city,
 Until he completed his journey,
 His garments would stay spotless, fresh and new.

Gilgamesh and Ur-Shanabi embarked on the boat, 275
 They launched the boat, they embarked upon it.
 His wife said to him, to Utanapishtim the Distant One:

Gilgamesh has come here, spent with exertion,
 What will you give him for his homeward journey?

At that he, Gilgamesh, lifted the pole, 280 Bringing the boat back by the shore.
 Utanapishtim said to him, to Gilgamesh:

Gilgamesh, you have come here, spent with exertion,
 What shall I give you for your homeward journey?
 I will reveal to you, O Gilgamesh, a secret matter, 285
 And a mystery of the gods I will tell you.
 There is a certain plant, its stem is like a thornbush,
 Its thorns, like the wild rose, will prick [your hand].
 If you can secure this plant, [. . .]

No sooner had Gilgamesh heard this, 290
 He opened a shaft, flung away his tools.
 He tied heavy stones to his feet,
 They pulled him down into the watery depths.
 He took the plant though it pricked his hand.
 He cut the heavy stones from his feet, 295
 The sea cast him up on his home shore.

Gilgamesh said to him, to Ur-Shanabi the boatman:

Ur-Shanabi, this plant is cure for heartache, Whereby a man will regain his stamina.
 I will take it to ramparted Uruk, 300
 I will have an old man eat some and so test the plant.
 His name shall be "Old Man Has Become Young-Again-Man."
 I myself will eat it and so return to my carefree youth.

At twenty double leagues they took a bite to eat,
 At thirty double leagues they made their camp. 305

Gilgamesh saw a pond whose water was cool,
 He went down into it to bathe in the water.
 A snake caught the scent of the plant,
 Stealthily it came up and carried the plant away,
 On its way back it shed its skin. 310

Thereupon Gilgamesh sat down weeping,
 His tears flowed down his face,
 He said to Ur-Shanabi the boatman:

For whom, Ur-Shanabi, have my hands been toiling?
 For whom has my heart's blood been poured out? 315
 For myself I have obtained no benefit,
 I have done a good deed for a reptile!
 Now, floodwaters rise against me for twenty double leagues,
 When I opened the shaft, I flung away the tools.
 How shall I find my bearings? 320
 I have come much too far to go back, and I abandoned the boat on the shore.

At twenty double leagues they took a bite to eat,
 At thirty double leagues they made their camp.

When they arrived in ramparted Uruk, Gilgamesh said to him, to Ur-Shanabi the boatman:

325

Go up, Ur-Shanabi, pace out the walls of Uruk.
 Study the foundation terrace and examine the brickwork.
 Is not its masonry of kiln-fired brick?
 And did not seven masters lay its foundations?
 One square mile of city, one square mile of gardens,
 One square mile of clay pits, a half square mile of Ishtar's dwelling,
 Three and a half square miles is the measure of Uruk!

THE HEBREW BIBLE

ca. 1000–300 B.C.E.

The sacred writings of the ancient Hebrew people are arguably the world's most influential texts. They have remained the sacred text of Judaism and have inspired two other major world religions: Christianity and Islam. Because these texts have been so influential in human affairs, and have become central to so many people's core religious beliefs, they are not often read in the same way as "literary" texts. But studying the books of the Hebrew Bible as literature—paying close attention to their narrative techniques, their imagery, characterization, and point of view—is not incompatible with religious faith. Close reading enriches our understanding and appreciation of these texts as supremely important cultural and historical documents, for readers of any religious background or belief.

The Hebrew Bible encompasses a rich variety of texts from different periods, composed in both poetry and prose. One of the obvious differences between the Bible and most works of "literature"—such as Sophocles's Oedipus the King or Virgil's Aeneid—is that no single human hand composed the whole Bible, or even the whole of Genesis or Job. Traditionally, Moses is thought to have been the author of the first five books of the Bible and also, according to some traditions, the book of Job. But modern Bible scholars agree that these books, in their current form, must have been woven together from several different earlier sources. This theory explains the otherwise puzzling fact that there are often odd contradictions and repetitions in the narrative. For example, God tells Noah to take two of every kind of animal into the ark; but a little later, the Lord tells Noah to take seven pairs of each animal. The simplest explanation for this kind of discrepancy is that the text we have is a collage built of several earlier narratives, put together, or "redacted," into a single master story. Many scholars believe that it is possible to distinguish between the different original strands, each of which has its distinct stylistic features and perspectives on the narrative. For instance, one strand of the text is identified by the name that it uses for God, YHWH (a personal name for the Hebrew god: in English, Jehovah, and hence the strand is called J); in another strand (dubbed E), God is called Elohim (which comes from the standard Semitic term for any god, el).

The various sources have been put together with great skill, and the result is a text of extraordinary literary, philosophical, and theological richness. The lengthiest selections included here are abridged versions of the books of Genesis and Job. Perhaps the most important element running through the two is a complex ethical concern with how human suffering and prosperity come about and what role God plays in shaping human lives. The books resist easy answers to these questions. We might expect that God would simply punish wrongdoers and reward the righteous; and indeed, he does punish Adam and Eve for their disobedience. But often the relation between human behavior and divine favor is shown to be deeply mysterious. God favors Abel over Cain, blesses Noah and Abraham over all other humans, seems to pay more attention to Isaac than Ishmael, favors Jacob over Esau and Joseph over his brothers, and blesses the Hebrew people over all other inhabitants of the Middle East; but in none of these cases are we given an explanation, let alone a moral justification. Moreover, God allows even his favorites, such as Jacob, Joseph, and Job, to suffer terrible hardship before restoring them to prosperity. The book of Job brings this issue explicitly to the forefront. God's ways are mysterious, and instead of reinforcing a simple moral (like "Be good and God will bless you"), the Bible constantly undercuts it. But throughout these texts, we see that God's power is the major force in all of human history.

It is no accident that the book of Genesis—unlike other ancient creation stories—begins not with earth, sky, and sea but with God himself, the originator of everything.

GENESIS

The first book of the Bible takes its name from the Greek word for "origin" or "birth"—genesis. The book tells a story of how the world, and the human race, came into existence; how humans first disobeyed God; and how God began to establish a special relationship with a series of chosen men and their families: Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph. The book was probably redacted in the fifth century B.C.E., a period when the people of Judah were in exile in Babylon. One can understand Genesis in this context as an attempt to consolidate Jewish identity in the midst of an alien culture.

The first section (chapters 1–11) recounts "creation history"—God's creation of the world and of humankind, and the development of early human society. Human beings occupy center stage in this account of the world's origin, as they do not in, for example, Mesopotamian and Greek creation stories. This early age is marked especially by God's anger at humanity, from his expulsion of Adam and Eve from Eden to his destruction of the Tower of Babel, which scatters human beings and divides their single language into many languages. God's decision to destroy humanity is presented as a reversal of the original act of creation. The flood mixes together again the waters that were separated on the second day of creation, and it destroys almost all the different kinds of animals created on the fifth and sixth days, together with almost all humans.

But not quite all animals and humans are destroyed. Noah and his family, and the animals taken onto the ark, are spared, because Noah has found favor in God's eyes; Noah's various wives and the chosen animals, it seems, have attracted no particular divine attention but benefit by association with Noah. This dramatic demonstration of God's power and willingness to favor certain members of the human race while destroying others leads to a new beginning. The second part of Genesis (chapters 12–50) moves from humanity in general to the stories of four men and their families: Abraham and his wife, Sarah; Isaac and his wife, Rebekah; Jacob and his wives, Leah and Rachel; and Joseph and his brothers. The transition is marked by God's first declaration of his commitment to the people of Israel. When he tells Noah's descendant Abram (who will be renamed Abraham) to leave his home in Mesopotamia, he declares, "I will make you a great nation and I will bless you and make your name great, and you shall be a blessing." Showing him the land of Canaan, he promises, "To your seed I will give this land." This positive covenant builds on the merely negative promise God has already made to humanity in general: that he will never again destroy the world by flood (chapter 9). Now there is a purpose in history: other peoples will be blessed through the people of Israel, who are chosen for a particularly close relationship with God.

Many complications arise that seem to threaten the fulfillment of the covenant—and add narrative excitement to the story. God has promised "this land" to Abraham's children, but repeatedly, Abraham's descendants must leave the land of their fathers, deferring the hope of a settled home in the promised land. The pattern of exile from home recurs again and again in the book of Genesis and recalls the expulsion of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden, while the strife between family members, especially brothers, and the theme of the triumph of a younger brother over an elder, constantly recall the story of Cain and Abel. Repeatedly, we see God's covenant fulfilled in unexpected ways, revealing his power and his surpassing of merely human expectations.

God himself can be seen as the most vivid and complex character of the book of Genesis. He, like the humans made in his image, enjoys an evening stroll through a cool garden; he is willing to scheme and make deals; he has his particular friends and his favorites; and he is capable of emotions: pleasure, hope, anger, and regret. But the human characters in this book, both men and women, are also strikingly vivid. They are people of intense feelings, and their relationships with one another, their loves, hatreds, fears, and desires, are evoked in compelling detail.

It is worthwhile to pay close attention to the way the text brings people's feelings, characters, and motivations to life in just a few simple words. We often seem to be invited to ponder several possible layers of meaning in what people say, as when Abraham loads up Isaac with wood for the fire, takes the cleaver in his hand, and leads him into the mountain. Isaac says simply, "Father!" Is he scared? Does he know what his father plans to do? Does the word fill Abraham himself with guilt and horror? Or is he unshaking in his resolve to obey?

Like the Odyssey, the book of Genesis is about the search for a homeland, a special place of belonging—although here the quest belongs not to a single man but to a whole people. As in the Odyssey, hospitality plays an essential part in the value structure of the text. It is often through human hospitality that God's plan can succeed. Abraham, sitting by his tent flap in the alien land of Mamre, passes a test of his hospitality with flying colors when he offers a lavish feast to the "three men" who turn out to be messengers of the Lord. The descendants of Abraham negotiate their relationships with the various other peoples who inhabit the area that God seems to have promised as their inheritance. At the same time, they must try to avoid total assimilation; in terms of culture, worship, and “seed,” the people must remain distinct. Circumcision, which God enjoins on Abraham and his family, marks this male line off from its neighbors.

EXODUS

After the death of Joseph, the Hebrew people remain in Egypt and multiply, and the Egyptians become increasingly hostile toward this alien population. Moses, along with his brother Aaron, is chosen by God as the savior of the people, the man who will lead them out of slavery and exile and back to their homeland in Canaan. They escape from Egypt, crossing the waters of the Red Sea, which miraculously part to let them through and then wash back to drown Pharaoh and his army. In the wilderness, Moses goes to hear the word of God at the top of Mount Sinai, and the Ten Commandments are revealed to him: ten rules of ethical and religious conduct, to be carved on stone tablets, that will form the basis for the new law of the Hebrew people and their covenant with God.

JOB

The book of Job draws on an ancient folk tale about God and his Accuser (the Hebrew term is “Satan”) testing a just man, who finally passes their test. But the biblical story makes this motif into the prose frame for an extraordinary poem recounting Job’s conversations with his friends and with God. Perhaps sometime around the fifth century B.C.E., the poem was composed and the text as we have it was put together. Dating is difficult with a book that seems deliberately to exclude references to the historical and social world: neither the people of Israel nor God's covenant with them is explicitly mentioned. Instead, the text is focused on a single, profound problem, facing all nations of the world at all times. Why does God allow good people to suffer?

Job is a good and upright man who nevertheless suffers horribly—in fact, he is selected for suffering because of his goodness. The text raises the question not only of why the innocent suffer but more generally of why there is misfortune and unhappiness in the world. “Have you taken note of my servant Job,” God asks the Accuser, “for there is no one like him on earth: innocent, upright, and God-fearing, and keeping himself apart from evil?” But Job loses his family and wealth in a series of calamities that strike one after the other like hammer blows and is then plagued with a horrible disease. In a series of magnificent speeches, he expresses his sense of his own innocence and demands one thing: to understand the reason for his suffering.

From the beginning, we can see a little farther into the problem than Job. In the prologue, the Accuser challenges God's praise of Job by pointing out that Job's goodness has never been tested; it is easy to be righteous in prosperity. Because we see that Job's afflictions originate in a test, we know that there is a reason for his suffering, but we may not find it a valid reason and may feel that Job is the object of sport for higher powers. If so, what we know from the prologue only makes the problem of innocent suffering worse. Alternatively, we can see God's wager as a sign of his respect for Job and his willingness to trust humanity to make good choices and remain faithful no matter what. But the fact remains that Job is innocent, and yet he still suffers. What kind of order can we find in a world where that can happen? The prologue in no way cancels the profundity of Job's need to understand the reasons for his suffering.

For Job's comforters, there is no problem. They are anchored solidly in the world of goodness rewarded and wickedness punished. They can account for suffering easily. If Job is suffering, he must have done something wrong. All he has to do, then, is repent his sin and be reconciled with God. Their pious formula, however, does not apply to Job's situation. As we know from the prologue, their mistake is to confuse moral goodness with outward circumstance. Despite or because of their conventional piety, they do not understand Job's suffering, and they get God wrong. In the epilogue, God says to Eliphaz, “I am very angry at you and your two friends, for you have not spoken rightly about me as did my servant Job.” Job has spoken rightly by insisting on his innocence and not reducing God's ways to a formula. He also avoids identifying goodness with his fortune in life; unlike his friends, Job acknowledges that good people sometimes suffer dreadfully, and he is appalled by it. But he fulfills God's expectations because he does not curse or in any way repudiate him. Instead, Job wants God to meet him face to face. But he is mistaken to think that he and God can meet on such equal terms and that he can get an explanation. In the end, God does speak to him, but only to pose a series of wonderful but entirely unanswerable questions, such as “Where were you when I founded the earth?” There is no reciprocal conversation; Job simply, briefly, acknowledges his error and recognizes the vast, incommensurable greatness of God.

The text culminates in God's magnificent speech from the storm, which ranges over all of creation and its animal life. The contrast with the account of creation in the first chapter of Genesis, which puts human beings at the center, is dramatic. Here there are beasts whose might far surpasses that of humans, who seem just a part of the created world, and the poetry of this speech conveys the awe and mystery that are attributes of God. The book of Job does not explain innocent suffering, but it does leave us with a sense of what we cannot understand.

PSALMS

The book of Psalms is a collection of 150 poems or hymns. Traditionally, King David was imagined as the author, though modern scholars believe that the various poems come from different time periods, some from before Jerusalem was besieged and finally destroyed by the Babylonians (in 587 B.C.E.), while others (such as "By the Rivers of Babylon") were clearly composed afterward, at a time when the Hebrew people were exiled to the city of their conquerors. Most were composed to be used in worship, and they range in theme and mood, from hymns of praise or joyful thanksgiving to desperate songs of lament expressing the sorrows of a people in exile or the bitterness of a person unjustly wronged. The rich, vivid imagery of the Psalms—memorably conveyed in the language of the King James translation, used here—has had an essential influence on the development of literature in English.

A NOTE ON THE TRANSLATIONS

Except for the Psalms, presented in the King James Version, the biblical text given here is from the recent modern translations by Robert Alter. Alter's language is mostly contemporary, but he is conscious of the need to be faithful to the poetic rhythms of the original—both in the verse of the book of Job and in the rhythmical prose of Genesis (which includes short passages of verse). Far more than other translators, Alter preserves the simple syntax and verbal repetitions of the Hebrew—for instance, by repeating and no less than twenty times in the first eight verses of Genesis. The lack of subordination is an essential feature of the original text's style, as are other kinds of word order that Alter tries to imitate in English, like emphatic inversion (God says, "To your seed I will give" rather than "I will give to your seed"). The Bible tells its complex story in a surprisingly small number of words, and nouns may take on greater power through their repetition in a number of different contexts: it is worthwhile to trace, for example, the use of hand or house or brother throughout the book of Genesis. Alter does not manage to retain every repetition or verbal effect of the Hebrew, but the translation comes close to mirroring the Bible's combination of simple, colloquial vocabulary (with occasional uses of archaic or peculiar phrasing) and vivid concrete metaphor. Alter uses seed, for example, to reflect the Hebrew imagery, instead of changing it to children or offspring (as the New Revised Standard Version does).

1. When God began to create heaven and earth, and the earth then was welter and waste<sup>2</sup> and darkness over the deep and God's breath<sup>3</sup> hovering over the waters, God said, "Let there be light." And there was light. And God saw the light, that it was good, and God divided the light from the darkness. And God called the light Day, and the darkness He called Night. And it was evening and it was morning, first day. And God said, "Let there be a vault in the midst of the waters, and let it divide water from water."<sup>4</sup> And God made the vault and it divided the water beneath the vault from the water above the vault, and so it was. And God called the vault Heavens, and it was evening and it was morning, second day. And God said, "Let the waters under the heavens be gathered in one place so that the dry land will appear," and so it was. And God called the dry land Earth and the gathering of waters He called Seas, and God saw that it was good. And God said, "Let the earth grow grass, plants yielding seed of each kind and trees bearing fruit of each kind, that has its seed within it upon the earth." And so it was. And the earth put forth grass, plants yielding seed, and trees bearing fruit of each kind, and God saw that it was good. And it was evening and it was morning, third day. And God said, "Let there be lights in the vault of the heavens to divide the day from the night, and they shall be signs for the fixed times and for days and years, and they shall be lights in the vault of the heavens to light up the earth." And so it was. And God made the two great lights, the great light for dominion of day and the small light for dominion of night, and the stars. And God placed them in the vault of the heavens to light up the earth and to have dominion over day and night and to divide the light from the darkness. And God saw that it was good. And it was evening and it was morning, fourth day. And God said, "Let the waters swarm with the swarm of living creatures and let fowl fly over the earth across the vault of the heavens." And God created the great sea monsters and every living creature that crawls, which the water had swarmed forth of each kind, and the winged fowl of each kind, and God saw that it was good. And God blessed them, saying, "Be fruitful and multiply and fill the water in the seas and let the fowl multiply in the earth." And it was evening and it was morning, fifth day. And God said, "Let the earth bring forth living creatures of each kind, cattle and crawling things and wild beasts of each kind." And so it was. And God made wild beasts of each kind and cattle of every kind and all crawling things on the ground of each kind, and God saw that it was good. And God said, "Let us make a human in our image,<sup>5</sup> by our likeness, to hold sway over the fish of the sea and the fowl of the heavens and the cattle and the wild beasts and all the crawling things that crawl upon the earth.

1. Excerpts from Genesis are translated by Robert Alter. The notes are indebted to Alter's annotations.

2. The translator combines a rare English word (welter, meaning chaos, or the turmoil of rolling waves) with waste to render a phrase that is very rare in the Hebrew, tohu wabohu.

3. The Hebrew word for "breath," ruah, may also mean "spirit."

4. The water below the vault, or sky, is the ocean; the water above the vault is the rain.

5. The Hebrew word for "human" is 'adam, which also means "dust"; it is not the first man's name, but the noun denoting all humanity. It does not necessarily imply that the human is male.

And God created the human in his image, in the image of God He created him, male and female He created them.<sup>6</sup>

And God blessed them, and God said to them, “Be fruitful and multiply and fill the earth and conquer it, and hold sway over the fish of the sea and the fowl of the heavens and every beast that crawls upon the earth.” And God said, “Look, I have given you every seed-bearing plant on the face of all the earth and every tree that has fruit bearing seed, yours they will be for food. And to all the beasts of the earth and to all the fowl of the heavens and to all that crawls on the earth, which has the breath of life within it, the green plants for food.” And so it was. And God saw all that He had done, and, look, it was very good. And it was evening and it was morning, the sixth day.

2.<sup>7</sup> Then the heavens and the earth were completed, and all their array. And God completed on the seventh day the task He had done, and He ceased on the seventh day from all the task He had done. And God blessed the seventh day and hallowed it, for on it He had ceased from all His task that He had created to do. This is the tale of the heavens and the earth when they were created.

On the day the LORD God made earth and heavens, no shrub of the field being yet on the earth and no plant of the field yet sprouted, for the LORD God had not caused rain to fall on the earth and there was no human to till the soil, and wetness would well from the earth to water all the surface of the soil, then the LORD God fashioned the human, humus from the soil,<sup>8</sup> and blew into his nostrils the breath of life, and the human became a living creature. And the LORD God planted a garden in Eden, to the east, and He placed there the human He had fashioned. And the LORD God caused to sprout from the soil every tree lovely to look at and good for food, and the tree of life was in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge, good and evil. Now a river runs out of Eden to water the garden and from there splits off into four streams. The name of the first is Pishon, the one that winds through the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold. And the gold of that land is goodly, bdellium<sup>9</sup> is there, and lapis lazuli. And the name of the second river is Gihon, the one that winds through all the land of Cush. And the name of the third river is Tigris, the one that goes to the east of Ashur. And the fourth river is Euphrates. And the LORD God took the human and set him down in the garden of Eden to till it and watch it. And the LORD God commanded the human, saying, “From every fruit of the garden you may surely eat. But from the tree of knowledge, good and evil, you shall not eat, for on the day you eat from it, you are doomed to die.” And the LORD God said, “It is not good for the human to be alone, I shall make him a sustainer beside him.” And the LORD God fashioned from the soil each beast of the field and each fowl of the heavens and brought each to the human to see what he would call it, and whatever the human called a

7. This is the beginning of a different account of the Creation, which does not agree in all respects with the first.

8. There is a pun in the Hebrew on ‘adam, “human,” and ‘adamah, “humus” or “soil.”

9. A fragrant tree.

living creature, that was its name. And the human called names to all the cattle and to the fowl of the heavens and to all the beasts of the field, but for the human no sustainer beside him was found. And the LORD God cast a deep slumber on the human, and he slept, and He took one of his ribs and closed over the flesh where it had been, and the LORD God built the rib He had taken from the human into a woman and He brought her to the human. And the human said:

“This one at last, bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh,
This one shall be called Woman, for from man was this one taken.”<sup>1</sup>

Therefore does a man leave his father and his mother and cling to his wife and they become one flesh. And the two of them were naked, the human and his woman, and they were not ashamed.

3. Now the serpent was most cunning of all the beasts of the field that the LORD God had made. And he said to the woman, “Though God said, you shall not eat from any tree of the garden—” And the woman said to the serpent, “From the fruit of the garden’s trees we may eat, but from the fruit of the tree in the midst of the garden God has said, ‘You shall not eat from it and you shall not touch it, lest you die.’” And the serpent said to the woman, “You shall not be doomed to die. For God knows that on the day you eat of it your eyes will be opened and you will become as gods knowing good and evil.” And the woman saw that the tree was good for eating and that it was lust to the eyes and the tree was lovely to look at, and she took of its fruit and ate, and she also gave to her man, and he ate. And the eyes of the two were opened, and they knew they were naked, and they sewed fig leaves and made themselves loincloths.

And they heard the sound of the LORD God walking about in the garden in the evening breeze, and the human and his woman hid from the LORD God in the midst of the trees of the garden. And the LORD God called to the human and said to him, “Where are you?” And he said, “I heard Your sound in the garden and I was afraid, for I was naked, and I hid.” And He said, “Who told you that you were naked? From the tree I commanded you not to eat have you eaten?” And the human said, “The woman whom you gave by me, she gave me from the tree, and I ate.” And the LORD God said to the woman, “What is this you have done?” And the woman said, “The serpent beguiled me and I ate.” And the LORD God said to the serpent, “Because you have done this,

Cursed be you
of all cattle and all beasts of the field.
On your belly shall you go and dust shall you eat all the days of your life.
Enmity will I set between you and the woman, between your seed and hers.

1. “Man” is ish in Hebrew; “woman” is ishshah.

He will boot your head and you will bite his heel.”<sup>2</sup>

To the woman He said,

“I will terribly sharpen your birth pangs, in pain shall you bear children.
And for your man shall be your longing, and he shall rule over you.”

And to the human He said, “Because you listened to the voice of your wife and ate from the tree that I commanded you ‘You shall not eat from it,’

Cursed be the soil for your sake, with pangs shall you eat from it all the days of your life.
Thorn and thistle shall it sprout for you and you shall eat the plants of the field.
By the sweat of your brow shall you eat bread till you return to the soil, for from there were you taken, for dust you are
and to dust shall you return.”

And the human called his woman’s name Eve, for she was the mother of all that lives.<sup>3</sup> And the LORD God made skin coats for the human and his woman, and He clothed them. And the LORD God said, “Now that the human has become like one of us, knowing good and evil, he may reach out and take as well from the tree of life and live forever.” And the LORD God sent him from the garden of Eden to till the soil from which he had been taken. And He drove out the human and set up east of the garden of Eden the cherubim and the flame of the whirling sword to guard the way to the tree of life.

4. And the human knew Eve his woman and she conceived and bore Cain, and she said, “I have got me a man with the LORD.” And she bore as well his brother, Abel, and Abel became a herder of sheep while Cain was a tiller of the soil. And it happened in the course of time that Cain brought from the fruit of the soil an offering to the LORD. And Abel too had brought from the choice firstlings of his flock, and the LORD regarded Abel and his offering but He did not regard Cain and his offering, and Cain was very incensed, and his face fell. And the LORD said to Cain,

and why is your face fallen?
For whether you offer well, or whether you do not,
at the tent flap sin crouches and for you is its longing but you will rule over it.”<sup>4</sup>

2. “Boot . . . bite” represents a pun in Hebrew: the word for trampling, or “booting,” is repeated to refer to the snake’s reaction; it may refer to the snake’s hiss just before it bites.
3. The name Hawah, Eve, is similar to the verbal root hayah, “to live.”

4. Obscure; it seems to mean something like “Sin shall be eager for you, but you must master it.”

And Cain said to Abel his brother, “Let us go out to the field.” And when they were in the field, Cain rose against Abel his brother and killed him. And the LORD said to Cain, “Where is Abel your brother?” And he said, “I do not know. Am I my brother’s keeper?” And He said, “What have you done? Listen! your brother’s blood cries out to me from the soil. And so, cursed shall you be by the soil that gaped with its mouth to take your brother’s blood from your hand. If you till the soil, it will no longer give you its strength. A restless wanderer shall you be on the earth.” And Cain said to the LORD, “My punishment is too great to bear. Now that You have driven me this day from the soil and I must hide from Your presence, I shall be a restless wanderer on the earth and whoever finds me will kill me.” And the LORD said to him, “Therefore whoever kills Cain shall suffer sevenfold vengeance.” And the LORD set a mark upon Cain so that whoever found him would not slay him.

And Cain went out from the LORD’s presence and dwelled in the land of Nod east of Eden. And Cain knew his wife and she conceived and bore Enoch. Then he became the builder of a city and called the name of the city, like his son’s name, Enoch. And Irad was born to Enoch,<sup>5</sup> and Irad begot Mehujael and Mehujael begot Methusael and Methusael begot Lamech. And Lamech took him two wives, the name of the one was Adah and the name of the other was Zillah. And Adah bore Jabal: he was the first of tent dwellers with livestock. And his brother’s name was Jubal: he was the first of all who play on the lyre and pipe. As for Zillah, she bore Tubal-Cain, who forged every tool of copper and iron. And the sister of Tubal-Cain was Naamah. And Lamech said to his wives, “Adah and Zillah, O hearken my voice,

 You wives of Lamech, give ear to my speech.
 For a man have I slain for my wound, a boy for my bruising.
 For sevenfold Cain is avenged, and Lamech seventy and seven.”

And Adam again knew his wife and she bore a son and called his name Seth, as to say, “God has granted me<sup>6</sup> other seed in place of Abel, for Cain has killed him.” As for Seth, to him, too, a son was born, and he called his name Enosh. It was then that the name of the LORD was first invoked.

Genesis 6–9

[Noah and the Flood]

6. And it happened as humankind began to multiply over the earth and daughters were born to them, that the sons of God saw that the daughters of man were comely, and they took themselves wives howsoever they chose.<sup>7</sup> And the

5. This is the first of many lists of genealogies in the book of Genesis. Genealogy is one of the major ways in which the text evokes and orders historical time and creates a connection between past and present.
 6. The pun in Hebrew is between the name

Shet and the verb shat, “granted.”

7. The passage is based on archaic myths (perhaps from an old Hittite tradition) about male gods (“the sons of God”) having sex with mortal women.

LORD said, “My breath shall not abide in the human forever, for he is but flesh. Let his days be a hundred and twenty years.”

The Nephilim<sup>8</sup> were then on the earth, and afterward as well, the sons of God having come to bed with the daughters of man who bore them children: they are the heroes of yore, the men of renown.

And the LORD saw that the evil of the human creature was great on the earth and that every scheme of his heart’s devising was only perpetually evil. And the LORD regretted having made the human on earth and was grieved to the heart. And the LORD said, “I will wipe out the human race I created from the face of the earth, from human to cattle to crawling thing to the fowl of the heavens, for I regret that I have made them.” But Noah found favor in the eyes of the LORD. This is the lineage of Noah—Noah was a righteous man, he was blameless in his time, Noah walked with God—and Noah begot three sons, Shem and Ham and Japheth. And the earth was corrupt before God and the earth was filled with outrage. And God saw the earth and, look, it was corrupt, for all flesh had corrupted its ways on the earth. And God said to Noah, “The end of all flesh is come before me, for the earth is filled with outrage by them, and I am now about to destroy them, with the earth. Make yourself an ark of cypress wood, with cells you shall make the ark, and caulk it inside and out with pitch. This is how you shall make it: three hundred cubits, the ark’s length; fifty cubits, its width; thirty cubits, its height. Make a skylight in the ark, within a cubit of the top you shall finish it, and put an entrance in the ark on one side. With lower and middle and upper decks you shall make it. As for me, I am about to bring the Flood, water upon the earth, to destroy all flesh that has within it the breath of life from under the heavens, everything on the earth shall perish. And I will set up my covenant with you, and you shall enter the ark, you and your sons and your wife and the wives of your sons, with you. And from all that lives, from all flesh, two of each thing you shall bring to the ark to keep alive with you, male and female they shall be. From the fowl of each kind and from the cattle of each kind and from all that crawls on the earth of each kind, two of each thing shall come to you to be kept alive. As for you, take you from every food that is eaten and store it by you, to serve for you and for them as food.” And this Noah did; as all that God commanded him, so he did.

7. And the LORD said to Noah, “Come into the ark, you and all your household, for it is you I have seen righteous before Me in this generation. Of every clean animal take you seven pairs, each with its mate, and of every animal that is not clean, one pair, each with its mate.<sup>9</sup> Of the fowl of the heavens as well seven pairs, male and female, to keep seed alive over all the earth. For in seven days’ time I will make it rain on the earth forty days and forty nights and I will wipe out from the face of the earth all existing things that I have made.” And Noah did all that the LORD commanded him.

8. This appears to mean “the fallen ones.” The allusion seems cryptic, perhaps because the monotheistic writer is avoiding explicit discussion of multiple semidivine or divine figures, although the idea of such beings would have been familiar to the ancient reader.

9. “Clean” and “not clean” refer to the cateries of animals that might or might not be sacrificed; it does not refer to dietary restrictions, which came later in the tradition. There is clearly a discrepancy in the narratives here, between the previous chapter’s specification of “two of each thing” and this chapter’s requirement of “seven pairs.”

Noah was six hundred years old when the Flood came, water over the earth. And Noah and his sons and his wife and his sons' wives came into the ark because of the waters of the Flood. Of the clean animals and of the animals that were not clean and of the fowl and of all that crawls upon the ground two each came to Noah into the ark, male and female, as God had commanded Noah. And it happened after seven days, that the waters of the Flood were over the earth. In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, on the seventeenth day of the month, on that day,

All the wellsprings of the great deep burst and the casements of the heavens were opened.

And the rain was over the earth forty days and forty nights. That very day, Noah and Shem and Ham and Japheth, the sons of Noah, and Noah's wife, and the three wives of his sons together with them, came into the ark, they as well as beasts of each kind and cattle of each kind and each kind of crawling thing that crawls on the earth and each kind of bird, each winged thing. They came to Noah into the ark, two by two of all flesh that has the breath of life within it. And those that came in, male and female of all flesh they came, as God had commanded him, and the LORD shut him in. And the Flood was forty days over the earth, and the waters multiplied and bore the ark upward and it rose above the earth. And the waters surged and multiplied mightily over the earth, and the ark went on the surface of the water. And the waters surged most mightily over the earth, and all the high mountains under the heavens were covered. Fifteen cubits above them the waters surged as the mountains were covered. And all flesh that stirs on the earth perished, the fowl and the cattle and the beasts and all swarming things that swarm upon the earth, and all humankind. All that had the quickening breath of life in its nostrils, of all that was on dry land, died. And He wiped out all existing things from the face of the earth, from humans to cattle to crawling things to the fowl of the heavens, they were wiped out from the earth. And Noah alone remained, and those with him in the ark. And the waters surged over the earth one hundred and fifty days.

8. And God remembered Noah and all the beasts and all the cattle that were with him in the ark. And God sent a wind over the earth and the waters subsided. And the wellsprings of the deep were dammed up, and the casements of the heavens, the rain from the heavens held back. And the waters receded from the earth little by little, and the waters ebbbed. At the end of a hundred and fifty days the ark came to rest, on the seventeenth day of the seventh month, on the mountains of Ararat. The waters continued to ebb, until the tenth month, on the first day of the tenth month, the mountaintops appeared. And it happened, at the end of forty days, that Noah opened the window of the ark he had made. And he sent out the raven and it went forth to and fro until the waters should dry up from the earth. And he sent out the dove to see whether the waters had abated from the surface of the ground. But the dove found no resting place for its foot and it returned to him to the ark, for the waters were over all the earth. And he reached out and took it and brought it back to him into the ark. Then he waited another seven days and again sent the dove out from the ark. And the dove came back to him at eventide and, look, a plucked olive leaf was in its bill, and Noah knew that the waters had abated from the earth. Then he waited still another seven days and sent out the dove, and it did not return to him again. And it happened in the six hundred and first year, in the first month, on the first day of the month, the waters dried up from the earth, and Noah took off the covering of the ark and he saw and, look, the surface of the ground was dry. And in the second month, on the twenty-seventh day of the month, the earth was completely dry. And God spoke to Noah, saying, “Go out of the ark, you and your wife and your sons and your sons’ wives, with you. All the animals that are with you of all flesh, fowl and cattle and every crawling thing that crawls on the earth, take out with you, and let them swarm through the earth and be fruitful and multiply on the earth.” And Noah went out, his sons and his wife and his sons’ wives with him. Every beast, every crawling thing, and every fowl, everything that stirs on the earth, by their families, came out of the ark. And Noah built an altar to the LORD and he took from every clean cattle and every clean fowl and offered burnt offerings on the altar. And the LORD smelled the fragrant odor and the LORD said in His heart, “I will not again damn the soil on humankind’s score. For the devisings of the human heart are evil from youth. And I will not again strike down all living things as I did. As long as all the days of the earth—seedtime and harvest and cold and heat

and summer and winter
and day and night
shall not cease.”

9. And God blessed Noah and his sons and He said to them, “Be fruitful and multiply and fill the earth. And the dread and fear of you shall be upon all the beasts of the field and all the fowl of the heavens, in all that crawls on the ground and in all the fish of the sea. In your hand they are given. All stirring things that are alive, yours shall be for food, like the green plants, I have given all to you. But flesh with its lifeblood still in it you shall not eat. And just so, your lifeblood I will requite, from every beast I will requite it, and from humankind, from every man’s brother. I will requite human life.

He who sheds human blood by humans his blood shall be shed,<sup>1</sup> for in the image of God
He made humankind.
As for you, be fruitful and multiply, swarm through the earth, and hold sway over it.”

And God said to Noah and to his sons with him, “And I, I am about to establish My covenant with you and with your seed after you, and with every living creature that is with you, the fowl and the cattle and every beast of the earth with you, all that have come out of the ark, every beast of the earth. And I will establish My covenant with you, that never again shall all flesh be cut off by the waters of the Flood, and never again shall there be a Flood to destroy the earth.” And God said, “This is the sign of the covenant that I set between Me and you and every living creature that is with you, for everlasting generations: My bow I have set in the clouds to be a sign of the covenant between Me and the earth, and so, when I send clouds over the earth, the bow will appear in the cloud. Then I will remember My covenant, between Me and you and every living creature of all flesh, and the waters will no more become a Flood to destroy all flesh. And the bow shall be in the cloud and I will see it, to remember the everlasting covenant between God and all living creatures, all flesh that is on the earth.” And God said to Noah, “This is the sign of the covenant I have established between Me and all flesh that is on the earth.”

And the sons of Noah who came out from the ark were Shem and Ham and Japheth, and Ham was the father of Canaan. These three were the sons of Noah, and from these the whole earth spread out. And Noah, a man of the soil, was the first to plant a vineyard. And he drank of the wine and became drunk, and exposed himself within his tent. And Ham the father of Canaan saw his father's nakedness and told his two brothers outside. And Shem and Japheth took a cloak and put it over both their shoulders and walked backward and covered their father's nakedness, their faces turned backward so they did not see their father's nakedness. And Noah woke from his wine and he knew what his youngest son had done to him.<sup>2</sup> And he said, “Cursed be Canaan,

the lowliest slave shall he be to his brothers.”<sup>3</sup>

And he said,

“Blessed be the LORD
the God of Shem,
unto them shall Canaan be slave.
May God enlarge Japheth, may he dwell in the tents of Shem,
unto them shall Canaan be slave.”

And Noah lived after the Flood three hundred and fifty years. And all the days of Noah were nine hundred and fifty years. Then he died.

From Genesis 11

[The Tower of Babel]

11. And all the earth was one language, one set of words. And it happened as they journeyed from the east that they found a valley in the land of Shinar and settled there. And they said to each other, “Come, let us bake bricks and burn them hard.” And the brick served them as stone, and bitumen served them as

2. The text leaves it unclear what Ham has done. Perhaps simply seeing his father naked is breaking a taboo.

3. An obvious purpose of this story is to justify the idea that the Israelites, rather than the Canaanites, ought to control the land of Canaan—an important issue in later Israelite history. After antiquity, Noah's three sons were often believed to have been the ancestors of the three supposed racial groups in the world: Japheth was the ancestor of European and Asian peoples, Shem was the ancestor of the Semitic races, and Ham was the ancestor of Africans. This interpretation goes well beyond the text itself and has often been motivated, implicitly or explicitly, by racism.

mortar. And they said, “Come, let us build us a city and a tower with its top in the heavens, that we may make us a name, lest we be scattered over all the earth.” And the LORD came down to see the city and the tower that the human creatures had built. And the LORD said, “As one people with one language for all, if this is what they have begun to do, now nothing they plot to do will elude them. Come, let us go down and baffle their language there so that they will not understand each other’s language.” And the LORD scattered them from there over all the earth and they left off building the city. Therefore it is called Babel, for there the LORD made the language of all the earth babble.<sup>4</sup> And from there the LORD scattered them over all the earth.

From Genesis 12, 17, 18

[God’s Promise to Abraham]

12. And the LORD said to Abram,<sup>5</sup> “Go forth from your land and your birthplace and your father’s house to the land I will show you. And I will make you a great nation and I will bless you and make your name great, and you shall be a blessing. And I will bless those who bless you, and those who damn you I will curse, and all the clans of the earth through you shall be blessed.” And Abram went forth as the LORD had spoken to him and Lot went forth with him, Abram being seventy-five years old when he left Haran. And Abram took Sarai his wife and Lot his nephew and all the goods they had gotten and the folk they had bought in Haran,<sup>6</sup> and they set out on the way to the land of Canaan, and they came to the land of Canaan. And Abram crossed through the land to the site of Shechem, to the Terebinth of Moreh. The Canaanite was then in the land. And the LORD appeared to Abram and said, “To your seed I will give this land.” And he built an altar there to the LORD who had appeared to him.

17. And Abram was ninety-nine years old, and the LORD appeared to Abram and said to him, “I am El Shaddai.<sup>7</sup> Walk in My presence and be blameless, and I will grant My covenant between Me and you and I will multiply you very greatly.” And Abram flung himself on his face, and God spoke to him, saying, “As for Me, this is My covenant with you: you shall be father to a multitude of nations. And no longer shall your name be called Abram but your name shall be Abraham, for I have made you father to a multitude of nations.<sup>8</sup> And I will

4. The pun in Hebrew is between balal, “to mix” or “to confuse,” and the Akkadian place name Babel (or Babylon), which probably originally meant “gate of heaven.” The “tower” is presumably a ziggurat, the type of tall building surrounding temple complexes in many ancient Mesopotamian cultures.

5. Ten generations and hundreds of years have passed since the time of Noah. Abram is a descendant of Noah’s son Shem.

6. Slaves. Slavery was a common institution in the ancient Near East. The slave girl Hagar will play an important part in the story, since she is the mother of Abram’s first son, Ishmael.

7. El means God; the meaning of Shaddai is obscure.

8. The names Abram and Abraham both mean “exalted father.” Abram and Sarai (later Sarah) have to change their names, not to gain titles with new meaning but as a sign of taking on their new roles as instruments of God’s purpose.

make you most abundantly fruitful and turn you into nations, and kings shall come forth from you. And I will establish My covenant between Me and you and your seed after you through their generations as an everlasting covenant to be God to you and to your seed after you. And I will give unto you and your seed after you the land in which you sojourn, the whole land of Canaan, as an everlasting holding, and I will be their God.”

And God said to Abraham, “As for you, you shall keep My commandment, you and your seed after you through their generations.”

18. And the LORD appeared to him in the Terebinths of Mamre<sup>9</sup> when he was sitting by the tent flap in the heat of the day. And he raised his eyes and saw, and, look, three men were standing before him. He saw, and he ran toward them from the tent flap and bowed to the ground. And he said, “My lord, if I have found favor in your eyes, please do not go on past your servant. Let a little water be fetched and bathe your feet and stretch out under the tree, and let me fetch a morsel of bread, and refresh yourselves. Then you may go on, for have you not come by your servant?” And they said, “Do as you have spoken.” And Abraham hurried to the tent to Sarah and he said, “Hurry! Knead three seahs of choice semolina flour and make loaves.”<sup>1</sup> And to the herd Abraham ran and fetched a tender and goodly calf and gave it to the lad, who hurried to prepare it. And he fetched curds and milk and the calf that had been prepared and he set these before them, he standing over them under the tree, and they ate. And they said to him, “Where is Sarah your wife?” And he said, “There, in the tent.” And he said, “I will surely return to you at this very season and, look, a son shall Sarah your wife have,” and Sarah was listening at the tent flap, which was behind him. And Abraham and Sarah were old, advanced in years, Sarah no longer had her woman’s flow. And Sarah laughed inwardly, saying, “After being shriveled, shall I have pleasure, and my husband is old?” And the LORD said to Abraham, “Why is it that Sarah laughed, saying, ‘Shall I really give birth, old as I am?’ Is anything beyond the LORD? In due time I will return to you, at this very season, and Sarah shall have a son.” And Sarah dissembled, saying, “I did not laugh,” for she was afraid. And He said, “Yes, you did laugh.”

[Abraham and Isaac]

21. And the LORD singled out Sarah as He had said, and the LORD did for Sarah as He had spoken. And Sarah conceived and bore a son to Abraham in his old age at the set time that God had spoken to him. And Abraham called the name of his son who was born to him, whom Sarah bore him, Isaac.<sup>2</sup> And Abraham circumcised Isaac his son when he was eight days old, as God had charged him. And Abraham was a hundred years old when Isaac his son was born to him. And Sarah said, “Laughter has God made me, Whoever hears will laugh at me.”

* * *

22. And it happened after these things that God tested Abraham. And He said to him, “Abraham!” and he said, “Here I am.” And He said, “Take, pray, your son, your only one, whom you love, Isaac, and go forth to the land of Moriah and offer him up as a burnt offering on one of the mountains which I shall say to you.” And Abraham rose early in the morning and saddled his donkey and took his two lads with him, and Isaac his son, and he split wood for the offering, and rose and went to the place that God had said to him. On the third day Abraham raised his eyes and saw the place from afar. And Abraham said to his lads, “Sit you here with the donkey and let me and the lad walk ahead and let us worship and return to you.” And Abraham took the wood for the offering and put it on Isaac his son and he took in his hand the fire and the cleaver, and the two of them went together. And Isaac said to Abraham his father, “Father!” and he said, “Here I am, my son.” And he said, “Here is the fire and the wood but where is the sheep for the offering?” And Abraham said, “God will see to the sheep for the offering, my son.” And the two of them went together. And they came to the place that God had said to him, and Abraham built there an altar and laid out the wood and bound Isaac his son and placed him on the altar on top of the wood. And Abraham reached out his hand and took the cleaver to slaughter his son. And the LORD’s messenger called out to him from the heavens and said, “Abraham, Abraham!” and he said, “Here I am.” And he said, “Do not reach out your hand against the lad, and do nothing to him, for now I know that you fear God and you have not held back your son, your only one, from Me.” And Abraham raised his eyes and saw and, look, a ram was caught in the thicket by its horns, and Abraham went and took the ram and offered him up as a burnt offering instead of his son. And Abraham called the name of that place YHWH-Yireh, as is said to this day, “On the mount of the LORD there is sight.”<sup>3</sup> And the LORD’s messenger called out to Abraham once again from the heavens, and He said, “By My own Self I swear, declares the LORD, that because you have done this thing and have not held back your son, your only one, I will greatly bless you and will greatly multiply your seed, as the stars in the heavens and as the sand on the shore of the sea, and your seed shall take hold of its enemies’ gate. And all the nations of the earth will be blessed through your seed because you have listened to my voice.” And Abraham returned to his lads, and they rose and went together to Beersheba, and Abraham dwelled in Beersheba.

19. On the third new moon of the Israelites' going out from Egypt, on this day did they come to the Wilderness of Sinai. And they journeyed onward from Rephidim and they came to the Wilderness of Sinai, and Israel camped there over against the mountain. And Moses had gone up to God, and the LORD called out to him from the mountain, saying, "Thus shall you say to the house of Jacob, and shall you tell to the Israelites: 'You yourselves saw what I did to Egypt, and I bore you on the wings of eagles<sup>2</sup> and I brought you to Me. And now, if you will truly heed My voice and keep My covenant, you will become for Me a treasure among all the peoples, for Mine is all the earth. And as for you, you will become for Me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation.' These are the words that you shall speak to the Israelites."

And Moses came and he called to the elders of the people, and he set before them all these words that the LORD had charged him. And all the people answered together and said, "Everything that the LORD has spoken we shall do." And Moses brought back the people's words to the LORD. And the LORD said to Moses, "Look, I am about to come to you in the utmost cloud, so that the people may hear as I speak to you, and you as well they will trust for all time." And Moses told the people's words to the LORD. And the LORD said to Moses, "Go to the people and consecrate them today and tomorrow, and they shall wash their cloaks. And they shall ready themselves for the third day, for on the third day the LORD will come down before the eyes of all the people on Mount Sinai. And you shall set bounds for the people all around, saying, 'Watch yourselves not to go up on the mountain or to touch its edge. Whosoever touches the mountain is doomed to die. No hand shall touch him,<sup>3</sup> but He shall surely be stoned or be shot, whether beast or man, he shall not live. When the ram's horn blasts long, they<sup>4</sup> it is who will go up the mountain.'" And Moses came down from the mountain to the people, and he consecrated the people, and they washed their cloaks. And he said to the people, "Ready yourselves for three days. Do not go near a woman."<sup>5</sup> And it happened on the third day as it turned morning, that there was thunder and lightning and a heavy cloud on the mountain and the sound of the ram's horn, very strong, and all the people who were in the camp trembled. And Moses brought out the people toward God from the camp and they stationed themselves at the bottom of the mountain. And Mount Sinai was all in smoke because the LORD had come down on it in fire, and its smoke went up like the smoke from a kiln, and the whole mountain trembled greatly. And the sound of the ram's horn grew stronger and stronger. Moses would speak, and God would answer him with voice.<sup>6</sup> And the LORD came down on Mount Sinai, to the mountaintop, and the LORD called Moses to the mountaintop, and Moses went up. And the LORD

1. Translated by Robert Alter, to whose notes some of the following annotations are indebted.

2. A metaphor for salvation. "What I did to Egypt" refers to the plagues that afflicted Egypt and to the destruction of the Egyptian army, as it pursued the departing Israelites, at the Red Sea.

3. Whoever violates the ban on touching the mountain will be impure and an outcast from the community. Therefore he has to be killed at a distance, with stones or arrows.

4. I.e., Moses and Aaron.

5. Sexual abstinence and the washing of clothes were methods of ritual purification.

6. I.e., with words.

said to Moses, “Go down, warn the people, lest they break through to the LORD to see and many of them perish. And the priests, too, who come near to the LORD, shall consecrate themselves,<sup>7</sup> lest the LORD burst forth against them.” And Moses said to the Lord, “The people will not be able to come up to Mount Sinai, for You Yourself warned us, saying, ‘Set bounds to the mountain and consecrate it.’” And the LORD said to him, “Go down, and you shall come up, you and Aaron<sup>8</sup> with you, and the priests and the people shall not break through to go up to the LORD, lest He burst forth against them.” And Moses went down to the people and said it to them.

20. And God spoke all these words, saying: “I am the LORD your God Who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slaves. You<sup>9</sup> shall have no other gods beside Me. You shall make you no carved likeness and no image of what is in the heavens above or what is on the earth below or what is in the waters beneath the earth. You shall not bow to them and you shall not worship them, for I am the LORD your God, a jealous god, reckoning the crime of fathers with sons, with the third generation and with the fourth, for My foes and doing kindness to the thousandth generation for My friends and for those who keep My commands. You shall not take the name of the LORD your God in vain, for the LORD will not acquit whosoever takes His name in vain. Remember the sabbath day to hallow it. Six days you shall work and you shall do your tasks, but the seventh day is a sabbath to the LORD your God. You shall do no task, you and your son and your daughter, your male slave and your slavegirl and your beast and your sojourner who is within your gates. For six days did the LORD make the heavens and the earth, the sea and all that is in it, and He rested on the seventh day. Therefore did the LORD bless the sabbath day and hallow it. Honor your father and your mother, so that your days may be long on the soil that the LORD your God has given you. You shall not murder. You shall not commit adultery. You shall not steal. You shall not bear false witness against your fellow man. You shall not covet your fellow man’s wife, or his male slave, or his slavegirl, or his ox, or his donkey, or anything that your fellow man has.”

And all the people were seeing the thunder and the flashes and the sound of the ram’s horn and the mountain in smoke, and the people saw and they drew back and stood at a distance. And they said to Moses, “Speak you with us that we may hear, and let not God speak with us lest we die.” And Moses said to the people, “Do not fear, for in order to test you God has come and in order that His fear be upon you, so that you do not offend.” And the people stood at a distance, and Moses drew near the thick cloud where God was.

7. I.e., they are to purify themselves and remain at the bottom of the mountain as the rest of the people do.

8. Moses’s closest companion and in an early tradition his brother; Aaron was Israel’s first High Priest.

9. Here and throughout this passage, the Hebrew text uses the singular of “you” (formulations of law elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible use the plural). The commandments are thus addressed to each person individually.

1. A man there was in the land of Uz<sup>2</sup> Job, his name. And the man was blameless and upright and feared God and shunned evil. And seven sons were born to him, and three daughters. And his flocks came to seven thousand sheep and three thousand camels and five hundred yokes of cattle and five hundred she-asses and a great abundance of slaves. And that man was greater than all the dwellers of the East. And his sons would go and hold a feast, in each one's house on his set day, and they would call to their sisters to eat and drink with them. And it happened when the days of the feast came round, that Job would send and consecrate them and rise early in the morning and offer up burnt offerings according to the number of them all. For Job thought, Perhaps my sons have offended and cursed God in their hearts. Thus would Job do at all times.

And one day, the sons of God<sup>3</sup> came to stand in attendance before the LORD, and the Adversary,<sup>4</sup> too, came among them. And the LORD said to the Adversary, "From where do you come?" And the Adversary answered the LORD and said, "From roaming the earth and walking about in it." And the LORD said to the Adversary, "Have you paid heed to my servant Job, for there is none like him on earth, a blameless and upright man, who fears God and shuns evil?" And the Adversary answered the LORD and said, "Does Job fear God for nothing? Have You not hedged him about and his household and all that he has all around? The work of his hands You have blessed, and his flocks have spread over the land. And yet, reach out Your hand, pray, and strike all he has. Will he not curse You to Your face? And the LORD said to the Adversary, "Look, all that he has is in your hands. Only against him do not reach out your hand." And the Adversary went out from before the LORD's presence.

And one day, his sons and his daughters were eating and drinking wine in the house of their brother, the firstborn. And a messenger came to Job and said, "The cattle were plowing and the she-asses grazing by them, and Sabeans fell upon them and took them, and the lads they struck down by the edge of the sword, and I alone escaped to tell you." This one was still speaking when another came and said, "God's fire fell from the heavens and burned among the sheep and the lads and consumed them, and I alone escaped to tell you." This one was still speaking when another came and said, "Chaldeans set out in three bands and pounced upon the camels and took them, and the lads they struck down by the edge of the sword." This one was still speaking when another came and said, "Your sons and your daughters were eating and drinking wine in the house of their brother, the firstborn. And, look, a great wind came from beyond the wilderness and struck the four corners of the house, and it fell on the young people, and they died. And I alone escaped to tell you." And Job rose and tore his garment and shaved his head and fell to the earth and bowed down.<sup>5</sup> And he said,

1. Translated by Robert Alter, to whom some of the following notes are indebted.

2. 'Uts (Uz) means "counsel," or "advice," so the story takes place in an unreal, fabulous landscape: the Land of Counsel.

3. This phrase reflects a premonotheistic idea of a family or council of gods.

4. "The Adversary," or "the satan" (hasatan in the original), means a person, thing, or set of circumstances that is an obstacle to someone. It does not mean "devil"; the modern connotations of evil are absent from the original word, and clearly this "satan" is part of God's court.

5. Gestures of mourning.

“Naked I came out from my mother’s womb, and naked shall I return there.
The LORD has given and the LORD has taken.
May the LORD’s name be blessed.”

With all this, Job did not offend, nor did he put blame on God.

2. And one day, the sons of God came to stand in attendance before the LORD, and the Adversary, too, came among them to stand in attendance before the LORD. And the LORD said to the Adversary, “From whence do you come?” And the Adversary answered the LORD and said, “From roaming the earth and walking about in it.” And the LORD said to the Adversary, “Have you paid heed to My servant Job, for there is none like him on earth, a blameless and upright man, who fears God and shuns evil and still clings to his innocence, and you incited Me against him to destroy him for nothing.” And the Adversary answered the LORD and said, “Skin for skin!<sup>6</sup> A man will give all he has for his own life. Yet, reach out, pray, your hand and strike his bone and his flesh. Will he not curse You to Your face?” And the LORD said to the Adversary, “Here he is in your hands. Only preserve his life.” And the Adversary went out from before the LORD’s presence. And he struck Job with a grievous burning rash from the soles of his feet to the crown of his head. And he took a potsherd to scrape himself with, and he was sitting among the ashes. And his wife said to him, “Do you still cling to your innocence? Curse God and die.” And he said to her, “You speak as one of the base women would speak. Shall we accept good from God, too, and evil we shall not accept?” With all this, Job did not offend with his lips.

And Job’s three companions heard of all this harm that had come upon him, and they came, each from his place—Eliphaz the Temanite and Bildad the Shuhite and Zophar the Naamathite, and they agreed to meet to grieve with him and to comfort him. And they lifted up their eyes from afar and did not recognize him, and they lifted up their voices and wept, and each tore his garment, and they tossed dust on their heads toward the heavens. And they sat with him on the ground seven days and seven nights, and none spoke a word to him, for they saw that the pain was very great.

3. Afterward, Job opened his mouth and cursed his day. And Job spoke up and he said:

Annul the day that I was born and the night that said, “A man is conceived.”
That day, let it be darkness.
Let God above not seek it out, nor brightness shine upon it. 5 Let darkness, death’s shadow, foul it, let a cloud-mass rest upon it,
let day-gloom dismay it.
That night, let murk overtake it.
Let it not join in the days of the year, 10 let it not enter the number of months.

6. An obscure proverb, perhaps meaning that Job will truly suffer only once pain touches his own skin.

Oh, let that night be barren, let it have no song of joy.
 Let the day-cursers hex it, those ready to rouse Leviathan.<sup>7</sup> 15
 Let its twilight stars go dark.
 Let it hope for day in vain,
 and let it not see the eyelids of dawn.
 For it did not shut the belly's doors to hide wretchedness from my eyes. 20 Why did I not die from the womb, from the belly come out, breathe my last?
 Why did knees welcome me,
 and why breasts, that I should suck?
 For now I would lie and be still, 25 would sleep and know repose with kings and the councilors of earth, who build ruins for themselves, or with princes, possessors of gold, who fill their houses with silver. 30 Or like a buried stillbirth I'd be,
 like babes who never saw light.
 There the wicked cease their troubling, and there the weary repose.
 All together the prisoners are tranquil, 35
 they hear not the taskmaster's voice.
 The small and the great are there, and the slave is free of his master.
 Why give light to the wretched and life to the deeply embittered, 40 who wait for death in vain, dig for it more than for treasure,
 who rejoice at the tomb,
 are glad when they find the grave?
 —To a man whose way is hidden, 45 and God has hedged him about.
 For before my bread my moaning comes,
 and my roar pours out like water.
 For I feared a thing—it befell me, what I dreaded came upon me. 50
 I was not quiet, I was not still,
 I had no repose, and trouble came.

4. And Eliphaz spoke out and he said:

If speech were tried against you, could you stand it?
 Yet who can hold back words?
 Look, you reproved many,
 and slack hands you strengthened.

7. Leviathan is a sea monster, representing chaos in Canaanite mythology. The “day-cursers” are magicians.

The stumbler your words lifted up, 5 and bended knees you bolstered.
 But now it comes to you and you cannot stand it,
 it reaches you and you are dismayed.
 Is not your reverence your safety, your hope—your blameless ways? 10 Recall, pray: what innocent man has died, and where were the upright demolished?
 As I have seen, those who plow mischief, those who plant wretchedness, reap it.
 Through God's breath they die, 15 before his nostrils' breathing they vanish.
 The lion's roar, the maned beast's sound—and the young lions' teeth are smashed.
 The king of beasts dies with no prey, the whelps of the lion are scattered. 20
 And to me came a word in secret, and my ear caught a tag-end of it, in musings from nighttime's visions when slumber falls upon men.
 Fear called to me, and trembling, 25
 and all my limbs it gripped with fear.
 And a spirit passed over my face, made the hair on my flesh stand on end.
 It halted, its look unfamiliar, an image before my eyes, 30 stillness, and a sound did I hear:
 Can a mortal be cleared before God, can a man be made pure by his Maker?
 Why, His servants He does not trust,
 His agents He charges with blame. 35
 All the more so, the clay-house dwellers, whose foundation is in the dust,
 who are crushed more quickly than moths.
 From morning to eve they are shattered, unawares they are lost forever. 40 Should their life-thread be broken within them, they die, and without any wisdom.

5. Call out, pray: will any answer you, and to whom of the angels will you turn?
 For anger kills a fool,
 and the simple, envy slays.
 I have seen a fool striking root— 5
 all at once his abode I saw cursed.
 His children are distant from rescue and are crushed in the gate—none will save.
 Whose harvest the hungry eat and from among thorns they take it away, 10 and the thirsty pant for their wealth.
 For crime does not spring from the dust,
 nor from the soil does wretchedness sprout.

But man is to wretchedness born like sparks flying upward. 15 Yet I search for El<sup>8</sup> and to God I make my case, Who does great things without limit wonders beyond all number, Who brings rain down on the earth 20
 and sends water over the fields.
 Who raises the lowly on high—
 the downcast are lifted in rescue.
 Thwarts the designs of the cunning, and their hands do not perform wisely. 25
 He entraps the wise in their cunning, and the crooked's counsel proves hasty.
 By day they encounter darkness,
 as in night they go groping at noon.
 He rescues the simple from the sword, 30 and from the hand of the strong, the impoverished, and the indigent then has hope,
 and wickedness clamps its mouth shut.
 Why, happy the man whom God corrects.
 Shaddai's reproof do not spurn! 35
 For He causes pain and binds the wound,
 He deals blows but His hands will heal.
 In six straits He will save you,
 and in seven harm will not touch you.
 In famine He redeems you from death, 40 and in battle from the sword.
 From the scourge of the tongue you are hidden,
 and you shall fear not assault when it comes.
 At assault and starvation you laugh, and the beasts of the earth you fear not. 45
 With the stones of the field is your pact, the beasts of the field leagued with you.
 And you shall know that your tent is peaceful, probe your home and find nothing amiss.
 And you shall know that your seed is abundant, 50 your offspring like the grass of the earth.
 You shall come to the grave in vigor,
 as grain-shocks mount in their season.
 Look, this we have searched, it is so.
 Hear it, and you—you should know. 55

6. And Job spoke out and he said:

Could my anguish but be weighed,
 and my disaster on the scales be borne,
 they would be heavier now than the sand of the sea.
 Thus my words are choked back.

8. God.

For Shaddai's arrows are in me—their venom my spirit drinks. 5
 The terrors of God beset me.
 Does the wild ass bray over his grass, the ox bellow over his feed?<sup>9</sup> Is tasteless food eaten unsalted, 10 does the oozing of mallows have savor?<sup>1</sup>
 My throat refuses to touch them.
 They resemble my sickening flesh.
 If only my wish were fulfilled, and my hope God might grant. 15
 If God would deign to crush me, loose His hand and tear me apart.
 And this still would be my comfort,
 I shrink back in pangs—he spares not.
 Yet I withhold not the Holy One's words. 20
 What is my strength, that I should hope, and what my end that I should endure?
 Is my strength the strength of stones, is my flesh made of bronze?
 Indeed, there is no help within me, 25 and prudence is driven from me.
 The blighted man's friend owes him kindness, though the fear of Shaddai he forsake.
 My brothers betrayed like a wadi,<sup>2</sup> like the channel of brooks that run dry. 30
 They are dark from the ice, snow heaped on them.
 When they warm, they are gone,
 in the heat they melt from their place.
 The paths that they go on are winding, 35
 they mount in the void and are lost.
 The caravans of Tema looked out,<sup>3</sup>
 the convoys of Sheba awaited.
 Disappointed in what they had trusted, they reached it and their hopes were dashed. 40
 For now you are His.
 You see panic and you fear.
 Did I say, Give for me,
 and with your wealth pay a ransom for me, and free me from the hands of the foe, 45 from the oppressors' hands redeem me?
 Instruct me—as for me, I'll keep silent, and let me know where I went wrong.

9. Rhetorical questions. The idea is that animals do not complain when fed appropriately, and, by analogy, humans do not complain unless they are truly suffering.

1. The tasteless food may be literal (Job cannot eat because he is too upset), or metaphorical.

2. A desert ravine, which is full of water only in the rainy season; when summer comes, it runs dry.

3. For water, continuing the image of the dried-up wadi.

How forceful are honest words.
 Yet what rebuke is the rebuke by you? 50
 Do you mean to rebuke with words, treat the speech of the desperate as wind?
 Even for the orphan you cast lots,
 and haggle for your companion.
 And now, deign to turn toward me. 55
 To your face I will surely not lie.
 Relent, pray, let there be no injustice.
 Relent. I am yet in the right.
 Is there injustice on my tongue?
 Does my palate not taste disasters? 60

7. Does not man have fixed service on earth, and like a hired worker's his days?
 Like a slave he pants for shade,
 like a hired worker he waits for his pay.
 Thus I was heir to futile moons, 5 and wretched nights were allotted to me.
 Lying down, I thought, When shall I rise?—
 Each evening, I was sated with tossing till dawn.
 My flesh was clothed with worms and earth-clods, my skin rippled with running sores. 10
 My days are swifter than the weaver's shuttle.
 They snap off without any hope.
 Recall that my life is a breath.
 Not again will my eyes see good.
 The eye of who sees me will not make me out. 15
 Your eyes are on me—I am gone.
 A cloud vanishes and goes off.
 Thus, who goes down to Sheol<sup>4</sup> will not come up.
 He will not return to his home.
 His place will not know him again. 20
 As for me, I will not restrain my mouth.
 I would lament with my spirit in straits
 I would speak when my being is bitter.
 Am I Yamm<sup>5</sup> or am I the Sea Beast, that You should put a watch upon me? 25
 When I thought my couch would console me, that my bed would bear my lament,
 You panicked me in dreams and in visions you struck me with terror.
 And my throat would have chosen choking, my bones—death. 30
 I am sickened—I won't live forever.
 Let me be, for my days are mere breath.
 What is man that You make him great and that You pay heed to him? 35

4. The land of the dead.

5. Yamm is the sea god in Canaanite mythology, also known as Leviathan; he was subdued by Baal, the weather god, whom Job here associates with his own God.

why, this is his joyous way, from another soil he will spring.
 Look, God will not spurn the blameless, nor hold the hand of evildoers.
 He will yet fill your mouth with laughter and your lips with a shout of joy.
 Your foes will be clothed in disgrace, and the tent of the wicked gone.

9. And Job spoke out and he said

Of course, I knew it was so:
 how can man be right before God?
 Should a person bring grievance against Him,
 He will not answer one of a thousand.
 Wise in mind, staunch in strength, who can argue with Him and come out whole?
 He uproots mountains and they know not,
 overturns them in His wrath.
 He makes earth shake in its setting, and its pillars shudder.
 He bids the sun not to rise, and the stars He seals up tight.
 He stretches the heavens alone and tramples the crests of the sea.
 He makes the Bear and Orion,
 the Pleiades and the South Wind's chambers.
 He performs great things without limit and wonders without number.
 Look, He passes over me and I do not see, slips by me and I cannot grasp Him.
 Look, He seizes—who can resist Him?
 Who can tell him, "What do You do?"
 God will not relent his fury.
 Beneath him Rahab's<sup>7</sup> minions stoop.
 And yet, as for me, I would answer Him, would choose my words with Him.
 Though in the right, I can't make my plea.
 I would have to entreat my own judge.
 Should I call out and He answer me,
 I would not trust Him to heed my voice
 Who for a hair would crush me and make my wounds many for nought.
 He does not allow me to catch my breath as He sates me with bitterness.
 If it's strength—He is staunch,
 and if it's justice—who can arraign Him?
 Though in the right, my mouth will convict me,
 I am blameless, yet He makes me crooked.
 I am blameless—I know not myself,
 I loathe my life.

7. Another name for the sea monster (Baal, or Leviathan).

It's all the same, and so I thought:
 the blameless and the wicked He destroys.
 If a scourge causes death in an instant,
 He mocks the innocent's plight.
 The earth is given in the wicked man's hand, 45
 the face of its judges He veils.
 If not He—then who else?
 And my days are swifter than a courier.
 They have fled and have never seen good, slipped away like reed ships, 50
 like an eagle swooping on prey.
 If I said, I would forget my lament.
 I would leave my grim mood and be gladdened,
 I was in terror of all my suffering.
 I knew You would not acquit me. 55
 I will be guilty.
 Why should I toil in vain?
 Should I bathe in snow,
 make my palms pure with lye, You would yet plunge me into a pit, 60 and my robes would defile me.
 For He is not a man like me that I might answer Him,
 that we might come together in court.
 Would there were an arbiter between us, who could lay his hand on us both, 65 who could take from me His rod, and His terror would not confound me.
 I would speak, and I will not fear Him,
 for that is not the way I am.

10. My whole being loathes my life.
 Let me give vent to my lament.
 Let me speak when my being is bitter.
 I shall say to God: Do not convict me.
 Inform me why You accuse me. 5
 Is it good for You to oppress, to spurn Your own palms' labor, and on the council of the wicked to shine?
 Do You have the eyes of mortal flesh, do You see as man would see? 10
 Are Your days like a mortal's days,
 Your years like the years of a man, that You should search out my crime and inquire for my offense?
 You surely know I am not guilty, 15
 but there is none who saves from Your hand.
 Your hands fashioned me and made me,
 and then You turn round and destroy me!
 Recall, pray, that like clay You worked me, and to the dust You will make me return. 20 Why, You poured me out like milk and like cheese You curdled me.
 With skin and flesh You clothed me,

with bones and sinews entwined me.
 Life and kindness you gave me, 25 and Your precepts my spirit kept.
 Yet these did You hide in Your heart;
 I knew that this was with You:
 If I offended, You kept watch upon me and of my crime would not acquit me. 30
 If I was guilty, alas for me, and though innocent, I could not raise my head, sated with shame and surfeited with disgrace.
 Like a triumphant lion You hunt me, over again wondrously smite me. 35
 You summon new witnesses against me and swell up your anger toward me—vanishings and hard service are mine.
 And why from the womb did You take me?
 I'd breathe my last, no eye would have seen me. 40
 As though I had not been, I would be.
 From belly to grave I'd be carried.
 My days are but few—let me be.
 Turn away that I may have some gladness before I go, never more to return, 45 to the land of dark and death's shadow, the land of gloom, thickest murk, death's shadow and disorder, where it shines thickest murk.

11. And Zophar the Naamathite spoke out and he said:
 Shall a swarm of words be unanswered,
 and should a smooth talker be in the right?
 Your lies may silence folk,
 you mock and no one protests. 5
 And you say: my teaching is spotless, and I am pure in your eyes.
 Yet, if only God would speak, and He would open His lips against you, would tell you wisdom's secrets, 10 for prudence is double-edged.
 And know, God leaves some of your crime forgotten.
 Can you find what God has probed, can you find Shaddai's last end?
 Higher than heaven, what can you do, 15 deeper than Sheol, what can you know?
 Longer than earth is its measure, and broader than the sea.
 Should He slip away or confine or assemble, who can resist Him? 20
 For He knows the empty folk,
 He sees wrongdoing and surely takes note.
 And a hollow man will get a wise heart when a wild ass is born a man.
 If you yourself readied your heart 25 and spread out your palms to Him, if there is wrongdoing in your hands, remove it, let no mischief dwell in your tents.

 For then you will raise your face unstained, you will be steadfast and will not fear. 30
 For you will forget wretchedness, like water gone off, recall it.
 And life will rise higher than noon, will soar, will be like the morning.
 And you will trust, for there is hope, 35 will search, and lie secure.
 You will stretch out, and none make you tremble, and many pay court to you.
 And the eyes of the wicked will pine, escape will be lost to them, 40
 and their hope—a last gasp of breath.

12. And Job spoke up and he said:
 Oh yes, you are the people,
 and with you wisdom will die!
 But I, too, have a mind like you,
 I am no less than you, 5
 and who does not know such things?
 A laughing-stock to his friend I am,
 who calls to his God and is answered,
 a laughing-stock of the blameless just man.
 The smug man's thought scorns disaster, 10 readied for those who stumble.
 The tents of despoilers are tranquil, provokers of God are secure, whom God has led by the hand.
 Yet ask of the beasts, they will teach you, 15
 the fowl of the heavens will tell you, or speak to the earth, it will teach you,
 the fish of the sea will inform you.
 Who has not known in all these that the LORD's hand has done this? 20
 In Whose hand is the breath of each living thing, and the spirit of all human flesh.
 Does not the ear make out words,
 the palate taste food?
 In the aged is wisdom, 25
 and in length of days understanding.
 With Him are wisdom and strength,
 He possesses counsel and understanding.
 Why, He destroys and there is no rebuilding, closes in on a man, leaves no opening. 30
 Why, He holds back the waters and they dry up, sends them forth and they turn the earth over.
 With Him is power and prudence,
 His the duped and the duper.
 He leads counselors astray 35 and judges He drives to madness.

 He undoes the sash of kings and binds a loincloth round their waist.
 He leads priests astray,
 the mighty He misleads. 40
 He takes away speech from the trustworthy, and sense from the elders He takes,
 He pours forth scorn on princes, and the belt of the nobles He slackens, lays bare depths from the darkness 45 and brings out to light death's shadow, raises nations high and destroys them, flattens nations and leads them away, stuns the minds of the people's leaders, makes them wander in trackless wastes— 50
 they grope in darkness without light,
 He makes them wander like drunken men.

13. Why, my eye has seen all, my ear has heard and understood.
 As you know, I, too, know.
 I am no less than you.
 Yet I would speak to Shaddai, 5 and I want to dispute with God.
 And yet, you plaster lies,<sup>8</sup>
 you are all quack-healers.
 Would that you fell silent, and this would be your wisdom. 10 Hear, pray, my dispute, and to my lips' pleas listen closely.
 Would you speak crookedness of God,
 and of Him would you speak false things?
 Would you be partial on His behalf, 15 would you plead the case of God?
 Would it be good that He probed you,
 as one mocks a man would you mock Him?
 He shall surely dispute with you if in secret you are partial. 20
 Will not His majesty strike you with terror, and His fear fall upon you?
 Your pronouncements are maxims of ash, your word-piles, piles of clay.
 Be silent before me—I would speak, 25
 no matter what befalls me.
 Why should I bear my flesh in my teeth, and my life-breath place in my palm?
 Look, He slays me, I have no hope.
 Yet my ways I'll dispute to His face. 30
 Even that becomes my rescue, for no tainted man comes before Him.

8. An idiom also found in the Psalms; the idea is that the truth is “plastered over” with lies.

Hear, O hear my word
 and my utterance in your ear.
 Look, pray, I have laid out my case, 35
 I know that I am in the right.
 Who would make a plea against me?
 I would be silent then, breathe my last.
 Just two things do not do to me, then would I not hide from Your presence. 40 Take Your palm away from me, and let Your dread not strike me with terror.
 Call and I will reply,
 or I will speak, and answer me.
 How many crimes and offenses have I? 45
 My offense and my wrong, inform me.
 Why do You hide Your face, and count me Your enemy?
 Would You harry a driven leaf, and a dry straw would You chase, 50 that You should write bitter things against me, make me heir to the crimes of my youth?
 And You put my feet in stocks, watch after all my paths,
 on the soles of my feet make a mark.<sup>9</sup> 55

And man wears away like rot, like a garment eaten by moths.

14. Man born of woman, scant of days and sated with trouble,
 like a blossom he comes forth and withers,
 and flees like a shadow—he will not stay.
 Even on such You cast Your eye, 5 and me You bring in judgment with You?
 [Who can make the impure pure?
 No one.]<sup>1</sup>
 Oh, his days are decreed, the number of his months are with You, 10
 his limits You fixed that he cannot pass.
 Turn away from him that he may cease, until he serves out his day like a hired man.
 For a tree has hope:
 though cut down, it can still be removed, 15
 and its shoots will not cease.
 Though its root grow old in the ground and its stock die in the dust, from the scent of water it flowers, and puts forth branches like a sapling. 20
 But a strong man dies defeated, man breathes his last, and where is he?

9. Probably a reference to branding or tattooing done to mark out a criminal.

1. This verse is bracketed because it is metrically too short; many scholars think it does not belong in the text.

Water runs out from a lake,
 and a river is parched and dries up, but a man lies down and will not arise, 25 till the sky is no more he will not awake and will not rouse from his sleep.
 Would that You hid me in Sheol, concealed me till Your anger passed, set me a limit and recalled me. 30
 If a man dies will he live?
 All my hard service days I shall hope until my vanishing comes.
 Call out and I shall answer you, for the work of Your hand You should yearn. 35
 For then You would count my steps,
 You would not keep watch over my offense.
 My crime would be sealed in a packet,
 You would plaster over my guilt.
 And yet, a falling mountain crumbles, 40
 a rock is ripped from its place.
 Water wears away stones,
 its surge sweeps up the dust of the earth, and the hope of man You destroy.
 You overwhelm him forever, and he goes off, 45
 You change his face and send him away.
 If his sons grow great, he will not know.
 And should they dwindle, he will not notice them.
 But the flesh upon him will ache, his own being will mourn for him. 50

29. And Job again took up his theme and he said:
 Would that I were as in moons of yore,
 as the days when God watched over me,
 when He shined his lamp over my head, by its light I walked in darkness, 5 as I was in the days of my prime—God an intimate of my tent, when Shaddai still was with me,
 all around me my lads;
 when my feet bathed in curds 10
 and the rock poured out streams of oil, when I went out to the city's gate, in the square I secured my seat.<sup>2</sup> Lads saw me and took cover, the aged arose, stood up. 15 Noblemen held back their words, their palm they put to their mouth.
 The voice of the princes was muffled, their tongue to their palate stuck.

2. The square just inside the city gate was the town's meeting place; having a seat there would be a sign of status.

When the ear heard, it affirmed me, 20 and the eye saw and acclaimed me.
 For I would free the poor who cried out,
 the orphan with no one to help him.
 The perishing man's blessing would reach me, and the widow's heart I made sing. 25 Righteousness I donned and it clothed me, like a cloak and a headdress, my justice.
 Eyes I became for the blind, and legs for the lame I was.
 A father I was for the impoverished, 30 a stranger's cause I took up.
 And I cracked the wrongdoer's jaws, from his teeth I would wrench the prey.
 And I thought: In my nest I shall breathe my last,
 and my days will abound like the sand. 35
 My root will be open to water, and dew in my branches abide,
 My glory renewed within me,
 and my bow ever fresh in my hand.
 To me they would listen awaiting 40
 and fall silent at my advice.
 At my speech they would say nothing further,
 and upon them my word would drop.
 They waited for me as for rain, and gaped open their mouths as for showers. 45
 I laughed to them—they scarcely trusted—but my face's light they did not dim.
 I chose their way and sat as chief,
 I dwelled like a king in his brigade when he comforts the mourning. 50

30. And now mere striplings laugh at me whose fathers I spurned to put with the dogs of my flock.
 The strength of their hands—what use to me?
 From them the vigor has gone: 5
 In want and starvation bereft they flee to desert land,
 the darkness of desolate dunes, plucking saltwort from the bush,
 the roots of broomwood their bread. 10
 From within they are banished—people shout over them as at thieves.
 In river ravines they encamp, holes in the dust and crags.
 Among bushes they bray, 15 beneath thornplants they huddle.
 Vile creatures and nameless, too,
 they are struck from the land.
 And now I become their taunt,

I become their mocking word. 20
 They despised me, were distant to me, and from my face they did not spare their spit.
 For my bowstring they loosed and abused me, cast off restraint toward me.
 On the right, raw youths stand up, 25 they make me run off
 and pave against me their roadways of ruin.
 They shatter my path,
 my disaster devise,
 and none helps me against them. 30
 Like a wide water-burst they come, in the shape of a tempest they tumble.
 Terror rolls over me,
 pursues my path like the wind, and my rescue like a cloud passes on. 35
 And now my life spills out, days of affliction seize me.
 At night my limbs are pierced,
 and my sinews know no rest.
 With great power He seizes my garment, 40 grabs hold of me at the collar.
 He hurls me into the muck,
 and I become like dust and ashes.
 I scream to You and You do not answer,
 I stand still and You do not observe me. 45
 You become a cruel one toward me, with the might of Your hand You hound me.
 You bear me up, on the wind make me straddle, break me apart in a storm.
 For I know You'll return me to death, 50
 the meetinghouse of all living things.
 But one would not reach out against the afflicted if in his disaster he screamed.
 Have I not wept for the bleak-fated man, sorrowed for the impoverished? 55
 For I hoped for good and evil came.
 I expected light and darkness fell.
 My innards seethed and would not be still,
 days of affliction greeted me.
 In gloom did I walk, with no sun, 60
 I rose in assembly and I screamed.
 Brother I was to the jackals, companion to ostriches.<sup>3</sup>
 My skin turned black upon me, my limbs were scorched by drought. 65
 And my lyre has turned into mourning, my flute, a keening sound.

3. Known for their loud, mournful cries.

31. A pact I sealed with my eyes—
     I will not gaze on a virgin.
 And what is the share from God above,
     the portion from Shaddai in the heights?
 Is there not ruin for the wrongdoer, 5 and estrangement for those who do evil?
 Does He not see my way,
     and all my steps count?
 Have I walked in a lie, has my foot hurried to deceit? 10
 Let Him weigh me on fair scales, that God know my blamelessness.
 If my stride has strayed from the way, and my heart gone after my eyes, or the least thing stuck to my palms, 15 let me sow and another shall eat, my offspring torn up by the roots.
 If my heart was seduced by a woman, and at the door of my friend I lurked, let my wife grind for another 20 and upon her let others crouch.<sup>4</sup> For that is lewdness,
     and that is a grave crime.
 For it is fire that consumes to Perdition, and in all my yield eats the roots. 25
 If I spurned the case of my slave or my slavegirl, in their brief against me, what would I do when God stands up,
     and when He assays it, what would I answer?
 Why, my Maker made him in the belly, 30 and formed him in the selfsame womb.
 Did I hold back the poor from his desire or make the eyes of the widow pine?
 Did I eat my bread alone, and an orphan not eat from it? 35
 For from my youth like a father I raised him, and from my mother's womb I led him.
 If I saw a man failing, ungarbed, and no garment for the impoverished, did his loins not then bless me, 40
     and from my sheep's shearing was he not warmed?
 If I raised my hand against an orphan, when I saw my advantage in the gate, let my shoulder fall out of its socket and my arm break off from its shaft. 45
 For ruin from God is my fear, and His presence I cannot withstand.
 If I made gold my bulwark, and fine gold I called my trust,

4. The “grinding” and “crouching” are implicit metaphors for sex.

if I rejoiced that my wealth was great 50 and that abundance my hand had found, if I saw light when it gleamed and the moon gliding grand,
 and my heart was seduced in secret, and my hand caressed my mouth, 55
 this, too, would be a grave crime, for I would have denied God above.<sup>5</sup>
 If I rejoiced at my foe's disaster, and exulted when harm found him out—yet I did not let my mouth offend 60 to seek out his life in an oath.
 Did the men of my tent ever say,
     "Would that we were never sated of his flesh"?
 The sojourner did not sleep outside.
     My doors to the wayfarer I opened. 65 Did I hide like Adam my wrongdoings, to bury within me my crime,
 that I should fear the teeming crowd,
     and the scorn of clans terrify me, fall silent and keep within doors? 70
 Would that I had someone to hear me out.
     Here's my mark—let Shaddai answer me,
     and let my accuser indict his writ.
 I would bear it upon my shoulder, bind it as a crown upon me. 75
 The number of my steps I would tell Him, like a prince I would approach him.
 If my soil has cried out against me,
     and together its furrows wept,

 if I ate its yield without payment, 80 and drove its owners to despair, instead of wheat let nettles grow,
     and instead of barley, stinkweed.

 Here end the words of Job.

* * *

38. And the LORD answered Job from the whirlwind and He said:

Who is this who darkens counsel in words without knowledge?
 Gird, pray, your loins like a man,
     that I may ask you, and you can inform Me.
 Where were you when I founded earth? 5
     Tell, if you know understanding.
 Who fixed its measures, do you know, or who stretched a line upon it?
 In what were its sockets sunk, or who laid its cornerstone, 10

5. Apparently refers to idolatrous worship of the sun and moon.

when the morning stars sang together,
 and all the sons of God shouted for joy?
 Who hedged the sea in with doors,
 when it gushed forth from the womb, when I made cloud its clothing, 15 and thick mist its swaddling bands?
 I made breakers upon it My limit, and set a bolt with double doors.
 And I said, "Thus far come, no further, here halt the surge of your waves." 20
 Have you ever commanded the morning, appointed the dawn to its place,
 to seize the earth's corners,
 that the wicked be shaken from it?
 It turns like sealing clay, 25 takes color like a garment, and their light is withdrawn from the wicked,
 and the upraised arm is broken.
 Have you come into the springs of the sea,
 in the bottommost deep walked about? 30
 Have the gates of death been laid bare to you, and the gates of death's shadow have you seen?
 Did you take in the breadth of the earth?
 Tell, if you know it all.
 Where is the way that light dwells, 35 and darkness, where is its place, that you might take it to its home and understand the paths to its house?
 You know, for were you born then,
 and the number of your days is great! 40
 Have you come into the storehouse of snow, the storehouse of hail have you seen,
 which I keep for a time of strife,
 for a day of battle and war?
 By what way does the west wind fan out, 45
 the east wind whip over the earth?
 Who split a channel for the torrent, and a way for the thunderstorm, to rain on a land without man, wilderness bare of humankind, 50 to sate the desolate dunes and make the grass sprout there?
 Does the rain have a father, or who begot the drops of dew?
 From whose belly did the ice come forth, 55 to the frost of the heavens who gave birth?
 Water congeals like stone, and the face of the deep locks hard.
 Can you tie the bands of the Pleiades, or loose Orion's reins? 60
 Can you bring constellations out in their season, lead the Great Bear and her cubs?

 Do you know the laws of the heavens, can you fix their rule on earth?
 Can you lift your voice to the cloud, 65 that the water-spate cover you?
 Can you send lightning bolts on their way,
 and they will say to you, "Here we are!"?
 Who placed in the hidden parts wisdom, or who gave the mind understanding? 70
 Who counted the skies in wisdom, and the jars of the heavens who tilted,
 when the dust melts to a mass,
 and the clods cling fast together?
 Can you hunt prey for the lion, 75 fill the king of beast's appetite, when it crouches in its den, lies in ambush in the covert?
 Who readies the raven's prey when its young cry out to God 80 and stray deprived of food?

39. Do you know the mountain goats' birth-time, do you mark the calving of the gazelles?
 Do you number the months till they come to term and know their birthing time?
 They crouch, burst forth with their babes, 5 their young they push out to the world.
 Their offspring batten, grow big in the wild,
 they go out and do not return.
 Who set the wild ass free, and the onager's reins who loosed, 10 whose home I made in the steppes, his dwelling-place flats of salt?
 He scoffs at the bustling city,
 the driver's shouts he does not hear.
 He roams mountains for his forage, 15 and every green thing he seeks.
 Will the wild ox want to serve you, pass the night at your feeding trough?
 Bind the wild ox with cord for the furrow, will he harrow the valleys behind you? 20 Can you rely on him with his great power and leave your labor to him?
 Can you trust him to bring back your seed, gather grain on your threshing floor?
 The ostrich's wing joyously beats. 25
 Is the pinion, the plume like the stork's?
 For she leaves her eggs on the ground, and in the dust she lets them warm.
 And she forgets that a foot can crush them, and a beast of the field stomp on them— 30 harsh, abandons her young to a stranger, in vain her labor, without fear.

 For God made her forgetful of wisdom, and He did not allot her insight.
 Now on the height she races, 35
 she scoffs at the horse and its rider.
 Do you give might to the horse,
 do you clothe his neck with a mane?
 Do you make his roar like locusts—his splendid snort is terror. 40
 He churns up the valley exulting, in power goes out to the clash of arms.
 He scoffs at fear and is undaunted, turns not back before the sword.
 Over him rattles the quiver, 45
 the blade, the javelin, and the spear.
 With clamor and clatter he swallows the ground, and ignores the trumpet's sound.
 At the trumpet he says, "Aha," and from afar he scents the fray, 50
 the thunder of captains, the shouts.
 Does the hawk soar by your wisdom, spread his wings to fly away south?
 By your word does the eagle mount and set his nest on high? 55
 On the crag he dwells and beds down, on the crest of the crag his stronghold.
 From there he seeks out food,
 from afar his eyes look down.
 His chicks lap up blood, 60 where the slain are, there he is.

40. And the LORD answered Job and He said:
 Will he who disputes with Shaddai be reproved?
 Who argues with God, let him answer!
 And Job answered the LORD and he said:
 Look, I am worthless. What can I say back to You? 5
 My hand I put over my mouth.
 Once have I spoken and I will not answer, twice, and will not go on.
 And the LORD answered Job from the whirlwind and He
 said:
 Gird, pray, your loins like a man. 10
 Let me ask you, and you will inform Me.
 Will you indeed overthrow My case, hold Me guilty, so you can be right?
 If you have an arm like God's,
 and with a voice like His you can thunder, 15 put on, pray, pride and preeminence, and grandeur and glory don.
 Let loose your utmost wrath,
 see every proud man, bring him low.
 See every proud man, make him kneel, 20 tramp on the wicked where they are.

 Bury them in the dust together, shut them up in the grave.
 And I on my part shall acclaim you, for your right hand triumphs for you. 25 Look, pray: Behemoth<sup>6</sup> whom I made with you, grass like cattle he eats.
 Look, pray: the power in his loins,
 the virile strength in his belly's muscles.
 He makes his tail stand like a cedar, 30 his balls' sinews twine together.
 His bones are bars of bronze,
 his limbs like iron rods.
 He is the first of the ways of God.
 Let his Maker draw near him with His sword! 35
 For the mountains offer their yield to him, every beast of the field plays there.
 Underneath the lotus he lies, in the covert of reeds and marsh.
 The lotus hedges him, shades him, 40
 the brook willows stand around him.
 Look, he swallows a river at his ease, untroubled while Jordan pours into his mouth.
 Could one take him with one's eyes, with barbs pierce his nose? 45
 Could you draw Leviathan<sup>7</sup> with a hook, and with a cord press down his tongue?
 Could you put a lead-line in his nose,
 and with a fish-hook pierce his cheek?
 Would he urgently entreat you, 50 would he speak to you gentle words?
 Would he seal a pact with you,
 that you take him as lifelong slave?
 Could you play with him like a bird, and leash him for your young women? 55 Could hucksters haggle over him, divide him among the traders?
 Could you fill his skin with darts,
 and a fisherman's net with his head?
 Just put your hand upon him— 60
 you will no more recall how to battle.

 41. Look, all hope of him is dashed, at his mere sight one is cast down.
 No fierce one could arouse him,
 and who before him could stand up?
 Who could go before Me in this I'd reward, 5 under all the heavens he would be mine.
 I would not keep silent about him,

6. The Hebrew word behemot simply means "beasts"; the description suggests a mythologized version of the hippopotamus, an animal the poet had presumably never seen.

7. The mythical Canaanite sea monster, here associated with the crocodile.

about his heroic acts and surpassing grace.
 Who can uncover his outer garb, come into his double mail? 10
 Who can pry open the doors of his face?
     All around his teeth is terror.
 His back is rows of shields, closed with the tightest seal.
 Each touches against the next, 15 no breath can come between them.
 Each sticks fast to the next,
     locked together, they will not part.
 His sneezes shoot out light, and his eyes are like the eyelids of dawn. 20 Firebrands leap from his mouth, sparks of fire fly into the air.
 From his nostrils smoke comes out, like a boiling vat on brushwood.
 His breath kindles coals, 25 and flame comes out of his mouth.
 Strength abides in his neck,
     and before him power dances.
 The folds of his flesh cling together;
     hard-cast, he will not totter. 30
 His heart is cast hard as stone, cast hard as a nether millstone.<sup>8</sup>
 When he rears up, the gods are frightened,<sup>9</sup> when he crashes down, they cringe.
 Who overtakes him with sword, it will not avail, 35 nor spear nor dart nor lance.
 Iron he deems as straw,
     and bronze as rotten wood.
 No arrow can make him flee, slingstones for him turn to straw. 40 Missiles are deemed as straw, and he mocks the javelin's clatter.
 Beneath him, jagged shards,
     he draws a harrow over the mud.
 He makes the deep boil like a pot, 45 turns sea to an ointment pan.
 Behind him glistens a wake,
     he makes the deep seem hoary.
 He has no match on earth,
     made as he is without fear. 50
 All that is lofty he can see.
     He is king over all proud beasts.

42. And Job answered the LORD and he said:
 I know You can do anything, and no devising is beyond You.

8. Flour was ground between two stones; the bottom one would have to be particularly hard, to withstand the pressure.

9. "Gods" = a sign that the text is not monotheistic. Job believes that his Lord is the best and strongest but not the only god.

“Who is this obscuring counsel without knowledge?”<sup>1</sup> Therefore I told but did not understand, wonders beyond me that I did not know. 5 “Hear, pray, and I will speak Let me ask you, that you may inform me.”
 By the ear’s rumor I heard of You, and now my eye has seen You.
 Therefore do I recant, 10
     And I repent in dust and ashes.

And it happened after the LORD had spoken these words to Job, that the LORD said to Eliphaz the Temanite: “My wrath has flared against you and your two companions because you have not spoken rightly of Me as did My servant Job. And now, take for yourselves seven bulls and seven rams and go to My servant Job, and offer a burnt-offering for yourselves, and Job My servant will pray on your behalf. To him only I shall show favor, not to do a vile thing to you, for you have not spoken rightly of Me as did my servant Job. And Eliphaz the Temanite and Bildad the Shuhite and Zophar the Naamathite went out and did according to all that the LORD had spoken to them, and the LORD showed favor to Job. And the LORD restored Job’s fortunes when he prayed for his companions, and the LORD increased twofold all that Job had. And all his male and female kinfolk and all who had known him before came and broke bread with him in his house and grieved with him and comforted him for all the harm that the LORD had brought on him. And each of them gave him one kesitah<sup>2</sup> and one golden ring. And the LORD blessed Job’s latter days more than his former days, and he had fourteen thousand sheep and six thousand camels and a thousand yoke of oxen and a thousand she-asses. And he had seven sons and three daughters. And he called the name of the first one Dove and the name of the second Cinnamon and the name of the third Horn of Eyeshade.<sup>3</sup> And there were no women in the land so beautiful as Job’s daughters. And their father gave them an estate among their brothers. And Job lived a hundred and forty years after this, and he saw his children and his children’s children, four generations. And Job died, aged and sated in years.

Psalm 8<sup>1</sup>

1. O Lord our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth! who hast set thy glory above the heavens.
2. Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength because of thine enemies, that thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger.
3. When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained;
4. What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?
5. For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour.

1. I.e., giving advice in ignorance of the facts.
 The line is a quotation of the Lord’s words to Job.
 2. A valuable coin.

3. A substance used for eye makeup.
 1. The text of the Psalms is that of the King James Version.

6. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet:
7. All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field;
8. The fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas.
9. O Lord our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth!

Psalm 19

1. The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handywork.
2. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge.
3. There is no speech nor language, where their voice is not heard.
4. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world. In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun,
5. Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race.
6. His going forth is from the end of the heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it: and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof.
7. The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple.
8. The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart: the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes.
9. The fear of the Lord is clean, enduring for ever: the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.
10. More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold: sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.
11. Moreover by them is thy servant warned: and in keeping of them there is great reward.
12. Who can understand his errors? cleanse thou me from secret faults.
13. Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me: then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression.
14. Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength, and my redeemer.

Psalm 23

1. The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.
2. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters.
3. He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake.
4. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.
5. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over.

6. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever.

Psalm 104

1. Bless the Lord, O my soul. O Lord my God, thou art very great; thou art clothed with honour and majesty.

2. Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment: who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain:

3. Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters: who maketh the clouds his chariot: who walketh upon the wings of the wind:

4. Who maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire:

5. Who laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be removed for ever.

6. Thou coveredst it with the deep as with a garment: the waters stood above the mountains.

7. At thy rebuke they fled; at the voice of thy thunder they hasted away.

8. They go up by the mountains; they go down by the valleys unto the place which thou hast founded for them.

9. Thou hast set a bound that they may not pass over; that they turn not again to cover the earth.

10. He sendeth the springs into the valleys, which run among the hills.

11. They give drink to every beast of the field: the wild asses quench their thirst.

12. By them shall the fowls of the heaven have their habitation, which sing among the branches.

13. He watereth the hills from his chambers: the earth is satisfied with the fruit of thy works.

14. He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man: that he may bring forth food out of the earth;

15. And wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart.

16. The trees of the Lord are full of sap; the cedars of Lebanon, which he hath planted;

17. Where the birds make their nests: as for the stork, the fir trees are her house.

18. The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats; and the rocks for the conies.

19. He appointed the moon for seasons: the sun knoweth his going down.

20. Thou makest darkness, and it is night: wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth.

21. The young lions roar after their prey, and seek their meat from God.

22. The sun ariseth, they gather themselves together, and lay them down in their dens.

23. Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labour until the evening.

24. O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all: the earth is full of thy riches.

25. So is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts.

26. There go the ships: there is that leviathan, whom thou hast made to play therein.

27. These wait all upon thee; that thou mayest give them their meat in due season.

28. That thou givest them they gather: thou openest thine hand, they are filled with good.

29. Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled: thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust.

30. Thou sendest forth thy spirit, they are created: and thou renewest the face of the earth.

31. The glory of the Lord shall endure for ever: the Lord shall rejoice in his works.

32. He looketh on the earth, and it trembleth: he toucheth the hills, and they smoke.

33. I will sing unto the Lord as long as I live: I will sing praise to my God while I have my being.

34. My meditation of him shall be sweet: I will be glad in the Lord.

35. Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more. Bless thou the Lord, O my soul. Praise ye the Lord.

Psalm 137

1. By the rivers of Babylon,<sup>1</sup> there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion.

2. We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof.

3. For there they that carried us away captive required of us a song; and they that wasted us required of us mirth, saying, Sing us one of the songs of Zion.

4. How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?

5. If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning.

6. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy.

7. Remember, O Lord, the children of Edom<sup>2</sup> in the day of Jerusalem; who said, Rase it, rase it, even to the foundation thereof.

8. O daughter of Babylon, who art to be destroyed; happy shall he be, that rewardeth thee as thou hast served us.

9. Happy shall he be, that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones.

1. On the Euphrates River. Jerusalem was captured and sacked by the Babylonians in 586 B.C.E. The Hebrews were taken away into captivity in Babylon.

2. The Edomites helped the Babylonians capture Jerusalem.

HOMER

eighth century B.C.E.

---

The Iliad and the Odyssey tell the story of the clash of two great civilizations, and the effects of war on both the winners and the losers. Both poems are about the Trojan War, a mythical conflict between a coalition of Greeks and the inhabitants of Troy, a city in Asia Minor. These are the earliest works of Greek literature, composed almost three thousand years before our time. Yet they are rich and sophisticated in their narrative techniques, and they provide extraordinarily vivid portrayals of people, social relationships, and feelings, especially our incompatible desires for honor and violence, and for peace and a home.

HISTORICAL CONTEXTS

On the Greek island of Crete is an enormous palace, dominated by monumental arches adorned with fierce lions, built by the earliest Greek-speaking people: the Mycenaeans, who probably inspired the Trojan legends. About 2000 B.C.E., they began building big, fortified cities around central palaces in the south of Greece. The Mycenaeans had a form of writing now known as “Linear B”—not an alphabet but a “syllabary” (in which a symbol corresponds to each syllable, not to each letter)—as well as a centralized, tightly controlled economy and sophisticated artistic and architectural traditions. The metal they used for weapons, armor, and tools was predominantly bronze, and their time is therefore known as the Bronze Age.

After dominating the region for about six hundred years, Mycenaean civilization came to an end around 1200 B.C.E. Archaeological investigations suggest that the great cities were burnt or destroyed at this time, perhaps by invasion or war. The next few hundred years are known as the Dark Ages of Greece: people seem to have been less wealthy, and the cultural knowledge of the Mycenaeans, including the knowledge of writing, was lost.

Greeks of this time spoke many different dialects and lived in small towns and villages scattered across a wide area. They did not regain their knowledge of reading or writing until an alphabet, invented by a trading people called the Phoenicians, was adopted in the eighth century B.C.E.

One might think that an illiterate society could have nothing like “literature,” a word based on the Latin for “letters” (litterae). In the centuries of Greek illiteracy, however, there developed a thriving tradition of oral poetry, especially on the Ionian coast, in modern-day Turkey. Travelling bards told tales of the lost age of heroes who fought with bronze, and of the great cities besieged and destroyed by war. The Homeric poems make use of folk memories of a real conflict or conflicts between the Mycenaean Greeks and inhabitants of one or more cities in Asia Minor. The world of Homer is neither historical in a modern sense nor purely fictional. Through poetry, the Greeks of the Dark Ages created and preserved their own past.

Oral poets in ancient Greece used a traditional form (a six-beat line called hexameter), fitting their own riffs into the rhythm, with musical accompaniment. They also relied on common themes, traditional stories, traditional characters, traditional descriptors (such as “swift Achilles” or “black ships”), phrases that fit the rhythm of the line, and even whole scenes that follow a set pattern, such as the way a warrior gets dressed or the way that meals are prepared. Fluent poetic ad-libbing is very difficult; these techniques gave each performer a structure, so that stories and lines did not have to be generated entirely on the spot. We know that the tradition of this type of composition must have gone back hundreds of years, because the Iliad and the Odyssey include details that would have been anachronistic by the time these poems were written down, such as the use of bronze weapons: by the eighth century, soldiers fought with iron. Details from different periods are jumbled together, so that even in the eighth century B.C.E. the heroic, mythic world of the Homeric poems must have seemed quite distant from everyday reality. In addition, the poems mix different Greek dialects, the speech of many different areas in the Greek-speaking world, into a language unlike anything anyone ever actually spoke.

There is an ancient tradition that the Iliad and the Odyssey were both composed by a blind, illiterate singer from the island of Chios, named Homer. But many scholars—in antiquity and today—have suspected that this story is more legend than fact, and it is quite possible that there was no such person as “Homer.”

It is hard to understand the relation between the heroic poetry composed and sung by illiterate bards in archaic Greece, and the written texts of the Odyssey and the Iliad. The question is made all the more difficult because the poems are far longer than most instances of oral poetic performance, including that of the oral poets living in the former Yugoslavia, who were studied by classicists in the twentieth century as the closest living analogy to ancient Greek bards. Good bards may be able to keep going for an hour or two: in the Homeric poems themselves, there are accounts of singers performing for a while after dinner. But a complete performance of either of these poems would have lasted at least twenty hours. This is much too long for an audience to sit through in an evening. It would also have been difficult for any poet, even a genius, to compose at this length without the use of writing. Perhaps, then, these poems are the work of an oral poet, or poets, who became literate. Or perhaps they represent a collaboration between one or more oral poets, and a scribe. In any case, soon after the Greeks developed their alphabet, they found a way to preserve their oral tradition in two monumental written poems.

These works make use of tradition in strikingly original ways, creating just two coherent stories out of the mass of legends that surrounded the Trojan War. They are long poems about heroes, a genre that later came to be called epic—from the Greek for “story” or “word.” Throughout the ancient world, for hundreds of years to come, everybody knew the Iliad and the Odyssey. The poems were performed aloud, illustrated in paintings on vases or on walls, read, learned by heart, remembered, reworked, and imitated by everyone in the Greek and Roman worlds, from the Athenian tragedians to the Roman poet Virgil.

THE ILIAD

The title Iliad suggests a work about the Trojan War, since Ilias is another name for Troy. Greek readers or listeners would have been familiar with the background myths. Paris, a prince of Troy, son of King Priam, had to judge which of three goddesses should be awarded a golden apple: Athena, goddess of wisdom; Hera, the queen of the gods and thus a representative of power; or Aphrodite, goddess of sexual desire. He chose Aphrodite, and as his reward she gave him the most beautiful woman in the world, Helen of Sparta, to be his wife. Unfortunately, Helen already had a husband: Menelaos (or Menelaus in the Latin spelling), king of Sparta and brother of the powerful general Agamemnon. When Paris took Helen with him back to Troy from Mycenae, Agamemnon and Menelaos mustered a great army, a coalition drawn from many Greek cities, including the great heroes Achilles, the fastest runner and best fighter, and Odysseus, the cleverest of the Greeks. So began a war that lasted ten years, until Odysseus finally devised a stratagem to enter the city walls of Troy. He built a wooden horse, filled it with Greek warriors, and tricked the Trojans into taking the horse into the city. After nightfall, the Greek soldiers leaped from the horse and killed the male inhabitants, captured the women, and razed the city to the ground.

Surprisingly, none of these events play any part in the main narrative of the Iliad, which begins when the war is already in its tenth year and ends before the capture of the city. Moreover, the central focus is not on the conflict between Greeks and Trojans, but on a conflict among the Greek commanders. The first word of the Iliad is “Wrath,” and the wrath of Achilles—first against his comrade Agamemnon, and only later against the enemy Trojans—is the central subject of the poem. In Greek, the word used is menis, a term otherwise applied only to the wrath of the gods. Achilles’ rage is an extraordinary thing, which sets him apart from the rest of humanity—Greeks and Trojans. The poem tells how Achilles, the greatest Greek hero and the son of a goddess, becomes alienated from his society, how his anger against the Greeks shifts into an inhuman aggression against the Trojans, and how he is at last willing to return to the human world.

The Iliad is about war, honor, and aggression. There are moments of graphic violence, when we are told exactly where the point of a spear or sword penetrates vulnerable human flesh: as when Achilles’ friend Patroclus throws his spear at another warrior, Sarpedon, and catches him “where the lungs close in around the beating heart”; or when Hector rams his spear into Patroclus, “into his lower flank, and drove the bronze point through”; or when Achilles’ spear “went utterly through the soft neck” of Hector but “did not sever the windpipe.” The precise anatomical detail reminds us how vulnerable these warriors are, because they have mortal bodies—in contrast to the gods, who may participate in battle but can never die.

The plot deals with the exchange or ransoming of human bodies. Achilles’ anger at Agamemnon is roused by a quarrel about who owns Briseïs, a young woman Achilles has seized as a prize of war but whom Agamemnon takes as recompense for the loss of his own captive woman, Chryseïs. The story also hinges on the ownership of dead male bodies: the corpses, in turn, of Sarpedon, Patroclus, and Hector. War seems to produce its own kind of economy, a system of exchange: a live woman for a dead warrior, one life for another, or death for undying fame.

The Iliad is a violent poem, and, on one level, the violence simply contributes to the entertainment: it is exciting to hear or read about slaughter. But it would be a mistake to see the Iliad as pure military propaganda. At times, the poem brings out the terrible pity of war: the city of Troy will be ruined, the people killed or enslaved, and the poet looks back with regret to “the days of peace, before the Greeks came.” Some similes compare the violence on the battlefield to the events of the world of peace, where people can plow their fields, build their homes, and watch their sheep. But these similes may suggest that violence and the threat of pain and death are facts of life: even when people are at peace, there is murder, and lions or wolves leap into the fold to kill the sheep.

Within the narrow world of the battlefield, Homer’s vividly imagined characters have choices to make. They cannot choose, like gods, to avoid death; but they can choose how they will die. The poem itself acknowledges that the exchange of honor for death may seem inadequate. After Agamemnon has treated him dishonorably, Achilles begins to question the whole heroic code and its system of trading death for glory: “For not worth my life is all they say I lion used to possess,” he declares, since prizes of honor can always be replaced but “the life of a man does not come back.” Unlike the other fighters, Achilles knows for sure—thanks to the goddess Thetis, his mother—that remaining at Troy will mean his death. But all the warriors of the Iliad are conscious that in fighting they risk their own deaths. Achilles’ choices—to fight and die soon, in this war, or go home and live a little longer—are therefore a starker version of the decision faced by all who fight.

Fascinatingly, the Iliad makes the Trojans as fully human as the Greeks. The Trojan hero, Hector, seems to many readers the most likeable character in the poem, fighting not for vengeance but to protect his wife and their infant son. One of the most touching moments comes as Hector says goodbye to his tearful wife before going into battle; a deep tenderness connects Hector and his family—in contrast to the more shallow associations of the Greeks with their female prisoners of war. As Hector reaches down to kiss his son, the child screams, frightened at seeing his father in his helmet. The parents laugh together, and Hector takes off the helmet so the baby will not be scared as he swings him in his arms. The moment is both heartwarming and chilling, since we know—and his wife knows—that this devoted father will never see his son again; the baby is right to be frightened, since he will soon be hurled headlong from the city walls by the victorious Greeks.

The Iliad culminates in an astonishing encounter, between Priam, king of Troy, and Achilles, who has killed his son Hector. Priam goes to plead with Achilles to return his son's body, and the two enemies end up sitting together, each weeping for those they have lost. The experience of grief is common to all humans, even those who kill each other in war. The major contrast drawn by the Iliad is not between Greek and Trojan, but between the humans and the immortal gods. The gods play an important role in the action of the poem, sometimes intervening to cause or prevent a hero's death or dishonor. We are told at the beginning that there is a connection between all the deaths caused by Achilles' wrath and the will of Zeus: the whole action of the poem happened as "the will of Zeus was accomplished." But the presence of the gods does not turn the human characters into puppets, controlled only by the gods or by fate. Human characters are never forced by gods to act out of character. Rather, human action and divine action work together, and the gods provide a way of talking about the elements of human experience that are otherwise incomprehensible.

Moreover, the presence of the gods—like the similes—makes us particularly aware of what is distinctive about human life in war. In the world of the gods, there are conflicts about hierarchy, just as there are on earth: sometimes the lesser gods refuse to recognize the authority of Zeus, just as some Greek chieftains sometimes refuse to bow to Agamemnon. But on Olympus, all quarrels end in laughter and drinking, not death. The most important fact about all the warriors in the Iliad is that they die. Moreover, before death humans have to face grief, dishonor, loss, and pain—experiences that play little or no part in any god's life. Achilles in his wrath refuses to accept the horror of loss: loss of honor, and the loss of his dearest friend, Patroclus. His anger can end, and he can eat again, only when his heart becomes "enduring," and he realizes that all humans, even the greatest warriors, have to endure unendurable loss and keep on living. The Iliad provides a bleak but inspiring account of human suffering as a kind of power that the gods themselves cannot achieve.

THE ODYSSEY

The Odyssey has a special place in the study of world literature, since it deals explicitly with the relationship between the people we know and those who are strange to us. It is about a journey that spans most of the world as it was known to Greeks at the time, and deals with issues that any student of world literature must confront, including the place of literature and memory in the formation of cultural identity. The poem shows us, in depth and in detail, the complex relationships between one Westerner, a Greek man, and the other cultures that he encounters—not in war, but in the course of a long journey, where the worst enemies may be found inside his own household. The poem tells the story of Odysseus's homecoming from Troy, tracing his reclamation of a household from which he has been absent for the past twenty years. It is a gripping and varied tale, which includes fantasy and magic but also focuses on domestic details and on the human need for a family and a home.

The Odyssey is set after the Iliad, and was probably produced a little later, since it seems deliberately to avoid repeating anything that had been included in the Iliad, and fills in many important details that had been absent from the other poem—including allusions to the actual fall of Troy, and its aftermath. The Odyssey creates a different but complementary vision of the Trojan War, showing how the Greeks faced further danger in the long voyage back to Greece, and in their return to homes from which they had been absent for many years.

In the Greek original, the first word of the Odyssey—our first clue to the poem's subject—is andra ("a man"). One man, Odysseus himself, is the center of the poem, in a way that no single hero, not even Achilles, is the center of the Iliad. The journey from war to peace requires different skills from those needed on the battlefield, and through the figure of Odysseus the poem shows us what those skills might be. He has strength and physical courage, but he also has brains: the "clear rascal" is the smartest of those who fought at Troy. He is famously adaptable, a "man who can adapt to anything," able to deal with any eventuality, no matter how difficult or unexpected. He has psychological strength, an ability both to endure and to inflict pain without flinching; more than once, the poem connects the name Odysseus with the Greek word for "to be angry" or "hate" (odyssomai): Odysseus is the man hated by the god Poseidon. He has the patience and self-restraint required to bide his time until the moment comes for him to reveal himself to his household. Most of all, he has the will to go home, and to restore his home to its proper order. It is no accident that Odysseus's favorite weapon is not the sword or the spear but the bow, which shoots from a distance at the target of his choosing.

"Man" is also the subject of the Odyssey in a broader sense, because the poem has a particular interest in the diversity of cultures and ways of life. The Iliad is set almost exclusively on the battlefield of Troy, and is focused on the relationships among the aristocratic male warriors. By contrast, the Odyssey shows us a multitude of distinct worlds and cultures, including nonhuman cultures. Odysseus spends years on the luxurious island of the nymph Calypso; he encounters the sweetly singing Sirens, the monster Scylla, and the Lotus-eaters; and he disembarks on the island of the sun, with its tempting, delicious cattle, and of the witch Circe, who can turn men to pigs. He is almost killed on the island of the shepherd-giants, the Cyclopes, and he is welcomed in the magical land of Phaeacia, where fruits ripen all season long, and where he meets the king, the queen, and the princess, Nausicaa, who is out to do laundry and play ball with her girlfriends, while daydreaming about her future husband. The many cultures of the poem include both the exotic and the ordinary.

Even in the Greek world, we are given glimpses of several distinct ways of life. In showing multiple encounters between the Greek hero and people who are very different from him, the Homeric poem invites us to think about how we ought to behave toward people who are not the same as ourselves.

The Odyssey is particularly concerned with the laws of hospitality, which in Greek is xenia—a word that covers the whole relationship between guests and hosts, and between strangers and those who take them in. Hospitality is the fundamental criterion for civilized society in this poem. Cultures may vary in other respects, but any good society will accommodate the wanderer as a guest. Odysseus encounters many strange peoples in the course of his journey. Some, like the goddess Calypso, are almost too welcoming: she invites him into her home and her bed, and keeps him there even when he longs to go home. Odysseus acknowledges that Calypso is far more beautiful than his own wife and that her island is more lush than his own stony homeland; but, movingly, he still wants to go back. This poem deals with the fundamental desire we feel for our own people and our own place, not because they are better than any other, but simply because they are ours. Similarly, Odysseus rejects the possibility of starting his life over in the hospitable land of the Phaeacians. The monstrous one-eyed Cyclops, Polyphemus, is a grotesque counterpart to the good Phaeacian hosts: instead of welcoming and feeding his guests, the Cyclops wants to eat them for dinner. This encounter is a reminder of how distinctive, and sometimes unheroic, are the skills Odysseus needs to survive the journey home. Heroes in battle, in the Iliad, are always concerned that their names be remembered in times to come. But Odysseus defeats Polyphemus—whose name suggests “Much-named”—by denying his own name, calling himself “Noman.” The journey home has to trump even Odysseus’s heroic identity.

At times, Odysseus’s own men transgress the norms of hospitality, as when they kill the cattle of the Sun, which they have been expressly forbidden to touch. Hospitality is tested most severely when Odysseus arrives as a stranger back in his own home. The suitors have seized control of his house and are abusing his unwitting hospitality, in his absence, by courting his wife, devouring his food and drink, and ruining his property. There are repeated references in the Odyssey to the nightmare double of Odysseus’s return: the homecoming of Agamemnon, who came back from Troy only to be killed in his bath by his wife, Clytemnestra, and her lover, Aegisthus. Zeus, the king of the gods, insists at the beginning of the poem that Aegisthus is hated by the gods, and he praises Agamemnon’s son, Orestes, who avenges his father’s death by killing the adulterous murderer.

First-time readers may be surprised that the wanderings of Odysseus, across the sea from Troy back to his stony Greek homeland, Ithaca, occupy only a short part of the whole poem. In the second half of the poem, Odysseus is back home in Ithaca, but his journey is only half complete. He arrives home as a stranger, disguised as a poor beggar. The act of homecoming seems to require several stages, beyond merely reaching a geographic location. Odysseus comes up with multiple tales to explain his presence in Ithaca; he uses his many disguises to test the loyalty of those he meets—and, as in the encounter with Poly-phemus, he must show enormous self-control in his willingness to suppress his identity, at least temporarily. Throughout the poem, Odysseus has a particularly close affinity with poets and storytellers; he himself narrates his wanderings to the Phaeacians, and, once back on Ithaca, he tells a series of false stories about who he is and where he comes from. Controlling and multiplying stories is one of the most important ways in which Odysseus is a person who can “always find solutions”; he is able to see the multiplicity of the world and constantly to redefine his own place in it.

In the course of his homecoming, Odysseus passes a series of tests, and creates more tests of his own. He must show his mastery of weapons (such as the strong-bow) and his knowledge of the people who make up his household. Odysseus has to win the peace by reconnecting with each loyal member of his home: his servants, his son, his father, and—most memorably—his wife, Penelope. He tests her loyalty by refusing to reveal himself to her right away. But she shows herself a perfect match for her trickster husband, putting him to yet another test. When it is bedtime, she asks the servant to bring out the bed—the bed that, as only Odysseus himself could know, is formed from a tree growing right through the house; if Odysseus were an imposter, he would think the bed could be moved. The immovable bed is, of course, an image for the permanence of Penelope and Odysseus’s marriage. When they talk in the bed that night after sex, a simile suggests that now, at last, both Odysseus and Penelope have come home; he, weeping, and she, clinging to him, are like sailors saved from drowning, “Grateful to be alive, they crawl to land.” The image first seems to apply to Odysseus, and then to Penelope—a shift that suggests the dynamic intimacy between husband and wife.

The Odyssey has elements we associate with many other types of literature: romance, folklore, heroism, mystery, travelers’ tales, magic, military exploits, and family drama. It is a text that can be enjoyed on any number of levels: as a feminized version of epic—a heroic story focused not on men fighting wars, but a journey home; as a love story; as a fantasy about fathers, sons, and patriarchy; as an account of Greek identity; as a work of primitive anthropology; as a meditation on cultural difference; as a morality tale; or as a pilgrim’s progress. As the first word indicates, this is a poem about humanity. An extraordinarily rich work, as multilayered and intelligent as its hero, the Odyssey is enjoyable on first reading, and worth rereading over and over again.

BOOK I

[The Wrath of Achilles]

Wrath—sing, goddess,<sup>2</sup> of the ruinous wrath of Peleus' son Achilles that inflicted woes without number upon the Achaeans, hurled forth to Hades many strong souls of warriors and rendered their bodies prey for the dogs, for all birds, and the will of Zeus was accomplished; 5 sing from when they two first stood in conflict—Atreus' son, lord of men, and godlike Achilles.

Which of the gods, then, set these two together in conflict, to fight?
 Apollo, son of Leto and Zeus; who in his rage at the king raised a virulent plague through the army; the men were dying 10 because the son of Atreus dishonored the priest Chryses.<sup>3</sup> For he came to the Achaeans' swift ships bearing countless gifts to ransom his daughter, holding in his hands on a golden staff the wreaths of Apollo who strikes from afar, and beseeched all the Achaeans— 15 but mostly the two sons of Atreus, marshalers of men:

"Sons of Atreus and you other strong-greaved Achaeans, may the gods who have homes on Olympus grant you to plunder the city of Priam,<sup>4</sup> and reach your home safely; release to me my beloved daughter, take instead the ransom, 20 revering Zeus' son who strikes from afar—Apollo."

Then the rest of the Achaeans all shouted assent, to respect the priest and accept the splendid ransom;
 but this did not please the heart of Atreus' son Agamemnon, and violently he sent him away and laid a powerful warning upon him: 25
 "Let me not find you, old man, near our hollow ships, either loitering now or coming again later, lest the god's staff and wreath not protect you.
 The girl I will not release; sooner will old age come upon her in our house, in Argos,<sup>5</sup> far from her homeland, 30 pacing back and forth by the loom and sharing my bed.
 So go, do not make me angry, and you will return the safer."

Thus he spoke; and the old man was afraid and obeyed his word, and he went in silence along the shore of the tumultuous sea.
 And going aside, the old man fervently prayed 35 to lord Apollo, whom lovely-haired Leto bore:
 "Hear me, God of the silver bow, you who stand over Chryse and Killa most holy, you whose might rules Tenedos,<sup>6</sup>

1. Translated by Caroline Alexander.

2. Calliope, the muse who inspires epic poetry.

3. Chryses is from the town of Chryse near Troy. The Greeks had captured his daughter when they sacked Thebes (see below) and had given her to Agamemnon as his share of the booty.

4. Troy; Priam is its king. Olympus is the mountain in northern Greece that was supposed to be the home of the gods.

5. Agamemnon's home in the northeastern Peloponnesus, the southern part of mainland Greece.

6. An island off the Trojan coast. Like Chryse, Killa is a town near Troy.

God of Plague;<sup>7</sup> if ever I roofed over a temple that pleased you, or if ever I burned as sacrifice to you the fatty thighbones of bulls and of goats<sup>8</sup>—grant me this wish:
 May the Danaans<sup>9</sup> pay for my tears with your arrows.” 40

Thus he prayed, and Phoebus Apollo heard him, and set out from the heights of Olympus, rage in his heart, with his bow on his shoulders and his hooded quiver; 45
 the arrows clattered on his shoulders as he raged, as the god himself moved; and he came like the night.
 Then far from the ships he crouched, and let loose an arrow—and terrible was the ring of his silver bow.
 First he went after the mules and sleek dogs, 50 but then, letting fly a sharp arrow, he struck at the men themselves, and the crowded pyres of the dead burned without ceasing.

Nine days the shafts of the god flew through the army, and on the tenth Achilles summoned the people to assembly;
 the goddess of the white arms, Hera,<sup>1</sup> put this in his mind, 55 for she was distressed for the Danaans, since she saw them dying.
 And when they were gathered together and assembled, Achilles of the swift feet stood and addressed them:
 “Son of Atreus, I now think that, staggering back, we shall go home again—if we escape death that is— 60
 if after all war and plague alike are to rout the Achaeans;
 but come—let us ask some seer, or priest, or even an interpreter of dreams, for a dream, too, is from Zeus, who may tell us why Phoebus Apollo is so greatly angered, if perhaps he faults our vows and sacrifice, 65 and whether receiving the burnt fat of sheep, of goats without blemish, he may somehow be willing to avert our destruction.”

Thus Achilles spoke and sat down. Then stood among them Calchas the son of Thestor, far the most eminent of bird-seers, who knew things that are, and things to come, and what had gone before, 70
 and had guided the ships of the Achaeans to Troy, through his divination, which Phoebus Apollo gave him.
 He in his wisdom spoke and addressed them:
 “O Achilles, dear to Zeus, you bid me state the reason for the wrath of Apollo, the lord who strikes from afar. 75 Then I will speak, but you listen closely and swear an oath to me that in good earnest you will stand by me in word and strength of hand; for I well know that I will anger a man who has great power over the Argives, and whom the Achaeans obey.
 For a king has the upper hand when he is angered with a base-born man; 80
 if he does swallow his anger for that day, yet he also holds resentment for later, until he brings it to fulfillment, within his breast. You now declare whether you will protect me.”

7. Apollo.

8. In sacrifice to Apollo.

9. The Greeks. Homer also calls them Achae-ans and Argives.

1. Sister and wife of Zeus; she was hostile to the Trojans and therefore favored the Greeks.

Then answering him Achilles of the swift feet spoke: “Take courage, and speak freely of any omen you know; 85 for by Apollo beloved of Zeus, to whom you, Calchas, pray when you reveal the gods’ omens to the Danaans, no man while I live and see light upon this earth will lay heavy hands upon you by the hollow ships—none of all the Danaans, not even if you speak of Agamemnon, 90 who now makes claim to be far the best man in the army.”

And then the blameless priest took courage and spoke:
 “It is not with prayer, nor with sacrifice that he finds fault, but for the sake of his priest, whom Agamemnon dishonored, and did not release his daughter, and did not accept the ransom— 95 for that reason the god who shoots from afar has sent these sufferings, and will send yet more;
 nor will he drive this foul plague away from the Danaans until we give back the dark-eyed girl to her dear father without price, without ransom, and lead a holy sacrifice to Chryse; propitiating him in this way we might persuade him.” 100

Thus speaking he sat down; and then rose among them the warrior son of Atreus, wide-ruling Agamemnon, greatly distressed, his darkening heart consumed with rage,
 his eyes like gleaming fires.
 Glaring, he first addressed Calchas: 105

“Prophet of evil, never yet have you spoken anything good for me, always to prophesy evil is dear to your heart.
 You have never spoken nor yet accomplished any good word; and now you speak in assembly of the Danaans, declaiming god’s will—that for this reason, you say, the Archer who shoots from afar causes their 110 affliction—

because I was not willing to accept his splendid ransom for the girl Chryseis,<sup>2</sup> since I greatly desire to have her at home; for I prefer her to Clytemnestra, my wedded wife, as she is not inferior to her,
 not in figure or bearing, nor even in disposition or handiwork. 115
 Yet, even so, I am willing to give her back—if this is for the best.
 I wish my men to be safe rather than perish.
 But make ready another prize at once, so that I alone of the Achaeans am not unrecompensed, since that is not fitting.
 For all of you are witness that my own prize goes elsewhere.” 120

Then answered him swift-footed, godlike Achilles: “Most honored son of Atreus, of all men most covetous of possessions, how then can the great-hearted Achaeans give you a prize?
 We do not know of any great common store laid up anywhere, but those things we carried from the cities, these have been distributed— 125 and it is not fitting to go about gathering these things again from the men.
 But no, relinquish the girl to the god now; we Achaeans will pay you back three times, four times over, if ever Zeus gives us the well-walled city of Troy to plunder.”

Then answering him spoke powerful Agamemnon: 130

“Do not in this way, skilled though you be, godlike Achilles, try to trick me, for you will not outwit nor persuade me.
 Or do you intend—while you yourself have a prize—that I just sit here without one—are you ordering me to give the girl back?
 No, either the great-hearted Achaeans will give me a prize 135 suited to my wishes, of equal value—or if they do not give one, then I myself will go and take either your own prize, or that of Ajax, or I will take and carry away the prize of Odysseus;<sup>3</sup> and whomever I visit will be made angry;
 but we shall consider these things later. 140
 For now, come, let us drag one of our dark ships to the bright salt sea, and assemble in it suitable rowers, and place the sacrifice in it, and take on the girl herself, Chryseïs of the lovely cheeks;
 and let there be one man in command, some man of counsel, either Ajax or Idomeneus,<sup>4</sup> or noble Odysseus, 145 or you, son of Peleus, most terrifying of all men, you might reconcile to us Apollo who works from afar, and perform the sacrifice.”

Then looking at him from under his brows swift-footed Achilles spoke:
 “O wrapped in shamelessness, cunning in spirit—how can any man of the Achaeans obey your words with good heart, 150 to journey with you or join men in violent battle?
 For it was not on account of Trojan warriors I came to wage battle here, since to me they are blameless—never yet have they driven off my cattle, or my horses, nor ever in Phthia,<sup>5</sup> where the rich earth breeds warriors, 155 have they destroyed my harvest, since there is much between us, both shadowy mountains and clashing sea.
 But we followed you, O great shameless one, for your pleasure, to win recompense for Menelaos<sup>6</sup> and for you, dog-face, from the Trojans; none of this do you pause to consider or care for. 160
 And now you boast you will personally take my prize from me, for which I suffered much hardship, which the sons of the Achaeans gave me!
 Never do I receive a prize equal to yours when the Achaeans sack some well-settled city of the Trojans; it is my hands that conduct the greater part of furious war, 165 yet when it comes to division of the spoils yours is the far greater prize, and I bearing some small thing, yet also prized,
 make my way to my ships, wearied with fighting.
 Now I am going to Phthia, since it is far better to go home with my curved ships, and I do not intend 170 to stay here dishonored, hauling up riches and wealth for you.”

3. Ajax, son of Telamon, was the bravest of the Greeks after Achilles; Odysseus the most crafty of the Greeks.

4. King of Crete and a prominent leader on the Greek side.

5. Achilles' home in northern Greece.

6. Agamemnon's brother. The aim of the expedition against Troy was to recover his wife, Helen, who had left with Paris, a son of Priam.

Then Agamemnon lord of men answered him: “Run, then, if your spirit so moves you. Nor will I beg you to stay here for my sake. Other men stand by me, who will pay me honor, and especially all-devising Zeus. 175
 You are most hateful to me of the kings cherished by Zeus; always contention is dear to you, and fighting and battles.
 If you are so very powerful, a god doubtless gave this to you.
 Go home with your ships and your companions—be lord of the Myrmidons;<sup>7</sup> of you I take no account, 180 nor do I care that you are angered. But I promise you this:
 As Phoebus Apollo robs me of Chryseïs, whom I will send away, on my ship, with my companions—so I will take Briseïs<sup>8</sup> of the pretty cheeks, yes, your prize, going myself to your hut, so that you will discern 185 how much I am your better and so another man will be loath to speak as my equal, openly matching himself with me.”

So he spoke. And anguish descended upon the son of Peleus and the heart in his rugged breast debated two ways, whether he should draw the sharp sword by his side 190 and scatter the men and slay and despoil the son of Atreus, or check his anger and restrain his spirit.
 While he churned these things through his heart and mind, as he was drawing from its sheath his great sword, Athena<sup>9</sup> came to him down from heaven; for Hera the goddess with white arms dispatched her, 195 who in her heart loved and cared for both men alike.
 She came up behind and grabbed the son of Peleus’ tawny hair, appearing to him alone, and none of the others saw her.
 Thunderstruck, Achilles turned behind him and at once recognized Pallas Athena; for her eyes gleamed terribly. 200
 And addressing her, he spoke winged words:
 “Why do you come again, daughter of Zeus who wields the aegis?
 Is it to witness the outrage of Agamemnon, the son of Atreus?
 But I state openly to you, and I think that it will be accomplished, that by these insolent acts he will shortly lose his life.” 205

Then the gleaming-eyed goddess addressed him:
 “From heaven I have come to stop your anger, if you will heed me;
 Hera the white-armed goddess sent me forth, who in her heart loves and cares for you both alike.
 Come, leave off this contention, stay your hand on your sword, 210 but rather cut him with words, telling him how things will be.
 For I will tell you this, and it will be accomplished;
 someday you will have three times as many shining gifts because of this outrage; restrain yourself and obey me.”

Then in reply Achilles of the swift feet addressed her: 215
 “I must obey the word of you both, goddess,

7. The contingent led by Achilles.

8. A captive woman who had been awarded to Achilles.

9. A goddess, daughter of Zeus, and a patron of human ingenuity and resourcefulness, whether exemplified by handicrafts (such as carpentry or weaving) or cunning in dealing with others. One of her epithets is Pallas. Like Hera, she sided with the Greeks in the war.

enraged in spirit though I am; for so is it better.
 If a man heeds the gods, then they also listen to him.”
 He spoke and checked his powerful hand on the silver sword hilt and back into the sheath thrust the great sword, nor did he disobey 220 the word of Athena. Then she was gone to Olympus, to the house of Zeus who wields the aegis and the company of the other gods.

And the son of Peleus once more with menacing words addressed Agamemnon, and he did not hold back his anger: “Wine-besotted, you who have the eyes of a dog and the heart of a deer, 225 never do you have courage to gear up for battle with your people, nor go on ambush with the best of the Achaeans;
 to you that is as death.
 Far better it is, all through the broad army of the Achaeans, to seize the gifts of the man who speaks against you. 230 King who feeds upon your people, since you rule worthless men; otherwise, son of Atreus, this now would be your last outrage.
 But I say openly to you, and I swear a great oath to it—yes, by this scepter,<sup>1</sup> that never again will put forth leaves and shoots when once it has left behind its stump in the mountains, 235 nor will it flourish again, since the bronze axe has stripped it round, leaf and bark; and now in turn the sons of the Achaeans busy with justice carry it around in their hands, they who safeguard the ordinances of Zeus—this will be my great oath:
 someday a yearning for Achilles will come upon the sons of the Achaeans, 240
 every man; then nothing will save you, for all your grief, when at the hands of man-slaying Hector<sup>2</sup> dying men fall in their multitude; and you will rip the heart within you, raging that you paid no honor to the best of the Achaeans.”

Thus spoke the son of Peleus, and hurled the gold-studded 245 scepter to the ground, and sat down, while the son of Atreus raged on the other side. Then between them rose Nestor,
 the sweet-sounding, the clear speaker from Pylos,<sup>3</sup> whose voice flowed from his tongue more sweetly than honey.
 In his time two generations of mortal men had already 250 perished, those who were born and raised with him in days of old, in sacred Pylos, and he was ruler among the third generation.
 With kindly thoughts to both he advised and addressed them:

“Oh look now, surely great trouble comes to the land of the Achaeans!
 Surely Priam and the sons of Priam would be gladdened 255 and the rest of the Trojans greatly rejoiced in heart if they were to learn you two were fighting over all this—you who surpass the Danaans in counsel, who surpass them in fighting!

1. A wooden staff that symbolized authority. It was handed by a herald to whichever leader rose to speak in an assembly as a sign of his authority to speak.

2. Son of Priam; he was the foremost warrior among the Trojans.

3. A territory on the western shore of the Peloponnesus.

But hearken; you are both younger than me.
 For once upon a time I banded with better 260 men even than you, and never did they slight me.
 Never yet have I seen, nor shall see such men—Peirithoös and Dryas, shepherd of his people, and Kaineus and Éxadios and Polyphemos like a god.<sup>4</sup> 264 These were raised to be strongest of earthly men; 266 they were the strongest and they fought with the strongest—the Centaurs who lie in the mountains—and terribly they slaughtered them.
 And yet with these men I kept company, coming from Pylos, far away, from a distant land; for they summoned me. 270
 And I fought by myself, I alone; against these men no mortal now upon earth could fight.
 And yet they marked my counsels and heeded my word.
 Now you two heed me, since it is better to do so.
 You should not, great though you are, deprive him of the girl, 275 but let her be, as it was to him the sons of the Achaeans gave her as prize; nor you, son of Peleus, venture to contend face-to-face with your king, since the king bearing the scepter partakes of a very different honor, and is he to whom Zeus has given distinction.
 And if you are the stronger man, and the mother who bore you a goddess,<sup>5</sup> 280
 yet is this one more powerful, since he rules over more men.
 Son of Atreus, restrain your spirit; for I—yes, I—entreat you to relinquish your anger with Achilles, who is for all Achaeans the great wall of defense against this evil war.”
 Then in turn lord Agamemnon spoke: 285 “Indeed all these things, old sir, you rightly say;
 but this man wants to be above all other men;
 he wants to be lord over all, to rule all,
 to give orders to all—which I think that one man at least will not obey.
 And if the eternal gods have made him a spearman 290 they do not on that account appoint him to speak insults.” Interrupting, godlike Achilles answered him:
 “May I be called a coward and of no account
 if I submit to you in everything you should say.
 Give such orders to other men, but do not act as master to me. 295
 For I do not think it likely I will obey you.
 And I will tell you something else and put it away in your mind—
 I will not fight for the girl with strength of hand, not with you, nor with any other man, since you who take her from me also gave her.
 But of other possessions beside my ships, swift and dark, 300

4. Heroes of an earlier generation. These are the Lapiths from Thessaly in northern Greece. At the wedding of Peirithoös, the mountain-dwelling centaurs (half human, half horse) got drunk and tried to rape the women who were present. The Lapiths killed them after a fierce fight. The line numbers here account for lines that were omitted by the translator because they may not belong to the next.

5. The sea nymph Thetis, who was married to the mortal Peleus (Achilles' father). She later left him and went to live with her father, Nereus, in the depths of the Aegean Sea.

of these you can take nothing lifted against my will.

And I invite you to try, so that these men too will know—very quickly will your dark blood gush round my spear.”

Having fought like this with words, blow for blow, they both stood, and broke up the assembly by the ships of the Achaeans. 305 Peleus’ son went to his shelter and balanced ships with the son of Menoetius<sup>6</sup> and his companions.

But the son of Atreus then drew a swift ship down to the sea, and chose twenty rowers to go in her, and put on board the sacrificial hecatomb

for the god, and fetching Chryseïs of the lovely cheeks 310 put her on board; and resourceful Odysseus came on as leader.

Then, embarked, they sailed upon the watery way, and the son of Atreus charged the men to purify themselves.
They cleansed themselves and cast the impurities into the sea, and to Apollo they made perfect sacrificial hecatombs 315 of bulls and goats along the shore of the murmuring sea;
and the savor rose to heaven amid a swirl of smoke.

So they attended to these tasks throughout the army; but Agamemnon did not leave off the quarrel, in which he first threatened Achilles, but spoke to Talthybios and Eurybates, 320 who were heralds and ready henchmen:

“Go to the shelter of Peleus’ son Achilles;
take by the hand Briseïs of the lovely cheeks and lead her away.
And if he does not give her up, I myself will take her, coming in force, and it will be the worse for him.” 325

So saying, he sent them forth, and enjoined on them a harsh command.

And they two went unwilling along the shore of the murmuring sea, and came to the camp and ships of the Myrmidons.
They found Achilles by his shelter and dark ship, sitting; and he did not rejoice to see them. 330

The two stood in fear and awe of the king, and neither addressed him, nor questioned.

But Achilles understood in his heart, and spoke to them:

“Hail heralds, messengers of Zeus, as also of men—come close; you are not to blame in my eyes, but Agamemnon, 335 who sends you two forth on account of the girl Briseïs.

But come, Patroclus, descended from Zeus, bring out the girl and give her to these two to take away. And let them both be witnesses before the blessed gods and mortal men alike, and before him, this stubborn king, if ever hereafter 340 other men need me to ward off shameful destruction.

For he surely raves in his ruinous heart, and knows not to look ahead as well as behind as to how the Achaeans shall fight in safety beside the ships.”

Thus he spoke and Patroclus obeyed his beloved companion, 345 and from the shelter led Briseïs of the lovely cheeks,

6. Patroclus, Achilles’ closest friend.

and gave her to be taken away. And straightway the heralds left for the ships of the Achaeans.

She the young woman, unwilling, went with them. But Achilles, weeping, quickly slipping away from his companions, sat on the shore of the gray salt sea, and looked out to depths as dark as wine; 350 again and again, stretching forth his hands, he prayed to his beloved mother:

“Mother, since you bore me to be short-lived as I am, Olympian Zeus who thunders on high ought to grant me at least honor; but now he honors me not even a little. For the son of Atreus, wide-ruling Agamemnon has dishonored me; he keeps my prize, having seized it, he personally taking it.” 355

So he spoke, shedding tears, and his lady mother heard him as she sat in the depths of the salt sea beside her aged father. At once she rose from the clear salt sea, like mist, and sat before him as he wept, 360 and caressed him with her hand, and spoke to him and said his name: “Child, why do you cry? What pain has come to your heart? Speak out, don’t hide it, so that we both know.”

Groaning deeply, Achilles of the swift feet spoke to her: “You know; why should I recount these things to you who know them all? We came to Thebes, the holy city of Eëtion;<sup>7</sup> 365 we sacked it and brought everything here.

The sons of the Achaeans fairly divided the things among them, and to the son of Atreus they gave out Chryseïs of the lovely cheeks. Then Chryses, a priest of Apollo who strikes from afar, came to the swift ships of the bronze-clad Achaeans 370 bearing untold ransom to set free his daughter, holding in his hands the wreaths of Apollo who strikes from afar on a golden staff, and beseeched all the Achaeans, but mostly the two sons of Atreus, marshalers of men. 375

Then all the rest of the Achaeans shouted assent, to respect the priest and take the splendid ransom; but this did not please the heart of Atreus’ son Agamemnon, but violently he drove him away and laid a strong injunction upon him. 380

And in anger the old man went back; and Apollo heard him when he prayed, since he was very dear to him, and he let fly an evil arrow against the Argives; and now the men died in quick succession as the arrows of the god ranged everywhere through the broad army of the Achaeans. But then a seer possessed of good knowledge publicly declared to us the wishes of the god who works his will. 385

Straightway I led in urging that the god be appeased; but then anger seized the son of Atreus, and suddenly rising to speak he declared aloud a threat, which is now fulfilled.

7. Eëtion was king of the Cilicians in Asia Minor and father of Hector’s wife, Andromache. “Thebes” (or Thebe): the Cilicians’ capital city, not the Greek or Egyptian city of the same name.

For the dark-eyed Achaeans are sending the girl on a swift ship to the town of Chryse, taking gifts for lord Apollo; 390 just now the heralds set out from my shelter leading the daughter of Briseus, whom the sons of the Achaeans gave to me.

But you, if you have the power, defend your son;
go to Olympus and petition Zeus, if ever in any way 395 in word or in deed you delighted the heart of Zeus.

For many times in the halls of my father I have heard you boast when you said that from the dark-clouded son of Cronus, alone among immortals, you warded off shameful destruction, at that time when the other Olympians sought to bind him—Hera and Poseidon<sup>8</sup> and Pallas Athena; 400

but you coming to him, goddess, released his bonds, swiftly summoning to high Olympus the Hundred-Handed One, whom the gods call Briareos the Strong—but all men call Aigaion—he in turn is stronger than his father;<sup>9</sup> and this one seated himself beside the son of Cronus, rejoicing in his glory. 405

And the blessed gods trembled before him, and did no more binding.
Now remind Zeus of these things, seat yourself beside him and clasp his knees

and see if he might be willing to aid the Trojans, and to pen the Achaeans around the sterns of their ships and the sea, dying, so that all may have profit of their king, 410 and he will know, Atreus' son, wide-ruling Agamemnon, his delusion, when he paid no honor to the best of the Achaeans."

Then Thetis answered him, with tears flowing down:
"Ah me, my child, why did I, bitter in childbearing, raise you?
Would that you sat by your ships without tears, without pain, 415 for indeed your measure of life is so very small, not long at all.
And now you are at once short-lived and unlucky beyond all men;
so I bore you to an unworthy fate in my halls.

To speak your request to Zeus who hurls the thunderbolt
I myself shall go to Olympus of the deep snow; perhaps he will heed me. 420
But you stay now by your fast-running ships, nurse your wrath at the Achaeans, and leave off the war entirely.
Zeus went yesterday to the river of Ocean among the blameless

to attend a feast, and all the gods accompanied him.
On the twelfth day he will come back to Olympus, 425 and then at that time I will go for you to the bronze-floored house
of Zeus,

and I will clasp his knees in supplication, and I think I will persuade him."

Then speaking thus she went away and left him there, angered in his heart on account of the fair-belted woman, whom they were taking by force against his will. And Odysseus 430 was drawing near the town of Chryse, bearing the sacred hecatomb.

 When they had come inside the deep harbor, they furled the sails, and placed them in the dark ship, and deftly lowering the mast by the forestays, laid it in the mast-gallows, and rowed her to her mooring under oars; 435 then they threw the anchor stones, and made fast the stern lines, and themselves disembarked into the broken surf, and disembarked the hecatomb for Apollo, who strikes from afar;
 and Chryseïs disembarked from the seagoing ship.
 Then leading her to the altar resourceful Odysseus 440 placed her in her father's hands and addressed him:
 "O Chryses, Agamemnon, lord of men, dispatched me to lead your child to you and to perform sacred hecatombs to Phoebus on behalf of the Danaans, so that we might propitiate lord Apollo, who has now sent sufferings, much lamented, upon the Argives." 445
 So speaking, he placed her in the priest's arms, and he, rejoicing, received his beloved daughter; and the men swiftly set up the splendid hecatomb for the god
 in good order around the well-built altar, then they washed their hands and took up the barley for scattering.
 And Chryses prayed aloud for them, lifting his hands: 450
 "Hear me, thou of the silver bow, you who stand over Chryse and Killa most holy, you whose might rules Tenedos, surely once before this you heard me when I prayed;
 honoring me you smote hard the host of the Achaeans.
 Now, as once before, fulfill this wish for me; 455 now this time ward shameful destruction from the Danaans."
 Thus he spoke praying, and Phoebus Apollo heard him.
 Then when they had prayed and thrown the scattering barley before them, they first drew back the heads of the sacrificial animals and cut their throats, and flayed them, and cut out the thighbones and covered them over with fat 460 they had made into double folds, and placed raw flesh upon them;
 the old man burned these on a cleft-stick and over them poured in libation dark-gleaming wine; and the youths beside him held sacrificial forks in hand.
 Then when the thighbones had been consumed by fire and they had tasted the entrails, they cut up the other parts and pierced them through on spits 465 and roasted them with care, and then drew off all the pieces.
 And when they had ceased their work and prepared their meal, they feasted, nor did any man's appetite lack his due portion.
 And when they had put away desire for eating and drinking,
 the young men filled mixing bowls brimful with wine, 470 and after pouring libations in each cup, distributed it to all;
 then all day long they sought the favor of the god in dance and song, the young Achaean men beautifully singing a hymn of praise, celebrating the god who works from afar; and the god rejoiced in his heart as he listened.

When the sun sank and dusk came on,
 then they laid down to sleep by the stern lines of their ship;
 and when dawn, born of the morning, shone forth her fingers of rosy light, then they sailed out for the broad army of the Achaeans.
 And to them Apollo who works from afar sent a following wind.
 They stepped the mast and spread the glistening sails, and the wind blew gusts in the middle of the sail, and around the cutwater the bow-wave, shimmering dark, sang loud as the ship proceeded.

She swept over the swell, making her course.
 And when they arrived at the broad army of the Achaeans, they dragged the dark ship ashore high on the sand, and splayed long struts beneath, and themselves scattered to their ships and shelters.

But, he, sitting idle by his fast-running ships, remained full of wrath—
 the Zeus-descended son of Peleus,<sup>2</sup> Achilles of the swift feet; never did he go to the assembly where men win glory, never to war, but consumed his own heart, biding his time there; yet he yearned for the war shout and battle.

But when at length the twelfth dawn arose, then all the gods who live forever went to Olympus together, with Zeus as their leader; and Thetis did not neglect her son's directives, and she rose from the heaving surface of the sea, and at dawn ascended to towering Olympus.
 She found the far-thundering son of Cronus sitting apart from the others on the topmost peak of ridged Olympus; and she sat before him and clasped his knees with her left hand, and with her right took hold of him beneath his chin,<sup>3</sup>

and in supplication addressed lord Zeus, the son of Cronus:
 "Father Zeus, if ever among the immortals I helped you by word or by deed, accomplish this wish for me:
 honor my son, who was born short-lived beyond all men, and yet now the lord of men Agamemnon has dishonored him; he holds his prize, having seized it, he personally taking it.
 Do you now revenge him, Olympian Zeus, all-devising; give strength to the Trojans until that time the Achaeans recompense my son and exalt him with honor."

So she spoke; but Zeus who gathers the clouds did not answer her, but sat silent a long while. And as she had clasped his knees, so Thetis now held on, clinging closely, and beseeched him again:
 "Promise me faithfully, and nod your assent, or refuse me—you have nothing to fear—so that I may learn how much I am of all gods the most dishonored."

Greatly troubled, Zeus who gathers the clouds addressed her:
 "This is a deadly business, when you set me up to quarrel with Hera, when she will harass me with words of abuse.

 As it is, she is always quarreling with me in the presence of the immortal gods, 520

and maintains, as you know, that I help the Trojans in battle.
 Now go back, lest Hera notice anything;
 I will make these matters my concern, to bring them to accomplishment.
 Come, I will my bow my head for you, so that you may be convinced;
 for among immortals this is the greatest 525 testament of my determination; for not revocable, nor false, nor unfulfilled is anything to which I have bowed my head.”
 The son of Cronus spoke, and nodded with his blue-black brows, the ambrosial mane of the lord god swept forward from his immortal head; and he shook great Olympus. 530

Thus the two parted after conspiring; and she sprang into the deep salt sea from shining Olympus, and Zeus went to his home; and all the gods rose as a body from their seats before their father; nor did any dare remain seated as he approached, but all stood to meet him. 535
 So he took his seat there upon his throne; nor did Hera fail to perceive at a glance that silver-footed Thetis, the daughter of the old man of the sea, had conspired with him.
 Straightway she addressed Zeus, the son of Cronus, with taunting words:

“Which of the gods now, O cunning schemer, has conspired with you?
 Always you love being away from me, mulling over your secrets to make your decisions. Never yet to me have you willingly dared state what you are thinking.” 540

Then the father of gods and men answered her: “Hera, do not hope to know all my thoughts; 545 they will be hard for you, although you are my wife.
 However, that which is fitting for you to hear, no other,
 of gods or men, will know before you;
 but that which I may wish to consider apart from the gods—do not press me about each and every thing, nor make inquiry.” 550

Then answered him the ox-eyed lady Hera:
 “Most dread son of Cronus, what sort of word have you spoken?
 Certainly before now I have neither pressed you, nor made inquiry, and entirely without interference you devise whatever you want.
 But now my heart is terribly afraid lest 555 silver-footed Thetis, daughter of the old man of the sea, won you over;
 for at dawn she came to your side and clasped your knees.
 And I suspect you pledged faithfully to her that you would honor Achilles, and destroy many by the ships of the Achaeans.”

Then in answer Zeus who gathers the clouds addressed her: 560 “What possesses you? You always suspect something, I never get past you.

Nonetheless, you can accomplish nothing at all, but will only be further from my heart—and it will be the worse for you.
 If this is the way things are—then you may be sure this is the way that pleases me.
 Sit down and be silent, and obey my word, 565

lest the gods in Olympus, as many as there are, be of no avail to you against me

as I close in, when I lay my unassailable hands upon you.”

Thus he spoke and the ox-eyed lady Hera was afraid, and she sat down in silence, bending her own heart into submission;
and throughout the house of Zeus the heavenly gods were troubled. 570

To them Hephaestus,<sup>4</sup> famed for his art, began to speak, comforting his dear mother, white-armed Hera:

“To be sure this will be a deadly business, not to be borne, if you two quarrel this way for the sake of mortals, carrying on this jabbering among the gods; nor 575 will there be any pleasure from our noble feast if unseemliness prevails.

I advise my mother, sensible as she is, to be agreeable to our dear father Zeus, so that our father will not reproach us again, and throw our feast into disorder.

For what if the Olympian wielder of lightning wished to blast us from our seats—for he is much the strongest. 580

Rather address him with gentle words;

then straightway will the Olympian be favorable to us.”

Thus he spoke, and springing to his feet placed a double-handled cup

in his dear mother’s hands, and addressed her: 585

“Endure, my mother, and restrain yourself, distressed though you be, lest, dear as you are, I with my own eyes see you struck down; then for all my grief I will have no power to help you; for it is painful to oppose the Olympian.

For at another time before this, when I was trying to ward him from you, 590

he grabbed me by the foot and cast me from the threshold of heaven;

the whole day I drifted down, and as the sun set

I dropped on Lemnos,<sup>5</sup> and there was but little life still in me.

It was there the Sintian men quickly ministered to me after my fall.”

So he spoke and Hera, goddess of the white arms, smiled 595 and smiling accepted the cup from her son’s hand.

Then to all the other gods, serving to the right, he poured sweet nectar<sup>6</sup> like wine, drawing from a mixing bowl;

and unquenchable laughter broke out among the blessed gods

as they watched Hephaestus bustling through the halls. 600

Then all day long until the sun went down, they feasted, nor was the appetite of any stinted of fair portion—nor stinted of the beautifully wrought lyre, which Apollo held, or of the Muses, who sang, one following the other, with lovely voice.

Then when the sun’s bright light went down, 605

they left to go to bed, each in his own house, where the famous crook-legged god,

Hephaestus, had made a house for each with skillful understanding.

Olympian Zeus, wielder of lightning, went to his bed where he was wont to retire when sweet sleep came to him;

Summary As Achilles, angry with Agamemnon, stays out of the fighting, the Trojans make a series of successful attacks against the Greek forces. They are led by the greatest of the Trojan heroes, Hector, son of Priam and brother of Paris, who leaves behind his wife and infant son to challenge the invading army and defend his home. When Hector brings the Trojan soldiers right up to the Greek ships, ready to set them on fire, Agamemnon acknowledges that he made a mistake to alienate Achilles, and sends messengers (including Odysseus) to try to persuade the hero to return to the war. But Achilles holds out, and the fighting continues. Many men die on both sides. Finally Achilles' friend, Patroclus, volunteers to fight in his place, borrowing Achilles' own armor. He is killed by Hector. Hector strips Achilles' divine armor from Patroclus's corpse. A fierce fight for the body itself ends in partial success for the Greeks; they take Patroclus's body but have to retreat to their camp, with the Trojans at their heels.

BOOK XVIII

[The Shield of Achilles]

So they fought like blazing fire;
 but Antilochos<sup>7</sup> went as swift-footed messenger to Achilles.
 And he found him in front of his straight-horned ships, foreboding in his heart those things that now had happened, and troubled he addressed his own great-hearted spirit: 5
 "Ah me, why now are the long-haired Achaeans again driven to the ships in panicked confusion across the plain?
 May the gods not have accomplished evil sufferings for my heart, as once my mother plainly told me, and said to me that while I yet lived, the best of Myrmidons 10 at Trojan hands would leave the light of day.
 Surely Menoetius' brave son has already died, stubborn one; and yet I told him that when he had driven off the blazing fire

to come back to the ships, not battle in his strength with Hector." While he churned these things through his mind and heart, 15 the son of noble Nestor drew close to him shedding hot tears, and spoke his grievous message:
 "Woe to me, son of brilliant Peleus, surely it is a baleful message you will hear, would that it had never happened.
 Patroclus lies dead, and they are fighting round his naked 20 body; for Hector of the shimmering helm has his armor."

So he spoke; and a dark cloud of grief enveloped Achilles.
 Taking with both hands the fire-blackened ashes, he poured them down upon his head, and defiled his handsome face;
 on his fragrant tunic the black ash settled; 25
 and he lay outstretched in the dust, a great man in his greatness, and with his own hands he defiled his hair, tearing at it.

7. A son of Nestor. He has been sent to tell Achilles that Patroclus is dead.

And the female slaves, whom Achilles and Patroclus had seized as plunder, stricken at heart cried loud, and ran outside around brilliant Achilles, and all with their hands 30 beat their breasts, and the limbs of each went slack beneath them;
 on his other side Antilochos wept, pouring tears, holding the hands of Achilles as his noble heart groaned.
 For he feared lest Achilles cut his own throat with iron.

Dreadful were Achilles' cries of grief; his lady mother heard 35 as she sat in the depths of the sea beside her aged father.
 Then she wailed in turn; and all the goddesses gathered round her, who down in the depths of the sea were daughters of Nereus.
 There was Glauke, Thaleia and Kymodoke, Nesaie and Speio, Thoë and ox-eyed Halia, 40
 Kymothoë and also Aktaia, and Limnoreaia, Melite, and Iaira, Amphithoë and Agauë, Doto, Proto and Pherousa, Dynamene, Dexamene, Amphinome and Kallianeira; Doris and Panope and illustrious Galateia 45 and Nemertes and Apseudes and Kallianassa; and Klymene was there and Ianeira and also Ianassa, Maira and Oreithyia and Amatheia of the lovely hair, and the others who in the depths of the sea were daughters of Nereus.
 And the silvery cave was filled with them; and all together 50 beat their breasts. And Thetis led the lament:

"Hear me, sister Nereids, so that all of you may know well as you listen, how many are the sorrows in my heart.
 Ay me, wretched I am—ay me, unhappy bearer of the noblest son, since I bore a son, blameless and strong, 55 outstanding among warriors, who shot up like a young shoot, and having nurtured him like a growing tree on the high ground of an orchard

I sent him forth with the curved ships to Ilion, to go to battle against the Trojans; him I shall not welcome again returned home into the house of Peleus. 60
 So long as he lives and sees the sun's light,
 he has sorrow, nor can I help him at all by going to him.
 But come, so that I may see my beloved child and hear of what sorrow has come to him while he stayed away from the fighting."

So speaking she left the cave; and her sisters went with her 65 in tears, and the swell of the sea broke around them.

And when they reached the rich soil of Troy, up onto the shore of the sea they went, up one after the other, where the ships

of the Myrmidons had been drawn up, close-pressed round swift Achilles.
 And his lady mother stood beside him as he groaned deeply, 70 and keenly wailing she held her son's head, and in lament spoke winged words:

"Child, why do you cry? What sorrow has reached your heart?
 Speak out, do not hide it. Those things have been accomplished for you through Zeus, as at that time before you prayed with uplifted hands, 75 that all the sons of the Achaeans be pinned against the sterns of their ships and for want of you suffer deeds that shamed them.”

Then groaning deeply swift-footed Achilles answered her: “Mother mine, these things the Olympian indeed fulfilled for me;
 but what pleasure do I have in them, since my beloved companion died, 80 Patroclus, whom I revered beyond all companions, as equal to my own life? I have lost him, and after slaying him Hector stripped the stupendous armor, a wonder to behold, a thing of beauty; the armor the gods gave to Peleus as splendid gifts on that day when they placed you in the bed of a mortal man. 85 Would that you had made your home with the immortal goddesses of the sea,

and Peleus had taken to himself a mortal wife.

But as it is, for you too there must be grief immeasurable in heart for the death of your son, whom you will not receive again returned to home, since my spirit does not bid me 90 to go on living nor take my part among men, unless, before all else, Hector, beaten beneath my spear, lose his life, and pay the penalty for making prey of Menoetius’ son Patroclus.”

Then in turn Thetis spoke to him as she shed her tear:

“Then you will die soon, my child, from what you say;
 for your fate is prepared straightway after Hector’s.” 95

Then greatly troubled swift-footed Achilles spoke to her: “Straightway may I die, since I was not destined to help my companion as he was killed; and a very long way from his fatherland he perished, and lacked me to be his defender against harm. 100
 Now since I am not returning to my beloved fatherland, nor was I in any way salvation’s light to Patroclus, nor to my other companions, who have been broken in their number by shining Hector, but sat beside the ships a useless burden on the earth,
 I who am such as no other of the bronze-clad Achaeans 105 is in battle; though in the assembly there are others better—would that strife perish from gods and men, and anger, which incites even a man of sense to violence,
 and which, far sweeter than dripping honey, wells like smoke in the breast of men, 110
 as Agamemnon lord of men then angered me.

But let us leave these things in the past for all our distress, subduing the spirit in our own breasts by necessity;
 for now I am setting out to find the destroyer of a dear life—Hector. I will take death at that time when 115
 Zeus and the other deathless gods wish to accomplish it.
 For even the mighty Heracles<sup>8</sup> did not escape from death, for all that he was dearest to lord Zeus the son of Cronus, but fate broke him and the hard anger of Hera;
 so I too, if the same fate has been prepared for me, 120 shall lie when I have died. But now let me win outstanding glory, and drive some woman of Troy, or deep-breasted Dardan<sup>9</sup> woman,

8. The greatest of Greek heroes, the son of Zeus by a mortal woman; pursued by the jealousy of Hera, he was forced to undertake twelve great labors and finally died in agony from the effects of a poisoned garment.

9. Trojan.

wiping with both hands from her soft cheeks
 the thick-falling tears, to moan aloud, and may they know that I stayed too long from fighting. 125
 Do not detain me from battle though you love me; you will not persuade me.”

Then answered him Thetis of the silver feet:
 “Yes, all these things, my child, you have spoken truly; nor is it shameful to ward off sheer destruction from your afflicted comrades.
 Yet your beautiful armor is held among the Trojans, 130 the brazen, glittering armor. Hector of the shimmering helm exults in this, wearing it on his own shoulders; but I do not think he will exult in it for long, since his slaughter is near at hand.
 But do not enter in the strife of battle until you see me returned here with your own eyes; 135 for at dawn I shall come back with the rising of the sun carrying splendid armor from lord Hephaestus.”

Then having so spoken she took herself away from her son, and turned to speak to her sisters of the sea:
 “All of you now make your way into the broad gulf of ocean, 140 to see the old man of the sea and the halls of our father, and to tell him everything; and I am going to high Olympus, to the side of Hephaestus, famed for his skill, to see if he might be willing to give to my son glorious gleaming armor.”
 So she spoke; and they at once plunged beneath the ocean swell; 145 and she, the goddess Thetis of the silver feet, went again to Olympus, so that she might carry splendid armor to her beloved son.

Her feet brought her to Olympus; meanwhile the Achaeans fleeing with inhuman shouts before man-slaughtering Hector reached their ships and the Hellespont. 150 But Patroclus—the strong-greaved Achaeans could not drag the body of Achilles’ henchman out from under the flying spears and arrow shafts;
 for again the Trojan host and horses came upon him, as did Hector son of Priam, like fire in fighting spirit.
 Three times shining Hector seized the body by the feet from behind, 155 determined to drag it off, and shouted loud to spur the Trojans.
 And three times the two Aiantes, mantled in their fierce courage, beat him from the corpse. But steadfastly trusting in his battle prowess Hector would now spring forth through the press of battle, now again take his stand and cry aloud, nor fell back at all; 160 but as from a carcass rustic herdsmen fail to drive away a tawny lion in his great hunger, so the two Aiantes, fully armed, were not able to frighten Hector son of Priam from the corpse.

And indeed he would have dragged it away and won for himself glory everlasting, 165 had not swift Iris<sup>1</sup> with feet like the wind come to the son of Peleus as messenger, racing from Olympus with word to prepare for battle, in secret from Zeus and the other gods; for Hera it was who sent her;

1. Goddess of the rainbow and the usual messenger of the gods in the Iliad.

and standing close to him she spoke her winged words: “Rise up, son of Peleus, most terrifying of men; 170 protect Patroclus, for whose sake the dread fighting is under way before the ships—they are killing one another, both those who fight to defend the body of he who died, and the Trojans who rush to haul it off to windy Ilion.
 Above all others shining Hector 175 is bent on dragging it away; and his heart is urgent to impale the head upon spiked stakes, cut from its tender neck.
 Come, rise up, don’t lie still; shame be on your heart, should Patroclus become a plaything for Trojan dogs.
 Yours the dishonor, if he comes mutilated to the dead.” 180

Then answered her swift-footed godlike Achilles:
 “Divine Iris, which of the gods sent you as messenger to me?”
 Then in turn swift Iris with feet like the wind addressed him:
 “Hera sent me, the glorious wife of Zeus;
 nor does the high-throned son of Cronus know, nor any other 185 of the immortals, who dwell about snow-clad Olympus.”
 Then answering her spoke swift-footed Achilles:
 “How then am I to go among the tumult? For those others have my armor.
 And my beloved mother forbade me arm for battle before I see her coming with my own eyes; 190 for she pledged to bring splendid armor from Hephaestus.
 And I do not know who else’s illustrious arms I might put on, unless it be the great shield of Telamonian Ajax.<sup>2</sup>
 But he too, I think, is engaged among the frontline fighters, wreaking havoc with his spear around Patroclus who lies dead.” 195
 Then in turn swift Iris with feet like the wind addressed him:
 “We too well know that they hold your glorious armor.
 But go as you are to the ditch and show yourself to the Trojans—perhaps in dread of you they might retreat from fighting, the Trojans, and the warrior sons of the Achaeans draw breath 200 in their extremity; for respite in war is brief.”
 So speaking swift-footed Iris departed; and Achilles beloved of Zeus arose. And Athena cast the tasseled aegis<sup>3</sup> about his mighty shoulders; she, shining among goddesses, encircled round his head a cloud of 205 gold, and from it blazed bright-shining fire.
 And as when smoke rising from a city reaches the clear high air from a distant island, which enemy men fight round, and they the whole day long are pitted in hateful warfare around their city walls, but with the sun’s setting 210 the beacon fires blaze, torch upon torch, and flaring upward the glare becomes visible to those who live around, in the hope that they might come with ships as allies against destruction, so from Achilles’ head the radiance reached the clear high air.
 And going away from the wall he stood at the ditch, nor did he mix with 215

the Achaeans; for he observed his mother's knowing command.
 And standing there he shouted, and from the distance Pallas Athena cried out too; unspeakable was the uproar he incited in the Trojans.
 As when a clarion voice is heard, when cries the trumpet of life-destroying enemies who surround a city, 220 such then was the clarion voice of Aeacides.

And when they heard the brazen voice of Aeacides, the spirit in man each was thrown in turmoil; the horses with their fine manes wheeled their chariots back, for in their hearts they forebode distress to come,
 and the charioteers were struck from their senses, when they saw the weariless 225
 terrible fire above the head of Peleus' great-hearted son blazing; and this the gleaming-eyed goddess Athena caused to blaze.
 Three times across the ditch godlike Achilles cried his great cry, and three times the Trojans and their illustrious allies were thrown in panic.

Then and there perished twelve outstanding men 230 upon their own chariots and spears. And the Achaeans with relief pulled Patroclus out from under the missiles, and laid him on a litter; and his beloved companions stood around it weeping, and with them followed swift-footed Achilles shedding hot tears, when he looked upon his trusted comrade 235 lying on the bier, torn with sharp bronze, whom he had sent forth with horses and chariots into war, but did not welcome him returned home again.

And ox-eyed lady Hera caused the tireless sun to return, unwilling, into the streams of Ocean; 240 the sun set, and the glorious Achaeans ceased from the powerful din of battle and all-leveling war.
 The Trojans in their turn on the other side, withdrawing from the mighty combat released their swift horses from under their chariots, and gathered into assembly before taking thought for supper; 245 and the assembly took place with them standing upright, nor did any man dare to take his seat; for trembling held them all, because Achilles had appeared; he who for a long time had abandoned the painful battle.

And to them Poulydamas, wise son of Panthoös, was first to speak to the assembly; he alone looked both forward and behind him;<sup>4</sup> 250
 he was Hector's comrade, and born in the same night, but the one greatly excelled in speech, and the other in the spear;
 he with wise intent gave counsel to them and spoke:
 "Consider well, my friends; I for my part urge you now to go to the city, and not await the bright dawn 255 on the open plain beside the ships; we are far from our ramparts.
 As long as that man harbored wrath at noble Agamemnon, so long were the Achaeans easier to fight;

4. I.e., he was a prophet; he knew the past and foresaw the future.

I myself used to welcome sleeping by the swift ships at night, with the hope we would seize these double-ended ships. 260
 But now terribly I dread the swift-footed son of Peleus; such is the reckless might of that one's spirit, he will not wish to remain upon the plain, in this middle ground where Achaeans and Trojans
 both share between them battle's fury, but he will fight for our city and our women. 265
 Come, let us go to the city, be persuaded by me; for this is how it will be.
 Now ambrosial night has curbed the swift-footed son of Peleus;
 but if he finds us here tomorrow when he rises under arms, well will a man come to know him; and gladly will he make his way to sacred Ilion— 270 he who escapes; but the dogs and vultures will devour many of the Trojans—but may this word never come to my hearing.
 If you will be persuaded by my words, painful though they are,
 this night we will harbor our strength in the place of assembly, and our high walls and gates and the doors fitted to them— 275
 the long, well-honed, barred doors—will guard our city;
 and in early morning, having armed in our weapons with the dawn, we will take up position along the ramparts. The worse for him, if he chooses
 to come from his ships to do battle around our walls;
 he will go back to the ships, when he has given his high-necked horses 280 their fill of running roundabout, as he roams beneath the city walls.
 Even his courage will not permit him to storm inside, nor will he ever sack our city. Before that the sleek dogs will devour him.” Then looking at him from beneath his brows spoke Hector of the shimmering helm:
 “Poulydamas, these things you declare are no longer pleasing to me, 285 you who bid us go back to cower down in the city.
 Or have you all not had your fill of being penned inside the walls?
 In days before, the city of Priam, as all men born of earth were wont to say, was rich in gold, rich in bronze—by now the splendid treasures have vanished from our houses, 290 and many possessions went for sale to Phrygia and lovely Maeonia,<sup>5</sup> since mighty Zeus conceived hatred for us.
 And now, at this time when the son of devious Cronus grants me to win glory by the ships and drive the Achaeans to the sea—you fool, no longer disclose such thoughts among the people! 295
 None of the Trojans will obey you, for I will not allow it.
 But come, let us all be persuaded to do as I say.
 Take your meal now at your posts throughout the army and be mindful of your watches and each of you be alert; and whoever of the Trojans is excessively distressed for his possessions, 300
 let him gather them together and give them to the people to consume as common stock;
 better that one of them have profit of them than the Achaeans;

5. Countries in Asia Minor allied with Troy.

and in early morning, having armed in our weapons with the dawn,
by the hollow ships we shall awaken cutting war.
And if in fact Achilles the godlike has stirred himself to action by his ships, 305

the worse it will be for him, if he so chooses, for I will not flee from him out of this grievous war, but I will strongly face him—we shall see whether he will win great glory, or I.
Enyalios<sup>6</sup> the god of war is impartial; and often he kills the one who kills.”

Thus declared Hector, and the Trojans shouted their applause, 310
the fools, for Pallas Athena took their wits away;
all assented to Hector as he devised disaster,
but none to Poulydamas, who thought out excellent counsel.

Then they took their meal throughout the army; but the Achaeans through all the night groaned aloud as they mourned Patroclus. 315

And the son of Peleus led their impassioned lament, placing his man-slaughtering hands on the breast of his companion, groaning without ceasing, as a full-maned lion, whose cubs a hunting man has stolen away out from the dense forest, and who returning too late is stricken with grief, 320
and many is the valley he traverses, following after the footprints of the man, in the hope he would find him in some quarter; for very bitter anger holds him;

so groaning deeply Achilles addressed the Myrmidons: “Alas, alas, empty were the words I let fall that day as I encouraged the warrior Menoetius within his walls; 325 I said to him that I would bring his son back to Opoeis<sup>7</sup> surrounded in glory

after sacking Ilion and receiving a share of the spoils.
But Zeus does not fulfill men’s every wish;
for it was fated that we both stain the same earth here in Troy, since I will not be returning home 330 to be received by old Peleus, the horseman, in his halls, nor by Thetis my mother, but the earth will cover me here.
But now, Patroclus, since I am following you beneath the earth,
I shall not honor you with funeral rites, until I lay here the armaments and head of Hector, your slayer, great-hearted one; 335 and before your pyre I shall cut the throats of twelve noble sons of Troy, in anger for your killing.

In the meanwhile you will lie as you are by my curved ships, and around you women of Troy and deep-breasted Dardan women shall wail for you night and day as they shed their tears, 340 those women whom we ourselves toiled to win by force and the long spear when we two sacked the rich cities of earth-born men.”

So speaking godlike Achilles ordered his companions to set a great cauldron on its three-legged stand astride the fire, so that with all speed

6. Another name for Ares.

7. An ancient city near the eastern coast of the central Greek mainland and home of Menoetius, father of Patroclus.

they could wash away the clotted blood from Patroclus;
 and they set a cauldron for heating bathing water on the blazing fire, then poured water in it, and took sticks of wood and kindled them beneath it. 345

And the fire caught the belly of the cauldron, and heated the water.
 Then when the water had come to boil in the bright bronze, they washed him and anointed him luxuriantly with oil, 350 and filled in his wounds with seasoned unguents; and placing him on the bier, they covered him with soft linen from his head to his feet, and over this with a shining mantle.

Then nightlong the Myrmidons groaned aloud as around Achilles of the swift feet they mourned Patroclus. 355

But Zeus addressed Hera, his sister and his wife:

“So once more, you have accomplished things your way, after all, my brown-eyed lady Hera, having roused to action swift-footed Achilles. Surely the long-haired Achaeans

must be your own offspring!”

Then answered him ox-eyed lady Hera: 360

“Most dread son of Cronus, what sort of word have you spoken?
 Surely, even a human tries to do what he can for another man, one who is only mortal, and who does not know so many arts as we;
 how then should not I—who claim to be the highest of the goddesses, both by birth and because I am called your wife, 365 and you are lord of all the immortal gods—how should I not contrive evil for the Trojans whom I hate?”

Thus they were speaking such things to one another.

But silver-footed Thetis arrived at the home of Hephaestus, imperishable, strewn with stars, conspicuous amongst the homes of the immortals, 370

made of bronze, which the crippled god had built himself.

And she found him dripping with sweat, twisting back and forth about his bellows,

hard at work; for he was forging fully twenty tripods to stand round the inside wall of his well-built palace.

He placed golden wheels beneath the legs of each, 375 so that of their own accord they might go into the divine assembly for him and then return back to his house again, a wonder to behold.

And they were so far finished, but the elaborate handles were not affixed; these he was fitting and striking the rivets.

And while he toiled at these things with his skilled understanding, 380
 the goddess Thetis of the silver feet approached him;

and Charis<sup>8</sup> of the shining headdress saw her as she was coming forward, lovely Charis, whom the famed bent-legged god had wed, and she clasped her hand, and spoke to her and said her name:

“Why, Thetis of the flowing robe, have you come to our house? 385

You are honored and beloved, but you have not come frequently before.
 But follow me in, so that I can set all hospitality before you.”

So speaking she, shining among goddesses, led Thetis forward.

8. Literally, “Grace” or “Beauty,” one of the Three Graces.

Then she settled her on a beautiful elaborate silver chair, and placed a stool beneath her feet; 390 and she called Hephaestus famed for his art and spoke a word to him:
 "Hephaestus, come this way; Thetis has need of something from you."
 Then the renowned god of the crooked legs answered her:
 "Then surely in our house is a goddess whom I hold in awe and revere.
 She saved me, that time I suffered bodily pain when I was made to fall a long way 395
 by the efforts of my dog-faced mother, who wanted to hide me away for being lame. At that time I would have suffered many cares at heart,
 had not Thetis taken me to her bosom,
 and Eurynome the daughter of Ocean of the shifting tide.
 For nine years with them I forged many intricate objects, 400 brooches and curving spirals for the hair, buds of rosettes and necklaces in their hollow cave; and all around the boundless currents of the Ocean with its foam flowed murmuring; nor did any other being know of this, neither of gods nor of mortal men, but Thetis and Eurynome knew, they who saved me. 405 Now she has come to our house; therefore I must surely repay to Thetis of the lovely hair all the value of my life.
 But you now set before her fitting hospitality, while I put away my bellows and all my tools."

He spoke, and the huge craftsman rose from the anvil block 410 limping, but his shrunken legs moved nimbly beneath him.
 He put the bellows aside from the fire, and all the tools with which he worked he gathered into a silver box.
 And with a sponge he wiped around his face and both his arms and powerful neck and shaggy chest, 415 and he put on a tunic, took up his thick staff, and went out the door, limping; and supporting their master were attendants made of gold, which seemed like living maidens.
 In their hearts there is intelligence, and they have voice and vigor, and from the immortal gods they have learned skills. 420 These bustled about supporting their master; and making his halting way to where Thetis was, he took his seat upon a shining chair, and clasped her hand, and spoke to her and said her name:
 "Why, Thetis of the flowing robe, have you come to our house?
 You are honored and beloved, but you have not come frequently before. 425 Speak what you will; my heart compels me to accomplish it, if I am able to accomplish it, and if it can be accomplished."

Then Thetis answered him as she let her tears fall:
 "Hephaestus—who of all the goddesses on Olympus, endures in her heart so many bitter cares, 430 as the griefs Zeus the son of Cronus has given to me beyond all?
 Out of all the other goddesses of the sea he made me subject to a mortal husband,
 Peleus son of Aeacus, and I endured the bed of a mortal man very much unwilling; he now worn out with bitter age lies in his halls, but there are other troubles now for me; 435 for he gave me a son to bear and to raise outstanding among warriors, who shot up like a young shoot, and having nurtured him like a growing tree on the high ground of an orchard

I sent him forth with the curved ships to Ilion, to go to battle against the Trojans; him I shall not welcome again
returned home into the house of Peleus. 440

So long as he lives and sees the sun's light
he has sorrow, nor can I help him at all by going to him.

The girl, whom the sons of the Achaeans picked out as prize for him, she it was, from his hands, lord Agamemnon took back; 445 and he has been consuming his heart in grief for her, while the Trojans pinned the Achaeans against the sterns of their ships, nor let them go forth from that place; and the Argive elders beseeched him, and promised many splendid gifts.

At this he refused to ward off their destruction, 450
but then put his own armor about Patroclus, and sent him to the fighting, and gave a great host with him.

All the day they battled around the Scaean gates; and surely that same day he would have sacked the city, had not Apollo killed the brave son of Menoetius as he was wreaking much destruction 455 among the front fighters, and gave glory to Hector.

And it is for this reason I have now come to your knees, to see if you would be willing to give to my short-lived son a shield and crested helmet and fine greaves with silver fastenings and a breastplate; for those that were his, his trusted comrade lost 460 when he was beaten down by the Trojans; and my son lies upon the ground grieving at heart."

Then answered her the famous crook-legged god:
"Have courage; do not let these matters be a care to your heart.
Would that I were so surely able to hide him away from death and its hard sorrow,

when dread fate comes upon him, 465 as he will have his splendid armor, such as many a man of the many men to come shall hold in wonder, whoever sees it."

So speaking he left her there, and went to his bellows; and he turned them to the fire and gave them their commands to get to work.

And all twenty bellows began to blow into the crucibles, 470 from every angle blasting up and forth their strong-blown gusts for him as he hurried to be now in this place, now again in that,
in whatever manner Hephaestus wished, and accomplished the job.

And he cast on the fire weariless bronze, and tin and treasured gold and silver; and then 475 he placed his great anvil on his anvil block, and with one hand grasped

his mighty hammer, and with the other grasped his tongs.

And first of all he made a great and mighty shield, working it intricately throughout, and cast around it a shining rim of triple thickness, glittering, and from it a silver shield-strap. 480 Five were the layers of the shield itself; and on it he wrought with knowing genius many intricate designs.

On it he formed the earth, and the heaven, and the sea and the weariless sun and waxing moon, and on it were all the wonders with which the heaven is ringed, 485
the Pleiades and Hyades and the might of Orion, and Arctos the Bear,<sup>9</sup> which men name the Wagon, and which always revolves in the same place, watchful for Orion, and alone has no part in the baths of Ocean.

And on it he made two cities of mortal men, 490 both beautiful; and in one there were weddings and wedding feasts, and they were leading the brides from their chambers beneath the gleam of torches

through the city, and loud rose the bridal song;
and the young men whirled in dance and in their midst the flutes and lyres raised their hubbub; and the women 495 standing in their doorways each watched in admiration.

And the people were thronged into the place of meeting; and there a dispute

had arisen, and two men were contending about the blood price for a man who had been killed. The one was promising to pay all, declaring so to the people, but the other refused to accept a thing; 500 and both desired the resolution be taken to a judge;

the people spoke out for both sides, favoring one or the other, and heralds were holding the people in check. The elders were sitting upon seats of polished stone in a sacred circle, and holding in their hands the staves of the heralds with their ringing voices; 505

to these the two sides next rushed, and in turn the elders each gave judgment.

And there lay in their midst two talents of gold, to give to him who might speak the straightest judgment among them.

But around the other city lay two armies of men, shining in their armor. And they were torn between two plans, 510 either to sack the city, or to divide everything equally with its people, as much wealth as the lovely town held within.

But the city was not yielding, and the men were secretly arming for ambush.

And their beloved wives and little children stood guard upon the ramparts

with those men whom old age held, 515 but the other men set forth; and Ares led them and Pallas Athena, both made in gold, and the clothing on them was golden, magnificent and mighty with their armor, like very gods, standing out apart; and beneath them the people were smaller.

And when these arrived at the place where it seemed to them good for ambush, 520

on the river, at the watering place for all the grazing herds,

9. Ursa Major, or the Big Dipper, which never descends below the horizon (i.e., into Ocean). The Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion are all clusters of stars, or constellations. Orion was a giant hunter of Greek mythology.

there they sat down, covered in their gleaming bronze.

And at a distance from them, their two lookouts were in position waiting for when they might see sheep and twist-horned cattle; and these soon came in sight, with two herdsmen following with them 525 taking pleasure in their flute, and did not at all foresee the plot.

And catching sight of them ahead, the men in ambush ran toward them, and swiftly, on both sides, cut off the herds of cattle and splendid flocks of white-wooled sheep, and killed the shepherds for good measure.

But the other men, when they heard the great uproar from the cattle 530 as they were sitting before the place of meeting, they at once mounted behind their high-stepping horses and went after them in pursuit. They reached the place swiftly, and having arrayed the battle, began fighting by the riverbanks, smiting one another with their bronze-headed spears.

And Strife was joining the throng of battle, and Tumult, and painful Death, 535

holding now a living man new-wounded, now one unharmed, now dragging a man who had died by his feet through the press of battle; and Death wore around her shoulders a cape crimsoned with the blood of men.

And they dashed in battle and fought like living men, dragging away the bodies of those slain by one another. 540

And on the shield he made a soft fallow field—fertile worked land broad and thrice-plowed; and on it many plowmen were driving their yoked teams of oxen turning up and down the field.
And when they came to the furrow end, after turning around, then would a man come up to give into their hands a cup of 545 honey-sweet wine; and they would turn back along the row, eager to reach the turning place of the deep fallow field.

And the earth darkened behind them, like land that has been plowed, made of gold though it was; a wonder indeed was that which was wrought.

And on the shield he placed a royal estate; and there the laborers 550 were reaping, sharp sickles in their hands.

Some sheaths were thickly falling to the ground along the row, others the sheaf binders bundled with bands.

Three binders stood by; but behind them children were gathering handfuls, carrying them in their arms, 555 constantly nearby. And among them the king, in silence, staff in hand, stood near the line rejoicing in his heart.

And to one side heralds were readying a feast beneath an oak, dressing the great ox they had slaughtered. And the women were scattering quantities of white barley for the workers as a meal. 560

And on the shield he put a great vineyard heavy with clumps of grapes,
a thing of beauty, all in gold, and the dark clusters were along it.
And it was set up on vine poles of solid silver;
and on either side he drove a ditch of blue enamel, and around it a fence of tin. One path alone was on it, 565 on which grape bearers made their way, when they gathered in the vineyard.

Maidens and young men with the giddy hearts of youth carried the honey-sweet crop in woven baskets; and in their midst a boy played his clear-sounding lyre with enchantment, and beautifully sang to it the mournful harvest song

570

in his soft voice. And the others beating time all together with song and cries followed, skipping with their feet.

And on it he made a herd of straight-horned cattle, and the cows were made of gold and tin,
 and lowing they hastened from the farmyard to their pasture, beside a rushing river, beside the waving reeds.

575

Golden herdsmen accompanied the cattle, four in all, and nine sleek dogs followed at their feet;
 but two dread lions held a bellowing bull among the foremost cattle; and he lowing loudly was being dragged away, and the dogs and sturdy youths followed after him.

580

And the two lions tearing open the great bull's hide were gulping down the entrails and dark blood; at a loss, the herdsmen set the swift dogs in pursuit, urging them on,
 but they shrank from biting the lions,
 and standing very close bayed and stayed away.

585

And on the shield the famed crook-legged god made a meadow, a great meadow for white-fleeced sheep lying in a lovely glen,
 and farmsteads and huts for the shepherds and their folds.
 And on it the famed crook-legged god made a patterned place for dancing,

590

like that which once in broad Knossos Daedalus created for Ariadne<sup>1</sup> of the lovely hair.
 There the unwed youths and maidens worth many oxen as their bridal price
 were dancing, holding each other's hands at the wrist; and the girls were wearing finest linen, and the youths wore fine-spun tunics, soft shining with oil.
 And the girls wore lovely crowns of flowers, and the youths were carrying

595

golden daggers from their silver sword-belts.
 And now the youths with practiced feet would lightly run in rings, as when a crouching potter makes trial of the potter's wheel fitted to his hand, to see if it speeds round; and then another time they would run across each other's lines.
 And a great crowd stood around the stirring dance filled with delight; and among them two acrobats, leaders of the dance, went whirling through their midst.

And Hephaestus set on it the great might of the river Ocean, along the outmost edge of the thick-made shield.

And when he had made the great and massive shield,

1. Daughter of Minos, king of Crete. Daedalus was the prototypical craftsman who built the labyrinth to house the Minotaur and who escaped from Crete on wings with his son Icarus. Knossos was the site of Minos's great palace.

then he wrought a breastplate for Achilles more resplendent than the light of fire, 610
 and he made a helmet for him, strong and fitted to his temples, a thing of beauty, intricately wrought, and set a gold crest on it;
 and then he made greaves for him of pliant tin.

And when the famed crook-legged god had made all the armor with his toil, lifting it up he set it before the mother of Achilles; 615 and she like a hawk leapt down from snowy summit of Olympus, carrying the glittering armor from Hephaestus.

Summary Achilles finally accepts gifts of restitution from Agamemnon, as he refused to do earlier. His return to the fighting brings terror to the Trojans and turns the battle into a rout in which Achilles kills every Trojan that crosses his path. As he pursues Agenor, Apollo tricks him by rescuing his intended victim (he spirits him away in a mist) and assumes Agenor's shape to lead Achilles away from the walls of Troy. The Trojans take refuge in the city, all except Hector.

BOOK XXII

[The Death of Hector]

So those who had fled terrorized like fawns into the city dried off their sweat and drank and slaked their thirst, slumped on the splendid ramparts. The Achaeans, however, drew near the walls with shields inclined against their shoulders; and there ruinous fate bound Hector to stand his ground, 5 before the Scaean gates of Ilion.

Now Phoebus Apollo hailed Peleion:
 "Why, son of Peleus, do you chase me, with those swift feet, you a mortal, I an undying god? You must not yet know that I am divine, you rage after me so furiously! 10 Is it of no concern, this business with the Trojans, whom you scattered in fear—

who are by now cowering in the city, while you slope off here?
 You will never kill me; I am not marked by fate."
 Then greatly stirred, swift-footed Achilles answered him:
 "You have thwarted me, most malevolent of all the gods, you who strike 15 from afar,

turning me here away from the city walls; otherwise many would have bitten the dirt before they arrived at Ilion.
 Saving them, you have robbed me of great glory, lightly, without fear of retribution;
 I would pay you back, if that power were in me." 20
 So speaking, he made toward the city, intent on great things, straining like a prizewinning horse who with his chariot runs effortlessly, stretching over the plain—so swiftly did Achilles move his feet and knees.

And old Priam first beheld him with his eyes 25
 as, shining like a star, Achilles streaked across the plain, the star that comes at summer's end,<sup>2</sup> its clear gleaming in the milky murk of night displayed among the multitude of stars—the star they give the name Orion's Dog; most radiant it is, but it makes an evil portent, 30 and brings great feverish heat on pitiful mortal men—just so did his bronze breastplate shine about Achilles running.

 The old man cried out and hammered his head with his hands, lifting them on high; crying mightily he called, imploring his beloved son; for before the gates Hector 35 continued to stand firm, intent on combat with Achilles.
 To him the old man called piteously, reaching out his hands:
 "Hector, for my sake, do not wait for this man on your own, without allies, lest you straightway meet your fate, broken by Peleion; since he is so much stronger, 40 he is pitiless; would that he were as dear to the gods as he is to me—in short order would the dogs and vultures devour him as he lay dead; and bitter pain would leave my heart.
 This is the man who has bereaved me of many sons, brave sons, killing them, or selling them to far-off islands. 45
 Even now there are two, Lykaon and Polydorus, whom I cannot see in the city of the cowering Trojans, sons whom Altes' daughter Laothoë<sup>3</sup> bore me, a queen among women.
 If they are alive somewhere among the army, then I will ransom them for bronze or gold; all this is inside— 50 old, illustrious Altes endowed his daughter richly.<sup>4</sup>
 But if they have already died and are in the house of Hades, this is anguish to my heart and to their mother, we who bore them; but to the rest of the people, it will be anguish shorter lived than if you also should die, broken by Achilles. 55 Come inside the walls, my child, that you may save the Trojan men and Trojan women, do not make a gift of glory to the son of Peleus, who will rob you of your very life.
 And on me—wretched, still feeling—have pity, born to ill fate, whom on the threshold of old age father Zeus, son of Cronus, 60
 will blight with my hard fate, when I have seen the destruction of my sons, the abduction of my daughters, my chambers ravaged, and innocent children hurled to the ground in the terror of battle; my daughters-in-law abducted by the wicked hands of Achaean men, 65 and I myself, last of all, at my very gates, my dogs will rip raw, when some man with sharp bronze, stabbing or casting, will strip the spirit from my limbs—
 the dogs I raised in my halls and fed at my table as guardians of my gates, these, maddened by the drinking of my blood, 70 will sprawl in my doorway. All is seemly for the young man slain in war, torn by sharp bronze, laid out dead; everything is honorable to him in death, whatever shows.

But when the dogs defile the white head and white beard and the private parts of a dead old man—this is most pitiable for wretched mortals.”

75

So the old man spoke, and pulled his white hair with his hands, tearing it from his head. But he did not persuade the heart of Hector.

Now in turn his mother wailed, raining tears, and loosening her robe, with a hand she exposed her breast and raining tears addressed him with winged words: “Hector, my child, be moved by this and have pity on me, if ever I used to give you my breast to soothe you—remember those times, dear child, defend yourself against this deadly man from inside the walls; don’t stand as champion against him, my stubborn one. If he cuts you down, I will surely never mourn you on your deathbed, dear budding branch, whom I bore, nor will your worthy wife. But a long way from us by the ships of the Achaeans the running dogs will eat you.”

80

85

Thus both of them weeping addressed their dear son, repeatedly beseeching. But they did not persuade the heart of Hector, and he awaited Achilles, who was looming huge as he drew near.
As a snake by its hole in the mountains waits for a man, having eaten evil poisons, and a deadly anger comes upon it, and it shoots a stinging glance, coiled by its hole, so Hector keeping his spirit unquelled did not retreat, but having leaned his shining shield against the jutting tower, in agitation he spoke to his great-hearted spirit:

90

“Oh me, if I enter the gates and walls Poulydamas will be the first to reproach me, who bade me lead the Trojans to the city that baneful night when Achilles the godlike rose, but I was not persuaded. It would have been far better if I had.
Now since I have destroyed my people by my recklessness, I dread the Trojan men and the Trojan women with their trailing robes, lest some other man more worthless than me say:

100

105

‘Hector, trusting in his strength, destroyed his people’— thus they will speak. It would be far better, then, for me to confront Achilles, either to kill him and return home, or to die with honor at his hands, before my city.

110

But what if I put aside my studded shield and my strong helmet, leaned my spear against the walls, and going out alone approached noble Achilles, and pledged to him Helen and the possessions with her?
All those things—as much as Alexandros carried away to Troy in his hollow ships, which was the beginning of our quarrel—to give to the sons of Atreus to lead away; and in addition to divide everything else with the Achaeans, whatever this city holds, and after that to make a formal oath with the Trojan council not to hide anything, but to divide it all, equally<sup>5</sup>—

115

but why does my heart debate these things? 122
 I could set forth to meet him and he not pity me, nor even respect me, but kill me naked as I was,
 as if I were a woman, since I would have put off my armor. 125
 It is not now possible from rock or oak, in the country way, to chatter to him those things that a girl and youth chatter to each other, a girl and youth—no, it is better to engage with him straightway;
 we shall see to whom the Olympians give glory.” 130

Thus his thoughts churned as he waited, and Achilles drew near, equal to the war god, the helmet-shaking warrior, brandishing his Pelian ash-wood spear above his right shoulder, terrifying. The bronze glinted around him like the flare of blazing fire or the sun rising. 135
 And as he watched him, trembling took hold of Hector; and he could no longer endure

there to stand his ground, but left the gates behind and, terrified, he ran.
 The son of Peleus charged for him, trusting in the swiftness of his feet;
 as a mountain hawk, lightest of all things on wings, easily swoops after a terror-stricken dove, 140 which, away from under, flees, but crying sharply near he swoops continuously and his spirit drives him to take her; so Achilles flew straight for him, ravenous, and Hector fled under the walls of Troy, working his swift knees.

By the watch place and the wild fig tree twisted by wind, 145 always away from the walls, along the wagon path they ran and reached the two fair-flowing streams, where the two springs gush forth from the whirling waters of Scamander.<sup>6</sup> One flows with warm water, enveloping steam rises from it as if from a burning fire. 150

The other even in summer runs as cold as hail, or snow water, or ice that forms from water.
 Near to these there are the broad washing hollows of fine stone, where their lustrous clothes the Trojan wives and their beautiful daughters washed, 155 in those days before, in peacetime, before there came the sons of the Achaeans.

By this place they ran, one fleeing, the other behind pursuing;
 outstanding was he who fled ahead—but far better he who pursued him swiftly; since it was not for a sacral animal, nor for an oxhide they contended, prizes in the races of men— 160 but they ran for the life of Hector breaker of horses.

As when prizewinning single-hoofed horses tear around the turning post—a great prize awaits, a tripod, or woman, in those games held when a man has died—so three times around the city of Priam they whirled 165 in the swiftness of their feet, and all the gods looked on.
 To them the father of men and gods spoke the first word:
 “Alas; it is a dear man whom my eyes see

6. One of the two rivers in the plain of Troy.

pursued around the wall; my heart grieves for Hector, who has burned many thigh cuts of sacrificial oxen to me, 170 both on the summit of Ida of the many glens, and at other times on the heights of his citadel. But now godlike Achilles pursues him in the swiftness of his feet around the city of Priam.
 But come, you gods, consider and take counsel whether we shall save him from death, or 175 noble though he is, break him at the hands of Achilles son of Peleus."

Then the gleaming-eyed goddess Athena answered him:
 "O father of the bright thunderbolt and black clouds, what have you said?
 This man who is mortal, consigned long ago to fate—you want to take him back and free him from the harsh sorrow of death? 180
 Do so; but not all the other gods will approve."
 In answer, Zeus who gathers the clouds addressed her:
 "Take heart, Tritogeneia,<sup>7</sup> dear child. I did not now speak in earnest, and I mean to be kind to you.
 Act in whatever way your mind inclines, nor hold back any longer." 185
 So speaking, he urged Athena, who had been eager even before;
 and she went, slipping down from the peaks of Olympus.

Relentlessly, swift Achilles kept driving Hector panicked before him, as when a dog in the mountains pursues a deer's fawn that he has started from its bed through glens and dells; 190 and though, cowering in fright, it eludes him beneath a thicket, the dog runs on, tracking it steadily, until he finds it—so Hector could not elude Achilles of the swift feet.
 Each time he made to dash toward the Dardanian gates, under the well-built tower, 195 in the hope that men from above might defend him with thrown missiles, each time did Achilles, outstripping him, turn him back toward the plain, and he himself sped ever by the city.
 As in a dream a man is not able to pursue one who eludes him, nor is the other able to escape, nor he to pursue, 200 so Achilles for all the swiftness of his feet was not able to lay hold of Hector, nor Hector to escape.

 How then could Hector have eluded his fated death had not Apollo for that last and final time joined closely with him to rouse his spirit and make swift his knees?
 And shining Achilles was shaking his head at his men, 205 nor allowed them to let their sharp spears fly at Hector, lest whoever making the throw claim glory, and himself come second.

But when for the fourth time they came to the springs, then Zeus the father leveled his golden scales, and placed in them two portions of death that brings enduring grief, 210 that of Achilles and that of Hector breaker of horses;
 he lifted them, holding by the middle; and the measured day of Hector sank, headed to Hades, and Phoebus Apollo abandoned him.

Then the gleaming-eyed goddess Athena came up to the son of Peleus
 and standing near addressed him with winged words: 215

7. Another name for Athena.

“Now I hope, illustrious Achilles, beloved of Zeus, to carry honor for us two back to the Achaean ships, after breaking Hector, insatiable though he be for battle;
he can no longer get clear of us, not if Apollo the Far-Shooter should suffer countless trials for his sake,

220

groveling before Father Zeus who wields the aegis.
But you now stop and catch your breath, while I make my way to Hector and convince him to fight man-to-man.”
Thus spoke Athena, and Achilles obeyed and rejoiced in his heart, and stood leaning on his bronze-flanged ash-wood spear.

225

She left him and came up to shining Hector in the likeness of Deïphobos,<sup>8</sup> in form and steady voice.
Standing close, she spoke winged words:

“My brother, swift Achilles presses you hard, pursuing you around the city of Priam in the swiftness of his feet.
Come; let us take our stand and standing firm defend ourselves.”

230

Then great Hector of the shimmering helm addressed her in turn: “Deïphobos, even before you were far dearest to me of my brothers, those sons whom Hecuba and Priam bore.
Now I am minded to honor you even more in my heart—you who dared for my sake, when you saw me with your eyes, to quit the walls where the others remain inside.”

235

Then the gleaming-eyed goddess Athena spoke to him:
“My brother, our father and lady mother implored me greatly, entreating in turn, and the companions about them, to remain there—for so great is the dread of all;
but my inner spirit was harrowed with impotent grief.
But now let us two press straight forward and go to battle, and let there be no restraint of our spears, so that we shall see if Achilles, killing us both, will bear our bloodied arms to his hollow ships, or if he will be broken by your spear.” Thus spoke Athena and with cunning led him on.

240

245

And when they had advanced almost upon each other great Hector of the shimmering helm spoke first:
“No longer, son of Peleus, shall I flee from you, as before I fled three times around the great city of Priam, nor could then endure to withstand your charge. But now my spirit stirs me to hold firm before you. I will kill you, or be killed.
But come, let us take an oath upon our gods, for they will be the best witnesses and protectors of agreements.
I will not, outrageous though you are, dishonor you if Zeus grants me to endure, and I take your life.

255

But when I have stripped you of your splendid armor, Achilles,
I will give your body back to the Achaeans; and do you the same.”

Then looking at him from beneath his brows, Achilles of the swift feet spoke:
“Hector, doer of unforgettable deeds—do not to me propose agreements.
As there are no pacts of faith between lions and men, 260

8. Hector's brother.

nor do wolves and lambs have spirit in kind,
 but they plot evil unremittingly for one another, so it is not possible that you and I be friends, nor for us two 265 will there be oaths; before that time one of us falling will sate with his blood the shield-bearing warrior god.
 Recollect your every skill. Now the need is very great to be a spearman and brave warrior.

There will be no further escape for you, but soon Pallas Athena 270 will break you by my spear. Now you will pay in one sum for all the sorrows of my companions, those whom you killed, raging with your spear."

He spoke, and balancing his long-shadowed spear, he let it fly.
 But, holding it in his sight as it came at him, shining Hector avoided it, for as he watched, he crouched, and the bronze spear flew over 275 and stuck in the earth; but Pallas Athena snatched it up and gave it back to Achilles, escaping the notice of Hector, shepherd of the people.

And Hector addressed the noble son of Peleus:
 "You missed! It was not, then, godlike Achilles, from Zeus you knew my fate—you only thought you did; 280 and you turn out to a glib talker, cunning with words—fearing you, you thought I would forget my strength and valor—but you will not fix your spear in my back as I flee, but drive it through my breast as I come at you, if a god grants this. Now in your turn dodge my spear, 285 bronze-pointed; would that you carried the whole of it in your flesh.
 Then would this war be the lighter to bear for the Trojans, with you dead. For you are their greatest evil."

He spoke, and balancing his long-shadowing spear, he let it fly, and hurled at the middle of the son of Peleus' shield, nor did he miss; 290 but the spear glanced off the shield, for a long way. And Hector was angry that his swift cast flew from his hand in vain, and he stood dejected, nor did he have any other ash-shafted spear.
 Raising his great voice he called Deïphobos of the pale shield and asked for his long spear—but Deïphobos was not near him. 295

And Hector understood within his heart and spoke aloud:
 "This is it. The gods summon me deathward.
 I thought the warrior Deïphobos was by me, but he is inside the walls and Athena has tricked me.
 Hateful death is very near me; it is no longer far away, 300 nor is there escape. And for some long time this has been pleasing to Zeus and to Zeus' son who shoots from afar, who before this protected me willingly enough. Yet now destiny has caught me.
 Let me not die without a struggle and ingloriously, but while doing some great thing for even men to come to hear of." 305

So speaking he drew his sharp sword that hung down by his side, huge and strong-made,
 and collecting himself he swooped like a high-flying eagle, an eagle that plunges through lowering clouds toward the plain to snatch a soft lamb or a cowering hare; 310 so Hector swooped brandishing his sharp sword.

But Achilles charged, his spirit filled with savage passion. Before his breast he held his covering shield, beautiful and intricately wrought, and nodded with his shining four-ridged helmet; splendid horsehair flowed about it 315 of gold, which Hephaestus had set thickly around the helmet crest.
 As a star moves among other stars in the milky murk of night, Hesperus the Evening Star, the most beautiful star to stand in heaven, so the light shone from the well-pointed spearhead that Achilles was shaking in his right hand, bent upon evil for Hector, 320 surveying his handsome flesh, where it might best give way.
 The rest of his body was held by brazen armor, the splendid armor he stripped after slaying strong Patroclus—but at that point where the collarbone holds the neck from the shoulders there showed his gullet, where death of the soul comes swiftest; 325 and at this point shining Achilles drove with his spear as Hector strove against him,
 and the spearhead went utterly through the soft neck.
 Heavy with bronze though it was, the ash-spear did not sever the windpipe, so that he could speak, making an exchange of words.
 He fell in the dust. And shining Achilles vaunted: 330 “Hector, you surely thought when you stripped Patroclus that you were safe, and you thought nothing of me as I was absent—pitiable fool. For standing by, his far greater avenger, I remained behind by the hollow ships—
 I who have broken the strength of your knees. You the dogs and birds 335 will rip apart shamefully; Patroclus the Achaeans will honor with funeral rites.”

Then with little strength Hector of the shimmering helm addressed him:
 “By your soul, by your knees, by your parents, do not let the dogs devour me by the ships of the Achaeans, but take the bronze and abundance of gold, 340
 the gifts my father and lady mother will give you; give my body back to go home, so that the Trojans and the Trojan wives will give my dead body its portion of the fire.”

Then looking at him from under his brows Achilles of the swift feet answered:
 “Do not, you dog, supplicate me by knees or parents. 345
 Would that my passion and spirit would drive me to devour your hacked-off flesh raw, such things you have done; so there is no one who can keep the dogs from your head, not if they haul here and weigh out ten times and twenty times the ransom, and promise more, 350 not if Dardanian Priam seeks to pay your weight in gold, not in any way will your lady mother mourn you laid out upon your bier, the child she bore; but the dogs and the birds will devour you wholly.”

Then, dying, Hector of the shimmering helm addressed him: 355 “Knowing you well, I divine my fate; nor will I persuade you.

Surely, the soul in your breast is iron.

Yet now take care, lest I become the cause of the god's wrath against you, on that day when Paris and Phoebus Apollo destroy you, great warrior though you be, at the Scaean gates."

360

Then the closure of death enveloped him as he was speaking, and his soul flying from his limbs started for Hades, lamenting her fate, abandoning manhood and all its young vigor.

But shining Achilles addressed him, dead though he was:

"Lie dead. I will take death at that time when Zeus and the other deathless gods wish to accomplish it."

365

He spoke and pulled his bronze spear from the dead body and laying it aside he stripped the bloodied armor from Hector's shoulders.

But the other sons of the Achaeans ran up around him and admired Hector's physique and beauty, nor was there a man who stood by him without inflicting a wound.

And thus each would speak, looking at his neighbor:

"Well, well; he is softer to handle, to be sure, this Hector, than when he torched our ships with blazing fire."

Thus they would speak, and stabbed him as they stood by.

375

But when shining Achilles of the swift feet had stripped Hector of his armor, he stood amid the Achaeans and pronounced winged words:

"O friends, leaders and counselors of the Achaeans;

since the gods gave me this man to be broken, who committed evil deeds, more than all the other Trojans together, come, let us go under arms and scout around the city so that we may learn the disposition of the Trojans, what they have in mind, whether they will abandon their high city now this man is dead, or desire to remain, although Hector is no longer with them—but why does my spirit recite these things?

380

385

There lies by the ships a dead man, unmourned, unburied—Patroclus. I shall not forget him as long as I am among the living and my own knees have power in them.

And if other men forget the dead in Hades,

I will remember my beloved companion even there.

390

But come now, Achaean men, singing a victory song let us return to our hollow ships, and bring him along.

We have achieved great glory; we have slain shining Hector, whom the Trojans worshipped throughout their city as a god."

He spoke, and conceived a shocking deed for shining Hector; behind both feet he pierced the tendon between the heel and ankle and fastened there oxhide straps, and bound him to his chariot and let the head drag along.

Lifting his glorious armor, Achilles mounted his chariot, and whipped the horses to begin, and they two, not unwilling, took off.

400

A cloud of dust rose as Hector was dragged, his blue-black hair fanning around him, his head lolling wholly in the dust that before was handsome; so Zeus gave him to his enemies to be defiled in the land of his own fathers.

His head was wholly befouled by dust; and now his mother 405 ripped her hair and flung her shining veil far away, shrieking her grief aloud as she looked on her child.

 His beloved father cried out pitifully and around them the people were gripped by wailing and crying throughout the city—it was as if the whole of 410 lofty Ilion, from its topmost point, were consumed with fire.
 With difficulty the people restrained old Priam in his grief as he strove to go forth from the Dardanian gates.
 Thrashing in the muck, he entreated all, calling off each man by name: 415 “Hold off, friend, for all your care for me, and let me leave the city to go to the ships of the Achaeans.
 I will entreat this reckless man of violent deeds, if somehow he may respect my age and pity my years. Even his father is of such years, 420 Peleus, who bore him and raised him to be the destruction of the Trojans; and beyond all men he has inflicted hardship on me.
 For so many of my flourishing sons he killed, but for all my grief, I did not mourn as much for all of them as for this one, bitter grief for whom will carry me down to the house of Hades— 425
 Hector. Would that he died in my arms.
 We would have glugged ourselves with crying and weeping, his mother, she, ill-fated woman who bore him, and I.”
 Thus he spoke lamenting; and thereupon the people mourned.
 And Hecuba led the Trojan women in passionate lament: 430 “My child, I am nothing. Why should I live now, grievously suffering, when you are dead? You who were night and day my triumph through the city, a blessing to all, to the Trojans and the Trojan women throughout the city, who received you like a god; for to them you were, indeed, their glory, 435 while you lived; and now death and fate have overtaken you.”
 Thus she spoke, crying. But Hector’s wife knew nothing.
 For no trusty messenger had come to her announcing that her husband remained outside the walls, and she was weaving at her loom in the corner of her high-roofed house 440 a crimson cloak of double-thickness, and working intricate figures in it.
 She called through the house to her attendants with the lovely hair to set a great tripod over the fire, so there would be a warm bath for Hector, when he returned home from battle—
 poor wretch, she did not know that far from all baths 445 gleaming-eyed Athena had broken him at the hands of Achilles.
 Then she heard the keening and groaning from the tower and her limbs shook, and the shuttle fell to the ground, and she called back to her maids with the beautiful hair:
 “Come, both of you follow me; I will see what trouble has happened. 450
 I hear the voice of Hector’s worthy mother, the heart in my own breast leaps to my mouth, my limbs beneath me are rigid; something evil is come near the sons of Priam.
 May this word not come to my hearing; but terribly

I fear that shining Achilles has cut my bold Hector from the city on his own, and driving him toward the plain has stopped him of that fateful ardor that possessed him, since he never remained in the ranks of men, but rushed far to the front, yielding in his courage to no one.” 455

So speaking she raced through the hall like a madwoman, her heart shaking; and her two maids ran with her. 460

But when she reached the tower and the crowd of men, she stood on the wall, staring around her; and saw him dragged before the city. Swift horses dragged him, unconcernedly, to the hollow ships of the Achaeans. 465

Dark night descended over her eyes, she fell backward and breathed out her soul;
 far from her head she flung her shining headdress,
 the diadem and cap and the braided binding, and the veil, which golden Aphrodite gave her 470 on that day when Hector of the shimmering helm led her out of the house of Eëtion, when he gave countless gifts for her dowry.
 In a throng around her stood her husband's sisters and his brothers' wives, who supported her among themselves, as she was stricken to the point of death.

But when then she regained her breath and the strength in her breast was collected, 475 with gulping sobs she spoke with the Trojan women:

“Hector, I am unlucky. For we were both born to one fate, you in Troy, in the house of Priam, and I in Thebes, under forested Plakos, in the house of Eëtion, who reared me when I was still young, 480 ill-fated he, I of bitter fate. I wish that he had not begotten me.

Now you go to the house of Hades in the depths of the earth, leaving me in shuddering grief, a widow in your house. The child is still only a baby, whom we bore, you and I, both ill-fated. You will 485 be, Hector, no help to him, now you have died, nor he to you.
 For even if he escapes this war of the Achaeans and all its tears, there will always be for him pain and care hereafter.

Other men will rob him of his land;
 the day of orphaning cuts a child off entirely from those his age;
 he is bent low in all things, his cheeks are tearstained. 490

In his neediness, the child approaches his father's companions, he tugs one by the cloak, another by his tunic;
 pitying him, one of them offers him a little cup and he moistens his lips, but he does not moisten his palate. 495

But a child blessed with both parents will beat him away from the feast, striking him with his hands, reviling him with abuse:

‘Get away—your father does not dine with us’— and crying the boy comes up to his widowed mother—Astyanax; who before on his father's knees 500 used to eat only marrow and the rich fat of sheep, then when sleep took him and he left off his childish play, he would slumber in bed in his nurse's embrace,

in his soft bedding, his heart filled with cheery thoughts.
 Now he will suffer many things, missing his dear father— 505 ‘Astyanax’—‘little lord of the city’—whom the Trojans called by this name, for you alone, Hector, defended their gates and long walls.
 Now beside the curved ships, away from your parents, the writhing worms devour you when the dogs have had enough of your naked body; yet there are clothes laid aside in the house, 510 finely woven, beautiful, fashioned by the hands of women.
 Now I will burn them all in a blazing fire, for they are no use to you, you are not wrapped in them—
 I will burn them to be an honor to you in the sight of the Trojan men and Trojan women.”
 So she spoke, crying, and the women in response mourned. 515

Summary Achilles buries Patroclus, and the Greeks celebrate the dead hero’s fame with athletic games, for which Achilles gives the prizes.

BOOK XXIV

[Achilles and Priam]

The games were dispersed, and the men scattered to go each to his own swift ship. And they began to think about their meal and giving themselves over to the pleasure of sweet sleep; but Achilles wept still, remembering his beloved companion, nor did sleep, who masters all, take hold of him, but he turned himself this side and that 5 yearning for the manly strength and noble spirit of Patroclus, and remembered with yearning all he been through with him and all the woes he had suffered,
 running through dangerous waves and the conflicts of men.
 Recalling these things he let the warm tears fall, as he lay now on his side, now again 10 on his back, and now face down; then starting up he would wander in distraction along the salt-sea shore. He came to know the dawn as she appeared over the sea and shore;
 and when he had yoked his swift horses to his chariot, he would tie Hector behind the chariot so as to drag him; 15 and after dragging him three times around the tomb of Menoetius’ dead son he would rest again in his shelter, and leave Hector stretched in the dust upon his face. But Apollo ward off from Hector’s flesh all disfigurement, pitying the mortal man, dead though he was, and covered him wholly round 20 with his golden aegis, so that Achilles would not tear the skin away as he dragged him.

So in his rage Achilles kept outraging glorious Hector;
 and as they watched, the blessed gods took pity on the son of Priam, and kept urging sharp-sighted Hermes, Slayer of Argos, to steal him away.
 And this found favor with all other gods, but not with Hera, 25 nor with Poseidon, nor with the gleaming-eyed maiden Athena, for their hatred persisted, as at the start, for sacred Ilion, and the people of Priam, because of the folly of Alexandros who insulted the goddesses, when they came to his shepherd's steading, and gave the nod to her, the goddess whose gift to him was ruinous lust.<sup>9</sup> 30

But when at length the twelfth dawn rose since Hector's death, then it was that Phoebus Apollo addressed the immortals:

"You gods are relentless, destroyers of men! Did Hector never burn as offerings to you the thighbones of oxen and of goats without blemish?

And now, dead though he is, you cannot bring yourselves to rescue him, for his wife to look on, for his mother, for his child, and for his father and his people, who would with all speed burn him upon a pyre and honor him with funeral rites;

but you gods choose to abet murderous Achilles, in whose breast the heart knows no justice, 40 nor does his purpose bend, but his skill is in savage things, like a lion, who giving way to his great strength and bold heart goes for the flocks of men, to snatch his feast.

So Achilles has destroyed pity, nor has he shame, which does great harm to men but also profits them. 45

A man surely is likely to lose someone even dearer—

a brother born of the same womb, or his own son—

but having wept and mourned, he lets it go;

for the Fates placed an enduring heart within mankind;

but Achilles, after he has stripped brilliant Hector of his life, 50 fastens him to his chariot and drags him round the tomb of his companion.

This is neither good for Achilles, nor is it worthy;
let him beware lest, noble though he be, we gods be angered with him.
For in his rage he outrages the senseless earth."

Then in anger white-armed Hera addressed him: 55

"This speech of yours, you of the silver bow, might be justified
if you gods hold Achilles and Hector in the same honor.

But Hector is mortal and sucked at the breast of a woman, while Achilles is born of a goddess, one whom I myself nurtured and reared and gave as wife to her husband, 60 to Peleus, who was exceedingly dear to the immortals' hearts; and all you gods took part in the wedding. And you among them partook of the feast, lyre in hand, you companion of evil, faithless forever."

Then answering her spoke Zeus who gathers the clouds:

"Hera, do not be angered with the gods. 65

The men will not have the same honor; yet Hector too was dearest to the gods of all mortal men in Ilion.

For so he was to me, since he never failed to offer pleasing gifts;

my altar was never lacking its fair share of sacrifice, of libation and the savour of burnt offering; for this honor is our due. 70

But as for stealing bold Hector away, let that go, it is in no way possible without Achilles' notice, for always his mother is at his side night and day alike;

but perhaps one of the gods would summon Thetis to my presence, so that I could speak a close word to her, so that Achilles would 75 accept gifts from Priam and release Hector for ransom.”

So he spoke; and storm-footed Iris sprang up to take his message.

Between Samothrace and rugged Imbros<sup>1</sup>

she leapt into the dark sea; and the sea groaned about her;

she sped to the depths of the sea like a leaden weight, which mounted upon a piece of field-ox horn goes bearing death to the fish who eat its carrion bait.

She found Thetis in a hollow cave; and gathered round her were the other goddesses of the sea, and she in the middle was weeping for the fate of her blameless son, who was destined to perish in the rich soil of Troy, far from his fatherland.

Standing close, swift-footed Iris addressed her:

“Rise up, Thetis; Zeus whose counsels are unfailing, summons you.”

Then the goddess Thetis of the silver feet answered her:

“What does he, the great god, command of me? I dread mingling with the immortals; for I have sorrows without end within my heart.

Yet I will go, his word will not be in vain, whatever he might say.”

So speaking the shining among goddesses took her blue-black veil; and than this there is no darker garment;

and she set out, and swift Iris with feet like the wind led the way before her; and on either side the waves of the sea parted for them.

Going up onto the shore, they darted to heaven;

and they found the far-thundering son of Cronus, and gathered round him were sitting all the other blessed gods who live forever.

Then beside Zeus the father Thetis took her seat, which Athena yielded to her.

Hera placed a beautiful cup of gold into her hands and spoke kindly words; and Thetis gave it back after drinking.

Then to them the father of gods and men began his speech:

“You have come to Olympus, divine Thetis, despite your cares, bearing grief that cannot be forgotten in your heart; I know this.

But even so I will tell you the reason for which I have called you here.

For nine days a quarrel has arisen among the immortals concerning Hector’s body and Achilles, sacker of cities.

They urge sharp-sighted Hermes, Slayer of Argos, to steal the body away.

I however grant this honor to Achilles, safeguarding your respect and loving friendship for time after:

go quickly to the army and lay a charge upon your son;

tell him the gods are angry,<sup>2</sup> and that I beyond all immortals am provoked to rage, because in his madman’s heart he holds Hector beside his curved ships, nor has surrendered him—and that perhaps in fear of me he would give Hector back.

And I will dispatch Iris to great-hearted Priam, to tell him to obtain the release of his dear son by going to the ships of the Achaeans, and to bear gifts for Achilles, which would soften his heart.”

So he spoke; nor did the goddess Thetis of the silver feet disobey,

and she left, darting down from the heights of Olympus, and made her way to her son's shelter; inside she found him groaning without cessation; around him his close companions busily attended to him and readied the morning meal;
 a great fleecy sheep had been slain by them in the shelter. 125
 His lady mother sat down close beside him, and stroked his hand, and spoke to him and said his name:
 "My child, how long will you devour your heart in weeping and grieving, mindful neither of food nor bed? Indeed, it is good to lie with a woman 130 in lovemaking; you will not be living long with me, but already death stands close beside you and powerful destiny.
 Now, mark me at once; I bring a message for you from Zeus;
 he says the gods are angry with you, and that he beyond all immortals is provoked to rage, because in your madman's heart 135 you hold Hector beside your curved ships nor have surrendered him.
 But come, give him up, and accept ransom for his body."

Then answering her spoke swift-footed Achilles:
 "Let the man appear who would bring the ransom and bear the body, if the Olympian himself in earnest bids." 140

So they, amid the gathering of ships, mother and son, were speaking many things, winged words, to one another;
 and the son of Cronus dispatched Iris into holy Ilion:
 "Come, swift Iris, leave this Olympian seat and bear a message to great-hearted Priam inside Ilion, 145 that he ransom his beloved son, going to the ships of the Achaeans, and that he bear gifts for Achilles, which would soften his heart, he alone, and let no other man of Troy go with him.
 A herald may accompany him, some older man, who can drive the mules and the strong-wheeled wagon, to bring back 150
 to the city the dead man, whom godlike Achilles killed.
 And let no thought of death trouble his heart, nor any fear;
 for we will have Hermes, Slayer of Argos, accompany him as escort, who will lead him, conducting him until he comes to Achilles.
 And when he has led him inside Achilles' shelter, 155 Achilles himself will not kill him and he will restrain all others;
 for he is not witless, nor thoughtless, nor without morals, but with great kindness he will have mercy on the suppliant."

So he spoke; and storm-footed Iris sprang up to take his message.
 And she came to the house of Priam, and there was met with crying and lamentation; 160
 the sons sitting about their father inside the courtyard stained their garments with their tears, and among them the old man was wrapped in his mantle, molded to it; much dung was round about the neck and head of the old man, which wallowing in he had scraped up with his own hands. 165
 All through his house his daughters and the wives of his sons wailed in grief,

remembering those men who in such numbers and nobility lay dead, having lost their lives at Argive hands.
 And Iris, messenger of Zeus, stood by Priam and addressed him, speaking softly; and trembling seized his limbs: 170 “Have courage in your heart, Priam son of Dardanos, nor fear at all.

 For I do not come to you here bearing evil, but with good intentions; for I am a messenger to you from Zeus, who though far away takes great thought for and pities you.
 The Olympian bids you redeem brilliant Hector by ransom, 175 and bring gifts to Achilles, which would soften his heart, you alone, and let no other man of Troy go with you.
 A herald may accompany you, some older man, who can drive the mules and the strong-wheeled wagon, to bring back to the city the dead man, whom godlike Achilles killed. 180
 And do not let any thought of death trouble your heart, nor any fear; for Hermes, Slayer of Argos, will follow with you as escort, and will lead you, conducting you until he comes to Achilles.
 But when he has led you inside Achilles’ shelter, Achilles himself will not kill you and will restrain all others; 185
 for he is not witless, nor thoughtless, nor without morals, but with great kindness he will have mercy on a suppliant.”

Then so speaking, Iris of the swift feet departed; and Priam ordered his sons to prepare the strong-wheeled mule-drawn wagon
 and to fasten upon it a wicker carrier. 190 And he went down into his storeroom, high-roofed and fragrant with cedar, which held his many precious things.
 And he called to his wife Hecuba and spoke to her:
 “My poor wife, from Zeus an Olympian messenger came to me, and bids me ransom our beloved son, going to the ships of the Achaeans, 195 to bring gifts to Achilles, which would soften his heart.
 Come and tell me this—how to your mind does this seem to be?
 For terribly does my spirit urge me, and my heart, to go there to the ships, inside the broad army of the Achaeans.”

So he spoke; and his wife cried out and answered him in a word: 200 “Alas for me, where have your wits departed, for which you were famed before, among even those from other lands, as well as those you ruled?
 How can you wish to go to the Achaean ships alone, into the sight of a man who killed your many and your noble sons? Your heart is iron. 205

For if he sets eyes upon you, and seizes you, ravening and faithless man as he is, he will not have pity on you, nor will he in any way respect your standing. No, let us weep now as we sit far from Hector in our halls; thus it seems powerful Destiny spun her fated thread<sup>3</sup> for him at his very birth, when I myself brought him to life, 210
 to glut swift-footed dogs far from his parents beside a violent man, whose liver I wish I could take hold of, burying my teeth into its middle to eat; then would there be revenge for my son, since he was not killed as he played the coward, but as he took his stand in defense of the Trojans and the deep-breasted 215

3. Fate or the Fates were often pictured as spinning the thread of a person's life.

Trojan women, taking thought of neither flight nor shelter.”

And old Priam, godlike, spoke to her again:

“Do not delay me in my wish to go, nor yourself, in my own halls, be a bird of ill omen; you will not persuade me.
For if any other person on earth had commanded me, 220
the smoke-watching seers, or priests, we would have said it was a lie and we would turn our backs on it;
but as it is, since I myself heard the god and looked her in the face,
I am going, and her word will not be in vain. And if it is my fate to die beside the ships of the bronze-clad Achaeans, 225 then so I wish it; let Achilles slay me at once after I have clasped in my arms my son, when I have put away all desire for weeping.”

He spoke, and opened up the fine covers of his chests.

There he drew out twelve splendid robes, and twelve single-folded woolen cloaks, and as many blankets, 230 as many mantles of white linen, and as many tunics too, and he weighed and brought out ten full talents of gold, and brought out two gleaming tripods, and four cauldrons, and he brought out a splendid cup, which Thracian men gave to him when he went to them on a mission, a magnificent possession; not 235 even this did the old man withhold, as he desired with all his heart to ransom back his beloved son. And the Trojans, all, he kept away from his covered halls, reviling them with shaming words:
“Be gone, outrages, disgraces; is there no weeping in your own homes, that you have come to trouble me? 240 Or do you think it too little, that Zeus the son of Cronus has given me suffering, destroying my best of sons? But you will come to know what this means too;

for you will be all the easier for the Achaeans to kill now my son has died. But before I behold with my own eyes my city sacked and ravaged, 245 may I enter in the house of Hades.”

He spoke, and drove the men off with his staff; and they went out before the old man’s urgency. And to his own sons he shouted rebuke, railing at Helenos and Paris and brilliant Agathon and Pammon and Antiphonos and Polites of the war cry 250 and Deïphobos and Hippothoös, too, and noble Dios.

To these nine, the old man, shouting his threats, gave orders:
“Make haste, worthless children, my disgraces. I would the pack of you together had been slain by the swift ship instead of Hector.
Woe is me, fated utterly, since I sired the best sons 255
in broad Troy, but I say not one of them is left, Mestor the godlike and Troilos the chariot fighter and Hector, who was a god among men, nor did he seem to be the son of mortal man, but of a god.

War destroyed these men, and all these things of shame are left, 260 the liars and dancers, and heroes of the dance floor, snatchers of lambs and kids in their own land.
Will you all not prepare a wagon for me at once, and place all these things in it, so that we can go upon our way?"

So he spoke; and they trembling before the old man's threats 265 lifted out the strong-wheeled wagon for the mule, a beautiful thing, newly made, and fastened the wicker carrier on it, and took down from its peg the mule yoke made of boxwood and with a knob upon it, well-fitted with rings to guide the reins;

and they brought out the yoke strap of nine cubits length together with the yoke. 270

Then they fitted the yoke skillfully onto the well-polished wagon pole, at the front end, and cast the ring over its peg, and they bound the thong three times on each side to the knob, and then secured it with a series of turns, and tucked the end under.

And carrying it from the storeroom they piled onto the polished wagon 275
the vast ransom for the head of Hector.

They yoked the mules, strong-footed, working in harness, which in time before the Mysians<sup>4</sup> gave as glorious gifts to Priam.
And for Priam they led under the yoke the horses that the old man, keeping them for himself, tended at their well-polished manger. 280

So the herald and Priam were having the animals yoked in the high-roofed house, a flurry of thoughts in their minds.

And Hecuba with stricken heart drew near them, carrying in her right hand in a cup of gold wine that is sweet to the mind, so that they might set out after making libation. 285

She stood before the horses, and spoke to Priam and said his name:
"Here, pour an offering to Zeus the father, and pray that you come home, back from the enemy men, since your heart drives you to the ships, although I do not wish it.

Come, pray then to the son of Cronus of the black cloud 290 on Ida, who looks down upon the whole of Troy, and ask for a bird of omen, the swift messenger that for him is most prized of birds and whose strength is greatest,

to fly to the right, so that you yourself, marking it with your eyes, may go trusting in it to the ships of the Danaans of swift horses. 295
But if far-thundering Zeus does not send you his messenger,

I would surely not then urge or bid you, go to the Argive ships, for all you are determined."

Then answering her spoke godlike Priam: 300
"O my woman, I will not disobey what you demand; for it is good to raise one's hands to Zeus, that he might have mercy."

He spoke, and the old man called on the handmaid attendant to pour clean water on their hands; and the maid came up beside him holding in her hands both a water bowl and pouring jug.

And after washing his hands, Priam took the cup from his wife. 305
Then standing in the middle of his court he prayed, and poured a wine libation

as he looked toward the heavens, and lifting his voice he spoke:
"Father Zeus, ruling from Mount Ida, most glorious and greatest,

4. A people of central Asia Minor.

grant that I come as one welcomed to the shelter of Achilles and that he pity me.

And send a bird, your swift messenger, which for you yourself is most prized of birds and whose strength is greatest, 310
to fly to the right, so that I myself, marking it with my eyes, may go trusting in it to the ships of the Danaans of swift horses.”

So he spoke in prayer, and Zeus all-devising heard him, and he sent at once an eagle, the surest omen of winged birds, 315
the dusky hunter men call the darkly-spangled one.

As wide as the door of a lofty room is made in the house of a wealthy man, strong-fitted with bolts, so wide were its wings on either side; and it appeared to them on the right as it swept through the city. And seeing it they 320 rejoiced, and the spirit in the breasts of all was lifted.

Then in haste the old man mounted his polished chariot, and drove out of the gateway and echoing colonnade.
In front, drawing the four-wheeled wagon, went the mules, which skillful Idaios the herald was driving; then the horses behind, 325 which the old man as he guided urged with his whip swiftly on through the city. And all his dear ones followed with him lamenting greatly, as if he were going to his death.

Then when they descended from the city and reached the plain, the rest, turning back, returned to Ilion, 330 the sons and the husbands of his daughters; but the two men did not escape the notice of far-thundering Zeus as they came into view upon the plain, and he pitied the old man as he saw him and swiftly spoke to Hermes his dear son:

“Hermes, it pleases you beyond all other gods to act as man’s companion,<sup>5</sup> and you listen to whomever you will; 335 go now, and lead Priam to the hollow ships of the Achaeans in such a way that none of the other Danaans sees him, no one notices, until he arrives at the shelter of the son of Peleus.”

So he spoke; nor did the messenger, the Slayer of Argos, disobey.
Straightway he bound beneath his feet his splendid sandals 340 immortal, golden, which carried him over the water and over the boundless earth with the breath of the wind;
he took up his wand, with which he charms the eyes of whichever men he wishes, and rouses them again when they have slumbered;

and taking this in his hands the mighty Slayer of Argos flew away. 345 Swiftly he arrived at Troy and at the Hellespont; then he set out in the likeness of a noble youth with his first beard, which is when early manhood is most graceful.

And when Priam and Idaios had driven beyond the great burial mound of Ilos,<sup>6</sup>

5. Among his many functions, Hermes is an escort to travelers (in particular, he guides the souls of the dead to the underworld). He is also a trickster and will put the guards at the Greek wall to sleep so that Priam can pass through.

6. Priam’s grandfather. The tomb was a landmark on the Trojan plain.

then they brought the mules and horses to a stand at the river, so they could drink; for dusk by now had come upon the earth. 350

And as he looked, the herald caught sight of Hermes drawing close from nearby, and raising his voice he spoke to Priam:
"Take care, son of Dardanos; there is need for a cautious mind.
I see a man, and I think we two will soon be torn to pieces. 355

Come, let us flee with the horses, or if not let us take hold of his knees and beg, in the hope that he have mercy."

So he spoke; and the old man's mind was in turmoil, and he was dreadfully afraid,

and the hair stood up on his bent limbs, and he stood stupefied. But the Runner himself drawing near 360 and taking the old man's hand, inquired of him and addressed him:

"Whither, father, do you guide your mules and horses so through the ambrosial night, when other mortal men are sleeping?
Do you have no fear of the Achaeans, who breathe fury, hostile men and your enemy, who are near? 365

If any one of them should see you leading so much treasure through the black fast-moving night, what then would be your plan?
You yourself are not young, and this man who attends you is too old for driving men away, who might step forth in violence.
But I will do nothing to harm you, and will keep any other man 370 from you who would; for I liken you to my own father."

Then old Priam, like a god, answered him:
"These things are much as you say, dear child.
But still one of the gods has surely stretched his hands above me, who sent such a lucky wayfarer as you to fall in with me, 375 for such is your build and wonderful beauty, and you have good sense in your mind; yours are blessed parents."

Then in turn the messenger and Slayer of Argos addressed him:
"Yes, all these things, old man, you rightly say.
But come and tell me this and relate it exactly; 380 either you are sending away somewhere your many fine possessions to men in other lands, so that they stay there safe for you, or you are all abandoning sacred Ilion in fear; for such a man, the best, has fallen, your son; for he held nothing back in fight with the Achaeans." 385

Then old Priam, like a god, answered him:
"Who are you, my good friend, and who are your parents?
How well you tell the fate of my unhappy son."
Then in turn the messenger and Slayer of Argos addressed him:
"You test me, old man, when you ask of brilliant Hector. 390

The man whom many times I saw with my own eyes in battle where men win glory, and when he drove the Argives to the ships and kept killing them as he slashed with his sharp bronze sword.

We stood by looking on in wonder; for Achilles did not permit us to join the fight, being angered with the son of Atreus. 395 For I am a companion-in-arms of Achilles, and the same well-made ship brought us both.

I come from the Myrmidons, and my father is Polyktor.

He is a wealthy man, but he is old now, just as you;
 He has six sons, and I am his seventh;
 having shaken lots among us, it fell to me to follow here. 400
 And now I have come to the plain from the ships; for at dawn the dark-eyed Achaeans will deploy for battle round the city.
 For these men have grown impatient sitting around, nor can the Achaean kings restrain them in their eagerness for war."

Then old Priam, like a god, answered him: 405
 "If you are a companion of Peleus' son Achilles, come and tell me the whole truth, whether my son is still by the ships, or whether Achilles has cut him limb from limb and already thrown him to his dogs."

Then in turn the messenger and Slayer of Argos addressed him: 410
 "O old man, the dogs have not eaten him at all, nor the birds, but he lies there still beside Achilles' ship among the shelters, just as he was. It is now the twelfth day he has been lying, and his body has not decayed at all, nor have the worms gnawed at him, which consume men slain in battle. 415

It is true Achilles drags him heedlessly around the tomb of his companion, when the bright dawn shows forth, but does not disfigure him; you yourself would wonder at this, going there, how he lies fresh like the dew, and he is wholly cleansed of blood, there is no stain anywhere; all the wounds have closed together, 420 all the wounds that he was struck; for many men drove their bronze weapons into him.

So do the blessed gods care for your noble son although he is dead, since he was very dear to their hearts."

So he spoke; and the old man rejoiced, and answered with a word:
 "O child, surely it is a good thing to give the immortals 425 their proper gifts, since never did my son—if ever he was—forget in his halls the gods who hold Olympus;
 they remembered in turn these offerings even in his fated death.
 But come and accept this beautiful two-handled cup from me, and give me your protection, and with the gods escort me, 430 until I come to the shelter of the son of Peleus."

Then in turn the messenger and Slayer of Argos addressed him:
 "You make trial of my youth, old man, but you will not persuade me, who bid me accept your gifts behind Achilles' back.
 I fear him and in my heart I shrink 435 to rob him, lest something evil befall me later.

But with all kindness I would be your escort even should we go all the way to famous Argos, whether by swift ship, or accompanying you on foot; and no man would fight with you, making light of your escort."

He spoke and springing onto the horse-drawn chariot the

Runner 440
 swiftly took the whip and reins into his hands, and breathed a brave spirit into the mules and horses.
 And when they reached the fortifications of the ships and the ditch—the watch guards were just beginning to busy themselves with their meals—

then the messenger Argeïphontes<sup>7</sup> poured sleep upon them all, and straightway opened the gates and pushed back the bolts, and led in Priam and the glorious gifts upon the wagon. 445

And when they came before the towering quarters of the son of Peleus—

which the Myrmidons had built for their lord, cutting logs of fir, and thatched it above 450 after gathering bristling reeds from the meadow; and all around it they built for their lord a great courtyard with close-set stakes; a single bolt made of fir secured its door, a bolt that three Achaean men would drive shut, and three men would draw the great bolt back from its door, 455 three other men, but Achilles would drive it shut even on his own—there Hermes the Runner opened it for the old man, and brought inside the illustrious gifts for the swift-footed son of Peleus.
He descended from behind the horses to the ground and spoke:
“Old sir, I, a divine god, came to your aid; 460
I am Hermes; for my father sent me to accompany you as escort.
Yet I shall be quick to go back, nor will I enter into Achilles’ sight;
for it would be cause for anger should a mortal man entertain a god in this way, face-to-face.
But you go in and take hold of the knees of the son of Peleus; 465 and make your prayer in the name of his father and his mother of the lovely hair and his son, so that you stir his heart.”

Thus speaking, Hermes departed for high Olympus.
And Priam leapt from behind his horses to the ground, and left Idaios there; and he remained 470 guarding the mules and horses. The old man went straight toward the quarters,
where Achilles beloved of Zeus would always sit, and found him inside; his companions were sitting apart; two alone, the warrior Automedon and Alkimos, companion of Ares, were busy by him. He had just finished his meal, 475 eating and drinking, and the table still lay beside him.
Unseen by these men great Priam entered, then standing close with his arms he clasped Achilles’ knees and kissed the terrible man-slaughtering hands, which had killed his many sons.
As when madness closes tight upon a man who, after killing someone 480 in his own land, arrives in the country of others, at a rich man’s house, and wonder grips those looking on,
so Achilles looked in wonder at godlike Priam, and the others in wonder, too, looked each toward the other.

And in supplication Priam addressed him: 485 “Remember your father, godlike Achilles,
The same age as I, on the ruinous threshold of old age.
And perhaps those who dwell around surround him and bear hard upon him, nor is there anyone to ward off harm and destruction.

7. Literally, “Argos-slayer,” another name for Hermes.

Yet surely when he hears you are living 490 he rejoices in his heart and hopes for all his days to see his beloved son returning from Troy.

But I am fated utterly, since I sired the best sons
 in broad Troy, but I say not one of them is left.
 Fifty were my sons, when the sons of the Achaeans came; 495 nineteen were born to me from the womb of the same mother, and the rest the women in my palace bore to me.

Of these furious Ares has made slack the knees of many;
 he who alone was left to me, he alone protected our city and those inside it, him it was you lately killed as he fought to defend his country, 500 Hector. And for his sake I come now to the ships of the Achaeans to win his release from you, and I bear an untold ransom.

Revere the gods, Achilles, and have pity upon me, remembering your father; for I am yet more pitiful, and have endured such things as no other mortal man upon the earth, 505 drawing to my lips the hands of the man who killed my son."

So he spoke; and he stirred in the other a yearning to weep for his own father,
 and taking hold of his hand he gently pushed the old man away.
 And the two remembered, the one weeping without cessation for man-slaughtering Hector as he lay curled before Achilles' feet, 510 and Achilles wept for his own father, and then again for Patroclus; and the sound of their lament was raised throughout the hall.

But when godlike Achilles had taken his fill of lamentation and the yearning had gone from his breast and very limbs, he rose suddenly from his seat, and raised the old man by the hand, 515 pitying his gray head and gray beard, and lifting his voice he addressed him with winged word:
 "Poor soul, surely you have endured much evil in your heart.
 How did you dare to go to the Achaean ships alone, into the sight of a man who killed your many and your noble 520
 sons? Your heart is iron.

But come and seat yourself upon the chair, and let us leave these sorrows lying undisturbed within our hearts, grieving though we are;
 for there is no profit in grief that numbs the heart.
 For thus have the gods spun the thread of destiny for wretched mortals, 525 that we live in sorrow; and they themselves are free from care.

For two urns lie stored on the floor of Zeus full of such gifts as he gives, one of evil, the other of good.
 Should Zeus who delights in thunder bestow mixed lots upon a man, he will sometimes meet with evil, another time with good; 530 but should he give to a man only from the urn of woe, he renders him the object of abuse,

and grinding distress drives him across the shining earth,
 and he roams, esteemed by neither gods nor mortals.
 Thus to Peleus too the gods gave shining gifts from his birth; for he surpassed all men 535 in happiness and wealth, and was lord of the Myrmidons, and to him, mortal though he was, they gave a goddess as his wife;
 but to even him god gave evil, since in his halls was born no line of lordly sons, but he begot a single all-untimely child; nor do I care for him 540 as he grows old, since very far from my fatherland

 I sit at Troy, afflicting you and your children.
 And you, old man, we have heard, were blessed in time before;
 as much as Lesbos, seat of Makar, contains out there within its boundaries, and Phrygia inland and the boundless Hellespont, 545 all these, they say, old man, you surpassed in sons and wealth.
 But since the gods of heaven have brought this misery to you, there is forever fighting and the killing of men about your city.
 Bear up, nor mourn incessantly in your heart; for you will accomplish nothing in grieving for your son, 550 nor will you raise him from the dead; before that happens you will suffer yet another evil."

Then old Priam, like a god, answered him:
 "Do not have me sit upon a chair, god-cherished one, while Hector lies in your shelters unburied, but quick as you can release him, so that I may see him with my eyes, and you accept the many gifts 555
 of ransom, which we bring for you. And have enjoyment of them, and may you return to your fatherland, since from the first you spared me."<sup>8</sup> 557

Then looking at him from under his brows swift-footed Achilles
 spoke: 559
 "Provoke me no further, old man; for I myself am minded 560 to release Hector to you; from Zeus my mother came to me as messenger, she who bore me, daughter of the old man of the sea.
 I recognize, Priam, in my mind, and it does not escape me, that some one of the gods led you to the Achaeans' swift ships; for no mortal man, not even a young man in his prime, would dare 565 to come to our camp; nor could he have slipped by the watch guards, nor could he easily force back the bolts of our doors.
 Therefore do not now stir my heart further in its sorrows, lest, old man, I do not spare even yourself within my shelter, suppliant though you be, but transgress the commands of Zeus." 570

Thus he spoke; and the old man was afraid and obeyed his word.
 And the son of Peleus like a lion sprang out the door of his shelter, and not alone; with him followed his two henchmen, the warrior Automedon and Alkimos, whom beyond all other companions Achilles honored after Patroclus died. 575
 They released the horses and mules from under their yokes, and led in the herald, crier to the old man, and they seated him upon a bench; and from the strong-wheeled wagon they lifted the boundless ransom for the body of Hector.
 But they left two fine-spun robes and a tunic, 580 so Achilles could wrap the body and give it to be carried home.
 And summoning his maids, Achilles ordered them to wash the body and anoint it,
 after taking it to a place apart, so that Priam should not see his son, for fear the old man might not keep his anger hidden in his anguished heart on seeing his son, and might stir Achilles' own heart to violence 585 and he kill Priam, and transgress the commands of Zeus.

And when then the maids had washed and anointed the body with oil, they put around it the beautiful robe and tunic, and Achilles himself lifted it and placed it upon a bier, then his companions with him lifted this onto the polished wagon. 590
And Achilles groaned, and called his dear companion's name:
"Do not, Patroclus, be angered with me, if you should learn, though you be in the house of Hades, that I released shining Hector to his father, since the ransom he gave me was not unworthy.
And I in turn will give you a portion of it, as much as is fitting." 595

He spoke, and godlike Achilles went back into his shelter, and took his seat on the richly wrought chair, from which he had risen, against the far wall, and spoke his word to Priam:
"Your son has been released to you, old man, as you bade, and lies upon a bier; and with the dawn's appearance, 600 you will see yourself when you take him. But now let us not forget our supper.

For even Niobe<sup>9</sup> of the lovely hair did not forget her food, she whose twelve children were destroyed in her halls,
six daughters, and six sons in the prime of manhood.
The sons Apollo slew with his silver bow 605 in his anger with Niobe, and Artemis who showers arrows slew the daughters,
because Niobe equalled herself to Leto of the lovely cheeks—for she would boast that Leto bore two children, while she herself had borne many.

So two only though they were, they destroyed the many.
And for nine days they lay in their own blood, nor was there anyone 610 to give them burial; for the son of Cronus had turned the people into stone.
Then on the tenth day the heavenly gods gave them burial, and Niobe bethought herself of food, when she was worn out with weeping.
And now among the rocks somewhere, in the lonely mountains of Sipylus, where they say are the sleeping places of the immortal 615 nymphs who race beside the river Achelous, there, stone though she is, she broods upon the cares sent her from the gods.<sup>1</sup>

But come, and let us two, illustrious old sir, take thought of food. For you may weep for your dear son again when you have brought him into Ilion; he will be the cause of many tears." 620

He spoke, and springing to his feet swift Achilles, with a cut to the throat, slaughtered a shining white sheep; his companions flayed it and with skill prepared it properly.

9. Wife of Amphion, one of the two founders of the great Greek city of Thebes.

1. The legend of Niobe being turned into stone is thought to have had its origin in a rock face of Mount Sipylus (in Asia Minor) that resembled a woman who wept inconsolably for the loss of her children. The Achelous River runs near Mount Sipylus.

They sliced the flesh skillfully and pierced it on spits and roasted it with care, and then drew off all the pieces.
 Automedon took bread to distribute around the table 625 in fine baskets; but Achilles distributed the meat; and they reached out their hands to the good things set ready before them.
 And when they had put away desire for eating and drinking, then did Priam son of Dardanos look in wonder at Achilles, how massive he was, what kind of man; for he was like the gods to look upon; 630
 and Achilles looked in wonder at Dardanian Priam, gazing on his noble face and listening to his words.

But when they had their fill of looking upon each other,
 then old Priam the godlike addressed Achilles first:
 "Let me go to bed now quickly, god-cherished one, so that 635
 we may have solace when we lie down beneath sweet sleep.
 For not yet have my eyes closed beneath my lids, from the time my son lost his life at your hands, but always I groaned in lament and brooded on my sorrows without measure, wallowing in dung in the enclosure of my court. 640
 But now I have tasted food and let gleaming wine down my throat; before I had tasted nothing."

He spoke; and Achilles ordered the companions and servant women to set out a bed under cover of the porch and to throw upon it splendid crimson blankets to lie upon, and to spread rugs over them, 645 and to place woolen cloaks on top of all to cover them.
 And the maids went from the hall bearing torches in their hands, and working in haste soon spread two beds.
 Then bantering, Achilles of the swift feet addressed Priam:
 "Sleep outside, old friend, for fear one of the Achaean 650 leaders come suddenly upon us here, who forever devise their counsels beside me, as is right and proper.
 If one of them were to see you through the swift black night, he would at once make it known to Agamemnon, shepherd of the people, and there would be delay in the surrender of the body. 655
 But come and tell me this and relate it exactly;
 how many days do you desire to give funeral rites to shining Hector—for so long I will wait and hold back the army."

Then old Priam the godlike answered him:
 "If then you are willing for me to accomplish Hector's funeral, 660 by doing as follows, Achilles, you would give me a kindness.
 For you know how we are penned within the city, and it is a long way to bring wood from, the mountains; for the Trojans are greatly afraid; nine days we would mourn him in our halls, and on the tenth we would bury him and the people would feast, 665 and on the eleventh day we would make a tomb for him:
 and on the twelfth we shall go to war, if indeed we must."

Then in turn swift-footed godlike Achilles addressed him:
 "These things, old Priam, will be as you ask;
 I will suspend the war for such time, as you command." 670
 And so speaking he took hold of the old man's right hand by the wrist, lest he have any fear in his heart.

Then they lay down to sleep there in the forecourt of the shelter, the herald and Priam, a flurry of thoughts in their minds.
But Achilles slept in the inner recess of his well-built shelter, and Briseïs of the lovely cheeks lay at his side. 675

So the other gods as well as chariot-fighting men slept through the night, overcome by soft slumber, but sleep did not lay hold of Hermes the runner as he turned over in his heart how he might send king Priam 680 from the ships unnoticed by the hallowed watchers of the gate.
And he stood above Priam's head and addressed him with his words:
"Old man, surely you have no thought of any evil, seeing how you sleep in the midst of enemy men, since Achilles spared you.

And now you have won release of your beloved son, and gave many things for him; 685

but your sons who were left behind would give yet three times as much ransom for you alive, should Agamemnon the son of Atreus recognize you, and all the Achaeans."
So he spoke; and the old man was afraid, and woke up his herald.
Then Hermes yoked the mules and horses for them, 690 and himself drove swiftly through the camp; nor did anyone see.

But when they reached the crossing of the fair-flowing stream,<sup>2</sup> 692 then Hermes departed for high Olympus; and Dawn robed in saffron spread over all the earth; 694 the men with lamentation and groaning drove the horses on to the city, and the mules carried the corpse. No man saw them at first, nor any fair-belted woman, but then Cassandra,<sup>3</sup> like to golden Aphrodite, 695 having gone up to the height of Pergamos, saw her beloved father standing in the chariot and the herald and city crier;
and then she saw Hector lying upon the bier drawn by the mules.
She wailed her grief aloud, then cried out to the whole city:
"Look upon Hector, men and women of Troy! Come, if ever before you used to rejoice when he returned alive from battle, 700 since he was the great joy of the city and all its people." 705

So she spoke; nor did any man remain there in the city nor any woman; uncontrollable grief seized all;
close by the gates they met Priam as he brought Hector's body; at the front his beloved wife and lady mother ripped their hair in grief 710 for him, lunging at the strong-wheeled wagon, to touch his head; and the throng surrounded him weeping.
And for the whole day long until the sun's going down they would have mourned Hector, pouring their tears before the gates, had not the old man spoken among them from the chariot: 715
"Make way for me to pass with the mules; later you can sate yourselves with weeping, when I have brought him home."

3. Daughter of Priam and Hecuba; she was a prophetess and foretold the fall of Troy, but was cursed by Apollo to be disbelieved.

So he spoke; and they stood aside and made way for the wagon.

And when they had brought him into the illustrious house, then they laid him upon a fretted bed, and set beside it singers, leaders of the dirges, who sang their mournful dirge song, and the women keened in response. 720

And white-armed Andromache led the lament among them, holding in her arms the head of horse-breaking Hector: “My husband, you were lost from life while young, and are leaving me a widow 725

in your halls; and the child is still just a baby, whom we bore, you and I, ill-fated both, nor do I think he will reach young manhood; before that this city will be wholly ravaged; for you its watchman have perished, who used to guard it, 730 who protected its devoted wives and tender children. They soon will be carried away in the hollow ships, and I with them; and you then, my child, either you will follow with me, and there do work unworthy of you toiling for a harsh master—or some Achaean man seizing you by the arm will hurl you from the ramparts, unhappy death,<sup>4</sup> in his anger, one whose brother, perhaps, Hector slew, or his father or even his son, since so many of the Achaeans gripped the broad earth in their teeth at Hector’s hands. 735

For your father was no gentle man in sad battle; therefore the people mourn him through the city, and cursed is the grief and lamentation you have laid upon your parents, Hector. And to me beyond all others will be left painful sorrow; for you did not reach out your hands to me from your bed as you were dying, nor did you speak some close word to me, which I might always remember through the nights and days as I shed my tears.” 740 745

So she spoke, crying, and the women in response mourned.

And Hecuba led them next in the passionate lament: “Hector, far the dearest to my heart of all my sons, while you were alive you were dear to the gods, who now care for you even in your fated lot of death. 750

Other sons of mine Achilles of the swift feet would sell, whomever he captured, beyond the murmuring salt sea, into Samothrace, into Imbros and sea-spattered Lemnos; but he plucked your soul from you with his tapered bronze spear, and dragged you again and again around the tomb of his companion Patroclus, whom you slew—nor did he raise him from the dead so doing—yet now you lie as fresh as dew, unsullied in my halls, like one whom Apollo of the silver bow approaches and kills with his gentle arrows.” 755

So she spoke weeping, and stirred unceasing wailing. 760

Then third among the women, Helen led the lament:

“Hector, far dearest to my heart of all my husband’s brothers; too true, my husband is Alexandros of godlike beauty, who led me to Troy; would that I had died before;

4. Astyanax was, in fact, hurled from Troy’s walls after the city fell.

for this is now the twentieth year for me 765 since I set out from there and forsook my fatherland, but never yet did I hear a harsh or abusive word from you, but if someone else would revile me in these halls, one of my husband's brothers, or his sisters, or one of my fine-robed sisters-in-law, or my husband's mother—but my husband's father was like a kind father always— 770
 you with soothing words would restrain them with your gentle nature and kind speech.
 Therefore I weep, grieving at heart, for you and for me, ill-fated, together;
 for no longer is there anyone else in broad Troy to be kind or friend to me, but all shudder at me." 775
 So she spoke crying, and in response all the great multitude moaned.
     Then old Priam spoke his word among the people:
 "Men of Troy, now fetch timber to the city. Have no fear in your heart of cunning ambush by the Argives; for Achilles, as he sent me from the black ships, gave orders thus, 780 that he would do no harm before the twelfth dawn comes."
 So he spoke; and the men yoked the oxen and mules to the wagons, and soon they were gathered before the city.
     For nine days they brought an immense pile of timber; and when at length the tenth dawn showed, bringing light to mortals, 785 then, shedding tears, they carried forth bold Hector.
 On the very top of the pyre they placed his body, and on it flung the fire.
     And when Dawn born of the morning showed forth her fingers of rosy light, then around the pyre of illustrious Hector the people gathered;<sup>5</sup> 789 first they extinguished the burning pyre with dark-gleaming wine 791 entirely, all that retained the fire's strength; and then his brothers and his comrades picked out his white bones as they wept, and the swelling tears fell from their cheeks.
 And taking the bones they placed them in a golden box, 795 after covering them round with soft purple cloth; swiftly they placed these in a hollowed grave, and covered it from above with great stones set close together.
 Lightly they heaped up the burial mound—lookouts were set all round, 800 lest the strong-greaved Achaeans should attack before—and when they had piled up the mound they started back. Then having come together they duly gave a glorious feast in the house of Priam, king nurtured by Zeus.
 Thus they tended the funeral of Hector, breaker of horses.

BOOK I

[The Boy and the Goddess]

Tell me about a complicated man.<sup>2</sup> Muse, tell me how he wandered and was lost when he had wrecked the holy town of Troy, and where he went, and who he met, the pain he suffered on the sea, and how he worked 5 to save his life and bring his men back home.
 He failed, and for their own mistakes, they died.
 They ate the Sun God's cattle,<sup>3</sup> and the god kept them from home. Now goddess, child of Zeus,<sup>4</sup> tell the old story for our modern times. 10 Find the beginning.

All the other Greeks who had survived the brutal sack of Troy sailed safely home to their own wives—except this man alone. Calypso,<sup>5</sup> a great goddess, had trapped him in her cave; she wanted him 15 to be her husband. When the year rolled round in which the gods decreed he should go home to Ithaca, his troubles still went on.
 The man was friendless. All the gods took pity, except Poseidon's<sup>6</sup> anger never ended 20 until Odysseus was back at home.
 But now the distant Ethiopians, who live between the sunset and the dawn, were worshipping the Sea God with a feast, a hundred cattle and a hundred rams. 25
 There sat the god, delighting in his banquet.
 The other gods were gathered on Olympus, in Father Zeus'<sup>7</sup> palace. He was thinking of fine, well-born Aegisthus, who was killed by Agamemnon's famous son Orestes.<sup>8</sup> 30
 He told the deathless gods,

“This is absurd,
 that mortals blame the gods! They say we cause their suffering, but they themselves increase it by folly. So Aegisthus overstepped:

 he took the legal wife of Agamemnon, 35 then killed the husband when he came back home although he knew that it would doom them all.
 We gods had warned Aegisthus; we sent down perceptive Hermes,<sup>9</sup> who flashed into sight and told him not to murder Agamemnon 40 or court his wife; Orestes would grow up and come back to his home to take revenge.
 Aegisthus would not hear that good advice.
 But now his death has paid all debts.”

Athena<sup>1</sup>
 looked at him steadily and answered, “Father, 45 he did deserve to die. Bring death to all who act like him! But I am agonizing about Odysseus and his bad luck.
 For too long he has suffered, with no friends, sea all around him, sea on every side, 50 out on an island where a goddess lives, daughter of fearful Atlas, who holds up the pillars of the sea, and knows its depths—those pillars keep the heaven and earth apart.
 His daughter holds that poor unhappy man, 55

 You do not even care, Olympian! 60 Remember how he sacrificed to you on the broad plain of Troy beside his ships?
 So why do you dismiss Odysseus?”<sup>2</sup> “Daughter!” the Cloud God said, “You must be joking, since how could I forget Odysseus? 65

 He is more sensible than other humans, and makes more sacrifices to the gods.
 But Lord Poseidon rages, unrelenting, because Odysseus destroyed the eye but does not kill him. Come then, we must plan: how can he get back home? Poseidon must give up his anger, since he cannot fight alone against the will of all the gods.”

Athena’s eyes lit up and she replied, 80 “Great Father, if the blessed gods at last will let Odysseus return back home, then hurry, we must send our messenger, Hermes the giant-slayer. He must swoop down to Ogygia right away and tell 85 the beautiful Calypso we have formed a firm decision that Odysseus has waited long enough. He must go home.
And I will go to Ithaca to rouse the courage of his son, and make him call 90 a meeting, and speak out against the suitors who kill his flocks of sheep and longhorn cattle unstoppably. Then I will send him off to Pylos and to Sparta, to seek news about his father’s journey home, and gain 95 a noble reputation for himself.”

With that, she tied her sandals on her feet, the marvelous golden sandals that she wears to travel sea and land, as fast as wind.
She took the heavy bronze-tipped spear she uses 100 to tame the ranks of warriors with whom she is enraged. Then from the mountain down she sped to Ithaca, and stopped outside Odysseus’ court, bronze spear in hand.
She looked like Mentēs now, the Taphian leader,<sup>4</sup> 105 a guest-friend. There she found the lordly suitors sitting on hides—they killed the cows themselves—and playing checkers. Quick, attentive house slaves were waiting on them. Some were mixing wine with water in the bowls, and others brought 110 the tables out and wiped them off with sponges, and others carved up heaping plates of meat.
Telemachus was sitting with them, feeling dejected. In his mind he saw his father coming from somewhere, scattering the suitors, 115 and gaining back his honor, and control of all his property. With this in mind, he was the first to see Athena there.
He disapproved of leaving strangers stranded, so he went straight to meet her at the gate, 120 and shook her hand, and took her spear of bronze, and let his words fly out to her.

4. The Taphians were an island people from the Ionian Sea. “Mentes”: a friend of Odysseus.

“Good evening,
stranger, and welcome. Be our guest, come share our dinner, and then tell us what you need.”

He led her in, and Pallas followed him. 125
Inside the high-roofed hall, he set her spear beside a pillar in a polished stand, in which Odysseus kept stores of weapons.
And then he led her to a chair and spread a smooth embroidered cloth across the seat, 130 and pulled a footstool up to it. He sat beside her on a chair of inlaid wood, a distance from the suitors, so their shouting would not upset the stranger during dinner;
also to ask about his absent father. 135
A girl brought washing water in a jug of gold, and poured it on their hands and into a silver bowl, and set a table by them.
A deferential slave brought bread and laid a wide array of food, a generous spread. 140
The carver set beside them plates of meat of every kind, and gave them golden cups.
The cup boy kept on topping up the wine.
The suitors sauntered in and sat on chairs, observing proper order,<sup>5</sup> and the slaves 145 poured water on their hands. The house girls brought baskets of bread and heaped it up beside them, and house boys filled their wine-bowls up with drink.
They reached to take the good things set before them.
Once they were satisfied with food and drink, 150 the suitors turned their minds to other things—singing and dancing, glories of the feast.
A slave brought out a well-tuned lyre and gave it to Phemius, the man the suitors forced to sing for them. He struck the chords to start 155 his lovely song.

Telemachus leaned in close to Athena, so they would not hear,
and said,

“Dear guest—excuse my saying this—these men are only interested in music, a life of ease. They make no contribution. 160
This food belongs to someone else, a man whose white bones may be lying in the rain or sunk beneath the waves. If they saw him

5. There may be an implication here that the suitors seat themselves according to some kind of rank, with the more important ones taking a more honorable position.

return to Ithaca, they would all pray for faster feet, instead of wealth and gold 165 and fancy clothes. In fact, he must have died.
 We have no hope. He will not come back home.
 If someone says so, we do not believe it.
 But come now, tell me this and tell the truth.
 Who are you? From what city, and what parents? 170
 What kind of ship did you here arrive on?
 What sailors brought you here, and by what route?
 You surely did not travel here on foot!
 Here is the thing I really want to know:
 have you been here before? Are you a friend 175 who visited my father? Many men came to his house. He traveled many places.”

Athena’s clear bright eyes met his. She said, “Yes, I will tell you everything. I am Mentos, the son of wise Anchialus, 180 lord of the Taphians, who love the oar.
 I traveled with my ship and my companions over the wine-dark sea to foreign lands, with iron that I hope to trade for copper in Temese. My ship is in the harbor 185 far from the town, beneath the woody hill.
 And you and I are guest-friends through our fathers, from long ago—Laertes<sup>6</sup> can confirm it.
 I hear that fine old man no longer comes to town, but lives out in the countryside, 190 stricken by grief, with only one old slave, who gives him food and drink when he trails back leg-weary from his orchard, rich in vines.
 I came because they told me that your father was here—but now it seems that gods have blocked 195 his path back home. But I am sure that he is not yet dead. The wide sea keeps him trapped upon some island, captured by fierce men who will not let him go. Now I will make a prophecy the gods have given me, 200 and I think it will all come true, although I am no prophet. He will not be gone much longer from his own dear native land, even if chains of iron hold him fast.
 He will devise a means of getting home. 205
 He is resourceful. Tell me now—are you Odysseus’ son? You are so tall!
 Your handsome face and eyes resemble his.
 We often met and knew each other well, before he went to Troy, where all the best 210

6. Odysseus’s father.

leaders of Argos sailed in hollow ships.
From that time on, we have not seen each other.”

Telemachus was careful as he answered.
“Dear guest, I will be frank with you. My mother says that I am his son, but I cannot 215 be sure, since no one knows his own begetting.
I wish I were the son of someone lucky, who could grow old at home with all his wealth.
Instead, the most unlucky man alive is said to be my father—since you ask.” 220

Athena looked at him with sparkling eyes.
“Son of Penelope, you and your sons will make a name in history, since you are so clever. But now tell me this. Who are these banqueters? And what is the occasion? 225
A drinking party, or a wedding feast?
They look so arrogant and self-indulgent, making themselves at home. A wise observer would surely disapprove of how they act.”

Telemachus said moodily, “My friend, 230 since you have raised the subject, there was once a time when this house here was doing well, our future bright, when he was still at home.
But now the gods have changed their plans and cursed us, and cast my father into utter darkness. 235
If he had died it would not be this bad—
if he had fallen with his friends at Troy, or in his loved ones’ arms, when he had wound the threads of war to end. The Greeks would then have built a tomb for him; he would have won 240 fame for his son. But now, the winds have seized him, and he is nameless and unknown. He left nothing but tears for me. I do not weep only for him. The gods have given me so many other troubles. All the chiefs 245 of Same, Zacynthus, Dulichium, and local lords from rocky Ithaca, are courting Mother, wasting our whole house.
She does not turn these awful suitors down, nor can she end the courting. They keep eating, 250 spoiling my house—and soon, they will kill me!”

Athena said in outrage, “This is monstrous!
You need Odysseus to come back home and lay his hands on all those shameless suitors!
If only he would come here now and stand 255 right at the gates, with two spears in his hands, in shield and helmet, as when I first saw him!

Odysseus was visiting our house, drinking and having fun on his way back from sailing in swift ships to Ephyra 260 to visit Ilus. He had gone there looking for deadly poison to anoint his arrows.
 Ilus refused, because he feared the gods.
 My father gave Odysseus the poison, loving him blindly. May Odysseus 265 come meet the suitors with that urge to kill!
 A bitter courtship and short life for them!
 But whether he comes home to take revenge, or not, is with the gods. You must consider how best to drive these suitors from your house. 270 Come, listen carefully to what I say.
 Tomorrow call the Achaean<sup>7</sup> chiefs to meeting, and tell the suitors—let the gods be witness—‘All of you, go away! To your own homes!’
 As for your mother, if she wants to marry, 275 let her return to her great father’s home.
 They will make her a wedding and prepare abundant gifts to show her father’s love.
 Now here is some advice from me for you.
 Fit out a ship with twenty oars, the best, 280 and go find out about your long-lost father.
 Someone may tell you news, or you may hear a voice from Zeus, best source of information.
 First go to Pylos, question godlike Nestor;
 from there, to Sparta; visit Menelaus.<sup>8</sup> 285
 He came home last of all the Achaean heroes.
 If you should hear that he is still alive and coming home, put up with this abuse for one more year. But if you hear that he is dead, go home, and build a tomb for him, 290 and hold a lavish funeral to show the honor he deserves, and give your mother in marriage to a man. When this is done, consider deeply how you might be able 295 to kill the suitors in your halls—by tricks or openly. You must not stick to childhood; you are no longer just a little boy.
 You surely heard how everybody praised Orestes when he killed the man who killed his famous father—devious Aegisthus? 300
 Dear boy, I see how big and tall you are.
 Be brave, and win yourself a lasting name.
 But I must go now, on my nimble ship;
 my friends are getting tired of waiting for me.
 Remember what I said and heed my words.” 305

7. Greek.

8. Brother of Agamemnon, husband of Helen,

the woman whose abduction by Paris caused the Trojan War.

Telemachus was brooding on her words, and said, "Dear guest, you were so kind to give me this fatherly advice. I will remember.
 I know that you are eager to be off, but please enjoy a bath before you go, and take a gift with you. I want to give you a precious, pretty treasure as a keepsake to mark our special friendship."

310

But the goddess
 Athena met his gaze and said, "Do not hold me back now. I must be on my way.
 As for the gift you feel inspired to give me, save it for when I come on my way home and let me give you presents then as well in fair exchange."

315

With that, the owl-eyed goddess flew away like a bird, up through the smoke.
 She left him feeling braver, more determined,
 and with his father even more in mind.
 Watching her go, he was amazed and saw she was a god. Then godlike, he went off to meet the suitors.

320

They were sitting calmly, listening to the poet, who sang how Athena cursed the journey of the Greeks as they were sailing home from Troy. Upstairs, Penelope had heard the marvelous song.
 She clambered down the steep steps of her house, not by herself—two slave girls came with her.
 She reached the suitors looking like a goddess, then stopped and stood beside a sturdy pillar, holding a gauzy veil before her face.
 Her slave girls stood, one on each side of her.
 In tears, she told the holy singer, 325

330

335

"Stop,
 please, Phemius! You know so many songs, enchanting tales of things that gods and men have done, the deeds that singers publicize.
 Sing something else, and let them drink in peace.
 Stop this upsetting song that always breaks my heart, so I can hardly bear my grief.
 I miss him all the time—that man, my husband, whose story is so famous throughout Greece."

340

Sullen Telemachus said, "Mother, no, you must not criticize the loyal bard for singing as it pleases him to sing.

345

Poets are not to blame for how things are;
 Zeus is; he gives to each as is his will.
 Do not blame Phemius because he told 350 about the Greek disasters. You must know the newest song is always praised the most.
 So steel your heart and listen to the song.
 Odysseus was not the only one who did not come back home again from Troy. 355
 Many were lost. Go in and do your work.
 Stick to the loom and distaff. Tell your slaves to do their chores as well. It is for men to talk, especially me. I am the master.”

That startled her. She went back to her room, 360 and took to heart her son's deliberate scolding.
 She went upstairs, along with both her slaves, and wept there for her dear Odysseus,
 until Athena gave her eyes sweet sleep.
 Throughout the shadowy hall the suitors clamored, 365 praying to lie beside her in her bed.
 Telemachus inhaled, then started speaking.

“You suitors, you are taking this too far.
 Let us enjoy the feast in peace. It is a lovely thing to listen to a bard, 370 especially one with such a godlike voice.
 At dawn, let us assemble in the square.
 I have to tell you this—it is an order.
 You have to leave my halls. Go dine elsewhere!
 Eat your own food, or share between your houses. 375
 Or if you think it easier and better to ruin one man's wealth, and if you think that you can get away with it—go on!
 I call upon the gods; Zeus will grant vengeance.
 You will be punished and destroyed, right here!” 380

He spoke, and they began to bite their lips, shocked that Telemachus would dare to speak so boldly. But Antinous replied, “Telemachus, the gods themselves have taught you such pride, to talk so big and brash in public! 385 May Zeus the son of Cronus never grant you your true inheritance, which is the throne of Ithaca.”

His mind alert and focused, Telemachus replied, “Antinous, you will not like this, but I have to say, 390
 I hope Zeus does give me the throne. Do you deny it is an honorable thing to be a king? It brings the household wealth, and honor to the man. But there are many other great chiefs in sea-girt Ithaca, 395 both old and young. I know that. One of them may seize the throne, now that Odysseus has died. But I shall be at least the lord of my own house and of the slaves that he seized for my benefit."

Eurymachus 400
replied, "Telemachus, the gods must choose which of us will be king of Ithaca.
But still, I hope you keep your own possessions, and rule your house. May no man drive you out, and seize your wealth, while Ithaca survives. 405
Now, friend, I want to ask about the stranger.
Where was he from, what country? Did he say?
Where is his place of birth, his native soil?
Does he bring news your father will come home?
Or did he come here for some other purpose? 410
How suddenly he darted off, not waiting for us to meet him. Yet he looked important."

The boy said soberly, "Eurymachus, my father is not ever coming home.
I do not listen now to any gossip, 415 or forecasts from the psychics whom my mother invites to visit us. The stranger was my father's guest-friend Mentès, son of wise Anchialus, who rules the Taphians, the people of the oar."

Those were his words, 420
but in his mind he knew she was a god.
They danced to music and enjoyed themselves till evening, then they went back home to sleep.
Telemachus' bedroom had been built above the courtyard, so it had a view. 425
He went upstairs, preoccupied by thought.
A loyal slave went with him, Eurycleia, daughter of Ops; she brought the burning torches.
Laertes bought her many years before when she was very young, for twenty oxen. 430 He gave her status in the household, equal to his own wife, but never slept with her, avoiding bitter feelings in his marriage.
She brought the torches now; she was the slave who loved him most, since she had cared for him 435 when he was tiny. Entering the room, he sat down on the bed, took off his tunic,
and gave it to the vigilant old woman.

She smoothed it out and folded it, then hung it up on a hook beside his wooden bed, and left the room. She used the silver latch to close the door; the strap pulled tight the bolt.
 He slept the night there, wrapped in woolen blankets, planning the journey told him by Athena.

Summary Telemachus summons a council and complains about the suitors' behavior and the Ithacans' failure to intervene. The suitors continue to mock him. With the help of Eurycleia, an old palace slave, but in secret from Penelope, Telemachus packs provisions and embarks on the ship prepared for him by Athena. He travels to Pylos, where pious old Nestor welcomes him. Then, accompanied by Nestor's youngest son, Pisistratus, Telemachus goes to Sparta, where he is welcomed by Helen and Menelaus. Back in Ithaca, the suitors learn of Telemachus's trip and plot to kill him when he comes back. Penelope finds out about Telemachus's journey and the murder plot and is devastated; Athena sends a dream phantom to comfort her.

BOOK 5

[From the Goddess to the Storm]

Then Dawn rose up from bed with Lord Tithonus,<sup>9</sup> to bring the light to deathless gods and mortals.
 The gods sat down for council, with the great Thunderlord Zeus. Athena was concerned about Odysseus' many troubles, trapped by the nymph Calypso in her house.

5

"Father, and all immortal gods," she said,
 "No longer let a sceptered king be kind,
 or gentle, or pay heed to right and wrong.
 Let every king be cruel, his acts unjust!
 Odysseus ruled gently, like a father,
 but no one even thinks about him now.
 The wretched man is stranded on an island;
 Calypso forces him to stay with her.
 He cannot make his way back to his country.
 He has no ships, no oars, and no companions to help him sail across the wide-backed sea.
 His son has gone for news of his lost father,
 in sandy Pylos and in splendid Sparta;
 they plot to kill the boy when he returns!"

10

15

20

Smiling at her, Lord Zeus who heaps the clouds replied, "Ah, daughter! What a thing to say!
 Did you not plan all this yourself, so that Odysseus could come and take revenge upon those suitors? Now use all your skill:

25

9. Dawn's lover, a mortal man whom she made immortal (though not ageless) and brought to live with her in the sky.

ensure Telemachus comes safely home, and that the suitors fail and sail away.”

Then turning to his son he said, “Dear Hermes, you are my messenger. Go tell the goddess our fixed intention: that Odysseus 30 must go back home—he has endured enough.
Without a god or human as his guide, he will drift miserably for twenty days upon a makeshift raft, and then arrive at fertile Scheria. The magical 35 Phaeacians will respect him like a god, and send him in a ship to his dear homeland, with gifts of bronze and heaps of gold and clothing, more than he would have brought with him from Troy if he had come directly, with his share 40 of plunder. It is granted him to see the ones he loves, beneath his own high roof, in his own country.”

Hermes heard these words.
At once he fastened on his feet the sandals of everlasting gold with which he flies 45 on breath of air across the sea and land;
he seized the wand he uses to enchant men’s eyes to sleep or wake as he desires, and flew. The god flashed bright in all his power.
He touched Pieria, then from the sky 50 he plunged into the sea and swooped between the waves, just like a seagull catching fish, wetting its whirring wings in tireless brine.
So Hermes scudded through the surging swell.
Then finally, he reached the distant island, 55 stepped from the indigo water to the shore, and reached the cavern where the goddess lived.

There sat Calypso with her braided curls.
Beside the hearth a mighty fire was burning.
The scent of citrus and of brittle pine 60 suffused the island. Inside, she was singing and weaving with a shuttle made of gold.
Her voice was beautiful. Around the cave a luscious forest flourished: alder, poplar, and scented cypress. It was full of wings. 65 Birds nested there but hunted out at sea:
the owls, the hawks, the gulls with gaping beaks.
A ripe and verdant vine, hung thick with grapes, was stretched to coil around her cave. Four springs spurted with sparkling water as they laced 70 with crisscross currents intertwined together.
The meadow softly bloomed with celery and violets. He gazed around in wonder and joy, at sights to please even a god.

 Even the deathless god who once killed Argos<sup>1</sup> 75 stood still, his heart amazed at all he saw.
 At last he went inside the cave. Calypso, the splendid goddess, knew the god on sight:
 the deathless gods all recognize each other,
 however far away their homes may be. 80
 But Hermes did not find Odysseus, since he was sitting by the shore as usual, sobbing in grief and pain; his heart was breaking.
 In tears he stared across the fruitless sea.

Divine Calypso told her guest to sit 85 upon a gleaming, glittering chair, and said, “Dear friend, Lord Hermes of the golden wand, why have you come? You do not often visit.
 What do you have in mind? My heart inclines to help you if I can, if it is fated. 90
 For now, come in, and let me make you welcome.”

At that the goddess led him to a table heaped with ambrosia, and she mixed a drink:
 red nectar.<sup>2</sup> So mercurial Hermes drank and ate till he was satisfied, and then 95
 the diplomat explained why he had come.

“You are a goddess, I a god—and yet you ask why I am here. Well, I will tell you.
 Zeus ordered me to come—I did not want to.
 Who would desire to cross such an expanse 100 of endless salty sea? No human town is near here, where gods get fine sacrifices.
 Still, none can sway or check the will of Zeus.
 He says the most unhappy man alive is living here—a warrior from those 105 who fought the town of Priam for nine years and in the tenth they sacked it and sailed home.
 But on the journey back, they wronged Athena.
 She roused the wind and surging sea against them and all his brave companions were destroyed, 110 while he himself was blown here by the waves.
 Zeus orders you to send him on his way at once, since it is not his destiny to die here far away from those he loves.
 It is his fate to see his family 115 and come back home, to his own native land.”

1. One of the standard epithets for Hermes.

2. Food of the gods.

Calypso shuddered and let fly at him.
 “You cruel, jealous gods! You bear a grudge whenever any goddess takes a man to sleep with as a lover in her bed. 120 Just so the gods who live at ease were angry when rosy-fingered Dawn took up Orion,<sup>3</sup> and from her golden throne, chaste Artemis attacked and killed him with her gentle arrows.
 Demeter with the cornrows in her hair 125 indulged her own desire, and she made love with Iasion in triple-furrowed fields—till Zeus found out, hurled flashing flame and killed him.<sup>4</sup> So now, you male gods are upset with me for living with a man. A man I saved! 130 Zeus pinned his ship and with his flash of lightning smashed it to pieces. All his friends were killed out on the wine-dark sea. This man alone, clutching the keel, was swept by wind and wave, and came here, to my home. I cared for him 135 and loved him, and I vowed to to set him free from time and death forever. Still, I know no other god can change the will of Zeus.
 So let him go, if that is Zeus’ order, across the barren sea. I will not give 140 an escort for this trip across the water; I have no ships or rowers. But I will share what I know with him, and gladly give useful advice so he can safely reach his home.”

The mediator, Zeus’ servant, 145 replied, “Then send him now, avoid the wrath of Zeus, do not enrage him, or one day his rage will hurt you.” With these words, he vanished.

Acknowledging the edict sent from Zeus, the goddess went to find Odysseus. 150 She found him on the shore. His eyes were always tearful; he wept sweet life away, in longing to go back home, since she no longer pleased him.
 He had no choice. He spent his nights with her inside her hollow cave, not wanting her 155 though she still wanted him. By day he sat out on the rocky beach, in tears and grief, staring in heartbreak at the fruitless sea.

The goddess stood by him and said, “Poor man!
 Stop grieving, please. You need not waste your life. 160

3. Orion was a human hunter with whom Dawn fell in love; the huntress goddess, Artemis, shot and killed him.

4. Demeter, goddess of the harvest, fell in love with Iasion (and in some versions had two sons by him); Zeus killed him with a thunderbolt.

I am quite ready now to send you off.
 Using your sword of bronze, cut trunks and build a raft, fix decks across, and let it take you across the misty sea. I will provide water, red wine, and food, to stop you starving, 165 and I will give you clothes, and send a wind to blow you safely home, if this is what those sky gods want. They are more powerful than me; they get their way.”

Odysseus,

informed by many years of pain and loss, 170 shuddered and let his words fly out at her.
 “Goddess, you have some other scheme in mind, not my safe passage. You are telling me to cross this vast and terrifying gulf, in just a raft, when even stable schooners 175 sped on by winds from Zeus would not succeed?
 No, goddess, I will not get on a raft, unless you swear to me a mighty oath you are not planning yet more pain for me.”

At that, divine Calypso smiled at him. 180
 She reached out and caressed him with her hand, saying, “You scalawag! What you have said shows that you understand how these things work.
 But by this earth, and by the sky above, and by the waters of the Styx<sup>5</sup> below, 185 which is the strongest oath for blessed gods,
 I swear I will not plot more pain for you.
 I have made plans for you as I would do for my own self, if I were in your place.
 I am not made of iron; no, my heart 190 is kind and decent, and I pity you.”

And with those words, the goddess quickly turned and led the way; he followed in her footsteps.
 They reached the cave together, man and goddess.
 The chair that Hermes had been sitting on 195 was empty now; Odysseus sat there.
 The goddess gave him human food and drink.
 She sat and faced godlike Odysseus while slave girls brought her nectar and ambrosia.
 They reached to take the good things set before them, 200
 and satisfied their hunger and their thirst.

The goddess-queen began. “Odysseus, son of Laertes, blessed by Zeus—your plans are always changing. Do you really want to go back to that home you love so much? 205

5. River of the underworld.

Well then, good-bye! But if you understood how gluttoned you will be with suffering before you reach your home, you would stay here with me and be immortal—though you might still wish to see that wife you always pine for. 210 And anyway, I know my body is better than hers is. I am taller too.
 Mortals can never rival the immortals in beauty.”

So Odysseus, with tact, said “Do not be enraged at me, great goddess. 215
 You are quite right. I know my modest wife Penelope could never match your beauty.
 She is a human; you are deathless, ageless.
 But even so, I want to go back home, and every day I hope that day will come. 220
 If some god strikes me on the wine-dark sea,
 I will endure it. By now I am used to suffering—I have gone through so much, at sea and in the war. Let this come too.”

The sun went down and brought the darkness on. 225
 They went inside the hollow cave and took the pleasure of their love, held close together.

When vernal Dawn first touched the sky with flowers, they rose and dressed: Odysseus put on his cloak and tunic, and Calypso wore 230 her fine long robe of silver. Round her waist she wrapped a golden belt, and veiled her head.
 Then she prepared the journey for the man.
 She gave an axe that fitted in his grip, its handle made of finest olive wood; 235 its huge bronze blade was sharp on either side.
 She also gave a polished adze. She led him out to the island’s end, where tall trees grew:
 black poplar, alder, fir that touched the sky,
 good for a nimble boat of seasoned timber. 240
 When she had shown him where the tall trees grew, Calypso, queen of goddesses, went home.
 Odysseus began and made good progress.
 With his bronze axe he cut down twenty trunks, polished them skillfully and planed them straight. 245 Calypso brought a gimlet and he drilled through every plank and fitted them together, fixing it firm with pegs and fastenings.
 As wide as when a man who knows his trade marks out the curving hull to fit a ship, 250 so wide Odysseus marked out his raft.
 He notched the side decks to the close-set frame and fixed long planks along the ribs to finish.

He set a mast inside, and joined to it a yardarm and a rudder to steer straight. 255
 He heaped the boat with brush, and caulked the sides with wickerwork, to keep the water out.
 Calypso brought him fabric for a sail,
 and he constructed that with equal skill.
 He fastened up the braces, clews and halyards, 260 and using levers, launched her on the sea.

The work had taken four days; on the fifth Calypso let him go. She washed and dressed him in clothes that smelled of incense. On the raft she put a flask of wine, a bigger flask 265 of water, and a large supply of food.
 She sent him off with gentle, lukewarm breezes.
 Gladly Odysseus spread out his sails to catch the wind; with skill he steered the rudder.
 No sleep fell on his eyes; he watched the stars, 270
 the Pleiades, late-setting Boötes, and Bear, which people also call the Plow, which circles in one place, and marks Orion—the only star that has no share of Ocean.<sup>6</sup> Calypso, queen of goddesses, had told him 275 to keep the Bear on his left side while sailing.
 He sailed the sea for seven days and ten,
 and on the eighteenth day, a murky mountain of the Phaeacian land appeared—it rose up like a shield beyond the misty sea. 280

Returning from the Ethiopians, and pausing on Mount Solyma, Poseidon, Master of Earthquakes, saw the distant raft.<sup>7</sup>
 Enraged, he shook his head and told himself,

“This is outrageous! So it seems the gods 285 have changed their plans about Odysseus while I was absent! He has almost reached Phaeacia, where it is his destiny to flee the rope of pain that binds him now.
 But I will goad him to more misery, 290 till he is sick of it.”

He gathered up
 the clouds, and seized his trident and stirred round the sea and roused the gusts of every wind, and covered earth and sea with fog. Night stretched from heaven. Eurus, Notus, blasting Zephyr 295

6. The idea is that the Plow (Big Dipper) is the only constellation that stays above the horizon all year round. This is not true in astronomical fact; other constellations also remain visible year round.

7. The Solymi people, and the Solyma mountain, were in Lycia, in eastern Greece; the geography requires the god to have extremely good eyesight, since Odysseus is sailing in the west.

and Boreas,<sup>8</sup> the child of sky, all fell and rolled a mighty wave. Odysseus grew weak at knees. He cried out in despair, “More pain? How will it end? I am afraid the goddess spoke the truth: that I will have a sea of sufferings before I reach my homeland. It is coming true! Zeus whirls the air. Look at those clouds! He agitates the waves, as winds attack from all directions.
 I can hold on to one thing: certain death.
 Those Greeks were lucky, three and four times over, who died upon the plain of Troy to help the sons of Atreus. I wish I had died that same day the mass of Trojans hurled their bronze-tipped spears at me around the corpse of Peleus’ son.<sup>9</sup> I would have had a funeral, and honor from the Greeks;
 but now I have to die this cruel death!”

A wave crashed onto him, and overturned the raft, and he fell out. The rudder slipped out of his hands. The winds blew all directions and one enormous gust snapped off the mast.
 The sail and yardarm drifted out to sea.
 Then for a long time rushing, crashing waves kept him submerged: he could not reach the surface.
 The clothes Calypso gave him weighed him down.
 At last he rose and spat the sour saltwater out of his mouth—it gushed forth in a torrent.
 Despite his pain and weakness, he remembered his raft, and lunged to get it through the waves;
 he climbed on top of it and clung to life.
 The great waves carried it this way and that.
 As when the thistles, clumping close together, are borne across the prairie by the North Wind, so these winds swept the raft across the sea.
 The South Wind hurls it, then the North Wind grabs it, then East Wind yields and lets the West Wind drive it.
 But stepping softly, Ino,<sup>1</sup> the White Goddess, Cadmus’ child, once human, human-voiced,
 now honored with the gods in salty depths, noticed that he was suffering and lost, with pity. Like a gull with wings outstretched she rose up from the sea, sat on the raft
 and said,

“Poor man! Why does enraged Poseidon create an odyssey<sup>2</sup> of pain for you?”

8. The four winds.

9. The reference is to Achilles.

1. Ino was a human girl transformed into a sea nymph.

2. The original uses a verb that puns on Odysseus’s name: odysat, which means “he hated” or “he was angry at.”

But his hostility will not destroy you.
 You seem intelligent. Do as I say.
 Strip off your clothes and leave the raft behind for winds to take away. With just your arms swim to Phaeacia. Fate decrees that there 345 you will survive. Here, take my scarf and tie it under your chest: with this immortal veil, you need not be afraid of death or danger.
 But when you reach dry earth, untie the scarf and throw it out to sea, away from land, 350 and turn away." With that, the goddess gave it, and plunged back down inside the surging sea, just like a gull. The black wave covered her.

The hero who had suffered so much danger was troubled and confused. He asked himself, 355
 "Some deity has said to leave the raft.
 But what if gods are weaving tricks again?
 I will not trust her yet: with my own eyes
 I saw the land she said I should escape to, and it is far away. I will do this: 360 as long as these wood timbers hold together, I will hang on, however hard it is.
 But when the waves have smashed my raft to pieces, then I will have no choice, and I will swim."

While he was thinking this, the Lord of Earthquakes, 365 Poseidon, roused a huge and dreadful wave that arched above his head: he hurled it at him.
 As when a fierce wind ruffles up a heap of dry wheat chaff; it scatters here and there;
 so were the raft's long timbers flung apart. 370
 He climbed astride a plank and rode along as if on horseback. He took off the clothes Calypso gave him, but he tied the scarf around his chest, and dove into the sea, spreading his arms to swim. The Lord of Earthquakes 375 saw him and nodded, muttering, "At last you are in pain! Go drift across the sea, till you meet people blessed by Zeus, the Sky Lord.
 But even then, I think you will not lack for suffering." He spurred his fine-maned horses, 380 and went to Aegae, where he had his home.

Athena, child of Zeus, devised a plan.
 She blocked the path of all the other winds, told them to cease and made them go to sleep, but roused swift Boreas and smoothed the waves 385 in front of him, so that Odysseus could reach Phaeacia and escape from death.

Two days and nights he drifted on the waves:
 each moment he expected he would die.

But when the Dawn with dazzling braids brought day 390 for the third time, the wind died down. No breeze, but total calm. As he was lifted up by an enormous wave, he scanned around, and saw the shore nearby. As when a father lies sick and weak for many days, tormented 395 by some cruel spirit, till at last the gods restore him back to life; his children feel great joy; Odysseus felt that same joy when he saw land. He swam and longed to set his feet on earth. But when he was in earshot, he heard the boom of surf against the rocks. 400
 The mighty waves were crashing on the shore, a dreadful belching. Everything was covered in salty foam. There were no sheltering harbors for ships, just sheer crags, reefs and solid cliffs. 405 Odysseus' heart and legs gave way.
 Shaken but purposeful, he told himself,

"Zeus went beyond my hopes and let me see dry land! I made it, cutting the abyss!
 But I see no way out from this gray sea. 410
 There are steep cliffs offshore, and all around the rushing water roars; the rock runs sheer;
 the sea is deep near shore; there is no way to set my feet on land without disaster.
 If I attempt to scramble out, a wave 415 will seize and dash me on the jagged rock;
 a useless effort. But if I swim on farther, looking for bays or coves or slanting beaches, storm winds may seize me once again and drag me, howling with grief, towards the fish-filled sea. 420
 A god may even send a great sea-monster, the kind that famous Amphitrite<sup>3</sup> rears.
 I know Poseidon wants to do me harm."

As he was thinking this, the waves grew big and hurled him at the craggy shore. His skin 425 would have been ripped away, and his bones smashed, had not Athena given him a thought.
 He grabbed a rock as he was swept along with both hands, and clung to it, groaning, till the wave passed by. But then the swell rushed back, 430 and struck him hard and hurled him out to sea.
 As when an octopus, dragged from its den, has many pebbles sticking to its suckers,
 so his strong hands were skinned against the rocks.
 A mighty wave rolled over him again. 435
 He would have died too soon, in misery, without the inspiration of Athena.

He came up from the wave that spewed to shore and swam towards the land, in search of beaches with gradual slopes, or inlets from the sea.

440

He swam until he reached a river's mouth with gentle waters; that place seemed ideal, smooth and not stony, sheltered from the wind.
He sensed its current; in his heart he prayed,

"Unknown god, hear me! How I longed for you!
I have escaped the salt sea and Poseidon.
Even the deathless gods respect a man who is as lost as I am now. I have gone through so much and reached your flowing streams.
Pity me, lord! I am your suppliant."

445

450

The current ceased; the River God restrained the waves and made them calm. He brought him safe into the river mouth. His legs cramped up; the sea had broken him. His swollen body gushed brine from mouth and nostrils. There he lay, winded and silent, hardly fit to move.

455

A terrible exhaustion overcame him.

When he could breathe and think again, he took the goddess' scarf off, and let it go into the river flowing to the sea;

460

strong currents swept it down and Ino's hands took it. He crawled on land and crouched beside the reeds and bent to kiss life-giving earth, and trembling, he spoke to his own heart.

"What now? What will become of me? If I stay up all wretched night beside this river, the cruel frost and gentle dew together may finish me: my life is thin with weakness.
At dawn a cold breeze blows beside the river.
But if I climb the slope to those dark woods and go to rest in that thick undergrowth, letting sweet sleep take hold of me, and losing my cold and weariness—wild beasts may find me and treat me as their prey."

470

But he decided to go into the woods. He found a place beside a clearing, near the water's edge.
He crawled beneath two bushes grown together, of thorn and olive.<sup>4</sup> No strong wet wind could blow through them, no shining sunbeam ever strike them,

475

4. The first bush is either wild olive or fig or evergreen thorn. The olive wood is significant in that it is Athena's tree: the goddess is still watching over her favorite.

no rain could penetrate them; they were growing 480 so thickly intertwined. Odysseus crept under, and he scraped a bed together, of leaves: there were enough to cover two against the worst of winter. Seeing this,
 the hero who had suffered for so long 485 was happy. He lay down inside and heaped more leaves on top. As when a man who lives out on a lonely farm that has no neighbors buries a glowing torch inside black embers to save the seed of fire and keep a source— 490 so was Odysseus concealed in leaves.
 Athena poured down sleep to shut his eyes so all his painful weariness could end.

BOOK 6

[A Princess and Her Laundry]

Odysseus had suffered. In exhaustion from all his long ordeals, the hero slept.
 Meanwhile, Athena went to the Phaeacians.
 This people used to live in Hyperia, a land of dancing. But their mighty neighbors, 5 the Cyclopes, kept looting them, and they could not hold out. Their king, Nausithous, brought them to Scheria, a distant place,
 and built a wall around the town, and homes, and temples to the gods, and plots of land. 10
 He went to Hades. Then Alcinous, who has god-given wisdom, came to power.
 Bright-eyed Athena traveled to his palace,
 to help Odysseus' journey home.
 She went inside the decorated bedroom 15
 where the young princess, Nausicaa, was sleeping, as lovely as a goddess. Slaves were sleeping outside her doorway, one on either side;
 two charming girls with all the Graces' gifts.
 The shining doors were shut, but like the wind 20
 the goddess reached the bed of Nausicaa, disguised as her best friend, a girl her age,
 the daughter of the famous sailor Dymas.
 Sharp-eyed Athena said,

“Oh, Nausicaa!

So lazy! But your mother should have taught you! 25
 Your clothes are lying there in dirty heaps, though you will soon be married, and you need a pretty dress to wear, and clothes to give to all your bridesmaids. That impresses people, and makes the parents happy. When day comes, 30

we have to do the laundry. I will come and help you, so the work will soon be done.
 Surely you will not long remain unmarried.
 The best young men here in your native land already want to court you. So at dawn 35 go ask your father for the cart with mules, to carry dresses, scarves, and sheets. You should ride there, not walk; the washing pools are far from town."

The goddess looked into her eyes, then went back to Olympus, which they say 40 is where the gods will have their home forever.
 The place is never shaken by the wind, or wet with rain or blanketed by snow.
 A cloudless sky is spread above the mountain, white radiance all round. The blessed gods 45 live there in happiness forevermore.

Then Dawn came from her lovely throne, and woke the girl. She was amazed, remembering her dream, and in a fine dress, went to tell her parents, whom she found inside the hall. 50
 Her mother sat beside the hearth and spun sea-purpled yarn, her house girls all around her.
 Her father was just heading out to council with his renowned advisors, since his people had called him to a meeting. She stood near him 55
 and said,

"Dear Daddy, please would you set up the wagon with the big smooth wheels for me, so I can take my fine clothes to the river to wash them? They are dirty. And you too should wear clean clothes for meeting your advisors, 60 dressed in your best to make important plans.
 Your five sons also—two of whom are married, but three are strapping single men—they always want to wear nice fresh-laundered clothes when they are going dancing. This is on my mind." 65

She said this since she felt too shy to talk of marriage to her father. But he knew, and answered, "Child, I would not grudge the mules or anything you want. Go on! The slaves can fit the wagon with its cargo rack." 70

He called the household slaves, and they obeyed.
 They made the wagon ready and inspected its wheels, led up the mules, and yoked them to it.
 The girl brought out the multicolored clothes, and put them on the cart, while in a basket 75 her mother packed nutritious food for her—a varied meal, with olives, cheese, and wine, stored in a goatskin. Then the girl got in.

 Her mother handed her a golden flask of oil, to use when she had had her bath. 80 Then Nausicaa took up the whip and reins, and cracked the whip. The mules were on their way, eager to go and rattling the harness, bringing the clothes and girl and all her slaves.
 They reached the lovely river where the pools 85 are always full—the water flows in streams and bubbles up from underneath, to wash even the dirtiest of laundry. There they freed the mules and drove them to the river to graze on honeyed grass beside the stream. 90
 The girls brought out the laundry from the cart, and brought it to the washing pools and trod it, competing with each other. When the dirt was gone, they spread the clothes along the shore, where salt sea washes pebbles to the beach. 95
 They bathed and rubbed themselves with olive oil.
 Then they sat on the riverbank and ate,
 and waited for the sun to dry the clothes.
 But when they finished eating, they took off their head-scarves to play ball. The white-armed princess 100 led them in play—like Artemis the archer, running across the heights of Taygetus and Erymanthus; she is glad to run with boars and fleet-foot deer. The rustic daughters of Zeus the Aegis King play round about her, 105 while Leto is delighted in her heart, seeing her daughter far above the rest, though all are beautiful. So Nausicaa stood out above them all. But when the girl was thinking she should head for home and yoke 110 the mules, and pack the laundry up again, Athena's eyes flashed bright. Odysseus must wake up, see the pretty girl, and have an escort to the town of the Phaeacians.
 The princess threw the ball towards a slave girl, 115 who missed the catch. It fell down in an eddy;
 the girls all started screaming, very loudly.
 Odysseus woke up, and thought things over.

“What is this country I have come to now?
 Are all the people wild and violent, 120 or good, hospitable, and god-fearing?
 I heard the sound of female voices. Is it nymphs, who frequent the craggy mountaintops, and river streams and meadows lush with grass?

Or could this noise I hear be human voices?
I have to try to find out who they are.” 125

Odysseus jumped up from out the bushes.
Grasping a leafy branch he broke it off to cover up his manly private parts.
Just as a mountain lion trusts its strength, 130 and beaten by the rain and wind, its eyes burn bright as it attacks the cows or sheep, or wild deer, and hunger drives it on to try the sturdy pens of sheep—so need impelled Odysseus to come upon 135 the girls with pretty hair, though he was naked.
All caked with salt, he looked a dreadful sight.
They ran along the shore quite terrified, some here, some there. But Nausicaa stayed still.
Athena made her legs stop trembling 140 and gave her courage in her heart. She stood there.
He wondered, should he touch her knees, or keep some distance and use charming words, to beg the pretty girl to show him to the town, and give him clothes. At last he thought it best 145 to keep some distance and use words to beg her.
The girl might be alarmed at being touched.
His words were calculated flattery.

“My lady, please! Are you divine or human?
If you are some great goddess from the sky, 150 you look like Zeus’ daughter Artemis—you are as tall and beautiful as she.
But if you live on earth and are a human,
your mother and your father must be lucky, your brothers also—lucky three times over. 155
Their hearts must be delighted, seeing you, their flourishing new sprout, the dancers’ leader.
And that man will be luckiest by far,
who takes you home with dowry, as his bride.
I have seen no one like you. Never, no one. 160
My eyes are dazzled when I look at you.
I traveled once to Delos, on my way to war and suffering; my troops marched with me.
Beside Apollo’s altar sprang a sapling, a fresh young palm. I gazed at it and marveled. 165
I never saw so magical a tree.
My lady, you transfix me that same way.
I am in awe of you, afraid to touch your knees. But I am desperate. I came from Ogygia, and for twenty days storm winds 170 and waves were driving me, adrift until yesterday some god washed me up right here, perhaps to meet more suffering. I think my troubles will not end until the gods have done their all. My lady, pity me. 175 Battered and wrecked, I come to you, you first—and I know no one else in this whole country.

 Show me the town, give me some rags to wear,
 if you brought any clothes when you came here.
 So may the gods grant all your heart's desires, 180
 a home and husband, somebody like-minded.
 For nothing could be better than when two live in one house, their minds in harmony, husband and wife. Their enemies are jealous, their friends delighted, and they have great honor." 185

Then white-armed Nausicaa replied, "Well, stranger, you seem a brave and clever man; you know that Zeus apportions happiness to people, to good and bad, each one as he decides.
 Your troubles come from him, and you must bear them. 190
 But since you have arrived here in our land, you will not lack for clothes or anything
 a person needs in times of desperation.
 I will show you the town. The people here are called Phaeacians, and I am the daughter 195 of the great King Alcinous, on whom depends the strength and power of our people."

And then she called her slaves with braided hair.
 "Wait, girls! Why are you running from this man?
 Do you believe he is an enemy? 200
 No living person ever born would come to our Phaeacia with a hostile mind, since we are much beloved by the gods.
 Our island is remote, washed round by sea;
 we have no human contact. But this man 205 is lost, poor thing. We must look after him.
 All foreigners and beggars come from Zeus, and any act of kindness is a blessing.
 So give the stranger food and drink, and wash him down in the river, sheltered from the wind." 210
 They stopped, and egged each other on to take Odysseus to shelter, as the princess, the daughter of Alcinous, had told them.
 They gave him clothes, a tunic and a cloak, the olive oil in the golden flask, 215 and led him down to wash beside the river.
 Odysseus politely said,

"Now, girls,
 wait at a distance here, so I can wash my grimy back, and rub myself with oil—it has been quite a while since I have done it. 220

Please let me wash in private. I am shy of being naked with you—pretty girls with lovely hair.”

So they withdrew, and told their mistress. Then he used the river water to scrub the brine off from his back and shoulders, 225 and wash the crusty sea salt from his hair.
But when he was all clean and richly oiled, dressed in the clothes the young unmarried girl had given him, Athena made him look bigger and sturdier, and made his hair 230 grow curling tendrils like a hyacinth.
As when Athena and Hephaestus teach a knowledgeable craftsman every art, and he pours gold on silver, making objects more beautiful—just so Athena poured 235 attractiveness across his head and shoulders.
Then he went off and sat beside the sea;
his handsomeness was dazzling. The girl was shocked. She told her slaves with tidy hair, “Now listen to me, girls! The gods who live 240 on Mount Olympus must have wished this man to come in contact with my godlike people.
Before, he looked so poor and unrefined;
now he is like a god that lives in heaven.
I hope I get a man like this as husband, 245 a man that lives here and would like to stay.
But, girls, now give the stranger food and drink!”

She gave her orders and the girls obeyed—they gave Odysseus some food and drink.
He wolfed the food and drank. He was half starved; 250 it had been ages since he tasted food.
Then white-armed Nausicaa had formed a plan.
Folding the clothes, she packed them in the wagon,
and yoked the mules, and then she climbed inside.
She gave Odysseus some clear instructions. 255

“Stranger, get ready; you must go to town, and I will have you meet the best of all our people. You seem smart; do as I say.
While we are passing through the fields and farmlands, you have to follow quickly with the girls 260 behind the mules, and let me lead the way.
Then we will reach the lofty city wall, which has a scenic port on either side, and one slim gate, where curved ships are drawn up along the road: a special spot for each. 265
The meeting place surrounds Poseidon’s shrine, fitted with heavy stones set deep in earth.

And there the workers make the ships' equipment—cables and sails—and there they plane the oars. 270 Phaeacians do not care for archery;
 their passion is for sails and oars and ships,
 on which they love to cross the dark-gray ocean.
 The people in the town are proud; I worry that they may speak against me. Someone rude may say, 'Who is that big strong man with her? 275 Where did she find that stranger? Will he be her husband? She has got him from a ship, a foreigner, since no one lives near here,
 or else a god, the answer to her prayers, descended from the sky to hold her tight. 280 Better if she has found herself a man from elsewhere, since she scorns the people here, although she has so many noble suitors.'
 So they will shame me. I myself would blame a girl who got too intimate with men 285 before her marriage, and who went against her loving parents' rules. But listen, stranger, I will explain the quickest way to gain my father's help to make your way back home.
 Beside the road there is a grove of poplars; 290
 it has a fountain, and a meadow round it.
 It is Athena's place, where Father has his orchard and estate,<sup>5</sup> as far from town as human voice can carry. Sit down there and wait until I reach my father's house 295 in town. But when you think I have arrived, walk on and ask directions for the palace of King Alcinous, my mighty father.
 It will be very easy finding it; a tiny child could guide you there. It is 300 unlike the other houses in Phaeacia.
 Go through the courtyard, in the house and on straight to the Great Hall. You will find my mother sitting beside the hearth by firelight, and spinning her amazing purple wool. 305
 She leans against a pillar, slaves behind her.
 My father has a throne right next to hers;
 he sits and sips his wine, just like a god.
 But pass him by, embrace my mother's knees to supplicate. If you do this, you quickly 310 will reach your home, however far it is, in happiness. If she is good to you, and looks upon you kindly in her heart,
 you can be sure of getting to your house, back to your family and native land." 315

5. The "estate," temenos, is land set apart for a king or a temple precinct.

With that, she used her shining whip to urge the mules to go. They left the river streams, and trotted well and clipped their hooves along.
 She drove an easy pace to let her slaves and great Odysseus keep up on foot. 320
 The sun was setting when they reached the grove, the famous sanctuary of Athena.
 Odysseus sat in it, and at once he prayed to mighty Zeus' daughter.

“Hear me,
 daughter of Zeus! Unvanquished Queen! If ever, 325 when that earth-shaker god was wrecking me, you helped me—may they pity me and give me kind welcome in Phaeacia.” And Athena heard him but did not yet appear to him, respecting her own uncle<sup>6</sup> in his fury 330 against Odysseus till he reached home.

[A Magical Kingdom]

Odysseus sat patiently and prayed.
 Meanwhile, the fine strong mules conveyed the girl to town; she reached her father's palace gate.
 Her brothers gathered round her like immortals.
 They took the harness off the mules and brought 5 the clothes inside. She went to her own room.
 Eurymedusa, her old slave, had lit a fire for her. This woman had been brought from Apeire by ship, long years before.
 The people chose to give her to the king, 10 because they bowed before him like a god.
 She used to babysit young Nausicaa, and now she lit her fire and cooked her meal.

Odysseus walked briskly to the town.
 Athena helpfully surrounded him 15 with mist that kept him safe from rude remarks from people who might ask him who he was.
 When he had almost reached the lovely city, bright-eyed Athena met him, like a girl, young and unmarried, with a water pitcher. 20
 She stopped in front of him. Odysseus
 said,

“Child, would you escort me to the house of King Alcinous, who rules this land?
 I have been through hard times. I traveled here from far away; I am a foreigner, and I know no one who lives here in town or anywhere round here.” 25

With twinkling eyes
the goddess answered, “Mr. Foreigner,
I will take you to where you want to go.
The king lives near my father’s home. But you 30 must walk in silence. Do not look at people, and ask no questions. People here are not too keen on strangers coming from abroad, although they like to cross the sea themselves.
They know their ships go very fast. Poseidon 35 gave them this gift. Their boats can fly like wings, or quick as thoughts.”

The goddess led him there.
He followed closely in her skipping steps.
The seafaring Phaeacians did not see him as he passed through the town, since that great goddess, 40 pigtailed Athena, in her care for him made him invisible with magic mist.
He was amazed to see the ships and harbors and meeting places of the noblemen, and high walls set with stakes on top—a wonder! 45
They reached the splendid palace of the king.
Divine Athena winked at him and said, “Here, Mr. Foreigner, this is the house you wanted me to take you to. You will find them, the king and queen, inside at dinner. 50 Do not be scared; go in. The brave succeed in all adventures, even those who come from countries far away. First greet the queen.
Arete is her name.<sup>7</sup> The king and queen 55 have common ancestry—Nausithous.
Eurymedon was long ago the king over the Giants, who were proud and bad.
He killed them, his own people, and then he got killed as well. His youngest daughter was named Periboea. She was very pretty. 60 Poseidon slept with her. She had a child, Nausithous, and he became the king here in Phaeacia, and he had two sons, our King Alcinous, and Rhexenor.
Apollo shot that Rhexenor when he 65 was newly married, with no son. He left a daughter, our Arete, and her uncle, Alcinous, made her his wife. No woman is honored as he honors her. She is precious to him, her children, and the people. 70

 We look at her as if she were a goddess, and point her out when she walks through our town.
 She is extremely clever and perceptive;
 she solves disputes to help the men she likes.
 If she looks on you kindly in her heart, 75
 you have a chance of seeing those you love, and getting back again to your big house and homeland.”

So bright-eyed Athena left him.
 She went from lovely Scheria, across the tireless sea, to Marathon and Athens, 80 and went inside Erechtheus' palace.<sup>8</sup>

Odysseus approached the royal house, and stood there by the threshold made of bronze.
 His heart was mulling over many things.
 The palace of the mighty king was high, 85 and shone like rays of sunlight or of moonlight.
 The walls were bronze all over, from the entrance back to the bedrooms, and along them ran a frieze of blue. Gold doors held safe the house.
 Pillars of silver rose up from the threshold, 90
 the lintel silver, and the handle, gold.
 Silver and golden dogs stood at each side, made by Hephaestus<sup>9</sup> with great artistry, to guard the home of brave Alcinous—immortal dogs, unaging for all time. 95
 At intervals were seats set in the walls, right from the doorway to the inner rooms,
 with soft embroidered throws, the work of women.
 Phaeacian lords and ladies sat upon them, eating and drinking, since they lacked for nothing. 100 Boys made of gold were set on pedestals, and they held burning torches in their hands, lighting the hall at night for those at dinner.
 The king had fifty slave girls in his house;
 some ground the yellow grain upon the millstone, 105 others wove cloth and sat there spinning yarn, with fingers quick as rustling poplar leaves, and oil was dripping from the woven fabric.<sup>1</sup>
 Just as Phaeacian men have special talent for launching ships to sea, the women there 110 are expert weavers, since Athena gave them fine minds and skill to make most lovely things.
 Outside the courtyard by the doors there grows an orchard of four acres, hedged around.

 The trees are tall, luxuriant with fruit: 115 bright-colored apples, pears and pomegranate, sweet figs and fertile olives, and the crop never runs out or withers in the winter, nor in the summer. Fruit grows all year round.
 The West Wind always blows and makes it swell 120 and ripen: mellowing pear on mellowing pear, apple on apple, grapes on grapes, and figs.
 A fertile vineyard too is planted there.
 They use the warmer side, a flattened slope, for drying grapes in sunshine. They pick bunches 125 and trample them, while unripe clusters open and shed their blooms, and others turn to purple.
 There are two springs: one flows all through the garden,
 the other gushes from the courtyard threshold, towards the palace, and the people draw 130 freshwater. So the gods had blessed the house of King Alcinous with lovely gifts.
 Hardened, long-suffering Odysseus stood there and stared, astonished in his heart, then quickly strode across the palace threshold. 135
 He found the lordly leaders of Phaeacia pouring drink offerings for sharp-eyed Hermes, to whom they give libations before bed.
 Odysseus went in the house disguised in mist with which Athena covered him, 140 until he reached Arete and the king.
 He threw his arms around Arete's knees, and all at once, the magic mist dispersed.
 They were astonished when they saw the man, and all fell silent. Then Odysseus 145
 said,

"Queen Arete, child of Rhexenor,
 I have had many years of pain and loss.
 I beg you, and your husband, and these men who feast here—may the gods bless you in life, and may you leave your children wealth and honor. 150
 Now help me, please, to get back home, and quickly!
 I miss my family. I have been gone so long it hurts."

He sat down by the hearth among the ashes of the fire. They all were silent till Echeneus spoke up. 155
 He was an elder statesman of Phaeacia, a skillful orator and learned man.
 Wanting to help, he said,

“Alcinous,
 you know it is not right to leave a stranger sitting there on the floor beside the hearth 160 among the cinders. Everyone is waiting for you to give the word. Make him get up, and seat him on a silver chair, and order wine to be poured, so we may make libations to Zeus the Thunderlord, who loves the needy. 165
 The house girl ought to bring the stranger food out from the storeroom.”

So Alcinous
 reached for Odysseus’ hand, and raised the many-minded hero from the ashes.
 He made Laodamas, his favorite son, 170 vacate his chair so he could sit beside him.
 The slave girl brought him water in a pitcher of gold to wash his hands, and poured it out over a silver bowl, and fetched a table of polished wood; a humble slave brought out 175 bread and an ample plateful of the meat.
 Half-starved and weak, the hero ate and drank.
 Majestic King Alcinous addressed
 Pontonous, the wine boy.

“Go and mix
 a bowl and serve the wine to all our guests, 180 so we may offer drink to thundering Zeus who blesses those in need.” The boy mixed up the sweet, delicious wine, and filled the cups for everyone, with first pour for the gods.
 They made the offerings and drank as much 185 as they desired, and then Alcinous
 said,

“Listen, lords. Hear what my heart commands.
 The feast is over; go home, go to bed.
 At dawn, we will call more of our best men, and host the stranger in our halls, and offer 190 fine sacrifices to the gods, then plan how we may help his journey, so our guest may travel quickly, without pain or trouble, encountering no trouble on the way, however far away it is, until 195 he reaches home. Once there, he must endure whatever was spun out when he was born by Fate and by the heavy ones, the Spinners.<sup>2</sup>
 But if he is immortal, come from heaven,

2. The Spinners are imagined in Greek mythology as three old female figures who construct the thread of human destiny—associated here with Fate, the “share” allotted to humans in life.

the gods have changed their ways, since in the past they used to show themselves to us directly whenever we would give them hecatombs.

They sit and eat among us. Even if just one of us meets them alone, out walking, they do not hide from us; we are close friends, as are the Giants and Cyclopic peoples.”

Odysseus, with careful calculation,
said,

“No, Alcinous, please think again.
I am not like the deathless gods in heaven.
My height is normal. I look like a human.
In pain I am a match for any man, whoever you may know that suffers most.
I could tell many stories of the dangers that I have suffered through; gods willed it so.
But let me have my meal, despite my grief.
The belly is just like a whining dog:
it begs and forces one to notice it,
despite exhaustion or the depths of sorrow.
My heart is full of sorrow, but my stomach is always telling me to eat and drink.
It tells me to forget what I have suffered, and fill it up. At dawn tomorrow, help me to reach my homeland, after all this pain.
May I live out my final days in sight of my own property and slaves and home.”

They all agreed the stranger’s words made sense, and that he should be sent back home. They poured drink offerings to the gods, and drank as much as they desired, then all went home to bed.
Odysseus was left there in the hall,
sitting beside Arete and the godlike Alcinous. The dishes from the feast were cleaned up by the slaves. White-armed Arete had noticed his fine clothes, the cloak and shirt she wove herself, with help from her slave girls.
Her words flew out to him as if on wings.

“Stranger, let me be first to speak to you.
Where are you from? And who gave you those clothes?
I thought you said you drifted here by sea?”

Planning his words with careful skill, he answered, “It would be difficult, Your Majesty, to tell it all; the gods have given me so many troubles. I will tell you this.
There is an island, far out in the sea,

Ogygia, where the child of Atlas lives, 245 the mighty goddess with smooth braids, the crafty Calypso, friend to neither gods nor mortals.
 A spirit brought me to her hearth, alone, when Zeus scooped up my ship and with bright lightning split it apart across the wine-dark sea. 250
 All of my comrades, my brave friends, were killed.
 I wrapped my arms around the keel and floated for ten days. On the tenth black night, the gods carried me till I reached Ogygia, home of the beautiful and mighty goddess 255 Calypso. Lovingly she cared for me, vowing to set me free from death and time forever. But she never swayed my heart.
 I stayed for seven years; she gave me clothes like those of gods, but they were always wet 260 with tears. At last the eighth year rolled around, and word came down from Zeus that I must go, and finally her mind was changed. She sent me upon a well-bound wooden raft, equipped with food, sweet wine, and clothes as if for gods, 265 and sent a fair warm wind. I sailed the sea for seventeen long days; on day eighteen, the murky mountains of your land appeared, and I was overjoyed, but more bad luck was hurled at me. Poseidon roused the winds 270 to block me, and he stirred the sea. I sobbed, and clung there, going nowhere, till my raft was smashed to pieces by the massive storm.
 But I swam through this gulf of water till the current brought me here. If I had tried 275 to land at once, I would have been swept back against the crags. I swam a way away, until I reached a river mouth, which seemed a perfect spot for landing: it was sheltered from wind, and smooth, quite free from rocks. So there 280 I flopped and tried to gather up my strength until the holy nightfall. Then I crawled out of the rain-fed river to the bank, and hid inside the bushes, and I heaped some leaves to cover me. Some god poured down 285 deep sleep. With heavy heart I slept all night and through the dawn to noon, beneath the leaves.
 Then in the afternoon, when sleep released me,
 I woke, and saw girls playing on the beach—your daughter, like a goddess, and her slaves. 290 I prayed to her. One would not think a girl as young as her would have so much good sense;
 young people are not usually so thoughtful.
 She was so kind to me; she gave me food and wine, and had them wash me in the river, 295 and let me have these clothes. Now I have told you the truth, no matter what.”

Alcinous

said, “Just one of these things my daughter did was not correct: she should have brought you here to us herself, escorted by her slave girls, since you had supplicated first to her.” 300

With careful tact Odysseus replied, “Your daughter is quite wonderful, great king. Please do not blame her. She told me to come here with her slaves, but I was too embarrassed, and nervous. I thought you might get annoyed at seeing me. We humans on this earth are apt to be suspicious.” 305

And the king

replied, “My heart is not the type to feel anger for no good reason. Moderation is always best. Athena, Zeus, Apollo, what a congenial man you are! I wish you would stay here, and marry my own daughter, and be my son. I would give you a home and wealth if you would like to stay. If not, we will not keep you here against your will. May Zeus not have it so! As for your journey, I give my word that you can go tomorrow. Lying down, lulled to sleep, you will be rowed across the peaceful sea until you reach your land and home, or anywhere you want, even beyond Euboea, which our people saw when they carried fair-haired Rhadamanthus to visit Tityus, the son of Gaia.<sup>3</sup> It is supposed to be the farthest shore on earth, but they were there and back that day, not even tired. That shows just how fine my ships are, and my men who stir the sea with oars.” 310 315 320 325

At that Odysseus, who had endured so much, was happy, and he prayed, 330

“O Father Zeus, may everything come true, just as Alcinous has said. So may his fame burn bright forever on the earth, and may I reach my home.”

3. Rhadamanthus is the mythical son of Zeus and Europa, closely associated with Crete. The story of his visit to Tityus is entirely unknown beyond this passage.

Then at these words,
 white-armed Arete called to her attendants 335 to put a bed out on the porch and lay fine purple blankets on it and to spread covers and woolly quilts across the top.
 With torches in their hands they bustled out.
 They made the bed up neatly, very fast, 340 then came and called Odysseus.

“Now guest,
 get up and come outside, your bed is ready.”

Odysseus was glad to go to sleep after his long adventures, on that bed surrounded by the rustling of the porch. 345 Alcinous was sleeping in his room, beside his wife, who made their bed and shared it.

[The Songs of a Poet]

Soon Dawn appeared and touched the sky with roses.
 Majestic, holy King Alcinous leapt out of bed, as did Odysseus, the city-sacker. Then the blessed king, mighty Alcinous, led out his guest 5 to the Phaeacian council by the ships.
 They sat there side by side on polished stones.
 Meanwhile, Athena walked all through the town, appearing like the royal messenger.
 To help Odysseus' journey home, 10
 she stood beside each man in turn and said,

“My lord, come to the meeting place, to learn about the visitor to our king's home.
 Despite his wanderings by sea, he looks like an immortal god.”

So she roused up 15
 the hearts and minds of each, and soon the seats of council were filled up; the men assembled.
 Seeing Laertes' clever son, the crowd marveled. Athena poured unearthly charm upon his head and shoulders, and she made him 20 taller and sturdier, so these Phaeacians would welcome and respect him, when he managed the many trials of skill that they would set to test him. When the people were assembled, Alcinous addressed them.

“Hear me, leaders 25 and chieftains of Phaeacia. I will tell you the promptings of my heart. This foreigner—I do not know his name—came wandering from west or east and showed up at my house.
 He begs and prays for help to travel on. 30
 Let us assist him, as we have before with other guests: no visitor has ever been forced to linger in my house. We always give them safe passage home. Now let us launch a ship for her maiden voyage on the water, 35 and choose a crew of fifty-two, the men selected as the best, and lash the oars beside the benches. Then return to shore, and come to my house. Let the young men hurry to cook a feast. I will provide supplies, 40 plenty for everyone. And I invite you also, lords, to welcome him with me.
 Do not refuse! We also must invite Demodocus, the poet. Gods inspire him, so any song he chooses to perform 45 is wonderful to hear.”

He led the way.
 The lords went with him, and the house boy fetched the bard. The fifty-two select young men went to the shore, just as the king commanded.
 They reached the restless salty sea, and launched 50 the black ship on the depths, set up the mast and sails, and fastened in the oars, by tying each to its leather thole-strap,<sup>4</sup> all in order.
 They spread the white sails wide, and moored the ship out in the water. Then the men walked up 55 towards the mighty palace of the king.
 The halls and porticoes were thronged with people, both old and young. To feed his many guests Alcinous killed twelve sheep, and eight boars with silver tusks, and two slow-lumbering cows. 60 Skinning the animals, they cooked a feast.
 The house boy brought the poet, whom the Muse adored. She gave him two gifts, good and bad:
 she took his sight away, but gave sweet song.
 The wine boy brought a silver-studded chair 65 and propped it by a pillar, in the middle of all the guests, and by a peg he hung the poet's lyre above his head and helped him to reach it, and he set a table by him, and a bread basket and a cup of wine 70 to drink whenever he desired. They all took food. When they were satisfied, the Muse prompted the bard to sing of famous actions, an episode whose fame has touched the sky:

 Achilles' and Odysseus' quarrel— 75 how at a splendid sacrificial feast, they argued bitterly, and Agamemnon was glad because the best of the Achaeans were quarreling, since when he had consulted the oracle at Pytho, crossing over 80 the entry stone, Apollo had foretold that this would be the start of suffering for Greeks and Trojans, through the plans of Zeus.<sup>5</sup> So sang the famous bard. Odysseus with his strong hands picked up his heavy cloak 85 of purple, and he covered up his face.
 He was ashamed to let them see him cry.
 Each time the singer paused, Odysseus wiped tears, drew down the cloak and poured a splash of wine out of his goblet, for the gods. 90 But each time, the Phaeacian nobles urged the bard to sing again—they loved his songs.
 So he would start again; Odysseus would moan and hide his head beneath his cloak.
 Only Alcinous could see his tears, 95 since he was sitting next to him, and heard his sobbing. So he quickly spoke.

“My lords!

We have already satisfied our wish for feasting, and the lyre, the feast's companion.
 Now let us go outside and set up contests 100 in every sport, so when our guest goes home he can tell all his friends we are the best at boxing, wrestling, high-jumping, and sprinting.”

With that he led the way; the others followed.
 The boy took down the lyre from its peg 105 and took Demodocus' hand to lead him out with the crowd who went to watch the games.
 Many young athletes stood there: Acronēus, Ocyalus, Elatreus, Nauteus, Thoön, Anchialus, Eretmeus, 110
 Anabesineus and Ponteus, Prymneus, Proreus, Amphialus, the son of Polynaus, son of Tecton,<sup>6</sup> and Naubolus' son, Euryalus, like Ares, cause of ruin. In his looks 115 and strength, he was the best in all Phaeacia, after Laodamas. Three sons of great Alcinous stood up: Laodamas, godlike Clytoneus, and Halius.

 First came the footrace. They lined up, then dashed 120 all in an instant, right around the track so fast they raised the dust up from the field.
 Clytoneus was the best by far at sprinting;
 he raced past all the others by the length of a field plowed by mules,<sup>7</sup> and reached the crowd. 125 Next came the brutal sport of wrestling, in which Euryalus was best. In jumping, Amphialus excelled. And at the discus, by far the best of all was Elatreus.
 The prince Laodamas excelled at boxing. 130
 They all enjoyed the games. When they were over, Laodamas, Alcinous' son,
 said,

“Now my friends, we ought to ask the stranger if he plays any sports. His build is strong; his legs and arms and neck are very sturdy, 135 and he is in his prime, though he has been broken by suffering. No pain can shake a man as badly as the sea, however strong he once was.”

Euryalus replied,
 “You are quite right, Laodamas. Why not 140 call out to challenge him yourself?”

The noble
 son of Alcinous agreed with him.
 He stood up in the middle of them all and called Odysseus.

“Come here!” he said.
 “Now you, sir! You should try our games as well, 145 if you know any sports; it seems you would.
 Nothing can be more glorious for a man, in a whole lifetime, than what he achieves with hands and feet. So try, set care aside.
 Soon you will travel, since your ship is launched. 150
 The crew is standing by.”

Odysseus
 thought carefully—he had a plan. He answered,

7. The length of land that could be plowed in a day was a standard unit of measurement.

The distance imagined here is probably about 200 feet (an unlikely margin for a race).

“Laodamas, why mock me with this challenge?
 My heart is set on sorrow, not on games, since I have suffered and endured so much 155 that now I only want to get back home.
 I sit here praying to your king and people to grant my wish.”

Euryalus responded
 with outright taunting.

“Stranger, I suppose you must be ignorant of all athletics. 160
 I know your type. The captain of a crew of merchant sailors, you roam round at sea and only care about your freight and cargo, keeping close watch on your ill-gotten gains.
 You are no athlete.”

With a scowl, he answered, 165
 “What crazy arrogance from you, you stranger!
 The gods do not bless everyone the same,
 with equal gifts of body, mind, or speech.
 One man is weak, but gods may crown his words with loveliness. Men gladly look to him; 170 his speech is steady, with calm dignity.
 He stands out from his audience, and when he walks through town, the people look at him as if he were a god. Another man has godlike looks but no grace in his words. 175 Like you—you look impressive, and a god could not improve your body. But your mind is crippled. You have stirred my heart to anger with these outrageous comments. I am not lacking experience of sports and games. 180
 When I was young, I trusted my strong arms and was among the first. Now pain has crushed me.
 I have endured the agonies of war,
 and struggled through the dangers of the sea.
 But you have challenged me and stung my heart. 185
 Despite my suffering, I will compete.”

With that he leapt up, cloak and all, and seized a massive discus, heavier than that used by the others. He spun around, drew back his arm and from his brawny hand he hurled. 190
 The stone went humming. The Phaeacians, known for rowing, ducked down cowering beneath its arc; it flew beyond the other pegs.
 Athena marked the spot. In human guise she spoke.

“A blind man, stranger, could discern this mark by groping. It is far ahead of all the others. You can celebrate!
 You won this round, and none of them will ever throw further—or as far!”

195

Odysseus
 was thrilled to realize he had a friend to take his side, and with a lighter heart, he told the young Phaeacians, 200

“Try to match this!
 If you can do it, I will throw another, as far or farther. You have made me angry, so I will take you on in any sport.
 Come on! In boxing, wrestling, or sprinting, I will compete with anyone, except Laodamas: he is my host. Who would fight with a friend? A man who challenges those who have welcomed him in a strange land is worthless and a fool; he spites himself.
 But I will challenge any of you others.
 Test my ability, let me know yours.
 I am not weak at any sport men practice.
 I know the way to hold a polished bow.
 I always was the first to hit my man out of a horde of enemies, though many comrades stood by me, arrows taking air.
 At Troy, when the Achaeans shot their bows, the only one superior to me was Philoctetes. Other men who eat their bread on earth are all worse shots than me.
 But I will not compete with super-archers, with Heracles or Eurytus, who risked competing with the gods at archery.
 Apollo was enraged at him and killed him as soon as he proposed it. He died young and did not reach old age in his own home.
 And I can throw a spear beyond the shots that others reach with arrows. I am only concerned that one of you may win the footrace:
 I lost my stamina and my legs weakened during my time at sea, upon the raft;
 I could not do my exercise routine.”

205

210

215

220

225

230

The crowd was silent, but Alcinous said, “Sir, you have expressed, with fine good manners, your wish to show your talents, and your anger at that man who stood up in this arena and mocked you, as no one who understands how to speak properly would ever do.

235

240

Now listen carefully, so you may tell your own fine friends at home when you are feasting beside your wife and children, and remember our skill in all the deeds we have accomplished from our forefathers' time till now. We are 245 not brilliant at wrestling or boxing, but we are quick at sprinting, and with ships we are the best. We love the feast, the lyre, dancing and varied clothes, hot baths and bed.
 But now let the best dancers of Phaeacia 250 perform, so that our guest may tell his friends when he gets home, how excellent we are at seafaring, at running, and at dancing and song. Let someone bring the well-tuned lyre from inside for Demodocus—go quickly!" 255

So spoke the king. The house boy brought the lyre.
 The people chose nine referees to check the games were fair. They leveled out a floor for dancing, with a fine wide ring around.
 The house boy gave Demodocus the lyre. 260
 He walked into the middle, flanked by boys, young and well trained, who tapped their feet performing the holy dance, their quick legs bright with speed.
 Odysseus was wonder-struck to see it.
 The poet strummed and sang a charming song 265 about the love of fair-crowned Aphrodite for Ares, who gave lavish gifts to her and shamed the bed of Lord Hephaestus, where they secretly had sex. The Sun God saw them, and told Hephaestus—bitter news for him.<sup>8</sup> 270
 He marched into his forge to get revenge, and set the mighty anvil on its block, and hammered chains so strong that they could never be broken or undone. He was so angry at Ares. When his trap was made, he went 275 inside the room of his beloved bed, and twined the mass of cables all around the bedposts, and then hung them from the ceiling, like slender spiderwebs, so finely made that nobody could see them, even gods: 280 the craftsmanship was so ingenious.
 When he had set that trap across the bed,
 he traveled to the cultured town of Lemnos, which was his favorite place in all the world.
 Ares the golden rider had kept watch. 285
 He saw Hephaestus, famous wonder-worker, leaving his house, and went inside himself;

8. Aphrodite, the goddess of sex, was married to the god Hephaestus, but had an affair with Ares, god of war; Helios, the sun god, who sees whatever the sun sees, revealed the truth.

he wanted to make love with Aphrodite.
 She had returned from visiting her father, the mighty son of Cronus; there she sat. 290
 Then Ares took her hand and said to her,

“My darling, let us go to bed. Hephaestus is out of town; he must have gone to Lemnos to see the Sintians whose speech is strange.”

She was excited to lie down with him; 295 they went to bed together. But the chains ingenious Hephaestus had created wrapped tight around them, so they could not move or get up. Then they knew that they were trapped.
 The limping god drew near—before he reached 300
 the land of Lemnos, he had turned back home.
 Troubled at heart, he came towards his house.
 Standing there in the doorway, he was seized by savage rage. He gave a mighty shout, calling to all the gods,

“O Father Zeus, 305
 and all you blessed gods who live forever, look! It is funny—and unbearable.
 See how my Aphrodite, child of Zeus, is disrespecting me for being lame.
 She loves destructive Ares, who is strong 310 and handsome. I am weak. I blame my parents.
 If only I had not been born! But come, see where those two are sleeping in my bed, as lovers. I am horrified to see it.
 But I predict they will not want to lie 315 longer like that, however great their love.
 Soon they will want to wake up, but my trap and chains will hold them fast, until her father pays back the price I gave him for his daughter.
 Her eyes stare at me like a dog. She is 320 so beautiful, but lacking self-control.”

The gods assembled at his house: Poseidon, Earth-Shaker, helpful Hermes, and Apollo.
 The goddesses stayed home, from modesty.
 The blessed gods who give good things were standing 325 inside the doorway, and they burst out laughing, at what a clever trap Hephaestus set.
 And as they looked, they said to one another,

“Crime does not pay! The slow can beat the quick, as now Hephaestus, who is lame and slow, 330 has used his skill to catch the fastest sprinter of all those on Olympus. Ares owes the price for his adultery.” They gossiped.

Apollo, son of Zeus, then said to Hermes, “Hermes my brother, would you like to sleep with golden Aphrodite, in her bed, even weighed down by mighty chains?” 335

And Hermes
 the sharp-eyed messenger replied, “Ah, brother, Apollo lord of archery: if only!
 I would be bound three times as tight or more and let you gods and all your wives look on,
 if only I could sleep with Aphrodite.” 340

Then laughter rose among the deathless gods.
 Only Poseidon did not laugh. He begged and pleaded with Hephaestus to release Ares. He told the wonder-working god, 345

“Now let him go! I promise he will pay the penalty in full among the gods, just as you ask.”

The famous limping god replied, “Poseidon, do not ask me this.
 It is disgusting, bailing scoundrels out.
 How could I bind you, while the gods look on,
 if Ares should escape his bonds and debts?”
 Poseidon, Lord of Earthquakes, answered him, “Hephaestus, if he tries to dodge this debt,
 I promise I will pay.” 355

The limping god said, “Then, in courtesy to you, I must do as you ask.” So using all his strength, Hephaestus loosed the chains. The pair of lovers were free from their constraints, and both jumped up.
 Ares went off to Thrace, while Aphrodite smiled as she went to Cyprus, to the island of Paphos, where she had a fragrant altar and sanctuary. The Graces washed her there, and rubbed her with the magic oil that glows upon immortals, and they dressed her up in gorgeous clothes. She looked astonishing. 360 365

That was the poet's song. Odysseus was happy listening; so were they all.
 And then Alcinous told Halios to dance with Laodamas; no one danced as well as them. They took a purple ball which Polybus the artisan had made them.
 One boy would leap and toss it to the clouds;
 the other would jump up, feet off the ground, 375 and catch it easily before he landed.

 After they practiced throwing it straight upwards, they danced across the fertile earth, crisscrossing, constantly trading places. Other boys who stood around the field were beating time with noisy stomping. Then Odysseus
 said,

“King of many citizens, great lord, you boasted that your dancers are the best, and it is true. I feel amazed to see this marvelous show.”

That pleased the reverend king.
 He spoke at once to his seafaring people.
 “Hear me, Phaeacian leaders, lords and nobles.
 The stranger seems extremely wise to me.
 So let us give him gifts, as hosts should do to guests in friendship. Twelve lords rule our people, with me as thirteenth lord. Let us each bring a pound of precious gold and laundered clothes, a tunic and a cloak. Then pile them up, and let our guest take all these gifts, and go to dinner with them, happy in his heart.
 Euryalus should tell him he is sorry, and give a special gift, since what he said was inappropriate.”

They all agreed,
 and each sent back a deputy to fetch the presents. And Euryalus spoke out.

“My lord Alcinous, great king of kings,
 I will apologize, as you command.
 And I will give him this bronze sword which has a silver handle, and a scabbard carved of ivory—a precious gift for him.”
 With that he put the silver-studded sword into Odysseus’ hands; his words flew out.

“I welcome you, sir. Be our guest.
 If something rude of any kind was said, let the winds take it. May the gods allow you to reach your home and see your wife again, since you have suffered so long, far away from those who love you.”

And Odysseus said, “Friend, I wish you well. May gods protect you, and may you never miss the sword you gave me.”

With that, he strapped the silver-studded sword across his back, and as the sun went down the precious gifts were brought to him. The slaves took them inside Alcinous' house.

The princes piled the lovely things beside the queen, their mother. King Alcinous led everyone inside and had them sit on upright chairs. He told Arete, 420

“Wife, bring out our finest chest, and put inside it a tunic and a freshly laundered cloak. 425 Set a bronze cauldron on the fire to boil, so he can take a bath. Then let him see the precious gifts our noblemen have brought,
and then enjoy the banquet and the song.
I also have a gift: a splendid cup 430 of gold. I hope he always thinks of me whenever he pours offerings to Zeus and other gods.”

Arete told her slaves
to quickly set a mighty pot to warm, for washing. So upon the blazing flames 435 they set the cauldron and poured water in, and heaped up wood. The fire licked around the belly of the tub and warmed the water.
Arete brought from her own room a chest to give the guest, and packed the gifts inside— 440 the clothes and gold that they had given him;
and she herself put in a cloak and tunic.
She told him,

“Watch the lid, and tie it closed, so nobody can rob you as you travel, when you are lulled to sleep on your black ship.” 445

Odysseus, experienced in loss, took careful note. He shut the lid and tied a cunning knot that he had learned from Circe.
Then right away the slave girl led him off towards the bath to wash. He was delighted 450 to see hot water. He had not been bathed since he had left the home of curly-haired Calypso, who had taken care of him as if he were a god. The slave girls washed him, rubbed oil on him and dressed him in a tunic 455 and fine wool mantle. Freshly bathed, he joined the men at wine. And there stood Nausicaa, divinely beautiful, beside a pillar that held the palace roof. She was amazed to see Odysseus. Her words flew fast. 460

“Good-bye then, stranger, but remember me when you reach home, because you owe your life to me. I helped you first.”

Odysseus

replied politely, “Nausicaa, may Zeus, husband of Hera, mighty Lord of Thunder, 465 allow me to go back and see my home.
There I shall pray to you as to a god, forever, princess, since you saved my life.”
With that he went to sit beside the king.

Now they were serving out the food and pouring 470 wine, and the steward led out to the center Demodocus, the well-respected poet.
He sat him in the middle of the banquet, against a pillar. Then Odysseus thought fast, and sliced a helping from the pig, 475 all richly laced with fat. The plate of meat had plenty left. He told the boy, “Go take

this meat and give it to Demodocus.
Despite my grief, I would be glad to meet him.
Poets are honored by all those who live 480 on earth. The Muse has taught them how to sing; she loves the race of poets.”

So the house boy handed it to Demodocus. He took it gladly; and everybody took their food.

When they had had enough to eat and drink, 485 the clever mastermind of many schemes
said,

“You are wonderful, Demodocus!
I praise you more than anyone; Apollo,<sup>9</sup> or else the Muse, the child of Zeus, has taught you.
You tell so accurately what the Greeks 490 achieved, and what they suffered, there at Troy, as if you had been there, or heard about it from somebody who was. So sing the story about the Wooden Horse, which Epeius built with Athena’s help. Odysseus 495 dragged it inside and to the citadel, filled up with men to sack the town. If you can tell that as it happened, I will say that you truly are blessed with inspiration.”

9. God associated with poetry, who carried the lyre.

A god inspired the bard to sing. He started with how the Greeks set fire to their camp and then embarked and sailed away. Meanwhile, Odysseus brought in a gang of men into the heart of Troy, inside the horse.
 The Trojans pulled the thing up to the summit, and sat around discussing what to do.
 Some said, "We ought to strike the wood with swords!" Others said, "Drag it higher up and hurl it down from the rocks!" But some said they should leave it to pacify the gods. So it would be.
 The town was doomed to ruin when it took that horse, chock-full of fighters bringing death to Trojans. And he sang how the Achaeans poured from the horse, in ambush from the hollow, and sacked the city; how they scattered out, destroying every neighborhood. Like Ares, Odysseus, with Menelaus, rushed to find Deiphobus' house,<sup>1</sup> and there he won at last, through dreadful violence, thanks to Athena. So the poet sang.

Odysseus was melting into tears;
 his cheeks were wet with weeping, as a woman weeps, as she falls to wrap her arms around her husband, fallen fighting for his home and children. She is watching as he gasps and dies. She shrieks, a clear high wail, collapsing upon his corpse. The men are right behind.
 They hit her shoulders with their spears and lead her to slavery, hard labor, and a life of pain. Her face is marked with her despair.
 In that same desperate way, Odysseus was crying. No one noticed that his eyes were wet with tears, except Alcinous, who sat right next to him and heard his sobs.
 Quickly he spoke to his seafaring people.

"Listen, my lords and nobles of Phaeacia!
 Demodocus should stop and set aside the lyre, since what he sings does not give pleasure to everyone. Throughout this heavenly song, since dinnertime, our guest has been in pain, grieving. A heavy burden weighs his heart.
 Let the song end, so we can all be happy, both guest and hosts. That would be best by far.
 This send-off party and these precious gifts,

1. After Paris was killed, Helen was appropriated by Deiphobus, another Trojan prince; Odysseus killed him and mangled his corpse, and Menelaus reclaimed his wife.

which we give out of friendship, are for him, 545 our guest of honor. Any man of sense will treat a guest in need like his own brother.
 Stranger, now answer all my questions clearly,
 not with evasion; frankness would be best.
 What did your parents name you? With what name 550 are you known to your people? Surely no one in all the world is nameless, poor or noble, since parents give a name to every child at birth. And also tell me of your country, your people, and your city, so our ships, 555 steered by their own good sense, may take you there.
 Phaeacians have no need of men at helm nor rudders, as in other ships. Our boats intuit what is in the minds of men, and know all human towns and fertile fields. 560
 They rush at full tilt right across the gulf of salty sea, concealed in mist and clouds.
 They have no fear of damages or loss.
 But once I heard Nausithous, my father, say that Poseidon hates us for the help 565
 we give to take our guests across the sea, and that one day a ship of ours would suffer shipwreck on its return; a mighty mountain would block our town from sight. So Father said.
 Perhaps the god will bring these things to pass 570 or not, as is his will. But come now, tell me about your wanderings: describe the places, the people, and the cities you have seen.
 Which ones were wild and cruel, unwelcoming, and which were kind to visitors, respecting 575
 the gods? And please explain why you were crying, sobbing your heart out when you heard him sing what happened to the Greeks at Troy. The gods devised and measured out this devastation, to make a song for those in times to come. 580 Did you lose somebody at Troy? A man from your wife's family, perhaps her father or brother? Ties of marriage are the closest after the bonds of blood. Or else perhaps you lost the friend who knew you best of all? 585
 A friend can be as close as any brother."

BOOK 9

[A Pirate in a Shepherd's Cave]

Wily Odysseus, the lord of lies, answered,

“My lord Alcinous, great king, it is a splendid thing to hear a poet as talented as this. His voice is godlike.
I think that there can be no greater pleasure 5 than when the whole community enjoys a banquet, as we sit inside the house, and listen to the singer, and the tables are heaped with bread and meat; the wine boy ladles drink from the bowl and pours it into cups. 10
To me this seems ideal, a thing of beauty.
Now something prompted you to ask about my own sad story. I will tell you, though the memory increases my despair.
Where shall I start? Where can I end? The gods 15 have given me so much to cry about.
First I will tell my name, so we will be acquainted and if I survive, you can be my guest in my distant home one day.
I am Odysseus, Laertes’ son, 20 known for my many clever tricks and lies.
My fame extends to heaven, but I live in Ithaca, where shaking forest hides Mount Neriton. Close by are other islands: Dulichium, and wooded Zacynthus 25 and Same. All the others face the dawn; my Ithaca is set apart, most distant, facing the dark.<sup>2</sup> It is a rugged land, but good at raising children. To my eyes no country could be sweeter. As you know, 30 divine Calypso held me in her cave, wanting to marry me; and likewise Circe, the trickster, trapped me, and she wanted me to be her husband. But she never swayed my heart, since when a man is far from home, 35 living abroad, there is no sweeter thing than his own native land and family.
Now let me tell you all the trouble Zeus has caused me on my journey home from Troy.
A blast of wind pushed me off course towards 40
the Cicones in Ismarus.<sup>3</sup> I sacked

2. The suggestion is that Ithaca is farthest west, facing the setting sun (“the darkness”), whereas the other islands are more to the east. It is impossible to reconcile this claim with actual geography.

3. The Cicones, a Thracian people, were allies of Troy. But the passage does not suggest that Odysseus’ piracy is motivated by any particular military objective.

the town and killed the men. We took their wives and shared their riches equally among us.
 Then I said we must run away. Those fools refused to listen. They were drinking wine 45 excessively, and killing sheep and cattle along the beach. The Cicones called out to neighbors on the mainland, who were strong and numerous, and skilled at horseback fighting, and if need be, on foot. They came like leaves 50 and blossoms in the spring at dawn. Then Zeus gave us bad luck. Poor us! The enemy assembled round the ships and fought with swords of bronze. And while the holy morning light was bright and strong, we held them off, though they 55 outnumbered us. But when the sun turned round and dipped, the hour when oxen are released, the Cicones began to overpower us Greeks. Six well-armed members of my crew died from each ship. The rest of us survived, 60 and we escaped the danger. We prepared to sail away with heavy hearts, relieved to be alive, but grieving for our friends.
 Before we launched the ships, we called aloud three times to each of our poor lost companions, 65 slaughtered at the hands of Cicones.

The Cloud Lord Zeus hurled North Wind at our ships, a terrible typhoon, and covered up the sea and earth with fog. Night fell from heaven and seized us and our ships keeled over sideways; 70 the sails were ripped three times by blasting wind.
 Scared for our lives, we hoisted down the sails and rowed with all our might towards the shore.
 We stayed there for two days and nights, exhausted, eating our hearts with pain. When bright-haired Dawn 75 brought the third morning, we set up our masts, unfurled the shining sails, and climbed aboard.
 The wind blew straight, the pilots steered, and I would have come safely home, to my own land, but as I rounded Malea, a current 80 and blast of wind pushed me off course, away from Cythera. For nine days I was swept by stormy winds across the fish-filled sea.
 On the tenth day, I landed on the island of those who live on food from luscious lotus. 85
 We gathered water, and my crew prepared a meal. We picnicked by the ships, then I chose two men, and one slave to make the third, to go and scout. We needed to find out what kind of people lived there on that island. 90
 The scouts encountered humans, Lotus-Eaters, who did not hurt them. They just shared with them their sweet delicious fruit. But as they ate it, they lost the will to come back and bring news to me. They wanted only to stay there, 95 feeding on lotus with the Lotus-Eaters.

 They had forgotten home. I dragged them back in tears, forced them on board the hollow ships, pushed them below the decks, and tied them up.
 I told the other men, the loyal ones, 100 to get back in the ships, so no one else would taste the lotus and forget about our destination. They embarked and sat along the rowing benches, side by side, and struck the grayish water with their oars. 105

With heavy hearts we sailed along and reached the country of high-minded Cyclopes, the mavericks. They put their trust in gods, and do not plant their food from seed, nor plow, and yet the barley, grain, and clustering wine-grapes 110
 all flourish there, increased by rain from Zeus.
 They hold no councils, have no common laws, but live in caves on lofty mountaintops, and each makes laws for his own wife and children, without concern for what the others think. 115
 A distance from this island is another, across the water, slantways from the harbor, level and thickly wooded. Countless goats live there but people never visit it.
 No hunters labor through its woods to scale 120 its hilly peaks. There are no flocks of sheep, no fields of plowland—it is all untilled, unsown and uninhabited by humans.
 Only the bleating goats live there and graze.
 Cyclopic people have no red-cheeked ships<sup>4</sup> 125 and no shipwright among them who could build boats, to enable them to row across to other cities, as most people do, crossing the sea to visit one another.
 With boats they could have turned this island into 130
 a fertile colony, with proper harvests.
 By the gray shore there lie well-watered meadows, where vines would never fail. There is flat land for plowing, and abundant crops would grow in the autumn; there is richness underground. 135
 The harbor has good anchorage; there is no need of anchor stones or ropes or cables.
 The ships that come to shore there can remain beached safely till the sailors wish to leave

4. Ships were decorated with red at the prow.

and fair winds blow. Up by the harbor head 140 freshwater gushes down beneath the caves.
 The poplars grow around it. There we sailed:
 the gods were guiding us all through the darkness.
 Thick fog wrapped round our ships and in the sky the moon was dark and clothed in clouds, so we 145 saw nothing of the island. None of us could see the great waves rolling in towards the land, until we rowed right to the beach.
 We lowered all the sails and disembarked onto the shore, and there we fell asleep. 150

When early Dawn shone forth with rosy fingers, we roamed around that island full of wonders.
 The daughters of the great King Zeus, the nymphs, drove out the mountain goats so that my crew could eat. On seeing them, we dashed to fetch 155 our javelins and bows from on board ship.
 We split into three groups, took aim and shot.
 Some god gave us good hunting. All twelve crews had nine goats each, and ten for mine. We sat there all day till sunset, eating meat and drinking 160 our strong red wine. The ships' supply of that had not run out; when we had sacked the holy citadel of the Cicones, we all took gallons of it, poured in great big pitchers.
 We looked across the narrow strip of water 165 at the Cyclopic island, saw their smoke, and heard the baaing of their sheep and goats.
 The sun went down and in the hours of darkness
 we lay and slept on shore beside the sea.
 But when the rosy hands of Dawn appeared, 170
 I called my men together and addressed them.

“My loyal friends! Stay here, the rest of you, while with my boat and crew I go to check who those men are, find out if they are wild, lawless aggressors, or the type to welcome 175 strangers, and fear the gods.”

With that, I climbed on board and told my crew to come with me and then untie the cables of the ship.
 Quickly they did so, sat along the benches, and struck the whitening water with their oars. 180
 The journey was not long. Upon arrival, right at the edge of land, beside the sea,
 we saw a high cave overhung with laurel,
 the home of several herds of sheep and goats.
 Around that cave was built a lofty courtyard, 185 of deep-set stones, with tall pines rising up, and leafy oaks. There lived a massive man who shepherded his flocks all by himself.

 He did not go to visit other people, but kept apart, and did not know the ways 190 of custom. In his build he was a wonder, a giant, not like men who live on bread, but like a wooded peak in airy mountains, rising alone above the rest.

I told my loyal crew to guard the ship, while I 195 would go with just twelve chosen men, my favorites.
 I took a goatskin full of dark sweet wine that I was given by Apollo's priest, Maron the son of Euanthes, who lived inside the shady grove on Ismarus. 200
 In reverence to the god, I came to help him, and save his wife and son. He gave me gifts:
 a silver bowl and seven pounds of gold,
 well wrought, and siphoned off some sweet strong wine, and filled twelve jars for me—a godlike drink. 205
 The slaves knew nothing of this wine; it was known just to him, his wife, and one house girl.
 Whenever he was drinking it, he poured a single shot into a cup, and added twenty of water, and a marvelous smell 210 rose from the bowl, and all would long to taste it.
 I filled a big skin up with it, and packed provisions in a bag—my heart suspected that I might meet a man of courage, wild, and lacking knowledge of the normal customs. 215

We soon were at the cave, but did not find the Cyclops; he was pasturing his flocks.
 We went inside and looked at everything.
 We saw his crates weighed down with cheese, and pens crammed full of lambs divided up by age: 220 the newborns, middlings, and those just weaned.
 There were well-crafted bowls and pails for milking, all full of whey. My crew begged, "Let us grab some cheese and quickly drive the kids and lambs out of their pens and down to our swift ships, 225 and sail away across the salty water!" That would have been the better choice. But I refused. I hoped to see him, and find out if he would give us gifts. In fact he brought no joy to my companions. Then we lit 230 a fire, and made a sacrifice, and ate some cheese, and sat to wait inside the cave until he brought his flocks back home. He came at dinnertime, and brought a load of wood to make a fire. He hurled it noisily 235 into the cave. We were afraid, and cowered towards the back. He drove his ewes and nannies inside to milk them, but he left the rams and he-goats in the spacious yard outside.

 He lifted up the heavy stone and set it 240 to block the entrance of the cave. It was a rock so huge and massive, twenty-two strong carts could not have dragged it from the threshold.
 He sat, and all in order milked his ewes and she-goats, then he set the lambs to suck 245 beside each bleating mother. Then he curdled half of the fresh white milk, set that aside in wicker baskets, and the rest he stored in pails so he could drink it with his dinner.
 When he had carefully performed his chores, 250
 he lit a fire, then looked around and saw us.
 'Strangers! Who are you? Where did you come from across the watery depths? Are you on business, or roaming round without a goal, like pirates, who risk their lives at sea to bring disaster 255 to other people?'

So he spoke. His voice, so deep and booming, and his giant size, made our hearts sink in terror. Even so, I answered,

'We are Greeks, come here from Troy.
 The winds have swept us off in all directions 260 across the vast expanse of sea, off course from our planned route back home. Zeus willed it so.
 We are proud to be the men of Agamemnon, the son of Atreus, whose fame is greatest under the sky, for sacking that vast city 265 and killing many people. Now we beg you, here at your knees, to grant a gift, as is the norm for hosts and guests. Please, sir, my lord:
 respect the gods. We are your suppliants, and Zeus is on our side, since he takes care 270 of visitors, guest-friends, and those in need.'

Unmoved he said, 'Well, foreigner, you are a fool, or from some very distant country.
 You order me to fear the gods! My people think nothing of that Zeus with his big scepter, 275 nor any god; our strength is more than theirs.
 If I spare you or spare your friends, it will not be out of fear of Zeus. I do the bidding of my own heart. But are you going far in that fine ship of yours, or somewhere near?' 280

He spoke to test me, but I saw right through him.
I know how these things work. I answered him deceitfully.

‘Poseidon, the Earth-Shaker, shipwrecked me at the far end of your island.
He pushed us in; wind dashed us on the rocks. 285
We barely managed to survive.’

But he made no reply and showed no mercy. Leaping up high, he reached his hands towards my men, seized two, and knocked them hard against the ground like puppies, and the floor was wet with brains. 290
He ripped them limb by limb to make his meal, then ate them like a lion on the mountains, devouring flesh, entrails, and marrow bones, and leaving nothing. Watching this disaster, we wept and lifted up our hands in prayer 295 to Zeus. We felt so helpless. When the Cyclops had filled his massive belly with his meal of human meat and unmixed milk,<sup>5</sup> he lay stretched out among his flocks. Then thinking like a military man, I thought I should 300 get out my sword, go up to him and thrust right through his torso, feeling for his liver.<sup>6</sup>
That would have doomed us all. On second thoughts, I realized we were too weak to move the mighty stone he set in the high doorway. 305
So we stayed there in misery till dawn.

Early the Dawn appeared, pink fingers blooming, and then he lit his fire and milked his ewes in turn, and set a lamb by every one.
When he had diligently done his chores, 310
he grabbed two men and made a meal of them.
After he ate, he drove his fat flock out.
He rolled the boulder out and back with ease,
as one would set the lid upon a quiver.
Then whistling merrily, the Cyclops drove 315 his fat flocks to the mountain. I was left, scheming to take revenge on him and hurt him,
and gain the glory, if Athena let me.
I made my plan. Beside the pen there stood a great big club, green olive wood, which he 320 had cut to dry, to be his walking stick.
It was so massive that it looked to us like a ship’s mast, a twenty-oared black freighter

5. The word for “unmixed” is usually used for wine undiluted with water. The text is making a sort of joke since milk is the equivalent of wine for this usually teetotaling character.

6. He imagines having to move by feel, since the cave is entirely dark.

that sails across the vast sea full of cargo.
 I went and cut from it about a fathom, 325 and gave it to the men, and ordered them to scrape it down. They made it smooth and I stood by and sharpened up the tip, and made it hard in the blazing flame. The cave was full of dung; I hid the club beneath a pile. 330
 Then I gave orders that the men cast lots for who would lift the stake with me and press it into his eye, when sweet sleep overtook him.
 The lots fell on the men I would have chosen:
 four men, and I was fifth among their number. 335

At evening he drove back his woolly flocks into the spacious cave, both male and female, and left none in the yard outside—perhaps suspecting something, or perhaps a god told him to do it. He picked up and placed 340 the stone to form a door, and sat to milk the sheep and bleating goats in turn, then put the little ones to suck. His chores were done; he grabbed two men for dinner. I approached and offered him a cup of ivy wood, 345 filled full of wine. I said,

‘Here, Cyclops! You have eaten human meat; now drink some wine, sample the merchandise our ship contains.
 I brought it as a holy offering,<sup>7</sup> so you might pity me and send me home. 350
 But you are in a cruel rage, beyond what anyone could bear. Do you expect more guests, when you have treated us so rudely?’

He took and drank the sweet delicious wine;
 he loved it, and demanded more.

‘Another! 355
 And now tell me your name, so I can give you a present as my guest, one you will like.
 My people do have wine; grape clusters grow from our rich earth, fed well by rain from Zeus.
 But this is nectar, god food!’

So I gave him 360
 another cup of wine, and then two more.
 He drank them all, unwisely. With the wine gone to his head, I told him, all politeness,

7. The term used here is usually applied to drink offerings given to the gods.

‘Cyclops, you asked my name. I will reveal it; then you must give the gift you promised me, of hospitality. My name is Noman.<sup>8</sup>
 My family and friends all call me Noman.’
 He answered with no pity in his heart, ‘I will eat Noman last; first I will eat the other men. That is my gift to you.’
 Then he collapsed, fell on his back, and lay there, his massive neck askew. All-conquering sleep took him. In drunken heaviness, he spewed wine from his throat, and chunks of human flesh.
 And then I drove the spear into the embers to heat it up, and told my men, ‘Be brave!’
 I wanted none of them to shrink in fear.
 The fire soon had seized the olive spear, green though it was, and terribly it glowed.
 I quickly snatched it from the fire. My crew stood firm: some god was breathing courage in us.
 They took the olive spear, its tip all sharp, and shoved it in his eye. I leaned on top and twisted it, as when a man drills wood for shipbuilding. Below, the workers spin the drill with straps, stretched out from either end.
 So round and round it goes, and so we whirled the fire-sharp weapon in his eye. His blood poured out around the stake, and blazing fire sizzled his lids and brows, and fried the roots.
 As when a blacksmith dips an axe or adze to temper it in ice-cold water; loudly it shrieks. From this, the iron takes on its power.
 So did his eyeball crackle on the spear.
 Horribly then he howled, the rocks resounded, and we shrank back in fear. He tugged the spear out of his eye, all soaked with gushing blood.
 Desperately with both hands he hurled it from him, and shouted to the Cyclopes who lived in caves high up on windy cliffs around.
 They heard and came from every side, and stood near to the cave, and called out, ‘Polyphemus!
 What is the matter? Are you badly hurt?
 Why are you screaming through the holy night and keeping us awake? Is someone stealing your herds, or trying to kill you, by some trick or force?’

Strong Polyphemus from inside replied, ‘My friends! Noman is killing me by tricks, not force.’

8. In Greek, “Noman”—oudeis—sounds a little like “Odysseus.”

Their words flew back to him:
 'If no one hurts you, you are all alone: 410 Great Zeus has made you sick; no help for that.
 Pray to your father, mighty Lord Poseidon.'

Then off they went, and I laughed to myself, at how my name, the 'no man' maneuver, tricked him.<sup>9</sup>
 The Cyclops groaned and labored in his pain, 415 felt with blind hands and took the door-stone out, and sat there at the entrance, arms outstretched, to catch whoever went out with the sheep.
 Maybe he thought I was a total fool.
 But I was strategizing, hatching plans, 420
 so that my men and I could all survive.
 I wove all kinds of wiles and cunning schemes;
 danger was near and it was life or death.
 The best idea I formed was this: there were those well-fed sturdy rams with good thick fleece, 425 wool as dark as violets—all fine big creatures.
 So silently I tied them with the rope used by the giant Cyclops as a bed.
 I bound the rams in sets of three and set a man beneath each middle sheep, with one 430 on either side, and so my men were saved.
 One ram was best of all the flock; I grabbed his back and curled myself up underneath his furry belly, clinging to his fleece;
 by force of will I kept on hanging there. 435
 And then we waited miserably for day.

When early Dawn revealed her rose-red hands,
 the rams jumped up, all eager for the grass.
 The ewes were bleating in their pens, unmilked, their udders full to bursting. Though their master 440 was weak and worn with pain, he felt the back of each ram as he lined them up—but missed the men tied up beneath their woolly bellies.
 Last of them all, the big ram went outside, heavy with wool and me—the clever trickster. 445 Strong Polyphemus stroked his back and asked him,

'Sweet ram, why are you last today to leave the cave? You are not normally so slow.
 You are the first to eat the tender flowers, leaping across the meadow, first to drink, 450 and first to want to go back to the sheepfold at evening time. But now you are the last.

9. There is a pun here in the Greek that is impossible to translate into English: metis means "nobody" but also "cunning." "Maneuver" is designed to hint at the wordplay.

You grieve for Master's eye; that wicked man, helped by his nasty henchmen, got me drunk and blinded me. Noman will not escape! 455
 If only you could talk like me, and tell me where he is skulking in his fear of me.
 Then I would dash his brains out on the rocks,
 and make them spatter all across the cave, to ease the pain that no-good Noman brought.' 460

With that, he nudged the ram away outside.
 We rode a short way from the cave, then I first freed myself and then untied my men.
 We stole his nice fat animals, and ran, constantly glancing all around and back 465 until we reached the ship. The other men were glad to see us, their surviving friends, but wept for those who died. I ordered them to stop their crying, scowling hard at each.
 I made them shove the fleecy flock on board, 470 and row the boat out into salty water.
 So they embarked, sat on their rowing benches, and struck their oar blades in the whitening sea.
 When I had gone as far as shouts can carry,
 I jeered back,

'Hey, you, Cyclops! Idiot! 475
 The crew trapped in your cave did not belong to some poor weakling. Well, you had it coming!
 You had no shame at eating your own guests!
 So Zeus and other gods have paid you back.'

My taunting made him angrier. He ripped 480 a rock out of the hill and hurled it at us.
 It landed right in front of our dark prow,
 and almost crushed the tip of the steering oar.
 The stone sank in the water; waves surged up.
 The backflow all at once propelled the ship 485 landwards; the swollen water pushed us with it.
 I grabbed a big long pole, and shoved us off.
 I told my men, 'Row fast, to save your lives!'
 and gestured with my head to make them hurry.
 They bent down to their oars and started rowing. 490
 We got out twice as far across the sea, and then I called to him again. My crew begged me to stop, and pleaded with me.

'Please!
 Calm down! Why are you being so insistent and taunting this wild man? He hurled that stone 495 and drove our ship right back to land. We thought that we were going to die. If he had heard us, he would have hurled a jagged rock and crushed our heads and wooden ship. He throws so hard!

But my tough heart was not convinced; I was still furious, and shouted back again, 500

‘Cyclops! If any mortal asks you how your eye was mutilated and made blind, say that Odysseus, the city-sacker, Laertes’ son, who lives in Ithaca, destroyed your sight.’ 505

He groaned, ‘The prophecy!
It has come true at last! There was a tall and handsome man named Telemus, the son of Eurymus, who lived among my people;
he spent his life here, soothsaying for us. 510
He told me that Odysseus’ hands would make me lose my sight. I always thought somebody tall and handsome, strong and brave would come to me. But now this little weakling, this little nobody, has blinded me; 515 by wine he got the best of me. Come on, Odysseus, and let me give you gifts,
and ask Poseidon’s help to get you home.
I am his son; the god is proud to be my father. He will heal me, if he wants, 520 though no one else, not god nor man, can do it.’

After he said these words, I answered him, ‘If only I could steal your life from you, and send you down to Hades’ house below, as sure as nobody will ever heal you, 525 even the god of earthquakes.’

But he prayed
holding his arms towards the starry sky, ‘Listen, Earth-Shaker, Blue-Haired Lord Poseidon: acknowledge me your son, and be my father.
Grant that Odysseus, the city-sacker, 530 will never go back home. Or if it is fated that he will see his family, then let him get there late and with no honor, in pain and lacking ships, and having caused the death of all his men, and let him find 535 more trouble in his own house.’

Blue Poseidon
granted his son’s prayer. Polyphemus raised a rock far bigger than the last, and swung,

then hurled it with immeasurable force.
 It fell a little short, beside our rudder, 540 and splashed into the sea; the waves surged up, and pushed the boat ahead, to the other shore.
 We reached the island where our ships were docked.
 The men were sitting waiting for us, weeping.
 We beached our ship and disembarked, then took 545 the sheep that we had stolen from the Cyclops out of the ship's hold, and we shared them out fairly, so all the men got equal portions.
 But in dividing up the flock, my crew gave me alone the ram, the Cyclops' favorite. 550
 There on the shore, I slaughtered him for Zeus, the son of Cronus, god of Dark Clouds, Lord of all the world. I burned the thighs. The god ignored my offering, and planned to ruin all of my ships and all my loyal men. 555
 So all day long till sunset we were sitting, feasting on meat and drinking sweet strong wine.
 But when the sun went down and darkness fell,
 we went to sleep beside the breaking waves.
 Then when rose-fingered Dawn came, bright and early, 560
 I roused my men and told them to embark and loose the cables. Quickly they obeyed, sat at their rowing benches, all in order,
 and struck the gray saltwater with their oars.
 So we sailed on, with sorrow in our hearts, 565 glad to survive, but grieving for our friends."

BOOK 10

[The Winds and the Witch]

"We reached the floating island of Aeolus, who is well loved by all the deathless gods.
 Around it, on sheer cliffs, there runs a wall of solid bronze, impregnable. Twelve children live with him in his palace: six strong boys, 5 and six girls. He arranged their marriages, one sister to each brother. They are always feasting there with their parents, at a banquet that never ends. By day, the savor fills the house; the court reverberates with sound. 10
 At night they sleep beside the wives they love on rope beds piled with blankets.

We arrived at that fine citadel. He welcomed me and made me stay a month, and asked for news of Troy, the Argive ships, and how the Greeks 15 went home. I told him everything. At last

I told him he should send me on my way.
 So he agreed to help me, and he gave me a bag of oxhide leather and he tied the gusty winds inside it. Zeus, the son 20 of Cronus, made him steward of the winds, and he can stop or rouse them as he wishes.
 He bound the bag with shining silver wire to my curved ship, so no gust could escape, however small, and he made Zephyr blow 25 so that the breath could carry home our ships and us. But it was not to be. Our folly ruined us. For nine days and nights we sailed, and on the tenth, our native land appeared.
 We were so near, we saw men tending fires. 30 Exhausted, I let sweet sleep overcome me.
 I had been doing all the steering, hoping that we would get home sooner if I did.
 But while I slept my men began to mutter, saying the great Aeolus gave me gifts— 35 silver and gold that I was taking home.
 With glances to his neighbor, each complained,

'It seems that everybody loves this man, and honors him, in every place we sail to.
 He also has that loot from sacking Troy. 40
 We shared the journey with him, yet we come back home with empty hands. And now Aeolus has made this friendly gift to him. So hurry, we should look in the bag, and see how much is in there—how much silver, how much gold.' 45

That bad idea took hold of them; they did it.
 They opened up the bag, and all the winds rushed out at once. A sudden buffet seized us and hurled us back to sea, the wrong direction, far from our home. They screamed and I woke up, 50 and wondered if I should jump off the ship and drown, or bite my lip, be stoical, and stay among the living. I endured it, covered my face, and lay on deck. A blast of storm wind whooshed the ships back to the island 55 of great Aeolus. They began to weep.
 We disembarked and filled our jars with water, and hungrily the men devoured their dinner.
 When they were done, I took one slave with me and one crew member, back to see Aeolus. 60
 He was at dinner with his wife and children.
 We entered and sat down beside the doorposts.
 Startled, they asked,

‘Why are you here again?
 You had bad luck? What happened? Surely we helped you go on your way, and meant for you to reach your homeland, where you wished to go.’ 65

I answered sadly, ‘Blame my men, and blame my stubborn urge to sleep, which ruined us.
 Dear friends, you have the power to put things right.’

I hoped these words would soften them, but they were silent. Then the father yelled, ‘Get out!
 You nasty creature, leave my island! Now!
 It is not right for me to help convey a man so deeply hated by the gods.
 You godforsaken thing, how dare you come here?
 Get out!’ 70 75

He roared and drove us from his palace.
 Dispirited, we sailed away. The men grew worn out with the agony of rowing;
 our folly had deprived us of fair winds.
 We rowed six days and nights; the seventh day we came to Laestrygonia—the town 80 of Telepylus upon the cliffs of Lamos.<sup>1</sup> A herdsman there, returning to his home, can greet another herdsman going out.<sup>2</sup>
 A sleepless man could earn a double wage 85 by herding cows, then pasturing white sheep—the paths of day and night are close together.<sup>3</sup> We reached the famous harbor, all surrounded by sheer rock cliffs. On each side, strips of shore jut out and almost meet, a narrow mouth. 90
 No waves rear up in there, not even small ones.
 White calm is everywhere. So all the others harbored their ships inside, crammed close together.
 I was the only one who chose to moor my ship outside the harbor, fastening 95
 the cables to a rock a way away.
 I disembarked and climbed a crag to scout.
 I saw no sign of cattle or of humans, except some smoke that rose up from the earth.
 I picked two men, and one slave as the third, 100 and sent them to find out what people lived and ate bread in this land. They disembarked and walked along a smooth path, where the wagons brought wood down from the mountains to the city.

1. Lamos is the founder of this mythical place.

2. The idea is that in this strange country herdsman work around the clock, a day shift and a night shift.

3. This odd line presumably means that the nights are almost nonexistent here, as in areas near the Arctic Circle. Attempts to plot Laestrygonia on a real map have not been convincing; this is a fictional place, melding several elements of actual geography.

They met a girl in front of town, out fetching 105 some water. She was heading for the fountain of Artaky, the whole town's water source.
 She was the strapping child of Antiphates, king of the Laestrygonians. They asked her about the king and people of the country. 110
 She promptly took them to the high-roofed palace of her own father. When they went inside they found a woman, mountain-high. They were appalled and shocked. The giantess at once summoned the king her husband from the council; 115 he tried to kill my men, and grabbing one he ate him up. The other two escaped, back to the ship. The king's shout boomed through town.
 Hearing, the mighty Laestrygonians thronged from all sides, not humanlike, but giants.<sup>4</sup> 120 With boulders bigger than a man could lift they pelted at us from the cliffs. We heard the dreadful uproar of ships being broken and dying men. They speared them there like fish.
 A gruesome meal! While they were killing them 125 inside the harbor, I drew out my sword and cut the ropes that moored my dark-cheeked ship, and yelling to my men, I told them, 'Row as fast as possible away from danger!'
 They rowed at double time, afraid to die. 130
 My ship was lucky and we reached the sea beyond the overhanging cliffs. The rest, trapped in the bay together, were destroyed.
 We sailed off sadly, happy to survive, but with our good friends lost. We reached Aeaea, 135 home of the beautiful, dreadful goddess Circe, who speaks in human languages—the sister of Aeetes whose mind is set on ruin.
 Those two are children of the Sun who shines on mortals, and of Perse, child of Ocean.<sup>5</sup> 140 Under the guidance of some god we drifted silently to the harbor, and we moored there.
 For two days and two nights we lay onshore, exhausted and our hearts consumed with grief.
 On the third morning brought by braided Dawn, 145
 I took my spear and sharp sword, and I ran up from the ship to higher ground, to look for signs of humans, listening for voices.
 I climbed up to a crag, and I saw smoke rising from Circe's palace, from the earth 150 up through the woods and thickets. I considered

4. The giants were children of Earth, fertilized by the blood of Uranus after his castration.

5. Perse is one of the many daughters of Ocean; Aeetes was the cruel king of Colchis, owner of the Golden Fleece and father of Medea.

if I should go down and investigate, since I had seen the smoke. But I decided to go back down first, to the beach and ship and feed my men, and then set out to scout. 155
 When I had almost reached my ship, some god took pity on me in my loneliness, and sent a mighty stag with great tall antlers to cross my path. He ran down from the forest to drink out of the river; it was hot. 160
 I struck him in the middle of his back; my bronze spear pierced him. With a moan, he fell onto the dust; his spirit flew away.
 I stepped on him and tugged my bronze spear out, and left it on the ground, while I plucked twigs 165 and twines, and wove a rope, a fathom's length, well knotted all the way along, and bound the hooves of that huge animal. I went down to my dark ship with him on my back.
 I used my spear to lean on, since the stag 170 was too big to be lugged across one shoulder.
 I dumped him down before the ship and made a comforting pep talk to cheer my men.

'My friends! We will not yet go down to Hades, sad though we are, before our fated day. 175 Come on, since we have food and drink on board, let us not starve ourselves; now time to eat!'

They quickly heeded my commands, and took their cloaks down from their faces,<sup>6</sup> and they marveled to see the big stag lying on the beach. 180
 It was enormous. When they finished staring, they washed their hands and cooked a splendid meal.
 So all that day till sunset we sat eating the meat aplenty and the strong sweet wine.
 When darkness fell, we went to sleep beside 185 the seashore. Then the roses of Dawn's fingers appeared again; I called my men and told them,

'Listen to me, my friends, despite your grief.
 We do not know where darkness lives, nor dawn, nor where the sun that shines upon the world 190 goes underneath the earth, nor where it rises.
 We need a way to fix our current plight, but I do not know how. I climbed the rocks to higher ground to look around. This is an island, wreathed about by boundless sea. 195
 The land lies low. I saw smoke in the middle, rising up through the forest and thick bush.'

6. People in Homer cover their faces in grief; the men in this small band of survivors have been grieving the loss of the other eleven ships and their crew members.

At that, their hearts sank, since they all remembered what happened with the Laestrygonians, their King Antiphates, and how the mighty 200 Cyclops devoured the men. They wept and wailed, and shed great floods of tears. But all that grieving could do no good. I made them wear their armor, and split them in two groups. I led one, and made Eurylochus command the other. 205
 We shook the lots in a helmet made of bronze; Eurylochus' lot jumped out. So he went with his band of twenty-two, all weeping.
 Those left behind with me were crying too.
 Inside the glade they found the house of Circe 210 built out of polished stones, on high foundations.
 Round it were mountain wolves and lions, which she tamed with drugs. They did not rush on them, but gathered around them in a friendly way, their long tails wagging, as dogs nuzzle round 215 their master when he comes back home from dinner with treats for them. Just so, those sharp-clawed wolves and lions, mighty beasts, came snuggling up.
 The men were terrified. They stood outside and heard some lovely singing. It was Circe, 220 the goddess. She was weaving as she sang, an intricate, enchanting piece of work,
 the kind a goddess fashions. Then Polites, my most devoted and most loyal man,
 a leader to his peers, said,

'Friends, inside 225
 someone is weaving on that massive loom, and singing so the floor resounds. Perhaps a woman, or a goddess. Let us call her.'

They shouted out to her. She came at once, opened the shining doors, and asked them in. 230
 So thinking nothing of it, in they went.
 Eurylochus alone remained outside, suspecting trickery. She led them in, sat them on chairs, and blended them a potion of barley, cheese, and golden honey, mixed 235 with Pramnian wine.<sup>7</sup> She added potent drugs to make them totally forget their home.
 They took and drank the mixture. Then she struck them, using her magic wand, and penned them in the pigsty. They were turned to pigs in body 240 and voice and hair; their minds remained the same.

7. A particular type of wine rather than from a particular location; it is described as black and harsh by the medical writer Galen. The same wine is used for the potion made in Nestor's cup, in book 11 of the Iliad.

They squealed at their imprisonment, and Circe threw them some mast and cornel cherries—food that pigs like rooting for in muddy ground.
 Eurylochus ran back to our black ship, 245 to tell us of the terrible disaster that happened to his friends. He tried to speak, but could not, overwhelmed by grief. His eyes were full of tears, his heart was pierced with sorrow.
 Astonished, we all questioned him. At last 250 he spoke about what happened to the others.

‘Odysseus, we went off through the woods, as you commanded. In the glade we found a beautiful tall house of polished stone.
 We heard a voice: a woman or a goddess 255 was singing as she worked her loom. My friends called out to her. She opened up the doors, inviting them inside. Suspecting nothing, they followed her. But I stayed there outside, fearing some trick. Then all at once, they vanished. 260
 I sat there for a while to watch and wait, but none of them came back.’

At this, I strapped
 my silver-studded sword across my back, took up my bow, and told him, ‘Take me there.’
 He grasped my knees and begged me tearfully, 265

‘No no, my lord! Please do not make me go!
 Let me stay here! You cannot bring them back, and you will not return here if you try.
 Hurry, we must escape with these men here!
 We have a chance to save our lives!’

I said, 270
 ‘You can stay here beside the ship and eat and drink. But I will go. I must do this.’
 I left the ship and shore, and walked on up, crossing the sacred glades, and I had almost reached the great house of the enchantress Circe, 275 when I met Hermes, carrying his wand of gold. He seemed an adolescent boy, the cutest age, when beards first start to grow.
 He took my hand and said,

‘Why have you come across these hills alone? You do not know 280 this place, poor man. Your men were turned to pigs in Circe’s house, and crammed in pens. Do you imagine you can set them free? You cannot.
 If you try that, you will not get back home.

You will stay here with them. But I can help you. 285 Here, take this antidote to keep you safe when you go into Circe's house. Now I will tell you all her lethal spells and tricks.
 She will make you a potion mixed with poison.
 Its magic will not work on you because 290 you have the herb I gave you. When she strikes you with her long wand, then draw your sharpened sword and rush at her as if you mean to kill her.
 She will be frightened of you, and will tell you to sleep with her. Do not hold out against her— 295 she is a goddess. If you sleep with her, you will set free your friends and save yourself.
 Tell her to swear an oath by all the gods that she will not plot further harm for you—or while you have your clothes off, she may hurt you, 300 unmanning you.'

The bright mercurial god pulled from the ground a plant and showed me how its root is black, its flower white as milk.
 The gods call this plant Moly.<sup>8</sup> It is hard for mortal men to dig it up, but gods 305 are able to do everything. Then Hermes flew through the wooded island, back towards high Mount Olympus. I went in the house of Circe. My heart pounded as I walked.
 I stood there at the doorway, and I saw her, 310
 the lovely Circe with her braided hair.
 I called; she heard and opened up the doors and asked me in. I followed nervously.
 She led me to a silver-studded chair, all finely crafted, with a footstool under. 315
 In a gold cup she mixed a drink for me, adding the drug—she hoped to do me harm.
 I sipped it, but the magic did not work.
 She struck me with her wand and said,

'Now go!
 Out to the sty, and lie there with your men!' 320
 But I drew my sharp sword from by my thigh and leapt at her as if I meant to kill her.
 She screamed and ducked beneath the sword, and grasped my knees, and wailing asked me,

'Who are you?
 Where is your city? And who are your parents?' 325

8. Probably an imaginary plant, though the legend may be connected to the ancient idea that garlic (which also has a white flower and dark root) can be used against bad spirits and vampires.

I am amazed that you could drink my potion and yet are not bewitched. No other man has drunk it and withstood the magic charm.
 But you are different. Your mind is not enchanted. You must be Odysseus, 330 the man who can adapt to anything.
 Bright flashing Hermes of the golden wand has often told me that you would sail here from Troy in your swift ship. Now sheathe your sword and come to bed with me. Through making love 335 we may begin to trust each other more.'

I answered, 'Circe! How can you command me to treat you gently, when you turned my men to pigs, and you are planning to play tricks in telling me to come to bed with you, 340 so you can take my courage and my manhood when you have got me naked? I refuse to come to bed with you, unless you swear a mighty oath that you will not form plans to hurt me anymore.'

When I said that, 345
 at once she made the oath as I had asked.
 She vowed and formed the oath, and then at last
 I went up to the dazzling bed of Circe.

Meanwhile, four slaves, her house girls, were at work around the palace. They were nymphs, the daughters 350 of fountains and of groves and holy rivers that flow into the sea. One set fine cloths of purple on the chairs, with stones beneath them.
 Beside each chair, another pulled up tables of silver and set golden baskets on them. 355
 The third mixed up inside a silver bowl sweet, cheering wine, and poured it in gold cups.
 The fourth brought water, and she lit a fire beneath a mighty tripod, till it boiled.
 It started bubbling in the copper cauldron; 360 she took me to the bathtub, and began to wash my head and shoulders, using water mixed to the perfect temperature, to take my deep soul-crushing weariness away.
 After the bath, she oiled my skin and dressed me 365 in fine wool cloak and tunic, and she led me to a silver-studded well-carved chair, and set a footstool underneath. Another slave brought water for my hands, in a gold pitcher, and poured it over them, to a silver bowl. 370
 She set a polished table near. The cook brought bread and laid a generous feast, and Circe told me to eat. But my heart was unwilling.

 I sat there with my mind on other things;
 I had forebodings. Circe noticed me 375 sitting, not touching food, and weighed by grief.
 She stood near me and asked, 'Odysseus!
 why are you sitting there so silently, like someone mute, eating your heart, not touching the banquet or the wine? You need not fear. 380 Remember, I already swore an oath.'

But I said, 'Circe, no! What decent man could bear to taste his food or sip his wine before he saw his men with his own eyes, and set them free? If you are so insistent 385 on telling me to eat and drink, then free them, so I may see with my own eyes my crew of loyal men.'

So Circe left the hall
 holding her wand, and opened up the pigsty and drove them out, still looking like fat boars, 390 large and full grown. They stood in front of her.
 Majestic Lady Circe walked among them, anointing each with some new drug. The potion had made thick hog-hairs sprout out on their bodies.
 Those bristles all flew off and they were men, 395 but younger than before, and much more handsome, and taller. Then they recognized me. Each embraced me tightly in his arms, and started sobbing in desperation. So the house rang loud with noise, and even she herself 400 pitied them. She came near to me and said,

'Odysseus, you always find solutions.
 Go now to your swift ship beside the sea.
 First drag the ship to land, and bring your stores and all your gear inside the caves. Then come 405 back with your loyal men.'

My heart agreed;
 I went down to my swift ship on the shore.
 I found my loyal men beside the ship, weeping and shedding floods of tears. As when a herd of cows is coming back from pasture 410 into the yard; and all the little heifers jump from their pens to skip and run towards their mothers, and they cluster round them, mooing;
 just so my men, as soon as they saw me, began to weep, and in their minds it seemed 415
 as if they had arrived in their own home, the land of rugged Ithaca, where they were born and raised. Still sobbing, they cried out, ‘Oh, Master! We are glad to see you back!

It is as if we had come home ourselves, to Ithaca, our fatherland. But tell us about how all our other friends were killed.’ 420

I reassured them, saying, ‘First we must drag up the ship to land, and put the stores and all our gear inside the caves; then hurry, all of you, come with me, and see your friends inside the goddess Circe’s holy house, eating and drinking; they have food enough to last forever.’ 425

They believed my story, with the exception of Eurylochus, who warned them, 430

‘Fools! Why would you go up there?
Why would you choose to take on so much danger, to enter Circe’s house, where she will turn us to pigs or wolves or lions, all of us, forced to protect her mighty house for her?
Remember what the Cyclops did? Our friends went to his home with this rash lord of ours.
Because of his bad choices, they all died.’ 435

At that, I thought of drawing my long sword from by my sturdy thigh, to cut his head off and let it fall down to the ground—although he was close family. My men restrained me, saying to me, ‘No, king, please let him go!
Let him stay here and guard the ship, and we will follow you to Circe’s holy house.’ 440

So they went up, away from ship and shore.
Eurylochus did not stay there; he came,
fearing my angry scolding.

Meanwhile Circe
had freed the other men, and in her house she gently bathed them, rubbing them with oil.
She had them dressed in woolen cloaks and tunics.
We found them feasting in the hall. The men, seeing each other face to face again, began to weep; their sobbing filled the hall.
The goddess stood beside me and said, 450

‘King, clever Odysseus, Laertes’ son, 455

now stop encouraging this lamentation.
 I know you and your men have suffered greatly, out on the fish-filled sea, and on dry land from hostile men. But it is time to eat 460 and drink some wine. You must get back the drive you had when you set out from Ithaca.
 You are worn down and brokenhearted, always dwelling on pain and wandering. You never feel joy at heart. You have endured too much.’ 465

We did as she had said. Then every day for a whole year we feasted there on meat and sweet strong wine. But when the year was over, when months had waned and seasons turned, and each long day had passed its course, my loyal men 470 called me and said,

‘Be guided by the gods.
 Now it is time to think of our own country, if you are fated to survive and reach your high-roofed house and your forefathers’ land.’

My warrior soul agreed. So all day long 475 till sunset we kept sitting at the feast of meat and sweet strong wine. But when the sun set, and the darkness came, they went to bed all through the shadowy palace. I went up to Circe’s splendid bed, and touched her knees 480 in supplication, and the goddess listened.

‘Circe,’ I said, ‘fulfill the vow you made to send me home. My heart now longs to go.
 My men are also desperate to leave.
 Whenever you are absent, they exhaust me 485 with constant lamentation.’

And she answered, ‘Laertes’ son, great King Odysseus, master of every challenge, you need not remain here in my house against your will.
 But first you must complete another journey. 490
 Go to the house of Hades and the dreadful Persephone,<sup>9</sup> and ask the Theban prophet, the blind Tiresias, for his advice.
 Persephone has given him alone full understanding, even now in death. 495
 The other spirits flit around as shadows.’

9. Hades is god of the underworld. Persephone is his wife.

That broke my heart, and sitting on the bed
 I wept, and lost all will to live and see the shining sun. When I was done with sobbing and rolling round in grief, I said to her, 500

‘But Circe, who can guide us on this journey?
 No one before has ever sailed to Hades by ship.’

And right away the goddess answered, ‘You are resourceful, King Odysseus.
 You need not worry that you have no pilot 505 to steer your ship. Set up your mast, let fly your white sails, and sit down. The North Wind’s breath will blow the ship. When you have crossed the stream of Ocean, you will reach the shore, where willows let fall their dying fruit, and towering poplars 510 grow in the forest of Persephone.
 Tie up your ship in the deep-eddying Ocean, and go into the spacious home of Hades.
 The Pyriphlegethon and Cocytus, a tributary of the Styx, both run 515 into the Acheron. The flowing water resounds beside the rock. Brave man, go there, and dig a hole a cubit<sup>1</sup> wide and long,
 and round it pour libations for the dead:
 first honey-mix,<sup>2</sup> then sweet wine, and the third 520 of water. Sprinkle barley, and beseech the spirits of the dead. Vow if you reach the barren land of Ithaca, to kill a heifer in your halls, the best you have, uncalved, and you will heap the fire with meat, 525 and offer to Tiresias alone a ram, pure black, the best of all your flock.
 When you have prayed to all the famous dead, slaughter one ram and one black ewe, directing the animals to Erebus,<sup>3</sup> but turn 530 yourself away, towards the gushing river.
 Many will come. Then tell your men to skin the sheep that lie there killed by ruthless bronze, and burn them, with a prayer to mighty Hades and terrible Persephone. Then draw 535 your sword and sit. Do not let them come near the blood, until you hear Tiresias.
 The prophet will soon come, and he will tell you about your journey, measured out across the fish-filled sea, and how you will get home.’ 540

1. A unit of measure roughly equivalent to the length of a human forearm.

2. A mixture of honey with some other substance, perhaps milk.

3. The underworld.

Dawn on her golden throne began to shine,
 and Circe dressed me in my cloak and tunic.
 The goddess wore a long white dress, of fine and delicate fabric, with a golden belt, and on her head, a veil. Then I walked round, 545 all through the house, and called my men. I stood beside each one, and roused them with my words.

‘Wake up! Now no more dozing in sweet sleep.
 We have to go. The goddess gave instructions.’

They did as I had said. But even then 550
 I could not lead my men away unharmed.
 The youngest one—Elpenor was his name—not very brave in war, nor very smart, was lying high up in the home of Circe, apart from his companions, seeking coolness 555 since he was drunk. He heard the noise and bustle, the movements of his friends, and jumped up quickly, forgetting to climb down the lofty ladder.
 He fell down crashing headlong from the roof, and broke his neck, right at the spine. His spirit 560 went down to Hades.

Then I told the others,
 ‘Perhaps you think that you are going home.
 But Circe says we have to go towards the house of Hades and Persephone, to meet Tiresias, the Theban spirit.’ 565

At that, their hearts were broken. They sat down right there and wept and tore their clothes. But all their lamentation did no good. We went down to our speedy ship beside the sea, despite our grief. We shed abundant tears. 570 Then Circe came and tied up one black ewe and one ram by the ship, and slipped away, easily; who can see the gods go by unless they wish to show themselves to us?”

BOOK II

[The Dead]

“We reached the sea and first of all we launched the ship into the sparkling salty water, set up the mast and sails, and brought the sheep on board with us. We were still grieving, weeping, in floods of tears. But beautiful, dread Circe, 5 the goddess who can speak in human tongues, sent us a wind to fill our sails, fair wind befriending us behind the dark blue prow.

 We made our tackle shipshape, then sat down.
 The wind and pilot guided straight our course. 10
 The sun set. It was dark in all directions.

We reached the limits of deep-flowing Ocean, where the Cimmerians live and have their city.
 Their land is covered up in mist and cloud;
 the shining Sun God never looks on them 15 with his bright beams—not when he rises up into the starry sky, nor when he turns back from the heavens to earth. Destructive night blankets the world for all poor mortals there.
 We beached our ship, drove out the sheep, and went 20 to seek the stream of Ocean where the goddess had told us we must go. Eurylochus and Perimedes made the sacrifice.
 I drew my sword and dug a hole, a fathom widthways and lengthways, and I poured libations 25 for all the dead: first honey-mix, sweet wine, and lastly, water. On the top, I sprinkled barley, and made a solemn vow that if I reached my homeland, I would sacrifice my best young heifer, still uncalved, and pile 30 the altar high with offerings for the dead.
 I promised for Tiresias as well
 a pure black sheep, the best in all my flock.
 So with these vows, I called upon the dead.
 I took the sheep and slit their throats above 35 the pit. Black blood flowed out. The spirits came up out of Erebus and gathered round.
 Teenagers, girls and boys, the old who suffered for many years, and fresh young brides whom labor destroyed in youth; and many men cut down 40 in battle by bronze spears, still dressed in armor stained with their blood. From every side they crowded around the pit, with eerie cries. Pale fear took hold of me. I roused my men and told them to flay the sheep that I had killed, and burn them, 45 and pray to Hades and Persephone.
 I drew my sword and sat on guard, preventing the spirits of the dead from coming near the blood, till I had met Tiresias.

First came the spirit of my man Elpenor, 50 who had not yet been buried in the earth.
 We left his body in the house of Circe without a funeral or burial;
 we were too occupied with other things.
 On sight of him, I wept in pity, saying, 55

‘Elpenor, how did you come here, in darkness?
You came on foot more quickly than I sailed.’

He groaned in answer, ‘Lord Odysseus, you master every circumstance. But I had bad luck from some god, and too much wine 60 befuddled me. In Circe’s house I lay upstairs, and I forgot to use the ladder to climb down from the roof. I fell headfirst; my neck was broken from my spine. My spirit came down to Hades. By the men you left, 65 the absent ones! And by your wife! And father, who brought you up from babyhood! And by your son, Telemachus, whom you abandoned alone at home, I beg you! When you sail from Hades and you dock your ship again 70 at Aeaea, please, my lord, remember me.
Do not go on and leave me there unburied, abandoned, without tears or lamentation—or you will make the gods enraged at you.
Burn me with all my arms, and heap a mound 75 beside the gray salt sea, so in the future people will know of me and my misfortune.
And fix into the tomb the oar I used to row with my companions while I lived.’

‘Poor man!’ I answered, ‘I will do all this.’ 80

We sat there talking sadly—I on one side held firm my sword in blood, while on the other the ghost of my crew member made his speech.
Then came the spirit of my own dead mother, Autolycus<sup>1</sup> daughter Anticleia, 85 whom I had left alive when I went off to holy Troy. On seeing her, I wept in pity. But despite my bitter grief, I would not let her near the blood till I talked to Tiresias. The prophet came 90 holding a golden scepter, and he knew me,
and said,

‘King under Zeus, Odysseus, adept survivor, why did you abandon the sun, poor man, to see the dead, and this place without joy? Step back now from the pit, 95 hold up your sharp sword so that I may drink the blood and speak to you.’

1. Autolycus is Odysseus’s maternal grandfather; the name suggests “Wolf Man.”

At that, I sheathed my silver-studded sword. When he had drunk the murky blood, the famous prophet spoke.

‘Odysseus, you think of going home 100 as honey-sweet, but gods will make it bitter.
I think Poseidon will not cease to feel incensed because you blinded his dear son.
You have to suffer, but you can get home,
if you control your urges and your men. 105 Turn from the purple depths and sail your ship towards the island of Thrinacia; there you will find grazing cows and fine fat sheep, belonging to the god who sees and hears all things—the Sun God. If you leave them be, 110 keeping your mind fixed on your journey home, you may still get to Ithaca, despite great losses. But if you hurt those cows, I see disaster for your ship and for your men.
If you yourself escape, you will come home 115 late and exhausted, in a stranger’s boat, having destroyed your men. And you will find invaders eating your supplies at home, courting your wife with gifts. Then you will match the suitors’ violence and kill them all, 120 inside your halls, through tricks or in the open, with sharp bronze weapons. When those men are dead, you have to go away and take an oar to people with no knowledge of the sea, who do not salt their food. They never saw 125 a ship’s red prow, nor oars, the wings of boats.
I prophesy the signs of things to come.
When you meet somebody, a traveler, who calls the thing you carry on your back a winnowing fan, then fix that oar in earth 130 and make fine sacrifices to Poseidon—a bull and stud-boar. Then you will go home and offer holy hecatombs to all the deathless gods who live in heaven, each in order. Gentle death will come to you, 135 far from the sea, of comfortable old age, your people flourishing. So it will be.’

I said, ‘Tiresias, I hope the gods spin out this fate for me. But tell me this, and tell the truth. I saw my mother’s spirit, 140 sitting in silence near the blood, refusing even to talk to me, or meet my eyes!
My lord, how can I make her recognize that it is me?’

At once he made his answer.
 'That is an easy matter to explain. 145 Whenever you allow one of these spirits to come here near the blood, it will be able to speak the truth to you. As soon as you push them away, they have to leave again.'

With that, Tiresias, the prophet spirit, 150 was finished; he departed to the house of Hades. I stayed rooted there in place until my mother came and drank the blood.
 She knew me then and spoke in tones of grief.

'My child! How did you come here through the darkness 155 while you were still alive? This place is hard for living men to see. There are great rivers and dreadful gulfs, including the great Ocean which none can cross on foot; one needs a ship.
 Have you come wandering here, so far from Troy, 160 with ship and crew? Have you not yet arrived in Ithaca, nor seen your wife at home?'

I answered, 'Mother, I was forced to come to Hades to consult the prophet spirit, Theban Tiresias. I have not yet 165 come near to Greece, nor reached my own home country.
 I have been lost and wretchedly unhappy since I first followed mighty Agamemnon to Troy, the land of horses, to make war upon the people there. But tell me, how 170 was sad death brought upon you? By long illness?
 Or did the archer Artemis destroy you with gentle arrows?<sup>2</sup> Tell me too about my father and the son I left behind.
 Are they still honored as the kings? Or has 175 another taken over, saying I will not return? And tell me what my wife is thinking, and her plans. Does she stay with our son and focus on his care, or has the best of the Achaeans<sup>3</sup> married her?' 180

My mother answered, 'She stays firm. Her heart is strong. She is still in your house. And all her nights are passed in misery, and days in tears. But no one has usurped your throne.
 Telemachus still tends the whole estate 185 unharmed and feasts in style, as lords should do, and he is always asked to council meetings.

2. Artemis, goddess of hunting and childbirth, was particularly associated with the deaths of women.
 3. Greeks.

Your father stays out in the countryside.
 He will not come to town. He does not sleep on a real bed with blankets and fresh sheets. 190
 In winter he sleeps inside, by the fire, just lying in the ashes with the slaves;
 his clothes are rags. In summer and at harvest, the piles of fallen leaves are beds for him.
 He lies there grieving, full of sorrow, longing 195 for your return. His old age is not easy.
 And that is why I met my fate and died.
 The goddess did not shoot me in my home, aiming with gentle arrows. Nor did sickness suck all the strength out from my limbs, with long 200 and cruel wasting. No, it was missing you, Odysseus, my sunshine; your sharp mind, and your kind heart. That took sweet life from me.'

Then in my heart I wanted to embrace the spirit of my mother. She was dead, 205 and I did not know how. Three times I tried, longing to touch her. But three times her ghost flew from my arms, like shadows or like dreams.
 Sharp pain pierced deeper in me as I cried,

'No, Mother! Why do you not stay for me, 210 and let me hold you, even here in Hades?
 Let us wrap loving arms around each other and find a frigid comfort in shared tears!
 But is this really you? Or has the Queen sent me a phantom, to increase my grief?' 215

She answered, 'Oh, my child! You are the most unlucky man alive. Persephone is not deceiving you. This is the rule for mortals when we die. Our muscles cease to hold the flesh and skeleton together; 220 as soon as life departs from our white bones, the force of blazing fire destroys the corpse.
 The spirit flies away and soon is gone, just like a dream. Now hurry to the light; remember all these things, so you may tell 225 your wife in times to come.'

As we were talking,
 some women came, sent by Persephone—
 the daughters and the wives of warriors.
 They thronged and clustered round the blood. I wanted to speak to each of them, and made a plan. 230 I drew my sword and would not let them come together in a group to drink the blood.
 They took turns coming forward, and each told her history; I questioned each. The first was well-born Tyro, child of Salmoneus, 235 and wife of Cretheus, Aeolus' son.

 She fell in love with River Enipeus, most handsome of all rivers that pour water over the earth. She often went to visit his lovely streams. Poseidon took his form, 240 and at the river mouth he lay with her.
 Around them arched a dark-blue wave that stood high as a mountain, and it hid the god and mortal woman. There he loosed her belt and made her sleep. The god made love to her, 245 and afterwards, he took her hand and spoke.

'Woman, be glad about this love. You will bear glorious children in the coming year.
 Affairs with gods always result in offspring.
 Look after them and raise them. Now go home; 250 tell no one who I am. But I will tell you.
 I am Poseidon, Shaker of the Earth.'
 With that he sank beneath the ocean waves.

She brought two sons to term, named Pelias and Neleus, both sturdy boys who served 255 almighty Zeus; and Pelias' home was on the spacious dancing fields of Iolcus, where sheep are plentiful; his brother lived in sandy Pylos. And she bore more sons, to Cretheus: Aeson, Pheres, Amythaeon 260 who loved war chariots.

And after her
 I saw Antiope, who said she slept in Zeus' arms and bore two sons: Amphion and Zethus, the first settlers of Thebes, city of seven gates. Strong though they were, 265 they could not live there on the open plain without defenses.

Then I saw Alcmene, wife of Amphytrion, who by great Zeus conceived the lionhearted Heracles.
 And I saw Megara, proud Creon's child, 270 the wife of tireless Heracles. I saw fine Epicaste, Oedipus' mother, who did a dreadful thing in ignorance:
 she married her own son. He killed his father, and married her. The gods revealed the truth 275 to humans; through their deadly plans, he ruled the Cadmeans in Thebes, despite his pain.
 But Epicaste crossed the gates of Hades;

she tied a noose and hung it from the ceiling, and hanged herself for sorrow, leaving him 280
the agonies a mother's Furies bring.<sup>4</sup>

Then I saw Chloris, who was youngest daughter of Amphion, who ruled the Minyans in Orchomenus. She was beautiful, and Neleus paid rich bride-gifts for her. 285
She was the queen in Pylos, and she bore Chromius, Nestor, Periclymenus, and mighty Pyro, who was such a marvel that all the men desired to marry her.
But Neleus would only let her marry 290 a man who could drive off the stubborn cattle of Iphicles from Phylace. The prophet Melampus was the only one who tried, but gods restrained him, cursing him; the herdsmen shackled him. Days and months went by, the seasons 295 changed as the year went by, until at last Iphicles set him free as his reward for prophecy.<sup>5</sup> The will of Zeus was done.
And then I saw Tyndareus' wife,
Leda, who bore him two strong sons: the horseman 300
Castor, and Polydeuces, skillful boxer.
Life-giving earth contains them, still alive.
Zeus honors them even in the underworld.
They live and die alternately, and they are honored like the gods.<sup>6</sup>

And then I saw 305
Iphimedeia, wife of Aloeus, who proudly said Poseidon slept with her.
She had two sons whose lives were both cut short:
Otus and famous Ephialtes, whom the fertile earth raised up as the tallest heroes 310 after renowned Orion. At nine years, they were nine cubits wide, nine fathoms high.
They brought the din of dreadful raging war to the immortal gods and tried to set Ossa and Pelion—trees, leaves and all— 315 on Mount Olympus, high up in the sky.
They might have managed it, if they had reached

4. This passage gives a version of the myth different from that of Sophocles' play, in which Oedipus's mother is called Jocasta.

5. The prophet Melampus, after his unsuccessful attempt to drive off Iphicles' cattle and win his daughter's hand, prophesied that Iphicles, who had been impotent, would be able to have more children. In reward for the good prophecy, Iphicles set Melampus free.

6. Castor and Polydeuces (also known as Pollux), the twins associated with the constellation Gemini, were given by Zeus the privilege of being alive on every other day, taking turns. According to many versions of the myth, Zeus was actually their father, having seduced Leda in the guise of a swan (so the twins are brothers of Helen and Clytemnestra).

full adulthood. Apollo, son of Zeus by braided Leto, killed them: they were both dead before down could grow on their young chins, dead before beards could wreath their naked faces. 320

Then I saw Phaedra, Procris,<sup>7</sup> and the lovely daughter of dangerous Minos, Ariadne.
 Theseus tried to bring her back from Crete to Athens, but could not succeed; the goddess 325 Artemis killed her on the isle of Día, when Dionysus spoke against her.<sup>8</sup> Then came Maera, Clymene and Eriphyle:
 accepting golden bribes, she killed her husband.<sup>9</sup>
 I cannot name each famous wife and daughter 330
 I saw there; holy night would pass away before I finished. I must go to sleep on board the ship beside my crew, or else right here. I know the gods and you will help my onward journey.”

They were silent, spellbound, listening in the shadowy hall. White-armed Arete spoke. 335

“Phaeacians! Look at him!
 What a tall, handsome man! And what a mind!
 He is my special guest, but all of you share in our rank as lords; so do not send him 340 away too fast, and when he leaves, you must be generous. He is in need, and you are rich in treasure, through the will of gods.”

The veteran Echeneus, the oldest man in their company, said, “Our wise queen has hit the mark, my friends. Do as she says.
 But first Alcinous must speak and act.” 345

The king said, “Let it be as she has spoken, as long as I am ruler of this nation of seafarers. I know our guest is keen to go back home, but let him stay till morning. 350

7. Phaedra was the elder daughter of Minos, king of Crete, who married Theseus of Athens and fell in love with his son, her stepson, with disastrous results. Procris was the daughter of Erectheus, another king of Athens, who was killed unintentionally by her husband, Cephalus.

8. Ariadne, another daughter of Minos of Crete, helped Theseus through the Cretan labyrinth to kill her half-brother, the Minotaur, and was taken off with him on his ship. In later versions of the legend, Theseus abandoned her, and she was whisked away by Dionysus. This Homeric version implies that she somehow offended Dionysus—it is unclear how, and this story is otherwise unknown.

9. Eriphyle accepted the bribe of a gold necklace to persuade her husband, Amphiaras, king of Argos, to go on a doomed raid against Thebes.

I will give all his presents then. You men will all help him, but I will help the most, since I hold power here."

Odysseus

answered with careful tact, "Alcinous, 355 king over all the people, if you urged me to stay here for a year before you gave the parting gifts and sent me on my way, I would be happy. It would be far better to reach my own dear home with hands filled full 360 of treasure. So all men would honor me and welcome me back home in Ithaca."

Alcinous replied, "Odysseus, the earth sustains all different kinds of people.
Many are cheats and thieves, who fashion lies 365 out of thin air. But when I look at you,
I know you are not in that category.
Your story has both grace and wisdom in it.
You sounded like a skillful poet, telling the sufferings of all the Greeks, including 370 what you endured yourself. But come now, tell me if you saw any spirits of your friends, who went with you to Troy and undertook the grief and pain of war. The night is long; it is not time to sleep yet. Tell me more 375 amazing deeds! I would keep listening until bright daybreak, if you kept on telling the dangers you have passed."

Odysseus

answered politely, "King Alcinous, there is a time for many tales, but also 380
a time for sleep. If you still want to hear, I will not grudge you stories. I will tell you some even more distressing ones, about my friend who managed to escape the shrieks and battle din at Troy but perished later, 385 killed in his own home by an evil wife.
Holy Persephone dispersed the ghosts of women and they went their separate ways.
The ghost of Agamemnon came in sorrow with all the rest who met their fate with him 390 inside Aegisthus' house. He recognized me when he had drunk the blood. He wept out loud, and tearfully reached out his hands towards me, desperate to touch. His energy and strength and all the suppleness his limbs once had 395 were gone. I wept and my heart pitied him.
I cried out,

‘Lord of men, King Agamemnon!
 How did you die? What bad luck brought you down?
 Was it Poseidon rousing up a blast of cruel wind to wreck your ships? Or were you 400 killed on dry land by enemies as you were poaching their fat flocks of sheep or cattle, or fighting for their city and their wives?’

He answered right away, ‘King under Zeus, Odysseus—survivor! No, Poseidon 405 did not rouse up a dreadful blast of wind to wreck my ship. No hostile men on land killed me in self-defense. It was Aegisthus who planned my death and murdered me, with help from my own wife. He called me to his house 410 to dinner and he killed me, as one slaughters an ox at manger. What a dreadful death!
 My men were systematically slaughtered like pigs in a rich lord’s house for some feast, a wedding or a banquet. You have seen 415 many cut down in war in thick of battle, or slaughtered in a combat hand to hand;
 but you would grieve with even deeper pity if you could see us lying dead beneath the tables piled with food and wine. The floor 420 swam thick with blood. I heard the desperate voice of Priam’s daughter, poor Cassandra,<sup>1</sup> whom deceitful Clytemnestra killed beside me.
 As I lay dying, struck through by the sword,
 I tried to lift my arms up from the ground. 425
 That she-dog turned away. I went to Hades.
 She did not even shut my eyes or close my mouth. There is no more disgusting act than when a wife betrays a man like that.
 That woman formed a plot to murder me! 430
 Her husband! When I got back home, I thought I would be welcomed, at least by my slaves and children. She has such an evil mind that she has poured down shame on her own head and on all other women, even good ones.’ 435

I cried out, ‘Curse her! Zeus has always brought disaster to the house of Atreus through women. Many men were lost for Helen, and Clytemnestra<sup>2</sup> formed this plot against you when you were far away.’

At once he answered, 440
 ‘So you must never treat your wife too well.

1. Cassandra, who had the gift of prophecy from Apollo, was brought back from Troy as a prize of war by Agamemnon.

2. Helen and Clytemnestra were sisters.

Do not let her know everything you know.
 Tell her some things, hide others. But your wife will not kill you, Odysseus. The wise Penelope is much too sensible 445 to do such things. Your bride was very young when we went off to war. She had a baby still at her breast, who must be now a man.
 He will be glad when you come home and see him, and he will throw his arms around his father. 450 That is how things should go. My wife prevented my eager eyes from gazing at my son.
 She killed me first. I have a final piece of sound advice for you—take heed of it.
 When you arrive in your own land, do not 455 anchor your ship in full view; move in secret.
 There is no trusting women any longer.
 But have you any news about my son?
 Is he alive? Is he in Orchomenus, or sandy Pylos, or with Menelaus 460 in Sparta? Surely my fine son Orestes is not yet dead.'

I answered, 'Agamemnon, why ask me this? I do not even know whether he is alive or dead. It is pointless to talk of hypotheticals.' 465

Both of us wept profusely, deeply grieving over the bitter words we spoke. Then came the spirits of Achilles<sup>3</sup> and Patroclus and of Antilochus and Ajax,<sup>4</sup> who was handsomest and had the best physique 470 of all the Greeks, next only to Achilles the sprinter. And Achilles recognized me and spoke in tears.

'My lord Odysseus,
 you fox! What will you think of next? How could you bear to come down to Hades? Numb dead people 475 live here, the shades of poor exhausted mortals.'
 I said, 'Achilles, greatest of Greek heroes,
 I came down here to meet Tiresias, in case he had advice for my return to rocky Ithaca. I have not even 480 returned to Greece, my homeland. I have had bad luck. But no one's luck was ever better than yours, nor ever will be. In your life we Greeks respected you as we do gods,

4. Strong Greek hero known for defensive fighting.

and now that you are here, you have great power among the dead. Achilles, you should not be bitter at your death.' 485

But he replied,
'Odysseus, you must not comfort me for death. I would prefer to be a workman, hired by a poor man on a peasant farm, 490 than rule as king of all the dead. But come, tell me about my son. Do you have news?
Did he march off to war to be a leader?
And what about my father Peleus?
Does he still have good standing among all 495 the Myrmidons? Or do they treat him badly in Phthia and Greece, since he is old and frail? Now I have left the light of day, and am not there to help, as on the plains of Troy when I was killing the best Trojans, 500 to help the Greeks. If I could go for even a little while, with all that strength I had,
up to my father's house, I would make those who hurt and disrespect him wish my hands were not invincible.'

I answered him, 505
'I have no news to tell about your father, but I can tell you all about your son, dear Neoptolemus. I brought him from Scyros by ship, with other well-armed Greeks.
When we were strategizing about Troy, 510
he always spoke up first and to the purpose, unmatched except by Nestor and myself.
And when we fought at Troy, he never paused in the great throng of battle; he was always fearlessly running forward, and he slaughtered 515 enormous numbers in the clash of war.
I cannot name all those he killed for us.
But with his bronze he cut down Eurypylus, the son of Telephus, most handsome man
I ever saw, next only to great Memnon. 520
The multitude of Cetians he brought were also killed, since Priam bribed his mother.<sup>5</sup> When we, the Argive leaders, were preparing to climb inside the Wooden Horse, it was my task to open up and close the door. 525
The other Greek commanders were in tears; their legs were shaking. Not your handsome boy!
I never saw his face grow pale; he had no tears to wipe away. Inside the horse, he begged me to allow him to jump out. 530

 He gripped his sword hilt and his heavy spear, so desperate to go hurt the Trojans.
 At last, when we had sacked the lofty city of Priam, he embarked weighed down with spoils.
 No sharp bronze spear had wounded him at all; 535
 he was unhurt by all the skirmishes endured in war when Ares rages blind.'

After I told him this, Achilles' ghost took great swift-footed strides across the fields of asphodel, delighted to have heard 540 about the glorious prowess of his son.

Other dead souls were gathering, all sad;
 each told the story of his sorrow. Only Ajax kept back, enraged because I won Achilles' armor,<sup>6</sup> when the case was judged 545 beside the ships. The hero's mother, Thetis, and sons of Troy, and Pallas, gave the arms to me. I wish I had not won this contest!
 For those arms Ajax lies beneath the earth, whose looks and deeds were best of all the Greeks 550
 after Achilles, son of Peleus.
 I spoke to him to try to make it up.

'Please, Ajax, son of mighty Telamon, can you not set aside your rage at me about those cursed arms? Not even now, 555 in death? The gods made them to ruin us.
 You were our tower; what a loss you were!
 We Greeks were struck by grief when you were gone;
 we mourned as long for you as for Achilles.
 Blame nobody but Zeus. He ruined us, 560 in hatred for the army of the Greeks;
 and that was why he brought this doom on you.
 But listen now, my lord. Subdue your anger.'
 He did not answer. He went off and followed the spirits of the dead to Erebus. 565

Despite his rage, we might have spoken longer if I had not felt in my heart an urge to see more spirits. I saw Minos<sup>7</sup> there, the son of Zeus, who holds the golden scepter and sits in judgment on the dead. They ask 570 their king to arbitrate disputes, inside the house of Hades, where the doors are always wide open. I saw great Orion,<sup>8</sup> chasing across the fields of asphodel the beasts he killed when living high in lonely mountains, 575 holding his indestructible bronze club.

 And I saw Tityus, the son of Gaia, stretched out nine miles.<sup>9</sup> When Leto, Zeus' lover, was traveling to Pytho, through the fields of beautiful Panopeus, he raped her. 580
 Two vultures sit on either side of him, ripping his liver, plunging in his bowels;
 he fails to push them off. I saw the pain of Tantalus, in water to his chin, so parched, no way to drink. When that old man 585 bent down towards the water, it was gone;
 some god had dried it up, and at his feet dark earth appeared. Tall leafy trees hung fruit above his head: sweet figs and pomegranates and brightly shining apples and ripe olives. 590
 But when he grasped them with his hands, the wind hurled them away towards the shadowy clouds.
 And I saw Sisyphus in torment, pushing a giant rock with both hands, leaning on it with all his might to shove it up towards 595 a hilltop; when he almost reached the peak, its weight would swerve, and it would roll back down, heedlessly. But he kept on straining, pushing, his body drenched in sweat, his head all dusty.
 I saw a phantom of great Heracles. 600
 The man himself is with the deathless gods,<sup>1</sup> happy and feasting, with fine-ankled Hebe,<sup>2</sup>
 the child of mighty Zeus and golden Hera.
 Around his ghost, the dead souls shrieked like birds, all panic struck. He walked like gloomy night, 605 holding his bow uncased and with an arrow held on the string. He glowered terribly, poised for a shot. Around his chest was strapped a terrifying baldric made of gold, fashioned with marvelous images of bears, 610 wild boars, and lions with fierce staring eyes, and battles and the slaughtering of men.
 I hope the craftsman who designed this scene will never make another work like this.
 This Heracles at once knew who I was, 615 and full of grief he cried,

8. Mythical hunter who was turned into the constellation Orion.

9. Tityus was a Titan, one of the generation before the Olympian gods. Gaia is the original earth goddess.

1. Heracles, a son of Zeus, was supposed to have been rewarded after all his labors with a place among the Olympian gods. The confusing suggestion that his phantom is with the dead, while his real self is with the gods, may be a reflection of various views about whether or not Heracles really was apotheosized.

2. "Hebe" means "youth."

‘Odysseus!

Master of every circumstance, so you are also tortured by the weight of fortune as I was while I lived beneath the sun?
I was a son of Zeus, and yet my pain was infinite. I was enslaved to someone far less heroic than myself, who laid harsh labors on me.<sup>3</sup> Once he sent me here to bring back Cerberus,<sup>4</sup> since he could think of no worse task for me. I brought the Dog up out of Hades, with the help of Hermes, and flashing-eyed Athena.’

He went back to Hades’ house. I stayed, in case more heroes who died in ancient times should come to me.
I would have seen the noble men I hoped for,
Pirithous and Theseus, god-born.<sup>5</sup>
But masses of the dead came thronging round with eerie cries, and cold fear seized me, lest the dreadful Queen Persephone might send the monster’s head, the Gorgon,<sup>6</sup> out of Hades.
So then I hurried back and told my men to climb on board the ship and loose the cables.
They did so, and sat down along the benches.
The current bore the ship down River Ocean, first with the help of oars, and then fair wind.”

BOOK 12

[Difficult Choices]

“Our ship sailed out beyond the stream of Ocean, across the waves of open sea, and came to Aea, home of newborn Dawn, who dances in meadows with the beams of Helius.
We beached the ship upon the sandy shore, and disembarked, and there we fell asleep while waiting for bright morning. When Dawn came, born early, with her fingertips like petals, I sent my men to Circe’s house, to bring the body of the dead Elpenor. Quickly we chopped the wood and at the farthest headland

3. Eurystheus, at the behest of the goddess Hera, laid the labors on Heracles, whom she resented as an illegitimate son of her husband, Zeus.

4. Guard dog of the underworld.

5. Theseus, a son of Poseidon, was a mythic king of Athens and killer of the Minotaur. Pirithous was his best friend, a son of Zeus; together they went to the underworld, hoping to abduct Persephone.

6. Female monster whose gaze turns onlookers to stone.

we held a funeral for him, and wept profusely, crying out in grief. We burned his body and his gear, and built a mound, and dragged a pillar onto it, and fixed 15 his oar on top—each ritual step in turn.
 Circe, the well-groomed goddess, was aware that we were back from Hades, and she hurried to meet us with her slaves. They carried bread and meat and bright red wine. She stood among us, 20
 and said,

‘This is amazing! You all went alive to Hades—you will be twice-dead, when other people only die one time!
 Eat now, and stay here drinking wine all day.
 At dawn, sail on. I will explain your route 25 in detail, so no evil thing can stitch a means to hurt you, on the land or sea.’

I am a stubborn man, but I agreed, so there we sat and feasted on the meat and strong sweet wine until the sun went down. 30
 When darkness fell, the men slept by the ship.
 Then Circe took my hand, and led me off apart from them, and questioned me in detail.
 I told her everything. The lady Circe replied at last,

‘That quest is over now. 35
 So listen, I will give you good instructions;
 another god will make sure you remember.
 First you will reach the Sirens, who bewitch all passersby. If anyone goes near them in ignorance, and listens to their voices, 40 that man will never travel to his home, and never make his wife and children happy to have him back with them again. The Sirens who sit there in their meadow will seduce him with piercing songs. Around about them lie 45 great heaps of men, flesh rotting from their bones, their skin all shriveled up. Use wax to plug your sailors’ ears as you row past, so they are deaf to them. But if you wish to hear them, your men must fasten you to your ship’s mast 50
 by hand and foot, straight upright, with tight ropes.
 So bound, you can enjoy the Sirens’ song.
 But if you beg your men to set you free,
 they have to tie you down with firmer knots.
 I will not give you definite instructions 55 about which route to take when you have sailed beyond the Sirens. Let your heart decide.

There are two choices, and the first goes through vast overhanging rocks, which Amphitrite batters aggressively with mighty waves. 60
 The blessed gods call these the Wandering Rocks.
 No birds can fly through safe, not even doves, who bring ambrosia to Zeus. One dove is always lost in that sheer gulf of stone and Zeus must send another to restore 65 the number of the flock. No human ship has ever passed there. When one tries to enter, the waves and raging gusts of fire engulf ship timbers and the bodies of the men.
 Only the famous Argo sailed through there 70 returning from the visit with Aeetes.
 The current hurled the ship towards the rocks, but Hera, who loved Jason, led them safe.<sup>1</sup> Taking the second way, you meet two rocks:
 one reaches up to heaven with its peak, 75 surrounded by blue fog that never clears.
 No light comes through there, even in the summer.
 No man could climb it or set foot upon it, even if he had twenty hands and feet.
 The rock is sheer, as if it had been polished. 80 Right in the middle lies a murky cave that faces west, towards dark Erebus.
 Steer your ship past it, great Odysseus.
 The hollow cave is so high up, no man could shoot it with an arrow. There lives Scylla, 85 howling and barking horribly; her voice is puppylike, but she is dangerous;
 even a god would be afraid of her.
 She has twelve dangling legs and six long necks with a gruesome head on each, and in each face 90 three rows of crowded teeth, pregnant with death.
 Her belly slumps inside the hollow cave;
 she keeps her heads above the yawning chasm and scopes around the rock, and hunts for fish.
 She catches dolphins, seals, and sometimes even 95 enormous whales—Queen Amphitrite, ruler of roaring waters, nurtures many creatures.
 No sailors ever pass that way unharmed.
 She snatches one man with each mouth from off each dark-prowed ship. The other rock is near, 100 enough to shoot an arrow right across.
 This second rock is lower down, and on it there grows a fig tree with thick leaves. Beneath, divine Charybdis sucks black water down.

1. The Greek hero Jason sailed in the Argo to get the Golden Fleece from King Aeetes of Colchis. The journey of Jason and the Argonauts was supposed to have taken place a generation before the wanderings of Odysseus. Jason was the favorite of the goddess Hera.

Three times a day she spurts it up; three times she glugs it down. Avoid that place when she is swallowing the water. No one could save you from death then, even great Poseidon.
 Row fast, and steer your ship alongside Scylla, since it is better if you lose six men than all of them.'

I answered, 'Goddess, please, tell me the truth: is there no other way?
 Or I can somehow circumvent Charybdis and stop that Scylla when she tries to kill my men?'

The goddess answered, 'No, you fool!
 Your mind is still obsessed with deeds of war.
 But now you must surrender to the gods.
 She is not mortal. She is deathless evil, terrible, wild and cruel. You cannot fight her.
 The best solution and the only way is flight. I am afraid if you take time to arm beside the rock, she will attack again with all six heads and take six more.
 So row away with all your might, and call on Scylla's mother, Cratais, Great Force, who bore her as a blight on humankind.
 Go fast, before the goddess strikes again.
 Then you will reach the island called Thrinacia, where Helius keeps sheep and many cattle:<sup>2</sup> fifty per herd, with seven herds in all.
 They never reproduce or die, and those who tend them are the smooth-haired goddesses, Phaethousa and Lampetia, the shining daughters of Helius by bright Neaira.
 She brought them up, then sent them off to live there in remote Thrinacia, to guard their father's sheep and cattle. If you can remember home and leave the cows unharmed, you will at last arrive in Ithaca.
 But if you damage them, I must foretell disaster for your ship and for your crew.
 Even if you survive, you will return late and humiliated, having caused the death of all your men.'

The golden throne of Dawn was riding up the sky as Circe concluded, and she strode across her island.
 I went back to my ship and roused the men

2. Helius and Hyperion are both sun gods, here confused.

to get on board and loose the sternward cables.
 Embarking, they sat down, each in his place,
 and struck the gray saltwater with their oars. 150
 Behind our dark-prowed ship, the dreadful goddess Circe sent friendly wind to fill the sails.
 We worked efficiently to organize the rigging, and the breeze and pilot steered.
 Then with an anxious heart I told the crew, 155

‘My friends, the revelations Circe shared with me should not be kept a secret, known to me alone. I will share them with you, and we can die in knowledge of the truth, or else escape. She said we must avoid 160 the voices of the otherworldly Sirens; steer past their flowering meadow. And she says that I alone should hear their singing. Bind me, to keep me upright at the mast, wound round with rope. If I beseech you and command you 165 to set me free, you must increase my bonds and chain me even tighter.’

So I told them
 each detail. Soon our well-built ship, blown fast by fair winds, neared the island of the Sirens, and suddenly, the wind died down. Calm came. 170 Some spirit lulled the waves to sleep. The men got up, pulled down the sails, and stowed them in the hollow hold. They sat at oar and made the water whiten, struck by polished wood.
 I gripped a wheel of wax between my hands 175 and cut it small. Firm kneading and the sunlight warmed it, and then I rubbed it in the ears of each man in his turn. They bound my hands and feet, straight upright at the mast. They sat and hit the sea with oars. We traveled fast, 180 and when we were in earshot of the Sirens, they knew our ship was near, and started singing.

‘Odysseus! Come here! You are well-known from many stories! Glory of the Greeks!
 Now stop your ship and listen to our voices. 185
 All those who pass this way hear honeyed song, poured from our mouths. The music brings them joy, and they go on their way with greater knowledge, since we know everything the Greeks and Trojans suffered in Troy, by gods’ will; and we know 190 whatever happens anywhere on earth.’

Their song was so melodious, I longed to listen more. I told my men to free me.

I scowled at them, but they kept rowing on.
 Eurylochus and Perimedes stood 195 and tied me even tighter, with more knots.
 But when we were well past them and I could no longer hear the singing of the Sirens, I nodded to my men, and they removed the wax that I had used to plug their ears, 200 and untied me. When we had left that island, I saw a mighty wave and smoke, and heard a roar. The men were terrified; their hands let fall the oars—they splashed down in the water.
 The ship stayed still, since no one now was pulling 205 the slender blades. I strode along the deck pausing to cheer each man, then gave a speech to rally all of them.

‘Dear friends! We are experienced in danger. This is not worse than the time the Cyclops captured us, 210 and forced us to remain inside his cave.
 We got away that time, thanks to my skill and brains and strategy. Remember that.
 Come on then, all of you, and trust my words.
 Sit on your benches, strike the swelling deep 215 with oars, since Zeus may grant us a way out from this disaster also. Pilot, listen:
 these are your orders. As you hold the rudder, direct the ship away from that dark smoke and rising wave, and head towards the rock; 220 if the ship veers the other way, you will endanger us.’

They promptly followed orders.
 I did not mention Scylla, since she meant inevitable death, and if they knew, the men would drop the oars and go and huddle 225 down in the hold in fear. Then I ignored Circe’s advice that I should not bear arms; it was too hard for me. I dressed myself in glorious armor; in my hands I took two long spears, and I climbed up on the forecastle. 230 I thought that rocky Scylla would appear from that direction, to destroy my men.
 So we rowed through the narrow strait in tears.
 On one side, Scylla; on the other, shining Charybdis with a dreadful gurgling noise 235 sucked down the water. When she spewed it out, she seethed, all churning like a boiling cauldron on a huge fire. The froth flew high, to spatter the topmost rocks on either side. But when she swallowed back the sea, she seemed all stirred 240 from inside, and the rock around was roaring dreadfully, and the dark-blue sand below was visible. The men were seized by fear.

 But while our frightened gaze was on Charybdis, Scylla snatched six men from the ship—my strongest, 245 best fighters. Looking back from down below, I saw their feet and hands up high, as they were carried off. In agony they cried to me and called my name—their final words.
 As when a fisherman out on a cliff 250 casts his long rod and line set round with oxhorn to trick the little fishes with his bait; when one is caught, he flings it gasping back onto the shore—so those men gasped as Scylla lifted them up high to her rocky cave 255 and at the entrance ate them up—still screaming, still reaching out to me in their death throes.
 That was the most heartrending sight I saw in all the time I suffered on the sea.

Free from the rocks of Scylla and Charybdis 260
 we quickly reached the island of the god, Hyperion's son Helius, the Sun God.
 There were his cattle, with their fine broad faces, and many flocks of well-fed sheep. While still out on the sea in my black ship, I heard 265
 the lowing of the cattle in their pens, and bleating of the sheep. I kept in mind the words of blind Tiresias the prophet and Circe. Both had given strict instructions that we avoid the island of the Sun, 270 the god of human joy. I told the men with heavy heart,

‘My friends, I know how much you have endured. But listen to me now.
 Tiresias and Circe both insisted we must avoid the island of the Sun, 275 the joy of mortals. They said dreadful danger lurks there for us. We have to steer our ship around it.’

They were quite downcast by this.
 Eurylochus said angrily to me,
 ‘You are unfair to us, Odysseus. 280
 You may be strong; you never seem to tire; you must be made of iron. But we men have had no rest or sleep; we are exhausted.
 And you refuse to let us disembark and cook our tasty dinner on this island. 285
 You order us to drift around all night in our swift ship across the misty sea.
 At night, fierce storms rise up and wreck men's ships, and how can anyone escape disaster if sudden gusts of wind from north or west bring cruel blasts to break the ship, despite the wishes of the gods? Let us submit to evening. Let us stay here, and cook food beside the ship. At dawn we can embark and sail the open sea.'

That was his speech.
 The other men agreed, and then I saw a spirit must be plotting our destruction.
 My words flew out.

'Eurylochus! You force me to yield, since I am one and you are many.
 But all of you, swear me a mighty oath:
 if we find any herd of cows, or flock of sheep, do not be fool enough to kill a single animal. Stay clear, and eat the food provided by immortal Circe.'

They swore as I commanded. When they finished making the oath, we set our well-built ship inside the curving harbor, near freshwater.
 The men got out and skillfully cooked dinner.
 When they were satisfied with food and drink, they wept, remembering their dear companions, whom Scylla captured from the ship and ate.
 Sweet sleep came down upon them as they cried.
 When night was over, when the stars were gone,
 Zeus roused a blast of wind, an eerie storm.
 He covered earth and sea with fog, and darkness fell down from heaven. When rose-fingered Dawn appeared, we dragged the ship inside a cave, a place nymphs danced in, and we moored it there.
 I gave a speech to my assembled men.

'My friends, we have supplies on board. Let us not touch the cattle, or we will regret it.
 Those cows and fat sheep are the property of Helius, the great Sun God, who sees all things, and hears all things.' I told them this.
 Reluctantly they yielded. But that month the South Wind blew and never stopped. No other was ever blowing, only South and East.
 While the men still had food and wine, they kept clear of the cows. They hoped to save their lives.
 But when our ship's supplies ran out, the men were forced to hunt; they used their hooks to catch both fish and birds, whatever they could get, since hunger gnawed their bellies. I strode off to pray, in case some god would show me how to get back home. I left my men behind, and crossed the island, washed my hands, in shelter out of the wind, and prayed to all the gods.

 They poured sweet sleep upon my eyes. 335

Meanwhile,

Eurylochus proposed a foolish plan.
 'Listen, my friends! You have already suffered too much. All human deaths are hard to bear. 340
 But starving is most miserable of all.
 So let us poach the finest of these cattle, and sacrifice them to the deathless gods.
 If we get home to Ithaca, at once 345
 we will construct a temple to the Sun God, with treasure in it. If he is so angry about these cows that he decides to wreck our ship, and if the other gods agree—I would prefer to drink the sea and die 350 at once, than perish slowly, shriveled up here on this desert island.'

All the others

agreed with him. They went to poach the best of Helius' cattle, which were grazing beside the ship. The men surrounded them, 355 and called upon the gods. They had plucked leaves from oak trees—on the ship there was no barley.<sup>3</sup> They prayed, then killed them, skinned them, and cut off the thighs, and covered up the bones with fat, a double layer, with raw meat on top. 360
 They had no wine to pour libations over the burning offering, but they made do with water, and they roasted all the innards.
 And when the thighs were burned, the entrails sprinkled, they cut the other meat up into chunks 365 for skewers.

Sweet sleep melted from my eyes;

I rushed back to the ship beside the shore.
 When I was close, the meaty smell of cooking enfolded me. I groaned, and told the gods,
 'O Zeus, and all you deathless gods! You blinded 370 my mind with that infernal sleep. My men did dreadful things while I was gone.'

Meanwhile,

Lampetia in flowing skirts ran off to tell the Sun God we had killed his cows.
 Enraged, he called the other gods at once.

3. Barley is a component of a ritual sacrifice.

‘Great Zeus, 375

and all you other deathless gods, you must punish Odysseus’ men. They killed my cattle! I delighted in those cows all through each day, when I went up to heaven and when I turned to earth. If they do not 380 repay me, I will sink down into Hades and bring my bright light only to the dead.’

Zeus answered, ‘Helius! Please shine with us and shine for mortals on life-giving earth.
I will immediately smite their ship 385 with my bright thunderbolt, and smash it up in fragments, all across the wine-dark sea.’

I heard this from the beautiful Calypso, who had been told by Hermes.

Back on shore
beside my ship, I scolded each of them. 390
It did no good; the cows were dead already.
The gods sent signs—the hides began to twitch, the meat on skewers started mooing, raw and cooked. There was the sound of cattle lowing.
For six days my men banqueted on beef 395 from Helius. When Zeus, the son of Cronus, led in the seventh day, the wind became less stormy, and we quickly went on board.
We set the mast up and unfurled the sails and set out on the open sea.

When we 400
had left that island, we could see no other, only the sky and sea. Zeus made a mass of dark-blue storm cloud hang above our ship.
The sea grew dark beneath it. For a moment the ship moved on, but then came Zephyr, shrieking, 405 noisily rushing, with torrential tempest.
A mighty gust of wind broke off both forestays;
the tacking was all scattered in the hold.
The mast was broken backwards, and it struck the pilot in the stern; it smashed his skull. 410
His bones were crushed, his skeleton was smashed.
He fell down like a diver from the deck;
his spirit left his body. At that instant, Zeus thundered and hurled bolts to strike the ship; shaken, it filled with sulfur. All the men 415 fell overboard, and they were swept away like seagulls on the waves beside the ship.
The gods prevented them from reaching home.

I paced on board until the current ripped the ship’s side from the keel. The waves bore off 420

the husk, and snapped the mast. But thrown across it there was a backstay cable, oxhide leather.
 With this I lashed the keel and mast together, and rode them, carried on by fearsome winds.
 At last the tempest ceased, the West Wind lulled. 425
 I worried that the South Wind might compel me to backtrack, to the terrible Charybdis.
 All night I was swept backwards and at sunrise
 I came back to the dreadful rocks of Scylla and of Charybdis, gulping salty water, 430 and overshadowed by the fig tree's branches.
 I jumped and clutched its trunk, batlike—unable to plant my feet, or climb. The roots were down too low; the tall long branches were too high.
 So I kept clinging on; I hoped Charybdis 435 would belch my mast and keel back up. She did!
 As one who spends the whole day judging quarrels between young men, at last goes home to eat—at that same hour, the planks came bobbing up out of Charybdis. I let go my hands 440 and feet and dropped myself way down to splash into the sea below, beside the timbers of floating wood. I clambered onto them, and used my hands to row myself away, and Zeus ensured that Scylla did not see me, 445 or else I could not have survived. I drifted for nine days. On the evening of the tenth, the gods helped me to reach the island of the dreadful, beautiful, divine Calypso.
 She loved and cared for me. Why should I tell 450 the story that I told you and your wife yesterday in your house? It is annoying, repeating tales that have been told before.”

Summary The Phaeacians send Odysseus back to Ithaca with gifts. Athena meets him and together they plot to kill the suitors. Athena disguises Odysseus as an old beggar, and he visits Eumaeus, the old slave who takes care of his pigs. Athena goes to Telemachus and instructs him to come back home. While boarding his ship, Telemachus meets Theoclymenus, an exile who is skilled in prophecy; when they reach Ithaca, there is a good omen. Telemachus leaves Theoclymenus to stay with Pireaus.

BOOK 16

[Father and Son]

At dawn the swineherd and Odysseus made breakfast, lit the fire, and sent the herdsmen out with the pigs that they had rounded up.
 The dogs, that as a rule would bark at strangers, were quiet when they saw Telemachus;
 they panted at him. When Odysseus saw how they acted, and heard footsteps coming,

he said,

“Eumaeus, someone must be coming—a friend or somebody you know—the dogs are friendly, with no barking. I can hear footsteps.” 10

He hardly finished, when his son,
his own dear son, was there inside the gate.
Amazed, the swineherd jumped up, letting fall the cups in which he had been mixing wine; it spilled. He ran towards his master, kissed 15 his face and shining eyes and both his hands, and wept. Just as a father, when he sees his own dear son, his only son, his dear most precious boy, returned from foreign lands after ten years of grieving for his loss, 20 welcomes him; so the swineherd wrapped his arms around godlike Telemachus and kissed him, as if he were returning from the dead.
With tears still in his eyes he said,

“Sweet light!
You have come back, Telemachus. I thought 25
that I would never see you anymore, after you sailed to Pylos. My dear child, come in, let me enjoy the sight of you now you are back. Come in! You do not often come to the countryside to see us herders; 30 you stay in town to watch that evil horde of suitors.”

And Telemachus replied
warily, “Grandpa, yes, I will come in.
I came to see you here with my own eyes, and hear if Mother still stays in the house, 35 or if some other man has married her already, and Odysseus’ bed is empty, full of ugly spiderwebs.”

The swineherd, the commander, said, “Indeed, her heart is loyal. She is in your house, 40 weeping by night and sad by day.”

He took Telemachus’ sword; the boy came in, crossing the stony threshold, and his father offered his seat. Telemachus refused, saying, “You sit there, stranger. I can find 45 a chair around my hut. The slave can help.”

Odysseus went back and sat back down.
 The swineherd spread fresh brushwood and a fleece on top, so that Telemachus could sit.
 He set the bread in baskets and brought meat, 50 left over from the meal the day before.
 He mixed some wine up in a wooden bowl,
 and sat down opposite Odysseus.
 They reached to take the good things set before them.
 When they were satisfied, Telemachus 55 turned to the noble swineherd.

“Tell me, Grandpa,
 where did this stranger come from? By what route did sailors bring him here? And who were they?
 He surely did not walk to Ithaca!”

Eumaeus answered, “I will tell you, child. 60
 He is from Crete. He says he wandered, lost, through many towns—so some god spun his fate.
 Now he has run away from the Thesprotians who brought him, and arrived here on my farm.
 He is all yours, your suppliant, to treat 65 however you desire.”

Telemachus
 said anxiously, “This news of yours, Eumaeus, is very worrying to me. How can I invite him to my house? I am too young to fight back with my fists if someone picks 70 a fight with me. My mother is unsure if she should stay with me and show respect towards her husband’s bed and public gossip, and keep on taking care of things at home, or marry one of them, whichever suitor 75 asserts himself, and brings most lavish gifts.
 But since this man has come here, to your house,
 I will dress him in fine clothes, cloak and tunic, and sandals for his feet, and give a sword, and help him on his way. If you are willing, 80 keep him here in the farmhouse; care for him.
 I will send you some clothes and all his food, so he will be no bother to these men or you. I will not let him go to meet the suitors; they are much too violent. 85
 I would be mortified if they abused him.
 It would be difficult for one man, even a strong one, to do anything to them.
 They are too many.”

Then Odysseus,
 frustrated, said, “My friend, it is my duty 90 to speak out when I hear the dreadful things those suitors have been doing in your house, against your will; it breaks my heart. You are a good man. Tell me, did you choose to let them bully you? Have the Ithacans been turned 95 against you by some god? Or do you blame your brothers, who should be a man's supporters when conflict comes? If only I had youth to match my will! I wish I were the son of great Odysseus—or that I were 100

 the man himself come home from wandering.
 We can still hope. Let someone chop my head off, if I would not destroy them when I came inside the palace of Odysseus!
 And if I lost—since I am only one 105 against so many—I would rather die in my own house, than watch such crimes committed!
 Strangers dishonored! Slave girls dragged around, raped in my lovely home! Men wasting wine and bread—for nothing! For this waiting game!" 110 Telemachus said soberly, "I will explain the situation to you, stranger.

 The Ithacans are not my enemies, and I do not have brothers I can blame.
 Zeus gave my family a single line: 115 Arcesius had just one son, Laertes, who had Odysseus, his only son, and he had me, his only son, whom he left back at home; he had no joy of me.
 And now there are so many cruel invaders, 120 since all the toughest men from all the islands—from Same and Dulichium and wooded Zacynthus, and all those who hold command in rocky Ithaca, have come to court my mother, wasting all my wealth. She does not 125 refuse the awful prospect of remarriage, nor can she end the courtship. They keep eating, consuming my whole house, and soon they may destroy me too. These things lie with the gods.
 Now Grandpa, you must hurry to the queen, 130 and tell her I am safe back home from Pylos.
 I will stay here while you tell her—just her;
 do not let any others hear the news, since many people want to plot my death."

Eumaeus, you replied, "I understand. 135
 But tell me, on this same trip, should I go and tell poor old Laertes? For a while he used to watch the fields and join the slaves for dinner at the house, when in the mood, despite his grief for lost Odysseus. 140

 But since your ship set sail away to Pylos, they say he has stopped eating, will not drink, and does not go to check the fields. He sits, weeping and sobbing, worn to skin and bone."

Telemachus said calmly, "That is sad; 145 distressing news. But no, leave him alone.
 If human wishes could come true, my first would be to have my father come back home.
 Take her your message, hurry back, and do not trail round the countryside to look for him. 150 Tell Mother she should send a girl in secret to run to old Laertes with the news."

At that, the swineherd tied his sandals on, and started off towards the town. Athena noticed him leaving from the yard, and stood 155 beside him as a woman, tall and skillful, and beautiful. Odysseus could see her, standing beside the entrance to the cottage.
 Telemachus could not; the gods are not equally visible to everyone. 160
 The dogs could see her but they did not bark.
 They whimpered and slunk back across the room in fear. She raised her eyebrows, with a nod;
 he understood and came out, past the wall, and stood beside her. Then Athena told him, 165

"Odysseus, great strategist, it is time for your son to know the truth; together you have to plan how you will kill the suitors.
 Then both of you go into town. I will join you there soon myself; indeed I am 170 itching to fight."

And then Athena touched him, using a golden wand, and dressed him up in fine clean cloak and tunic, and she made him taller and younger-looking. He became 175 tanned, and his cheeks filled out, and on his chin the beard grew dark. And so her work was done, and off she flew. Odysseus went in.
 His son was startled and looked down, afraid in case it was a god. His words flew out.

"Stranger, you look so different from before. 180 Your clothes, your skin—I think that you must be some god who has descended from the sky.
 Be kind to us, and we will sacrifice, and give you golden treasures. Pity us!"

Long-suffering Odysseus replied, “I am no god. Why would you think such things?
 I am your father, that same man you mourn.
 It is because of me these brutal men are hurting you so badly.” 185

Then he kissed
 his son and cried, tears pouring down his cheeks;
 he had been holding back till then. The boy 190 did not yet trust it really was his father,
 and said,

“No, you are not Odysseus, my father; some god must have cast a spell, to cause me further pain. No mortal man 195 could manage such a thing by his own wits, becoming old and young again—unless some god appeared and did it all with ease.
 You certainly were old just now, and wearing those dirty rags. Now you look like a god.” 200

Artful Odysseus said sharply, “No, Telemachus, you should not be surprised to see your father. It is me; no other is on his way. I am Odysseus.
 I suffered terribly, and I was lost, 205
 but after twenty years, I have come home.
 As for the way I look—Athena did it.
 The goddess can transform me as she likes;
 sometimes a homeless beggar, then she makes me look like a young man, wearing princely clothes. 210
 For heavenly gods it is not difficult to make a mortal beautiful or ugly.”

With that, he sat back down. Telemachus hurled his arms round his father, and he wept.
 They both felt deep desire for lamentation, 215 and wailed with cries as shrill as birds, like eagles or vultures, when the hunters have deprived them of fledglings who have not yet learned to fly.
 That was how bitterly they wept. Their grieving would have continued till the sun went down, 220 but suddenly Telemachus said,

“Father,
 by what route did the sailors bring you here, to Ithaca? And who were they? I know you did not walk.”

Odysseus replied,
 “Son, I will tell you everything. Phaeacians, 225 famous for navigation, brought me here.

 They always help their guests travel onward.
 I slept as their ship sped across the ocean;
 they set me down on Ithaca, still sleeping.
 They brought me marvelous gifts of gold and bronze 230 and clothing, which are lying in a cave, since gods have willed it so. Athena told me to come here and make plans with you to kill our enemies. How many suitors are there?
 What kind of men are they? I am well-known 235 for my intelligence, and I will plot to work out if we two alone can fight them, or if we might need others helping us."

Telemachus considered, then said, "Father,
 I always heard how excellent you are, 240 at fighting with a spear, and making plans.
 But what you said just now—it is too much.
 We cannot fight, the two of us, against such strong men, and so many—there are dozens, not just a handful. Let me tell you quickly 245 the number of the suitors. Fifty-two came from Dulichium, all top-notch fighters, who brought six henchmen. Twenty-four men came from Same, twenty more from Zacynthus, and from right here on Ithaca came twelve, 250 all strong young men. They have a house boy with them, named Medon, and a poet, and two slaves well trained in carving meat. If we attack when all those men are crowded in the house, I am afraid you will be paying back 255 their violence at all too high a price.
 Think harder: can we find some kind of helper, willing to fight for us?"

Odysseus

said, "Do you think Athena and her father, Zeus, would be strong enough to keep us safe? 260
 Would any other help be necessary?"

Telemachus replied, "The ones you mention are good defenders. They sit high among the clouds, and they control both men and gods."

The veteran Odysseus replied, 265
 "Those two will quickly join the heat of battle when we begin to grapple with the suitors, when in my house the god of war is testing our fighting force and theirs. Go back at dawn, and join those overconfident young men. 270
 The swineherd will escort me into town.

I will again be looking like a beggar.
 If they abuse me and you see me suffer,
 you must restrain yourself, repress your feelings, even if they are pelting me with weapons, 275 and even if they grab me by the foot to hurl me out. Just watch, and keep your temper.
 Politely tell them they should stop this folly.
 They will ignore you. Truly now their day of doom is near at hand. Now listen hard. 280 Athena, my best co-conspirator, will nudge my heart, and I will nod to you.
 Then you must find all weapons in the house that could be used for fighting; go and hide them away inside the upstairs storage room. 285
 And when the suitors ask where they have gone, fob them off, saying, 'They were near the fire,
 so I removed them from the breath of smoke, since they were getting damaged; they were losing the luster that they used to have, before 290 Odysseus went off to Troy. Praise Zeus!
 I thought of something even more important:
 if you get drunk you may start quarreling, and hurt each other. Then your lovely dinners and courtship will be ruined. Arms themselves 295 can prompt a man to use them.' Tell them that.
 Leave out two swords, two spears, and two thick shields for you and me to grab before we rush to ambush them. Athena will bewitch them, helped by sharp-witted Zeus. And one more thing: 300
 if you are my true son, of my own blood, let no one know that I am in the house.
 Laertes and the swineherd must not know, nor any of the slave girls, and not even Penelope, until we have determined 305 the women's attitude. We also must test the male slaves, and see who has respect and fears me in his heart, and who does not,
 and who looks up to you as you deserve."

His glowing son said, "Father, you will see 310 my courage in the moment. I am tough.
 But it would take too long to go around and test each man like that, and all the while,
 the suitors would be sitting in your house, wasting your wealth with heedless partying. 315 So reconsider. I agree you should find out about the women—which of them are innocent, and which dishonor you.
 However, I have no desire to traipse around to test the men; we can do that 320 later, if Zeus reveals a sign to you."

Such was their conversation. Then the ship in which Telemachus had gone to Pylos docked in the bay of Ithaca's main town.
 They disembarked and dragged the ship onto shore. 325
 The slaves brought out the splendid gifts and weapons and took them to the house of Clytius.
 A messenger was sent to tell the queen Telemachus was back in Ithaca, and that he said that they must come to town, 330 dragging the ship, in case she had been weeping in her anxiety about her son.
 The swineherd and this messenger met up, on the same mission, to inform the queen.
 When both of them arrived, the slave girls clustered 335 around the messenger. He said, “Great queen,

 your dear son has come home!”

And then the swineherd took her aside and told her what her son had ordered him to say. When he was done, he walked out through the hall and out the courtyard, 340 leaving the palace hall to join his pigs.

The suitors were upset and down at heart.
 Eurymachus the son of Polybus said, “Friends, the journey of this upstart boy succeeded! We were sure that he would fail. 345
 We must launch our best ship, equipped with rowers, to cross the salty sea and find the others and tell them to come home at once.”

His words were hardly finished when Amphinomus spotted a ship inside the harbor, pointed 350 away from land; the sails were being furled, the men were carrying the oars. He laughed triumphantly and said,

“No need to send a messenger! They are already back!
 Some god has told them, or they saw his ship 355 approaching, but could not catch up with it.”

So leaping up, they went down to the seashore, and dragged the black ship up onto dry land,
 and servants proudly brought the weapons out.
 They all went crowding to the marketplace, 360 together, and banned any other men from joining them, both young and old. And then Antinous addressed them.

“How amazing!

The gods have saved this man from death! For days our scouts took turns to watch from windy cliffs. 365 And when the sun went down, we never spent a night on shore, but sailed to wait till Dawn at sea in ambush for Telemachus, to make sure we would catch him. Now some god has brought him home. We need to make new plans 370 to murder him. He must not get away.
 He will obstruct our courtship if he lives, since he is wise to us, and he will plot,
 and now the people will be turned against us.
 Telemachus will gather them; he must 375 be furious, and he will not postpone action. He will stand up and tell them how we planned to murder him, but failed to do so.
 When they hear of our crimes, they will condemn us.
 We may get hurt or driven from our land, 380 to foreign territories; we must stop it!
 Catch him out in the countryside, away from town, or on the road. Let us rob him, and share his wealth and property among us—and let his mother, and whichever man 385 marries her, keep the house. But if you think it would be better if we let him live, and keep his father’s riches for himself, we should stop flocking here to waste the wealth inside his house. We should each go and court her 390 from home, by sending gifts. One day, the lady will marry, and the lucky man will be the one who sends the most gifts.”

They were silent.

But then Amphinomus, the famous son of Nisus, spoke. He had come from the wheat fields 395 and pastures of Dulichium, with others.
 He was intelligent; Penelope preferred his speeches over other men’s.
 Wisely he said,

“My friends, I for my part have no desire to kill Telemachus. 400
 It is a dreadful thing to kill a person of royal blood. So first we must discover the gods’ intentions. If great Zeus decrees it, I will kill him myself, and urge you all to join me. If the gods do not approve, 405
 I say we must not do it.”

So he spoke,
 and they agreed with what he said. They stood, and went back to Odysseus' house,

and sat on polished chairs.

Penelope
decided she must show herself to these 410 ungentlemanly suitors, since she had found out about the plot to kill her son—Medon had heard their plans, and he told her.
Her women at her side, she went downstairs, into the hall, approached them and then stopped, 415 standing beside the doorpost with a veil across her face. She told Antinous,

"You are a brute! A sneak! A criminal!
The people say you are the smartest boy of all those your own age on Ithaca. 420
It is not true. You are insane! How could you devise a plan to kill Telemachus?
Do you have no respect for ties created by supplication, which Zeus watches over?
Have you forgotten that your father came here, 425 running in terror from the Ithacans, who were enraged because he joined the pirates of Taphos, and was hounding the Thesprotians, our allies? So the Ithacans were eager to kill him, rip his heart out, and devour 430 his wealth. Odysseus protected him!
Now you consume your benefactor's wealth, and court his wife, and try to kill his son, and you are hurting me! I tell you, stop!
And make the other suitors stop as well." 435

Eurymachys said, "Wise Penelope, you need not worry; put all this from your mind.
No man will ever, ever hurt your boy while I am still alive upon this earth.
I swear to you, if someone tries, my sword 440 will spill his blood! Your city-sacking husband often would take me on his lap, and give me tidbits of meat with his own hands, and sips of red wine. So Telemachus is now the man I love the most in all the world. 445
The boy is in no danger, not from us—there is no help for death brought by the gods."

He spoke to mollify her; all the while he was devising plans to kill her son.
She went up to her light and airy bedroom, 450 and wept for dear Odysseus, her husband,
until Athena gave her eyes sweet sleep.

As evening fell, the swineherd came back home to find Odysseus. He and his son had killed a year-old pig and made a meal. 455 Athena came beside Odysseus and touched him with her wand again to make him ragged and old, to make sure when the swineherd came in, he would not recognize his master, in case he told Penelope the secret. 460

He came inside. Telemachus spoke first.
 “Eumaeus, you are back! What is the news in town? Are those proud suitors in my house, back from the ambush, or still lurking there to catch me on my way back home?”

Eumaeus 465
 answered, “I did not want to trek through town asking that question. I preferred to share my news as fast as possible and then come back. One of your own men went with me, a messenger; he told your mother first. 470
 I saw one more thing: as I passed the hill of Hermes, right above the town I saw a ship draw into harbor, full of men and loaded up with shields and spears. I thought it could be them, but I cannot be sure.” 475

Then Prince Telemachus began to smile and met his father's eyes; he did not let Eumaeus see. When they were finished cooking, they shared the dinner equally, and all had plenty, then they took the gift of sleep. 480

BOOK 17

[Insults and Abuse]

When newborn Dawn appeared with hands of flowers, Telemachus, Odysseus' son, fastened his handsome sandals on his feet, took up his sturdy spear that fit his hand,
 and headed out. He told the swineherd,

“Grandpa, 5
 I must go into town, to see my mother.
 Until we meet, I think she will not stop her lamentations, tears, and bitter sobbing.
 Now I need you to take this poor old stranger to town to beg his supper; any man 10 who feels like it can feed him. I cannot put up with everyone right now; I have too many worries. If he gets annoyed, the worse for him. I always like to tell the honest truth.”

Odysseus replied, 15

“My friend, I do not even want to stay.
Beggars should wander round the town and country.
I will get food from charitable people.
I am too old to stay here as a farmhand, obeying orders from an overseer. 20

This man will take me, as you told him to,
as soon as I have warmed up by the fire.
I only have these rags; the morning frost may do me in—you say the town is far.”

25

At that, Telemachus strode quickly out, thinking about his plan to hurt the suitors.
And when he reached the royal house, he propped his spear against a pillar, and went in, across the stony threshold.

Eurycleia 30

the nurse, was first to notice his arrival,
as she was laying fleeces on the chairs.
Weeping, she rushed at him. The other women owned by strong-willed Odysseus assembled and kissed Telemachus’ head and shoulders to welcome him. Then wise Penelope 35 came from her bedroom, looking like a goddess, like Artemis<sup>1</sup> or golden Aphrodite, and flung her arms around her darling son,

and wept. She kissed his face and shining eyes, and through her tears her words flew out.

“You came! 40

Telemachus! Sweet light! I was so sure that I would never see you anymore
after you sailed to Pylos secretly, not telling me, to get news of your father.
Tell me, what have you seen?”

Telemachus 45

said calmly, “Mother, do not try to make me upset, or stir my feelings. I survived the danger. Go upstairs and take your bath, put on clean clothes and take your women with you into your bedroom. Sacrifice and pray 50 to all the gods, that one day Zeus may grant revenge. Now I am going into town.

1. Artemis, goddess of hunting, was associated with chastity and the moon.

I will invite the stranger who arrived right after me on Ithaca. I sent him ahead, with my brave men, and told Piraeus 55 to take him home and treat him with all kindness until I come."

His flying words hit home.
 She washed, put on clean clothes, and prayed to all the gods, and made them lavish sacrifices, asking that one day Zeus would bring revenge. 60

Telemachus took up his spear and marched out through the hall, two swift dogs at his side.
 Athena poured unearthly grace upon him.
 Everyone was amazed to see him coming.
 The suitors gathered round and spoke to him 65 in friendly tones; at heart, they meant him harm.
 Keeping away from most of them, he joined Mentor and Antiphus and Halitherses, who were his father's friends from long ago.
 They questioned him in detail. Then Piraeus 70 approached with Theoclymenus, the stranger whom he had brought through town towards the center.
 At once Telemachus set out and rushed to stand beside the stranger. And Piraeus spoke first.

"Telemachus, send women quickly 75 to my house, so I may give back the gifts that Menelaus gave you."

But with caution
 Telemachus replied,

"Piraeus, no.
 We do not know exactly what will happen, and if the suitors in my house by stealth 80 should kill me and divide my father's wealth between themselves, I would prefer that you enjoy the gifts than any of those men.
 And if I kill them, planting doom among them, bring me the gifts, and we will both be happy." 85

With this, he led the weary stranger back to his house, where he laid their cloaks across chairs; they went to bathe. The slave girls washed them, rubbed them with oil, and dressed them in wool cloaks and tunics. Then they left the baths and sat 90 on chairs. A girl brought out a golden pitcher and poured the washing water on their hands, over a silver bowl. She set a table beside them, and a humble slave girl brought a generous array from their rich stores. 95 Penelope was leaning on a chair beside the door, facing Telemachus, spinning fine strands of wool. They helped themselves to food and drink. When they had had enough, Penelope, preoccupied, spoke up. 100

“Telemachus, I will go upstairs now, to lie down on my bed, which has become a bed of mourning, always stained with tears, since my Odysseus went off to Troy with those two sons of Atreus. But you 105 have failed to tell me if you gathered news about your father’s journey home; now tell me, before the suitors come.”

Telemachus
 answered her calmly. “Mother, I will tell you.
 We went to Pylos, visiting King Nestor. 110
 He made me very welcome in his palace, under his roof, as if I were his son returning after many years away.
 He cared for me like one of his own sons.
 But he said he had not heard anything 115 from anyone about Odysseus, alive or dead. He sent me on, with horses and carriage, to the son of Atreus, great General Menelaus. There I saw Helen for whose sake, by the will of gods, 120
 the Greeks and Trojans suffered through the war.
 When Menelaus asked why I had come to glorious Sparta, I told him the truth in detail, and he answered, ‘Stupid cowards!
 The bed they want to lie down in belongs 125 to someone truly resolute. As when a deer lays down her newborn suckling fawns inside the leafy den of some fierce lion, and goes off to the slopes and grassy valleys to graze. Then he comes back to his own bed 130 and cruelly destroys both little ones.
 So will Odysseus destroy them all.
 By Father Zeus, Athena, and Apollo,
 I pray he is as strong as long ago, 135 on Lesbos, when he wrestled Philomedes and hurled him to the ground, and all the Greeks cheered. May he fight the suitors that same way, so all of them will find their courtship ends badly, and their lives soon. And I will answer your questions frankly, and tell what I learned 140 from the old Sea God, who can tell no lies.

He said he saw him in distress: the nymph Calypso has him trapped upon her island, inside her house. He cannot come back home to his own country, since he has no fleet 145 or crew to row across the sea's broad back.
 That was what famous Menelaus said.
 My tasks accomplished, I sailed off. The gods gave me fair wind which swiftly brought me home."

His story stirred emotions in her heart. 150
 Then godlike Theoclymenus spoke up.

"My lady, wife of great Odysseus, this news is incomplete. I will reveal the whole truth with a prophecy. I swear by Zeus and hospitality and by 155 the hearth of great Odysseus, the place where I have come: he is already here in Ithaca—at rest or on his way.
 He must have learned what bad things they are doing, and he is plotting ruin for them all. 160
 I know because I saw a sign while sitting on board the ship—I told Telemachus."

Penelope said carefully, "Well, stranger, I hope this does come true. I would reward you with so much warmth and generosity 165 that everyone you met would see your luck."
 Meanwhile, outside Odysseus' house, the suitors relished games of darts and discus, playing outside as usual, with no thought of others. Then at dinnertime, when flocks 170 of sheep were trekking home from every field, led by their shepherds, Medon spoke. He was the suitors' favorite slave boy, whom they always brought to their feasts.

"My lords, you have enjoyed your games. Now come inside to eat. There is 175 no harm in having meals at proper times."

They followed his advice, stood up and went inside the palace. They spread out their cloaks over the chairs, and killed plump goats, large rams, some fattened pigs, and one domestic cow, 180 and cooked them for the feast.

Odysseus
 was making haste to leave the countryside for town. The swineherd spoke in lordly tones.

“Stranger, my master says that you can come to town today, as you desire—though I 185 would rather leave you here to watch the farm.
 But I am nervous that the master may reproach me, and a master’s curses fall heavily on a slave. Now we must go.
 The hour is late and it will soon get colder; 190
 the sun is sinking low.”

Odysseus
 answered, “I understand. We can go now; you lead the way. But if you have a stick, give it to me to lean on, since I hear the path is slippery.”

With that, he slung 195
 his bag across his shoulders by its string.
 It was all tattered, full of holes. Eumaeus gave him a serviceable stick. They left;
 the dogs and herdsmen stayed to guard the farm.
 The swineherd led his master into town 200 resembling a poor old beggar, leaning upon a stick and dressed in dirty rags.
 They walked along the stony path, and near the town, they reached an ornate fountain, flowing with clear streams, where the people came for water. 205
 It had been built by Ithacus, Neritus, and Polyctor. A circle of black poplars grew round it, nurtured by the spring. Cool water poured from the rocks above. There was an altar built over it in honor of the Nymphs. 210
 All passersby made offerings to them.
 Melanthius the son of Dolius, with two more herders, met them there. He was driving the finest goats to feed the suitors.
 On seeing them, he spoke abusively, 215 in brash, offensive language that enraged
 Odysseus.

“One scoundrel leads another!
 Makes sense: gods join like things with like. You foul pig-man, where are you taking this old swine?
 A scrounger, who will rub on many doors, 220 demanding scraps, not gifts for warriors.
 If you let me have him to guard my farm,
 and muck the pens and toss the kids their fodder,
 he could drink whey and fatten his stick legs.
 But he does not want work. He likes to traipse 225 around the town and beg for chow to stuff his greedy belly. I predict, if he reaches the palace of Odysseus, a mass of hands will hurl stools at his head, to pelt him through the house and bruise his ribs.” 230

With that, he sauntered past him, and lunged out to kick him on the hip bone. What a fool!
 Odysseus was not pushed off the path;
 he stood there fixed in place, and wondered whether to rush at him, armed with his stick, and kill him, 235 or grab him by the ears and push him down onto the ground. Instead, he braced himself and kept his temper. When the swineherd saw Melanthius insulting him, he prayed, arms high.

“O Fountain Nymphs, O Zeus’ daughters! 240
 If ever King Odysseus brought bones of lamb and goat in luscious fat for you, then now fulfill my prayer! May spirits guide him home!
 My master will put paid to all the bluster of this rude man, who loafs round town and lets 245 the animals be ruined by bad herders.”

Melanthius the goatherd sneered at him, “Oh, very nice! This dog knows how to talk, and it has learned some tricks. One day I will take him by ship and row him far away 250 from Ithaca, and get a heap of treasure by selling him. I wish Apollo would shoot silver arrows at Telemachus tomorrow in his house; or that the suitors would kill him. I am sure Odysseus 255 is far away and never coming back.”

With that, he left them—they were walking slowly, and he rushed on ahead of them. He went inside his master’s house, and sat among the suitors, with Eurymachus, his favorite. 260
 The slaves brought out a piece of meat for him, and a submissive house girl brought him bread.
 The swineherd and Odysseus went in,
 and stood, surrounded by the strumming sound of the resounding lyre that Phemius 265 was tuning for his song. Odysseus grabbed at the swineherd’s hand and said,

“Eumaeus!
 This is Odysseus’ splendid palace.
 It could be recognized among a thousand.
 The rooms are all connected, and the courtyard 270 is fenced in by a wall with cornices, and there are sturdy double doors. No man could break through here. I notice many men are feasting; I smell meat, and hear the lyre, which gods have made companion to the feast.” 275

Eumaeus answered, “Right! You are perceptive.
 Now we must plan. Will you go inside first to join the suitors, while I stay out here?
 Or do you want to wait, and I will go?
 But do not stay too long. If someone sees you, 280 you will be pelted, maybe beaten up.”

Unflappable Odysseus said, “Yes,
 I thought of that. You go, I will stay here.
 I have been hit before. I know hard knocks.
 I am resilient. I suffered war 285 and being lost at sea. So let this be.
 There is no way to hide a hungry belly.
 It is insistent, and the curse of hunger is why we sail across relentless seas, and plunder other people.”

As they spoke, 290
 Argos, the dog that lay there, raised his head and ears. Odysseus had trained this dog but with no benefit—he left too soon to march on holy Troy. The master gone, boys took the puppy out to hunt wild goats 295 and deer and hares. But now he lay neglected, without an owner, in a pile of dung from mules and cows—the slaves stored heaps of it outside the door, until they fertilized the large estate. So Argos lay there dirty, 300 covered with fleas. And when he realized Odysseus was near, he wagged his tail, and both his ears dropped back. He was too weak to move towards his master. At a distance, Odysseus had noticed, and he wiped 305 his tears away and hid them easily,
 and said,

“Eumaeus, it is strange this dog is lying in the dung; he looks quite handsome, though it is hard to tell if he can run, or if he is a pet, a table dog, 310 kept just for looks.”

Eumaeus, you replied,
 “This dog belonged to someone who has died in foreign lands. If he were in good health, as when Odysseus abandoned him and went to Troy, you soon would see how quick 315 and brave he used to be. He went to hunt in woodland, and he always caught his prey.

 His nose was marvelous. But now he is in bad condition, with his master gone, long dead. The women fail to care for him. 320 Slaves do not want to do their proper work, when masters are not watching them. Zeus halves our value on the day that makes us slaves."

With that, the swineherd went inside the palace, to join the noble suitors. Twenty years 325 had passed since Argos saw Odysseus, and now he saw him for the final time—
 then suddenly, black death took hold of him.

Telemachus first saw the swineherd coming.
 He gave a nod to tell him to come over. 330 Glancing around, Eumaeus saw the stool used by the boy who carved the suitors' meat.
 He picked it up and set it down beside Telemachus' table. There he sat; the slave boy brought him meat and bread. And then 335 Odysseus approached and stepped inside, looking like some poor homeless sad old man;
 he hobbled on his stick, then slumped himself down on the ash-wood threshold, leaning back against the cypress doorpost, which a workman 340 had smoothed and straightened long ago. The boy summoned the swineherd over, and picked up a wheat loaf from the basket and as much meat as his hands could hold, and gave it to him.
 He said,

"Please take this food out to that stranger, 345 and tell him he should walk around the hall and beg from all the suitors; shame is not a friend to those in need."

The swineherd went
 and told Odysseus, "Telemachus 350 gives you this food and says you ought to beg from all these suitors; shame, he says, is not fitting for those who have to live by handouts."

Odysseus prayed cautiously, "O Zeus, bless this Telemachus, and may he have all that his heart desires."

And with both hands 355
 he took the food and set it at his feet,

on top of his old ragged bag, and ate,
 and listened to the singer in the hall.
 As he was finishing, the music stopped;
 the suitors shouted, and Athena stood 360 beside Odysseus, and prompted him to go among the suitors, begging scraps, to find out which of them were bad or good—although she had no thought of saving any out of the massacre which was to come. 365
 He went around and begged from left to right, holding his hand out, like a practiced beggar.
 They gave him food in pity, and they wondered who this man was and whereabouts he came from.
 They asked each other, and Melanthius, 370
 the goatherd, said,

“You suitors of the queen, listen to me about this stranger here.
 I saw this man before; the swineherd brought him.
 I know no more; I do not know his background.”

Antinous began to scold the swineherd. 375 “Pig-man! You famous idiot! Why did you bring this man here? Do we not have already plenty of homeless people coming here to spoil our feasts? Is it not bad enough that they crowd round and eat your master’s wealth?
 You had to ask this other one as well?” 380

Eumaeus, you replied, “Antinous, you are a lord, but what you say is trash.
 Who would invite a stranger from abroad unless he had the skills to help the people— 385 a prophet, or a doctor, or a builder, or poet who can sing and bring delight?
 No one would ask a beggar; they bring only their hunger. Out of all the suitors, you are meanest to the slaves, especially me. 390
 But if the prudent queen and godlike prince still live here in this house, I do not mind.”

Telemachus said, “Shush. Antinous does not deserve an answer. He is always picking a fight, and goading on the others.” 395

Then turning to Antinous, he said,
 “You care for me so nicely, like a father!
 You told me I should force the stranger out.
 May no god make that happen! Go to him and give him something; I can spare the food. 400 Go on, I tell you! You should pay no heed to Mother or the other household slaves belonging to my father. You were not concerned about them anyway. You want to gorge yourself, not share with other people.” 405

Antinous replied, “You little show-off!
 What nasty temper! What an awful comment!
 If all the suitors gave the same as me,
 this house could keep him checked for three whole months.”

He had a footstool underneath the table, for resting his soft feet on while he feasted;
 he brandished it. The others all gave food and filled the beggar’s bag. Odysseus had finished with his test; he could have walked back to the threshold, no harm done. Instead, he stood beside Antinous and said, 410 415

“Friend, give me something. You must be the best of all the Greeks. You look like royalty, so you should give more food than all the rest,
 and I will make you known throughout the world. 420
 I used to be a rich man, with a palace.
 When needy beggars came from anywhere,
 no matter who they were, I gave them food.
 My slaves were numberless, my wealth was great;
 I had the life men say is happiness. 425
 But Zeus destroyed it all; he wanted to.
 He prompted me to travel with some pirates to Egypt; that long journey spelled my ruin.
 I moored my galleys in the River Nile and told my loyal men to stay and guard them, and sent out scouts to all the lookout points. 430
 But they were too impulsive, and they sacked the beautiful Egyptian fields, and seized women and children, and they killed the men.
 The screaming reached the town; the people heard, and rushed to come and help; at dawn the plain was all filled up with foot soldiers and horses and flashing bronze. Then Zeus, who loves the thunder, caused panic in my men—disastrous panic. 435 Danger was all around us, and not one stood firm. The sharp bronze swords killed many men, and others were enslaved as laborers. 440
 But they gave me to somebody they met, a foreigner named Dmetor, king of Cyprus.
 I came from there. Such is my tale of woe.” 445

Antinous replied, “What god imposed this pest to spoil our feast? Stay over there, not near my table—or you can get lost!

Get killed in Egypt or enslaved in Cyprus!
 You barefaced beggar! You come up to us, 450 and these men give you treats unthinkingly;
 we have so much, and people do not mind sharing another person's wealth."

Sharp-witted

Odysseus drew back from him and said,
 "You handsome idiot! You would not give 455 a grain of salt from your own house. You sit enjoying someone else's food, and yet you will not give a crumb from this great banquet to me."

Antinous was furious, and scowling said, "That does it! You insult me? 460
 You lost the chance to leave with dignity!"
 He lifted up his stool and hurled it at Odysseus' right shoulder, near his back.
 It did not knock him over; like a rock he stood there, shook his head, and silently 465 considered his revenge. Then he went back, sat on the threshold and set down the bag, all full of food, and told them, "Listen, suitors of this world-famous queen; I have to speak.
 When men are fighting for their own possessions, 470 for cows or sheep, there is no shame in wounds.
 But now Antinous has wounded me because I came here hungry; hunger brings such suffering to humans. If there are gods of the poor, or Furies to avenge us, 475 may he be struck by death, instead of marriage!

He answered, "Stranger, shut up, or be off!
 If you keep talking, we young men will drag you across the palace by your hands and feet and have you flayed alive!"

But all the others

reproached Antinous insistently. 480
 "You ought not to have hit a poor old beggar!
 If he turns out to be a god from heaven it will end badly! Gods disguise themselves as foreigners and strangers to a town, 485 to see who violates their holy laws, and who is good."

Antinous ignored
 the suitors' words. The blow increased the pain inside Telemachus' heart, but he let fall no tears. He calmly shook his head 490 and thought about revenge.

Penelope
heard what had happened in the hall, and said to all her slaves,

“I hope Apollo shoots Antinous, just as he hit the beggar!”

And old Eurynome replied, “If only our prayers were answered! None of them would live to see the Dawn ride in upon her throne.” 495

Penelope said, “Yes, dear, they are all our enemies and mean to do us harm.
Antinous is the worst; he is like death. 500
Some poor old stranger wandered to this house and asked the men for food, compelled by need.
The others helped him out and filled his bag;
Antinous hurled a footstool at his shoulder.”

She had this conversation in her room with her attendants, while Odysseus was eating dinner. Then she called the swineherd. 505

“Eumaeus! Have the stranger come to me, so I may welcome him, and ask if he has heard or witnessed anything about long-lost Odysseus. The stranger seems 510 as if he must have traveled far.”

Eumaeus
replied, “Your Majesty, I wish these men would quiet down! The tales the stranger tells would charm your heart. For three days and three nights 515
I had him stay with me. He ran away from off a ship, and came to my house first;
he started to describe his sufferings, and had not finished. Like a singer, blessed by gods with skill in storytelling—people 520 watch him and hope that he will sing forever—so this man’s tale enchanted me. He says Odysseus and he are old guest-friends through their forefathers. This man lived in Crete, the home of Minos,<sup>2</sup> and he traveled here 525
a rambling route, with dangers compassed round.
He says Odysseus is still alive and near here, in the rich Thesprotian land, and he is bringing home a pile of treasure.”

2. Legendary king of Crete.

Penelope said, "Call him over, let him tell me in person, while the suitors have their fun here in my house or at the doors; their mood is festive. In their homes they have untasted food and wine, which their house slaves devour, while they are flocking to our house each day to slaughter oxen, sheep, and goats, to feast and drink our wine, with no restraint.
 Our wealth is decimated. There is no man here like Odysseus, who could defend the house. But if Odysseus comes back to his own native land, he and his son will soon take vengeance for their violence."

Telemachus sneezed loudly and the noise resounded through the hall. Penelope laughed, and she told Eumaeus,

"Call the stranger!
 My son just sneezed at what I said—you heard?
 It is a sign of death for all the suitors;
 no one can save them from their ruin now.
 But listen: if I find this stranger speaking the truth, give him nice clothes—a cloak and tunic."

At that, the swineherd went and stood beside Odysseus. His words had wings.

"Now sir,
 Penelope, Telemachus' mother, has summoned you. She feels impelled to ask about her husband, painful though it is.
 If you tell her the truth—and she will know—you will get clothes; you desperately need them.
 And you can ask for food all through the town, and fill your belly. Anyone who wants can give you scraps."

Strong-willed Odysseus answered, "Eumaeus, I will tell the truth, the whole truth, to Penelope, and soon.
 I know about Odysseus; we shared in suffering. But I am very nervous about the rowdy suitors. Their aggression touches the iron sky. When I was walking across the hall just now, quite harmlessly, that man hurled something at me, and he hurt me.
 Telemachus did nothing to protect me, and nor did anybody else. So now, tell her to stay right there until night falls, however eager she may be. At dusk, she can come nearer, sit beside the fire,

and ask about her husband's journey home.
 I do have dirty clothes—you know it well, 575 since it was you I came to first for help."
 The swineherd headed back; he crossed the threshold, and sharp Penelope said,

"Are you not bringing the traveler? Is something wrong?
 Is he too scared or shy? A homeless man 580 can ill afford such shame."

Eumaeus answered,
 "His words were common sense; he wants to stay out of the suitors' way; they are aggressive.
 He says you should stay here until sunset.
 It is much better for you too, my queen, 585 to speak to him alone."

Penelope
 replied, "The stranger is no fool at least.
 There never were such bullies as these men, and they intend us harm."

The swineherd went back to the crowd of suitors, and approached 590 Telemachus, and tucked his head down close, so no one else would hear. "My friend," he said,
 "I have to go and watch the pigs, and all your property, and mine. You should take care of everything, but most of all, yourself. 595
 Do not get hurt. So many mean you harm.
 I pray that Zeus obliterates them all,
 before they injure us!"

Telemachus
 answered, "May it be so. First eat, then go; come back at dawn with animals for meat. 600
 The rest is up to me and up to gods."
 So then Eumaeus sat down on the stool, and ate and drank, then went back to his pigs, leaving the palace full of banqueters.
 It was already late, past afternoon; 605 music and dancing entertained the suitors.

Summary Odysseus, in disguise as a beggar, meets a professional beggar named Irus; they fight, and Odysseus beats Irus. The suitors reward him with special meat. Odysseus warns the nicest suitor, Amphinomus, to leave the house for his own protection, but Athena makes him stay. Penelope, inspired by Athena, shows herself to the suitors and declares that she will marry one of them. The young slave girl Melantho taunts Odysseus. The suitor Eurymachus throws a footstool at him. The suitors go home to bed.

BOOK 19

[The Queen and the Beggar]

Odysseus was left there in the hall,
and with Athena, he was hatching plans for how to kill the suitors. Words flew fast:

“Telemachus, we have to get the weapons and hide them. When the suitors see them gone 5 and question you, come up with good excuses.
You can explain, ‘The soot had damaged them;
when King Odysseus marched off to Troy their metal gleamed; now they are growing dull.
I put them safe away from all that smoke. 10
Some spirit also warned me if you drink too much and argue, you could hurt each other, dishonoring your banquet and your courtship.
Weapons themselves can tempt a man to fight.’”

Telemachus obeyed his father’s word. 15
He summoned Eurycleia, and he told her, “Shut up the women in their rooms, while I carry my father’s weapons to the storeroom.
They have got dirty since my father left when I was just a little boy. I want 20 to keep them safe, protected from the smoke.”

The loving nurse said, “Child, I wish you would take charge of all the household management and guard the wealth. Which girl should bring the torch?
You said the slaves were not allowed to walk 25
in front of you.”

He said, “This stranger will.<sup>1</sup>
A man who eats my bread must work for me, even if he has come from far away.”

She made no answer but locked up the doors that led inside the hall. Odysseus 30 and his bright boy jumped up and got the helmets and studded shields and pointed spears. Athena stood by them with a golden lamp; she made majestic light. Telemachus said,

“Father,
my eyes have noticed something very strange. 35
The palace walls, the handsome fir-wood rafters and crossbeams and the pillars high above

1. Eurycleia’s question implies an assumption that carrying the light is the job of a woman, a female slave; there is a momentary surprise that the answer is a man.

are visible, as if a fire were lit.
Some god from heaven must be in the house.”

But cautiously Odysseus replied, 40 “Hush, no more questions, discipline your thoughts.
This is the way of gods from Mount Olympus.
You need to go to bed. I will stay here, to aggravate the slave girls and your mother, and make her cry, and let her question me.” 45 Telemachus went through the hall, lit up by blazing torches, to his room. Sleep came, and there he lay till Dawn. Odysseus stayed in the hall, still plotting with Athena how to destroy the suitors.

Then the queen, 50
her wits about her, came down from her room, like Artemis or golden Aphrodite.
Slaves pulled her usual chair beside the fire;
it was inlaid with whorls of ivory and silver, crafted by Icmalius, 55 who had attached a footstool, all in one.
A great big fleece was laid across the chair, and pensively Penelope sat down.
The white-armed slave girls came and cleared away the piles of bread, the tables, and the cups, 60 from which the arrogant suitors had been drinking.
They threw the embers from the braziers onto the floor, and heaped fresh wood inside them for light and warmth.

And then Melantho scolded Odysseus again. “Hey! Stranger! Will you 65 keep causing trouble, roaming round our house at night and spying on us women here?
Get out, you tramp! Be happy with your meal!
Or you will soon get pelted with a torch!
Be off!”

Odysseus began to scowl, 70 and made a calculated speech. “Insane!
You silly girl, why are you mad at me?
Because I am all dirty, dressed in rags, and begging through the town? I have no choice.
That is how homeless people have to live. 75
I used to have a house, and I was rich, respectable, and often gave to beggars;
I helped whoever came, no matter what.
I had a lot of slave girls too, and all the things we count as wealth; the happy life. 80 Zeus ruined it. He must have wanted to.

Girl, may you never lose the rank you have among the other slave girls—if your mistress gets angry, or Odysseus arrives.
It might still happen. But if he is dead 85 and never coming back, his son is now a man, praise be Apollo. He will notice any misconduct from the women here.
He is a grown-up now.”

Penelope
had listened warily, and now she spoke 90 to scold the slave. “You brazen, shameless dog!
I see you! You will wipe away your nerve, your grand audacity, with your own life.
You knew quite well—I told you so myself—that I might keep the stranger in the hall 95 to question him about my missing husband.
I am weighed down by grief.”

And then she turned to tell Eurynome, “Bring out a chair and put a cushion on it, so this stranger can sit and talk with me. I want to ask him 100 some questions.”

So the woman brought a chair of polished wood, and set a cushion on it.
Odysseus knew how to bide his time.
He sat, and circumspect Penelope began the conversation.

“Stranger, first 105
I want to ask what people you have come from.
Who are your parents? Where is your home town?”

Cunning Odysseus said, “My good woman,<sup>2</sup> no mortal on the earth would speak against you; your glory reaches heaven. You must be 110 the daughter of a holy king who ruled a mighty people with good laws; his rule made the black earth grow wheat and barley; trees were full of fruit; the sheep had lambs; the sea provided fish, and people thrived. This is 115 your house. You have the right to question me, but do not ask about my family or native land. The memory will fill my heart with pain. I am a man of sorrow.
I should not sit in someone else’s house 120

2. Here and throughout the book Odysseus addresses Penelope with a word that means both “woman” and “wife.”

lamenting. It is rude to keep on grieving.
 The slaves, or even you, might criticize and say my tearfulness is caused by wine.”

Penelope said cautiously, “Well, stranger, the deathless gods destroyed my strength and beauty 125
 the day the Greeks went marching off to Troy, and my Odysseus went off with them.
 If he came back and cared for me again,
 I would regain my beauty and my status.
 But now I suffer dreadfully; some god 130 has ruined me. The lords of all the islands, Same, Dulichium, and Zacynthus, and those who live in Ithaca, are courting me—though I do not want them to!—and spoiling my house. I cannot deal with suppliants, 135 strangers and homeless men who want a job.
 I miss Odysseus; my heart is melting.
 The suitors want to push me into marriage, but I spin schemes. Some god first prompted me to set my weaving in the hall and work 140 a long fine cloth. I said to all my suitors, ‘Although Odysseus is dead, postpone requests for marriage till I finish weaving this sheet to shroud Laertes when he dies.
 My work should not be wasted, or the people 145 in Argos will reproach me, if a man who won such wealth should lie without a shroud.’ They acquiesced. By day I wove the web, and in the night by torchlight, I unwove it.
 I tricked them for three years; long hours went by 150 and days and months, but then, in the fourth year, with help from my own fickle, doglike slave girls, they came and caught me at it. Then they shouted in protest, and they made me finish it.
 I have no more ideas, and I cannot 155 fend off a marriage anymore. My parents are pressing me to marry, and my son knows that these men are wasting all his wealth and he is sick of it. He has become quite capable of caring for a house 160 that Zeus has glorified. And now, you must reveal your ancestry. You were not born from rocks or trees, as in a fairy tale.”
 The master of deception answered, “Wife of great Odysseus, Laertes’ son, 165 why will you not stop asking me about my family? I will speak, if I must.
 But you are making all my troubles worse.
 It is the way of things, when someone is away from home as long as I have been, 170 roaming through many cities, many dangers.

 Still, I will tell you what you ask. My homeland is Crete, a fertile island out at sea.
 I cannot count how many people live there, in ninety cities, and our languages 175 are mixed; there are Achaeans, native Cretans, and long-haired Dorians and Pelasgians.
 Knossos is there, a mighty city where Minos, the intimate of Zeus, was king for nine years,<sup>3</sup> and my father was his son, 180 the brave Deucalion, whose other son was Idomeneus, who sailed to Troy with the two sons of Atreus.<sup>4</sup> My name is Aethon,<sup>5</sup> and I am the younger brother.
 In Crete, I saw Odysseus, and gave him 185 guest-gifts. A storm had driven him off course at Malea, and carried him to Crete, although he yearned for Troy. He narrowly escaped the winds and found a refuge, mooring his ships in Amnisus, beside the cave 190 of Eileithyia.<sup>6</sup> He came up to town, and asked to see my brother, who, he said,
 was his good friend, a man he much admired.
 But Idomeneus had sailed to Troy ten days before. I asked him and his crew 195 inside and gave them all a lavish welcome;
 our stores were ample, and I made the people bring barley and red wine and bulls to butcher, to satisfy their hearts. Those noble Greeks stayed for twelve days; a mighty north wind trapped them, 200 so strong a person could not stand upright;
 some spirit must have summoned it to curse them.
 But on the thirteenth day, the wind died down;
 they sailed away."

His lies were like the truth, and as she listened, she began to weep. 205
 Her face was melting, like the snow that Zephyr scatters across the mountain peaks; then Eurys thaws it, and as it melts, the rivers swell and flow again.<sup>7</sup> So were her lovely cheeks dissolved with tears. She wept for her own husband, 210 who was right next to her. Odysseus

3. Every nine years, Minos, king of Crete, was instructed how to rule by his father, Zeus. Deucalion, his son, succeeded him as king.

4. Agamemnon and Menelaus.

5. The name "Aethon" can suggest either "shining" or "brown." It may suggest foxy tricks, since the word is applied to the reddish color of the fox in Pindar (Olympian 11.19).

6. Amnisus is the port of Knossos in Crete. Eileithyia is a goddess associated with childbirth.

7. Zephyr is the West Wind, Eurys the East. The West Wind is imagined as bringing the snow that is melted by the East Wind of springtime.

pitied his grieving wife inside his heart, but kept his eyes quite still, without a flicker, like horn or iron, and he hid his tears with artifice. She cried a long, long time, then spoke again. 215

“Now stranger, I would like to set a test, to see if you did host my husband and the men that followed him in your own house, as you have said. Describe his clothes, and what he looked like, and his men.” 220

Odysseus the trickster said, “My lady, that would be hard to say—his visit was so long ago. It has been twenty years.
 But I will tell the image in my mind.
 Kingly Odysseus wore a purple cloak, 225 of double-folded wool, held fastened by a golden brooch with double pins, that was elaborately engraved. In its front paws a dog held down a struggling dappled fawn.
 All those who saw it marveled how the dog 230 could grip the fawn, and how the fawn could kick its legs and try to get away, though both were made of gold. I noticed his white tunic was soft as dried-up onion peel, and shiny as sunlight. It astonished many women. 235 But note, I do not know if he had brought these clothes from home, or if a crew member had given them to him on board the ship, or some guest-friend. Odysseus had many dear friends, since very few could match his worth. 240
 And I myself gave him a sword of bronze, a double-folded purple cloak, and tunic edged with a fringe. I sent him off in glory when he embarked. He had a valet with him, I do remember, named Eurybates, 245
 a man a little older than himself, who had black skin, round shoulders, woolly hair, and was his favorite out of all his crew because his mind matched his.”

These words increased her grief. She knew the signs that he had planted 250 as evidence, and sobbed; she wept profusely.
 Pausing, she said, “I pitied you before,
 but now you are a guest and honored friend.
 I gave those clothes to him that you describe;
 I took them from the storeroom, folded them, 255 and clasped that brooch for him. But I will never welcome him home. A curse sailed on that ship when he went off to see Eviliūm—the town I will not name.”<sup>8</sup>

He answered shrewdly,

“Your Majesty, Odysseus’ wife, 260 stop ruining your pretty skin with tears, and grieving for your husband, brokenhearted.
I do not blame you; any woman would mourn for a husband by whom she had children, even if he were not the kind of man 265
they say your husband was—a godlike hero.
But stop your crying. Listen. I will tell you a certainty. I will be frank with you.
I heard Odysseus is coming home.
He is alive and near here, in Thesprotia. 270
By hustling, he gained a heap of treasure that he is bringing home. He lost his ship at sea, and let his loyal men be killed when he had left Thrinacia; Helius and Zeus despised Odysseus,<sup>9</sup> because 275 his men had killed the Cattle of the Sun.
So all those men were drowned beneath the waves, but he himself was clinging to the rudder and washed up in the land of the Phaeacians, the cousins of the gods. They honored him 280 as if he were a god himself, and gave him abundant gifts, and tried to send him home safely. He would have been here long ago, but he decided he should travel more and gather greater wealth. No man on earth 285 knows better how to make a profit. Pheidon, the king of the Thesprotians, told me this.
He poured libations and he swore to me there was a ship already launched and crew all set to take him home. But Pheidon said 290 good-bye to me first, as a ship of theirs happened to be already on its way to barley-rich Dulichium. He showed me the treasure that Odysseus had gained—enough to feed his children and grandchildren 295 for ten whole generations. Pheidon said Odysseus had gone to Dodona, to ask the rustling oak leaves whether Zeus advised him, after all those years away, to go home openly or in disguise. 300
I tell you, he is safe and near at hand.
He will not long be absent from his home

8. In the original, Penelope coins a compound word suggesting “Bad Troy” (Troy = Ilium).

9. The verb here, odyssomai, is the same one associated with the name “Odysseus” elsewhere in the poem (for example, 1.63). It means “to be angry at [somebody]” or “to hate,” and it is cognate with a noun for “pain” (odune).

and those that love him. I swear this by Zeus, the highest, greatest god, and by the hearth where I am sheltering. This will come true 305 as I have said. This very lunar month, between the waning and the waxing moon Odysseus will come."

Penelope
 said warily, "Well, stranger, I do hope that you are right. If so, I would reward you 310 at once with such warm generosity
 that everyone you met would see your luck.
 In fact, it seems to me, Odysseus will not come home. No one will see you off with kind good-byes. There is no master here 315 to welcome visitors as he once did and send them off with honor. Was there ever a man like him? Now slaves, give him a wash and make a bed with mattress, woolen blankets and fresh clean sheets, to keep him warm till Dawn 320 assumes her golden throne. Then bathe and oil him; seat him inside the hall, beside my son, and let him eat. If any of these men is so corrupt that he would harm our guest, the worse for him! He will get nowhere here, 325 however much he rages. Stranger, how could you have evidence that I excel all other women in intelligence, if you were kept in rags, your skin all sunburnt, in my house? Human beings have short lives. 330
 If we are cruel, everyone will curse us during our life, and mock us when we die.
 The names of those who act with nobleness are brought by travelers across the world, and many people speak about their goodness." 335

But devious Odysseus said, "Wife of great Odysseus, I started hating blankets and fine clean sheets the day I rowed from cloudy, mountainous Crete. I will lie down as I have spent so many sleepless nights, 340 on some rough pallet, waiting for bright Dawn.
 I do not care for footbaths; do not let any of these slave women in your house come near my feet, unless there is an old one whom I can trust, who has endured the same 345 heartbreak and sorrow as myself. If so, I would not mind if she should touch my feet."

Penelope said thoughtfully, "Dear guest, how well you speak! No visitor before who came into my house from foreign lands 350 has ever been so scrupulous. I have a sensible old woman, who brought up my husband. She first took him in her arms from his own mother as a newborn child.

 She is quite weak, but she can wash your feet. 355 Get up now, Eurycleia, wash your master's age-mate.<sup>1</sup> By now, Odysseus himself must have old wrinkled feet and hands like these.
 We mortals grow old fast in times of trouble."

The old slave shed hot tears, and held her hands 360 across her face, and wailed,

"Oh, child! I am so useless to you now! Zeus hated you beyond all other men, although you are so god-fearing! No human ever burned so many thigh-bones to the Lord of Thunder, 365 or sacrificed so much to him. You prayed that you would reach a comfortable old age and raise your son to be respected. Now you are the only one who cannot reach your home. And when that poor Odysseus 370 stays at the palaces of foreign kings, I think the women slaves are mocking him as these bad girls are hounding you. You have refused to let them wash you, to avoid abuse. But wise Penelope has told me 375 to wash you, and reluctantly I will,
 for her sake and for yours—you move my heart.
 Now listen. Many strangers have come here in trouble and distress. But I have never seen any man whose body, voice, and feet 380 are so much like my master's."

He replied
 shrewdly, "Old woman, everyone who sees the two of us says we are much alike;
 you were perceptive to observe the likeness."

Then the old woman took the shining cauldron 385 used for a footbath, and she filled it up with water—lots of cold, a splash of hot.
 Odysseus sat there beside the hearth, and hurriedly turned round to face the darkness.
 He had a premonition in his heart 390 that when she touched him, she would feel his scar and all would be revealed. She kneeled beside him, and washed her master. Suddenly, she felt the scar. A white-tusked boar had wounded him on Mount Parnassus long ago. He went there 395 with his maternal cousins and grandfather, noble Autolycus,<sup>2</sup> who was the best of all mankind at telling lies and stealing.

 Hermes<sup>3</sup> gave him this talent to reward him for burning many offerings to him. 400 Much earlier, Autolycus had gone to Ithaca to see his daughter's baby, and Eurycleia put the newborn child on his grandfather's lap and said, 'Now name your grandson—this much-wanted baby boy.' 405
 He told the parents, 'Name him this. I am disliked by many, all across the world, and I dislike them back.<sup>4</sup> So name the child
 'Odysseus.' And when he is a man, let him come to his mother's people's house, 410 by Mount Parnassus. I will give him treasure and send him home rejoicing.' When he grew, Odysseus came there to claim his gifts.
 His cousins and Autolycus embraced him, and greeted him with friendly words of welcome. 415
 His grandma, Amphithea, wrapped her arms around him like a vine and kissed his face and shining eyes. Autolycus instructed his sons to make the dinner. They obeyed and brought a bull of five years old and flayed it, 420 and chopped it all in pieces, and then sliced the meat with skill and portioned it on skewers and roasted it with care, and shared it out, and everybody got the same amount.
 The whole day long they feasted, till the sun 425 went down and darkness fell. Then they lay down and took the gift of sleep. When early Dawn, the newborn child with rosy hands, appeared, Autolycus went hunting with his dogs and with his sons; Odysseus went too. 430 Up the steep wooded side of Mount Parnassus they climbed and reached its windswept folds. The sun rose from the calmly flowing depths of Ocean to touch the fields, just as the hunters came into a glen. The dogs had dashed in front, 435 looking for tracks. Autolycus' sons came after, with Odysseus who kept close to the dogs, and brandished his long spear.
 A mighty boar lurked there; its lair was thick, protected from the wind; the golden sun 440 could never strike at it with shining rays, and rain could not get in; there was a pile of fallen leaves inside. The boar had heard the sound of feet—the men and dogs were near.

 Out of his hiding place he leapt to face them, 445 his bristles standing up, his eyes like fire, and stood right next to them. Odysseus was first to rush at him, his long spear gripped tight in his hand. He tried to strike; the boar struck first, above his knee, and charging sideways 450 scooped a great hunk of flesh off with his tusk, but did not reach the bone. Odysseus wounded the boar's right shoulder, and the spear pierced through. The creature howled and fell to earth.
 His life flew out. Autolycus' sons 455 bustled around and skillfully bound up the wound received by great Odysseus, and stopped the black blood with a charm, and took him back to their father's house, and nursed him well, then gave him splendid gifts, and promptly sent him 460 back home to Ithaca, and he was glad.
 His parents welcomed him and asked him questions, wanting to know how he had got the wound.
 He told them he was hunting with his cousins on Mount Parnassus, and a boar attacked him; 465 the white tusk pierced his leg.

The old slave woman,
 holding his leg and rubbing with flat palms,
 came to that place, and recognized the scar.
 She let his leg fall down into the basin.
 It clattered, tilted over, and the water 470 spilled out across the floor. Both joy and grief took hold of her. Her eyes were filled with tears; her voice was choked. She touched his beard and said,

"You are Odysseus! My darling child!
 My master! I did not know it was you 475 until I touched you all around your leg." She glanced towards Penelope, to tell her it was her husband. But Penelope did not look back; she could not meet her eyes, because Athena turned her mind aside. 480 Odysseus grabbed her throat with his right hand and with the left, he pulled her close and whispered,

"Nanny! Why are you trying to destroy me?
 You fed me at your breast! Now after all my twenty years of pain, I have arrived 485 back to my home. You have found out; a god has put the knowledge in your mind. Be silent;
 no one must know, or else I promise you,

if some god helps me bring the suitors down,
I will not spare you when I kill the rest,
the other slave women, although you were my nurse.” 490

With calculation, Eurycleia answered, “My child! What have you said! You know my mind is firm, unshakable; I will remain as strong as stone or iron. Let me 495 promise you this: if you defeat the suitors, I will tell you which women in the palace dishonor you, and which are free from guilt.”

Odysseus already had a plan.
“Nanny, why do you mention them? No need. 500
I will myself make my own observations of each of them. Be quiet now; entrust the future to the gods.”

The old nurse went to fetch more washing water; all the rest was spilt. She washed and oiled him, and then 505 he pulled his chair beside the fire again, to warm himself, and covered up his scar with rags. And carefully Penelope spoke to him.

“Stranger, I have one small question I want to ask you. It will soon be time 510 to lie down comfortably—at least for those who can enjoy sweet sleep, no matter what.
But I have been afflicted by some god with pain beyond all measure. In the day, I concentrate on my work and my women’s, 515 despite my constant grief. But when night comes, and everybody goes to sleep, I lie crying in bed and overwhelmed by pain; worries and sorrows crowd into my heart.
As when the daughter of Pandareus,<sup>5</sup> 520 the pale gray nightingale, sings beautifully when spring has come, and sits among the leaves that crowd the trees, and warbles up and down a symphony of sound, in mourning for her son by Zethus, darling Itylus, 525 whom she herself had killed in ignorance, with bronze. Just so, my mind pulls two directions—should I stay here beside my son, and keep things all the same—my property, my slave girls, and my great house—to show respect towards 530

 my husband's bed and what the people say?
 Or should I marry one of them—whichever is best of all the suitors and can bring most presents? When my son was immature, and young, I could not leave my husband's house. 535
 He would not let me. Now that he is big and all grown-up, he urges me to go;
 he is concerned that they are eating up his property. Now how do you interpret this dream of mine? I dreamed that twenty geese 540 came from the river to my house, and they were eating grain and I was glad to see them.
 Then a huge eagle with a pointed beak swooped from the mountain, broke their necks, and killed them.
 I wept and wailed, inside the dream; the women 545 gathered around me, and I cried because the eagle killed my geese. Then he came back and sitting on the jutting roof-beam, spoke in human language, to restrain my grief.
 'Penelope, great queen, cheer up. This is 550 no dream; it will come true. It is a vision.
 The geese are suitors; I was once an eagle, but now I am your husband. I have come back home to put a cruel end to them.'
 Then I woke up, looked round, and saw the geese 555 still eating grain beside the trough as they had done before."

Odysseus, well-known for his intelligence, said, "My dear woman, there is no way to wrest another meaning out of the dream; Odysseus himself 560 said how he will fulfill it: it means ruin for all the suitors. No one can protect them from death."

But shrewd Penelope said, "Stranger, dreams are confusing, and not all come true.
 There are two gates of dreams: one pair is made 565 of horn and one of ivory. The dreams from ivory are full of trickery; their stories turn out false. The ones that come through polished horn come true. But my strange dream did not come out that way, I think. I wish 570 it had, as does my son. The day of doom is coming that will take me from the house of my Odysseus. I will arrange a contest with his axes. He would set them all in a row, like ship's props. From a distance 575 he shot an arrow through all twelve of them.

I will assign this contest to the suitors.
 Whoever strings his bow most readily,
 and shoots through all twelve axes, will win me, and I will follow him. I will be parted 580 from here, this lovely house, my marriage home, so full of wealth and life, which I suppose I will remember even in my dreams."

Scheming Odysseus said, "Honored wife of great Odysseus, do not postpone 585 this contest. They will fumble with the bow and will not finish stringing it or shooting the arrow through, before Odysseus, the mastermind, arrives."

She chose her words with care: "If you would sit and entertain me, 590 guest, I would never wish to go to sleep.
 But humans cannot stay awake forever;
 immortal gods have set a proper time for everything that mortals do on earth.
 I will go up and lie down on my bed, 595 which is a bed of grief, all stained with tears that I have cried since he went off to see Evilium, the town I will not name.
 I will lie there, and you lie in this house; spread blankets on the floor, or have the slaves 600 make up a bed."

With that, she went upstairs, accompanied by slave girls. In her room, she cried for her dear husband, till sharp-sighted Athena poured sweet sleep onto her eyes.

Summary Odysseus itches to fight but Athena restrains him. The slaves prepare the house for the feast day. Melanthius, the goatherd, insults Odysseus. Philoetius, the cowherd, and Eumaeus, the swineherd, declare their loyalty to their old owner. The suitors pull out of the plot to kill Telemachus. They mock Odysseus in his disguise as beggar. The prophet Theoclymenus predicts their deaths.

BOOK 21

[An Archery Contest]

With glinting eyes, Athena put a thought into the mind of wise Penelope, the daughter of Icarius: to place the bow and iron axes in the hall of great Odysseus, and set the contest 5 which would begin the slaughter. She went up to her own room. Her muscular, firm hand picked up the ivory handle of the key—a hook of bronze. Then with her slaves she walked down to the storeroom where the master kept 10 his treasure: gold and bronze and well-wrought iron.

 The curving bow and deadly arrows lay there, given by Iphitus, Eurytus' son, the godlike man he happened to befriend at wise Ortilochus' house, far off 15 in Lacedaemon, in Messenia.<sup>6</sup> Odysseus had gone to claim a debt—some people of Messenia had come in rowing boats and poached three hundred sheep from Ithaca; they took their shepherds too. 20 Laertes and the other older men had sent Odysseus to fetch them back when he was still a boy. And Iphitus had come there for his horses, twelve fine mares, each suckling a sturdy mule. These horses 25 would later cause his death, when he had gone to visit Heracles, who welcomed him, but killed him, so that he could take the horses—<sup>7</sup> betraying hospitality, and heedless about the watchful gods. Before all that, 30 when Iphitus first met Odysseus, he gave this bow to him, inherited from his own father. And Odysseus gave Iphitus a sword and spear, to mark their bond. But Iphitus was dead before 35 the friends could visit one another's houses.
 So when Odysseus' black fleet sailed to war, he did not take the bow, but stored it in his own house, to use in Ithaca in memory of his friend.

The queen had reached 40
 the storeroom, and she stepped across the threshold of polished oak; a skillful carpenter had set it level, fixed the frame, and built the dazzling double doors. She quickly loosed the door-thong from its hook, pushed in the key 45 and with true aim, thrust back the fastenings.
 The fine doors, as the key struck home, began to bellow as a bull at pasture bellows.
 At once, they flew apart. She stepped inside, onto the pallet where the scented clothes 50 were stored in chests, and reached to lift the bow down from its hook, still in its shining case.
 She sat down on the floor to take it out, resting it on her lap, and started sobbing and wailing as she saw her husband's bow. 55

 At last, she dried her eyes, and in her arms picked up the curving bow and quiver, packed with many deadly arrows, and she went to meet her arrogant suitors. Slaves lugged out a chest with their master's many axes 60 of bronze and iron, for the competition.
 The queen came near the suitors, and she stopped beside a pillar with a filmy veil across her face. Two slave girls stood with her.
 She said,

“Now listen, lords. You keep on coming 65 to this house every day, to eat and drink, wasting the wealth of someone who has been away too long. Your motives are no secret.
 You want to marry me. I am the prize.
 So I will set a contest. This great bow 70 belonged to godlike King Odysseus.
 If anyone can grasp it in his hands and string it easily, and shoot through all twelve axes,<sup>8</sup> I will marry him, and leave this beautiful rich house, so full of life, 75 my lovely bridal home. I think I will remember it forever, even in my dreams.”

She told Eumaeus he should set the bow and pale-gray iron axes up before the suitors, and in tears the swineherd 80 took them, and did as she had asked. The cowherd wept also when he saw his master's bow.

Antinous began to scold and taunt them.
 He said, “You idiots! You tactless peasants!
 So thoughtless, so undisciplined! You fools, 85 your selfish crying is upsetting her!
 Poor lady, she is sad enough already at losing her beloved husband. Sit and eat in silence, or go do your wailing outside, and leave us suitors here to try 90 the deadly contest of the bow. I think it will be difficult; not one of us can match Odysseus. I saw him once in childhood, and I still remember him.”

He hoped he would be first to string the bow 95

8. The mechanics of the axe competition are debated, but it seems most likely that these are axe heads, without handles, with round, drilled holes in the end through which the wooden handle could be inserted. The axe heads are lined up in a row, with the holes all aligned straight. The goal of the contest is to shoot an arrow through all of the holes.

and shoot through all the axes. But he would be first to taste an arrow from the hands of great Odysseus, whom he had mocked, urging the others on to do the same.

Then Prince Telemachus addressed them all. 100 “Zeus must have made me stupid! My dear mother, despite her usual common sense, has said that she will marry someone else and leave this house. But I am laughing, and my heart feels foolish gladness. Well, come on, you suitors. 105 You want this prize—a woman unlike any in holy Pylos, Argos or Mycenae, or here in Ithaca or on the mainland.
No woman in Achaea is like her.
There is no need for me to praise my mother. 110
You know her worth. So do not make excuses, do not put off the contest of the bow.
We want to watch. And I will try myself.
If I succeed in stringing it and shooting all through, I will no longer mind if Mother 115 goes off with someone else, and leaves me here.
Success would prove me man enough to carry my father’s arms.”

He stood up straight and tall, tossed off his purple cloak, unstrapped his sword, and dug a trench to set the axes up, 120 all in a line, and trod the earth down flat.<sup>9</sup>
They were amazed to see him work so neatly, though he had never seen it done before.
He stood astride the threshold and began to try the bow. Three times he made it quiver, straining to draw it back; three times he failed 125 to string the bow and shoot through all the axes.
He would have tried a fourth time; he was keen to keep on pulling. But Odysseus shook his head, stopping him. Telemachus 130
said,

“Ugh! It seems that I will always be too weak and useless. Or perhaps I am too young and inexperienced at fighting in self-defense when someone starts a quarrel.
You all are stronger than I am. You try, 135 and we can end the contest.”

With these words,

9. If the contest is taking place in the feast hall—which has a finished floor, not dirt—the earth seems to be brought in and heaped up to provide a base for the axes.

he set the bow down on the floor, propped up against the polished, jointed double door,
 and tucked the arrow up against the handle.
 He sat back down where he had sat before. 140

Antinous called out, “Now, friends, get up, from left to right, beginning with the man next to the wine-slave!”

They agreed. The first was Leodes, their holy man,<sup>1</sup> who always sat in the farthest corner, by the wine-bowl. 145
 He was the only one who disapproved of all their bullying. He grasped the bow and stood astride the threshold, and he tried to string it, but he failed. His hands were soft, untrained by labor, and he grew worn out 150 trying to pull it back. He told the suitors,

“My friends, I cannot do it. Someone else should have a turn. This bow will take away courage, life-force, and energy from many noble young men;<sup>2</sup> but better we should die, 155 than live and lose the goal for which we gather in this house every day. Each man still hopes for marriage with Odysseus’ wife, Penelope. But if one tries and fails to string the bow, let him go use his wealth 160 to court some other fine, well-dressed Greek lady.
 And after that, Penelope will marry whichever man can bring most gifts for her—the man whom fate has chosen.”

With these words,
 he set the bow back down, and leaned it up 165
 against the polished, jointed double door, tucking the pointed arrow by the handle.
 Antinous responded with a jeer.

“My goodness, Leodes! What scary words!
 All your tough talk has made me really angry. 170
 You cannot string the bow, so you are claiming that it will take the life from proper men.
 You surely were not born for archery.
 The rest of us are actual warriors;
 we will soon string this bow.”

1. The holy man is literally a man who performs sacrifices. However, the job description is somewhat fluid, and he also serves as a prophet or diviner.
 2. Leodes speaks in prophetic language, perhaps unconsciously. His words could suggest only that the attempt to string the bow will discourage those who fail, but they can also mean that the bow will kill many men.

He told the goatherd, “Melanthius, come on now, light a fire and pull a chair beside it, with a fleece, and bring out from the pantry a big hunk of fat, so we young men can warm the bow, grease it, and try it, and so end this contest.” 175 180

Melanthius obeyed at once; he lit
 a blazing fire, and pulled a chair beside it, spreading a fleece on top, and brought the wheel of fat. The young men warmed the bow, but still they could not string it. They were far too weak. 185 Antinous and Eurymachus, the leaders, strongest and most impressive of the suitors, had still not had their turn.

Meanwhile the swineherd and cowherd had both gone outside the house.
 Odysseus himself came after them, 190 and when they were outside the gates, beyond the courtyard, in a friendly voice he said, “Cowherd and swineherd, I am hesitating whether to speak out openly; my impulse is to be frank. What if some god should guide 195 Odysseus, and suddenly, as if from nowhere, he was here—how would you act?
 Would you be with the suitors, or with him?
 How are your hearts inclined?”

The cowherd said,
 “O Father Zeus, please make this wish come true, 200 that he may come! May spirits guide him home!
 Then you would see how well-prepared I am to fight for him!” Eumaeus prayed in turn that all the gods would bring Odysseus back home. The man who thought of everything now knew 205 their minds, and said to them,

“I am here now.
 I suffered terribly for twenty years,
 and now I have come back to my own land.
 I see that you two are the only slaves who welcome my arrival. I have not 210 heard any others praying I would come back to my home. I promise, if some god brings down the noble suitors by my hands, I will give each of you a wife and wealth, and well-constructed houses, near my own. 215
 You two will be Telemachus’ brothers.
 Now let me show you clearer proof, so you can know me well and trust me. See my scar, made by the boar's white tusk, when I had gone to hunt on Mount Parnassus with my cousins." 220

So saying, he pulled back his rags and showed the great big scar. They stared and studied it, then both burst into tears. They threw their arms around Odysseus, and kissed his face and hugged him, overjoyed at seeing him. 225 Odysseus embraced them back and kissed them.
They would have wept till sunset, but he stopped them,
and said,

"Stop now; if someone steps outside and sees you crying, they may tell the men.
Go in, not both at once but taking turns, 230 first me, then you, then you. And this will be our sign: when all the noblemen refuse to let me have the bow and set of arrows, then you must bring them through the hall, Eumaeus, and put them in my hands. Command the women 235 to shut up tight the entrance to the hall, and go to their own quarters; if they hear men screaming or loud noises, they must not come out, but stay there quietly, and work.
And you, Philoetius, lock up the gates 240 leading out from the courtyard with the bolt and put the rope on too. We must move fast."

With that, he went inside, and sat back down on the same chair he sat on earlier.
Then the two slaves went in. Eurymachus 245 was handling the bow and warming it, turning it back and forth beside the fire.
But even after that, he could not manage to string it, and he groaned, and yelled in fury,

"This is disastrous! For all of us! 250 I do not even mind so much about the marriage. There are lots of other women on Ithaca, and in the other cities.
But that we should be proven so much weaker than King Odysseus, that we should fail 255 to string his bow! Our deep humiliation will be well-known for many years to come!"

Antinous said, "No, Eurymachus, it will not be like that, as you well know.
No one should shoot a bow today; it is 260 a feast day for Apollo! We should sit calmly and leave the axe heads standing there.
No one will come and take them. Let the boy pour wine, so we can make drink offerings, and leave the bow for now. At dawn, call back Melanthius, to bring the finest goats, so we can make our offerings to the god, Apollo, lord of archery, then try the bow again, and finish up the contest.” 265

They all agreed with him. Attendants poured water to wash their hands, and boys began to mix the wine in bowls, and poured a serving in every cup, so they could make libations and drink. Odysseus, the lord of lies, had carefully considered how to fool them. 275
He said,

“Now hear me, suitors of the Queen;
let me reveal the promptings of my heart.
Eurymachus and Lord Antinous,
I ask you specially, because you spoke so well: now set the bow aside, and turn towards the gods. At dawn, the god will choose the victor and give him success. For now, give me the polished bow, so I can try my strength and find out if my hands still have the suppleness and vigor of my youth, or if it has been lost in all my years of homelessness and poverty.” 285

They bristled,
nervous in case he strung the polished bow.
Antinous said, “Foreigner! You fool!
Are you not grateful that we let you stay here and eat with noblemen like us, and share our feast, and hear us talk? No other beggars can hear our conversation. This good wine has made you drunk. It does have that effect on those who gulp and fail to pace themselves.
Wine even turned the famous Centaur’s head.<sup>3</sup> 295
When Eurytion visited the Lapiths, inside the house of brave Pirithous the wine made him go crazy, and he did terrible things. The warriors were outraged, and dragged him from the house. Their ruthless swords cut off his ears and cropped his nose right off. 300 He wandered, still insane and blown about by gusts of madness. From that day, the Centaurs and humans have been enemies. His drinking 305 dwelling people, later imagined as half-human and half-horse.

was harmful to himself. If you should string that bow, it would be worse for you. No man will treat you kindly in our house. We will send you by ship to Echetus, the king of cruelty; you will find no escape. 310 Sit quietly, drink up, and do not quarrel with younger men."

Astute Penelope
 said, "No, Antinous, it is not right to disrespect a guest Telemachus has welcomed to this house. And do you think 315 that if this stranger's hands were strong enough to string the bow, he would take me away to marry him and live with him? Of course not!
 He does not even dream of such a thing.
 No need to spoil the feast by worrying 320 about such things; there is no need of that."

Eurymachus said, "Shrewd Penelope, it is indeed unlikely that this man would marry you. But we would feel ashamed if some rude person said, "Those men are weak! 325
 They court a fighter's wife, but cannot string his bow! Some random beggar has shown up and strung it easily, and shot right through all of the axes!' They will talk like that, and we will be humiliated!"

Calmly, 330
 Penelope replied, "Eurymachus, people who waste the riches of a king have lost their dignity. Why fuss at this?
 The stranger is quite tall and muscular;
 his father must be noble. Go on, give him 335 the bow, and let us watch. I tell you, if he strings it by the blessing of Apollo,
 I will give him a proper cloak and tunic, fine clothes and sandals, and a two-edged sword and dagger, sharp enough to ward away 340 both men and dogs, and I will help him go wherever he desires to go."

With quick intake of breath, Telemachus replied,
 "No, Mother, no one has a better right than I to give the bow to anyone 345 or to refuse it. No one on this island or out towards the pasturelands of Elis, and no man in this house can force my hand, even if I should choose to give the bow to him to take away. Go up and work with loom and distaff; tell your girls the same. 350

 The bow is work for men, especially me.<sup>4</sup>
 I am the one with power in this house."

She was amazed, and went back to her room, taking to heart her son's assertive words. 355 Inside her bedroom with her girls, she wept for her dear husband, her Odysseus, until clear-eyed Athena let her sleep.

Meanwhile, the swineherd lifted up the bow.
 The suitors made an uproar.

"Dirty pig-man!
 Where are you taking it? Are you insane? 360
 The dogs you raised yourself will eat you up when you are out there with your pigs alone, if we find favor with Apollo and the other deathless gods."

He was afraid,
 because there were so many people shouting 365 inside the hall, and set the bow he carried down on the ground. Telemachus called out, in forceful tones.

"No, Grandpa! Keep on going!
 Keep carrying the bow! You will soon see 370 you have to choose which master to obey.
 Though I am younger than you, I am stronger;
 watch out, or I will chase you to the fields, pelting your back with stones. I wish I had an equal edge on all those who invaded 375 my home to court my mother and make mischief.
 I would soon throw them out and make them pay!"

At that, the suitors all began to laugh;
 their anger at Telemachus was gone.
 Eumaeus went across the hall and gave 380
 the bow to competent Odysseus.
 And then he summoned Eurycleia, saying,

"Telemachus gave orders you must lock the doors into the hall and tie them fast.
 If any of you women hear a noise 385 of screaming men, stay up there in your quarters;
 do not come out; keep quiet and keep working."

4. These two lines echo the words of Hector to Andromache in book 6 of the Iliad: "War is a job for men, especially me."

At that, she held her tongue and locked the doors that led into the feast-hall. Philoetius scurried outside to bolt the outer gates 390 that led into the courtyard. On the porch lay a fresh-knotted cable made of byblos;<sup>5</sup> with that, he tied the gates, rushed in and sat back down, and looked towards Odysseus.

The master was already handling 395 the bow and turning it this way and that,
 to see if worms had eaten at the horn while he was gone. The suitors told each other,

“He stares at it as if he were an expert in bows. He acts the part! Perhaps he has 400 a bow like this at home or plans to make one.
 See how this pitiful migrant fingers it!”
 One confident young suitor said, “I hope his future luck will match how well he does in stringing it!”

So he had tricked them all. 405
 After examining the mighty bow carefully, inch by inch—as easily as an experienced musician stretches a sheep-gut string around a lyre’s peg and makes it fast—Odysseus, with ease, 410 strung the great bow. He held it in his right hand and plucked the string, which sang like swallow-song, a clear sweet note. The suitors, horrified, grew pale, and Zeus made ominous thunder rumble.
 Odysseus, who had so long been waiting, 415 was glad to hear the signal from the son of double-dealing Cronus.<sup>6</sup> He took up an arrow, which was lying on the table.
 The others were all packed up in the quiver, soon to be used. He laid it on the bridge, 420 then pulled the notch-end and the string together, still sitting in his chair. With careful aim, he shot. The weighted tip of bronze flew through each axe head and then out the other side.
 He told his son,

5. A fiber from the papyrus plant, imported to Greece from Egypt, known for its strength.

6. Cronus, leader of the Titans (divine descendants of Sky and Earth), was persuaded by his mother, Earth, to castrate his father, Sky, which he did with a sickle. Sky threatened revenge, but Cronus killed him and ruled the world with his sister/wife, Rhea; they were the parents of most of the Olympian gods. Cronus swallowed most of them, but Zeus, the sixth child, organized a war against his father, which he won, and he became king in turn.

“Telemachus, your guest does you a credit. I hit all the targets and with no effort strung the bow. I am still strong, despite their jibes about my weakness.
 Though it is daytime, it is time to feast;
 and later, we can celebrate with music,
 the joyful part of dinner.”

425

430

With his eyebrows
 he signaled, and his son strapped on his sword, picked up his spear, and stood beside his chair,
 next to his father, his bronze weapons flashing.

BOOK 22

[Bloodshed]

Odysseus ripped off his rags. Now naked, he leapt upon the threshold with his bow and quiverfull of arrows, which he tipped out in a rush before his feet, and spoke.

“Playtime is over. I will shoot again, towards another mark no man has hit.
 Apollo, may I manage it!”

5

He aimed
 his deadly arrow at Antinous.
 The young man sat there, just about to lift his golden goblet, swirling wine around, ready to drink. He had no thought of death.
 How could he? Who would think a single man, among so many banqueters, would dare to risk dark death, however strong he was?
 Odysseus aimed at his throat, then shot.
 The point pierced all the way through his soft neck.
 He flopped down to the side and his cup slipped out of his hand. A double pipe of blood gushed from his nostrils. His foot twitched and knocked the table down; food scattered on the ground.
 The bread and roasted meat were soiled with blood.
 Seeing him fall, the suitors, in an uproar, with shouts that filled the hall, jumped up and rushed to search around by all the thick stone walls for shields or swords to grab—but there were none.
 They angrily rebuked Odysseus.

15

20

25

“Stranger, you shot a man, and you will pay!
 You will join no more games—you have to die!
 For certain! You have killed the best young man in all of Ithaca. Right here, the vultures will eat your corpse.” Those poor fools did not know that he had killed Antinous on purpose, nor that the snares of death were round them all.

Clever Odysseus scowled back and sneered, “Dogs! So you thought I would not come back home 35 from Troy? And so you fleeced my house, and raped my slave girls, and you flirted with my wife while I am still alive! You did not fear the gods who live in heaven, and you thought no man would ever come to take revenge. 40
 Now you are trapped inside the snares of death.”

At that, pale fear seized all of them. They groped to find a way to save their lives somehow. Only Eurymachus found words to answer.

“If it is you, Odysseus, come back, 45 then we agree! Quite right, the Greeks have done outrageous things to your estate and home.
 But now the one responsible is dead—
 Antinous! It was all his idea.
 He did not even really want your wife, 50
 but had another plan, which Zeus has foiled:
 to lie in ambush for your son, and kill him,
 then seize the throne and rule in Ithaca.
 Now he is slain—quite rightly. Please, my lord, have mercy on your people! We will pay 55 in public, yes, for all the food and drink.
 We each will bring the price of twenty oxen, and pay you all the gold and bronze you want.
 Your anger is quite understandable.”

Odysseus saw through him; with a glare 60 he told him, “Even if you give me all your whole inheritance, and even more, I will not keep my hands away from slaughter until I pay you suitors back for all your wickedness. You have two choices: fight, 65 or run away: just try to save your lives!
 Not one of you will get away from death.”

At that their knees grew weak, their hearts stopped still.
 Eurymachus again addressed the suitors.
 “My friends, this man will not hold back his hands. 70 Seizing the bow and arrows, he will shoot us right from that polished threshold, till he kills each one of us. Be quick, make plans for battle.
 Draw out your swords, use tables as your shields<sup>7</sup>

7. In the usual arrangement, there were light side-tables by each diner, rather than a single larger dining table; the suitors are to pick up their tables for self-defense.

against the deadly arrows. All together, 75 rush at him, try to drive him off the threshold, and out of doors, then run all through the town, and quickly call for help. This man will soon have shot his last!"

He drew his sharp bronze sword and with a dreadful scream he leapt at him. 80
 But that same instant, Lord Odysseus let fly and hit his chest, beside the nipple, and instantly the arrow pierced his liver.
 The sword fell from his hand. He doubled up and fell across the table, spilling food 85 and wine across the floor. He smashed his head against the ground, and in his desperate pain kicked up the chair, and darkness drenched his eyes.

Amphinomus attacked Odysseus.
 He drew his sharp sword, hoping he could force him 90 to yield his place. Telemachus leapt in and thrust his bronze spear through him from behind, ramming it through his back and out his chest.
 Face-first he crashed and thudded to the ground.
 Telemachus dashed back—he left his spear 95 stuck in the body; he was terrified that if he bent to pull it out, some Greek would jump on him and stab him with a sword.
 He ran and quickly reached his loyal father.
 He stood beside him and his words flew out. 100

"Now Father, I will fetch a shield for you and two spears and a helmet made of bronze, and I will arm myself, and bring more arms for our two herdsmen, since we all need weapons."

Odysseus, the master planner, answered, 105
 "Run fast while I still have a stock of arrows, before they force me from the doors—I am fighting alone up here."

His son obeyed.
 He hurried to the storeroom for the arms, and took eight spears, four shields, and four bronze helmets 110
 each fitted out with bushy horsehair plumes.
 He hurried back to take them to his father, and was the first to strap the armor on.
 The two slaves also armed themselves, and stood flanking their brilliant, resourceful leader. 115
 As long as he had arrows, he kept shooting, and one by one he picked the suitors off, inside his own home. Then at last the king ran out of arrows; he set down his bow next to the sturdy doorpost, leaning up 120 against the palace walls, all shining white.

 He slung the four-fold shield across his shoulders, and put the well-made helmet on his head.
 The crest of horsehair gave a fearsome nod.
 He grasped a bronze-tipped spear in either hand. 125

There was a back gate in the castle walls, providing access to the passageway, with tightly fitted doors. Odysseus ordered the noble swineherd to stand there to guard it—there was only one way out. 130 Agelaus called out to all the suitors.

“Friends, one of us should slip out through that gate and quickly tell the people, raise alarms.
 That soon would put a stop to this man’s shooting.”

Melanthius the goatherd answered, “No! 135
 My lord, that entryway is much too narrow, and dangerously near the palace doors.
 One man, if he was brave, could keep it guarded against us all. So I will bring you armor out of the storeroom, which I think is where 140 those two, our enemies, have hidden it.”

Melanthius the goatherd climbed up past the arrow-slits inside the castle walls, into the chamber. There he took twelve shields, twelve spears and twelve bronze helmets, each one crested 145 with horsehair. Then he hurried back downstairs and handed all the weapons to the suitors.

Odysseus could see that they had arms; their spears were brandished. His heart stopped, his legs trembled—he was so shocked at their presumption. 150
 At once his words flew out to tell his son,

“One of the women, or Melanthius, is waging war against us, in my house!”

Wisely Telemachus owned up at once.
 “Father, it was my fault, I am to blame. 155
 I left the heavy storeroom door ajar.
 Someone on their side must have kept good watch.
 Go there, Eumaeus, shut the door, and see if any of the women are against us, or else, as I suspect, Melanthius.” 160

Meanwhile, Melanthius was going back to get more weapons from the room. The swineherd saw him and told Odysseus,

“My lord,
that little sneak, the man we all suspected, is going to the stores! Odysseus, 165 you always have a plan for what to do:
so should I kill him, as I think is best, or bring him here to you, so you can punish his many crimes against you in your house?”

Odysseus already had a plan. 170 “Telemachus and I will keep the suitors trapped in the hall—however much they rage.
You two, truss up his hands and feet behind him, drag him inside the storeroom, string him up, tying a knotted rope high on the column, 175 and hoist him to the rafters. Torture him with hours of agony before he dies.”

His word was their command; they hurried off, and reached the weaponry. Melanthius was unaware of them. As he was searching 180 for arms, they stopped on each side of the door and waited. When he stepped across the threshold, holding a lovely helmet in one hand,
and in the other hand, a rusty shield, once carried by Laertes in his youth, 185 but now in storage, with its seams all loose, the two men jumped on him and grabbed his hair to drag him in and threw him on the floor, shaking with fear. They bound his hands and feet and yanked them painfully behind his back, 190 just as the lord of suffering had told them.
They tied him with a knotted rope and hoisted his body up the column to the rafters.
Swineherd Eumaeus, you began to mock him:

“Keep watch the whole night through, Melanthius, 195 tucked up in this soft bed—it serves you right!
And wait there for the golden throne of Dawn leaving the sea, that hour when you would lead your goats to this house for the suitors’ dinner.”

There he was left, bound cruelly and stretched. 200
The herdsmen armed themselves and left the room, shutting the door, and joined their cunning leader.
They stood there on the threshold, tense with purpose, just four against so many men inside.

The child of Zeus, Athena, came to meet them; 205 her voice and looks resembled those of Mentor.
 Odysseus was happy when he saw her,
 and said, "Remember our old friendship, Mentor!
 I have been good to you since we were boys.
 So help me now!" He guessed it was Athena, 210 who rouses armies.

From the hall, the suitors shouted their opposition. Agelaus called, "Mentor, do not let Odysseus sway you to help him and to fight against us.
 I think this is how things will go. When we 215 have killed this father and his son, you will die also, if you do as you intend, and pay with your own life for all your plots.
 Our bronze will strip your life away from you, and we will seize whatever you may own 220 and mix it with the loot we get from here.
 Your sons will not survive here in these halls,<sup>8</sup> nor will your wife and daughters still walk free in Ithaca."

At that Athena's heart became enraged, and angrily she scolded 225 Odysseus. "Where is your courage now?
 You fought nine years on end against the Trojans, for white-armed Helen, Zeus' favorite child.<sup>9</sup>
 You slaughtered many men when war was raging, and formed the plan that made the city fall.<sup>1</sup> 230
 Now you are home at last, how can you flinch from being brave and using proper force against these suitors? Come now, stand by me and watch how Mentor, son of Alcimus, will treat your enemies as recompense 235 for all your service."

But she did not grant decisive victory; she kept on testing Odysseus' courage, and his son's.
 She flew up like a swallow through the smoke and nestled in the rafters of the roof. 240

Now Agelaus, Demoptolemus, Eurynomus, Pisander, Amphiomedon, and Polybus were urging on the suitors.
 Those were the most heroic of the group who still survived and battled for their lives: 245

8. It is unclear in the original whether Agelaus is threatening to kill Mentor's sons or only banish them.

9. The original epithet is an unusual one, eupaterios, suggesting "well-fathered."

1. The trick of the Wooden Horse.

the others were defeated by the bow and raining arrows. Agelaus told them,

“That Mentor’s boasts were empty, friends! He left, and they are all alone there at the entrance.
Now force this cruel man to stay his hands. 250
Do not hurl spears at him all in a mass, but you six must shoot first and pray Lord Zeus we strike Odysseus and win the fight.
Once he is down, the others will be nothing.”

The six men threw their spears as he had said; 255 at once Athena made their efforts fail.
One pierced the doorpost of the palace hall, another hit the closely fitted door, another’s spear of ash and heavy bronze fell on the wall. The group of four avoided 260 all of the suitors’ spears. Odysseus had waited long enough.

“My friends,” he said,
“they want to slaughter us and strip our arms!
Avenge my former wrongs, and save your lives!
Now shoot!”

They hurled their spears at once and hit. 265
Odysseus killed Demoptolemus; Telemachus, Euryades; the swineherd slaughtered Elatus, and the cowherd killed Pisander. They all fell and bit the earth.
The other suitors huddled in a corner; 270 the four rushed up and from the corpses pulled their spears. Again the suitors threw their weapons; again Athena made them fail. One spear struck at the doorpost, and another pierced the door; another ash spear hit the wall. 275 Amphimedon’s blow grazed Telemachus right by the wrist: the bronze tore through his skin.
Ctesippus hurled his spear; it only scratched the swineherd’s shoulder, just above his shield, flew past and fell down on the floor behind him. 280
The competent, sharp-eyed Odysseus and his companions hurled their piercing spears into the swarming throng. The city-sacker skewered Eurydamas; Telemachus slashed Amphimedon, and the swineherd struck 285 at Polybus; the cowherd sliced right through Ctesippus’ chest, and crowed,

“You fool! You loved insulting us—now you have stopped your boasting.
The gods have got the last word; they have won.

This is a gift to pay you for that kick you gave Odysseus when he walked through his own house, as a homeless man in need.” 290

Odysseus moved closer with his spear, and pierced Agelaus; Telemachus thrust at Leocritus, and drove his bronze 295 into his belly. He fell down headfirst, face smashed against the floor.

Then from the roof
 Athena lifted high her deadly aegis.
 The frightened suitors bolted through the hall like cattle, roused and driven by a gadfly 300 in springtime, when the days are getting longer.
 As eagles with their crooked beaks and talons swoop from the hills and pounce on smaller birds that fly across the fields beneath the clouds;
 the victims have no help and no way out, 305 as their attackers slaughter them, and men watch and enjoy the violence. So these four fighters sprang and struck, and drove the suitors in all directions. Screaming filled the hall, as skulls were cracked; the whole floor ran with blood. 310

Leodes darted up to supplicate Odysseus; he touched his knees.

“Please, mercy!
 I did no wrong, I swear, in word or deed to any of the women in the house.
 I tried to stop the suitors, tried to urge them 315 to keep their hands clean, but they would not listen.
 Those fools deserved their fate. But I did nothing!
 I am a priest—yet I must lie with them.
 Will good behavior go unrewarded?”

The calculating hero scowled at him. 320
 “If, as you claim, you sacrificed for them, you must have often prayed here in my hall that I would not regain the joys of home, and that my wife would marry you instead, and bear you children. You will not escape. 325 Suffer and die!”

Agelaus had dropped his sword when he was killed. With his strong arm Odysseus swung, slashed down and sliced right through the priest’s neck, and his head, still framing words, rolled in the dust.

The poet Phemius,
 who had been forced to sing to please the suitors,
 was huddling by the back door with his lyre, anxiously considering his choices:
 to slip outside and crouch beneath the altar of mighty Zeus, the god of home owners, where his old masters burned so many thigh-bones;
 or he could run towards Odysseus and grasp him by the knees and beg for mercy.
 He made his mind up: he would supplicate.
 He set his hollow lyre on the ground between the mixing bowl and silver chair, and dashed to take Odysseus' knees, beseeching him in quivering winged words.

"I beg you, Lord Odysseus! Have mercy!
 Think! If you kill me now, you will be sorry!
 I have the power to sing for gods and men.
 I am self-taught—all kinds of song are planted by gods inside my heart. I am prepared to sing for you, as if before a god.
 Wait, do not cut my throat! Just ask your son!
 He will explain it was against my will that I came here to sing to them after dinner.
 They were too fierce and they outnumbered me.
 I had no choice."

Then strong Telemachus turned quickly to his father, saying, "Stop, hold up your sword—this man is innocent.
 And let us also save the house boy, Medon.
 He always cared for me when I was young—unless the herdsmen have already killed him, or he already met you in your rage."

Medon was sensible: he had been hiding under a chair, beneath a fresh cowhide, in order to escape from being killed.
 Hearing these words, he jumped up from the chair, took off the cowhide and assumed the pose of supplication near Telemachus,
 and said,

"Friend, here I am! Please spare my life!
 Your father is too strong, and furious against the suitors, who skimmed off his wealth and failed to honor you. Please, talk to him!"

Canny Odysseus smiled down and said,
 "You need not worry, he has saved your life."

So live and spread the word that doing good is far superior to wickedness.
 Now leave the hall and go outside; sit down, 375 joining the famous singer in the courtyard, so I can finish what I have to do inside my house."

The two men went outside, and crouched by Zeus' altar, on the lookout for death at any moment all around. 380

Odysseus scanned all around his home for any man who might be still alive, who might be hiding to escape destruction.
 He saw them fallen, all of them, so many,
 lying in blood and dust, like fish hauled up 385 out of the dark-gray sea in fine-mesh nets; tipped out upon the curving beach's sand, they gasp for water from the salty sea.
 The sun shines down and takes their life away.
 So lay the suitors, heaped across each other.
 Odysseus, still scheming, told his son, 390

"I need to say something to Eurycleia.
 Hurry, Telemachus, and bring her here."

Telemachus was glad to please his father.
 He pushed the door ajar and called, "Come, Nanny, quick!. 395
 You supervise the female palace slaves.
 My father has to talk to you; come on!"

She had no words to answer him, but opened the doors into the great and sturdy hall.
 Telemachus went first and led the way. 400
 Among the corpses of the slaughtered men she saw Odysseus all smeared with blood.
 After a lion eats a grazing ox, its chest and jowls are thick with blood all over;
 a dreadful sight. Just so, Odysseus 405 had blood all over him—from hands to feet.
 Seeing the corpses, seeing all that blood, so great a deed of violence, she began to crow. Odysseus told her to stop and spoke with fluent words.

"Old woman, no! 410
 Be glad inside your heart, but do not shout.
 It is not pious, gloating over men who have been killed. Divine fate took them down, and their own wicked deeds. They disrespected all people that they met, both bad and good. 415

Through their own crimes they came to this bad end.
But tell me now about the household women.
Which ones dishonor me? And which are pure?"

The slave who loved her master answered, "Child,
I will tell you exactly how things stand. 420
In this house we have fifty female slaves whom we have trained to work, to card the wool, and taught to tolerate their life as slaves.<sup>2</sup> Twelve stepped away from honor: those twelve girls ignore me, and Penelope our mistress. 425
She would not let Telemachus instruct them, since he is young and only just grown-up.
Let me go upstairs to the women's rooms, to tell your wife—some god has sent her sleep."

The master strategist Odysseus 430
said,

"Not yet; do not wake her. Call the women who made those treasonous plots while I was gone."<sup>3</sup>
The old nurse did so. Walking through the hall, she called the girls. Meanwhile, Odysseus summoned the herdsmen and Telemachus 435 and spoke winged words to them.

"Now we must start to clear the corpses out. The girls must help.
Then clean my stately chairs and handsome tables with sponges fine as honeycomb, and water.
When the whole house is set in proper order, 440 restore my halls to health: take out the girls between the courtyard wall and the rotunda.
Hack at them with long swords, eradicate all life from them. They will forget the things the suitors made them do with them in secret, 445 through Aphrodite."

Sobbing desperately
the girls came, weeping, clutching at each other.
They carried out the bodies of the dead and piled them up on top of one another, under the roof outside. Odysseus 450 instructed them and forced them to continue.
And then they cleaned his lovely chairs and tables

2. Some scholars think that doulosune in this line ("slavery") suggests sexual slavery and that the line (reading doulosunes apechesthai) should be interpreted as "to hold off against (sexual) enslavement"—i.e., to resist the kind of advances made by the suitors.

3. The Greek verb mechanoonto ("plotted"—with implications of cunning strategy reminiscent of Odysseus himself) suggests that these girls were deliberately hoping to work against their master—a suggestion that goes well beyond Odysseus's evidence.

with wet absorbent sponges, while the prince and herdsman with their shovels scraped away the mess to make the sturdy floor all clean. 455
 The girls picked up the trash and took it out.
 The men created order in the house and set it all to rights, then led the girls outside and trapped them—they could not escape—
 between the courtyard wall and the rotunda. 460 Showing initiative, Telemachus insisted,

“I refuse to grant these girls a clean death, since they poured down shame on me and Mother, when they lay beside the suitors.”

At that, he wound a piece of sailor’s rope 465 round the rotunda and round the mighty pillar, stretched up so high no foot could touch the ground.
 As doves or thrushes spread their wings to fly home to their nests, but someone sets a trap—they crash into a net, a bitter bedtime; 470 just so the girls, their heads all in a row, were strung up with the noose around their necks to make their death an agony. They gasped, feet twitching for a while, but not for long.

Then the men took Melanthius outside 475 and with curved bronze cut off his nose and ears and ripped away his genitals, to feed raw to the dogs. Still full of rage, they chopped his hands and feet off. Then they washed their own, and they went back inside.

Odysseus 480
 told his beloved nurse, “Now bring me fire and sulfur, as a cure for evil things, and I will fumigate the house. And call Penelope, her slaves, and all the slave girls inside the house.”

She answered with affection, 485 “Yes, dear, all this is good. But let me bring a cloak and shirt for you. You should not stand here, your strong back covered only with those rags.
 That would be wrong!”

Odysseus, the master of every cunning scheme, replied, “No, first 490
 I need a fire here, to smoke the hall.”
 His loving slave complied and brought the fire and sulfur, and Odysseus made smoke, and fumigated every room inside the house and yard. Meanwhile, the old nurse ran 495 all through the palace summoning the women.

 By torchlight they came out from their apartments, to greet Odysseus with open arms.
 They kissed his face and took him by the hands in welcome. He was seized by sweet desire 500 to weep, and in his heart he knew them all.

BOOK 23

[The Olive Tree Bed]

Chuckling with glee, the old slave climbed upstairs to tell the queen that her beloved husband was home. Her weak old knees felt stronger now; with buoyant steps she went and stood beside her mistress, at her head, and said,

“Dear child, 5
 wake up and see! At long last you have got your wish come true! Odysseus has come!
 He is right here inside this house! At last!
 He slaughtered all the suitors who were wasting his property and threatening his son!” 10

But cautiously Penelope replied, “You poor old thing! The gods have made you crazy.
 They have the power to turn the sanest person mad, or make fools turn wise. You used to be so sensible, but they have damaged you. 15 Why else would you be mocking me like this,
 with silly stories, in my time of grief?
 Why did you wake me from the sleep that sweetly wrapped round my eyes? I have not slept so soundly since my Odysseus marched off to see 20 that cursed town—Evilium. Go back!
 If any other slave comes here to wake me and tell me all this nonsense, I will send her back down at once, and I will not be gentle.
 Your old age will protect you from worse scolding.” 25

But Eurycleia answered with affection, “Dear child, I am not mocking you. I am telling the truth: Odysseus is here!
 He is the stranger that they all abused.
 Telemachus has known for quite some time, 30 but sensibly he kept his father’s plans a secret, so Odysseus could take revenge for all their violence and pride.”

Penelope was overjoyed; she jumped from bed and hugged the nurse, and started crying. 35
 Her words flew fast.

“Dear Nanny! If this is the truth, if he has come back to this house, how could he have attacked those shameless suitors, when he is just one man, and there were always so many crowded in there?”

Eurycleia 40

answered, “I did not see or learn the details. I heard the sound of screaming from the men as they were killed. We huddled in our room and kept the doors tight shut, until your son called me—his father sent him. Then I saw Odysseus surrounded by dead bodies. 45 They lay on top of one another, sprawled across the solid floor. You would have been thrilled if you saw him, like a lion, drenched in blood and gore. Now they are all piled up out by the courtyard gates, and he is burning a mighty fire to fumigate the palace, restoring all its loveliness. He sent me to fetch you. Come with me, so both of you can start to live in happiness. You have 50 endured such misery. Your wish came true! He is alive! He has come home again, and found you and your son, and he has taken revenge on all the suitors who abused him.” 55

Penelope said carefully, “Do not 60 start gloating. As you know, my son and I would be delighted if he came. We all would. However, what you say cannot be true. Some god has killed the suitors out of anger at their abuse of power and their pride. 65 They failed to show respect to visitors, both good and bad. Their foolishness has killed them. But my Odysseus has lost his home, and far away from Greece, he lost his life.”

The nurse replied, “Dear child! How can you say 70 your husband will not come, when he is here, beside the hearth? Your heart has always been mistrustful. But I have clear evidence! When I was washing him, I felt the scar made when the boar impaled him with its tusk. 75 I tried to tell you, but he grabbed my throat and stopped me spoiling all his plans. Come with me. I swear on my own life: if I am lying, then kill me.”

Wise Penelope said, “Nanny, it must be hard for you to understand 80
 the ways of gods, despite your cleverness.
 But let us go to meet my son, so I can see the suitors dead, and see the man who killed them.”

So she went downstairs. Her heart could not decide if she should keep her distance 85 as she was questioning her own dear husband, or go right up to him and kiss his face and hold his hands in hers. She crossed the threshold and sat across from him beside the wall, in firelight. He sat beside the pillar, 90 and kept his eyes down, waiting to find out whether the woman who once shared his bed would speak to him. She sat in silence, stunned.
 Sometimes when she was glancing at his face it seemed like him; but then his dirty clothes 95 were unfamiliar. Telemachus scolded her.

“Mother! Cruel, heartless Mother!
 Why are you doing this, rejecting Father?
 Why do you not go over, sit beside him, and talk to him? No woman in the world 100 would be so obstinate! To keep your distance from him when he has come back after twenty long years of suffering! Your heart is always harder than rock!”

But thoughtfully she answered, “My child, I am confused. I cannot speak, 105 or meet his eyes. If this is really him, if my Odysseus has come back home,
 we have our ways to recognize each other, through secret signs known only to us two.”

Hardened Odysseus began to smile.
 He told the boy, 110

“You must allow your mother to test me out; she will soon know me better.
 While I am dirty, dressed in rags, she will not treat me with kindness or acknowledge me.
 Meanwhile, we must make plans. If someone murders 115 even just one man, even one who had few friends in his community, the killer is forced to run away and leave his homeland and family. But we have killed the mainstay of Ithaca, the island's best young men.

So what do you suggest?" 120

Telemachus
said warily, "You have to work it out.
They say you have the finest mind in all the world; no mortal man can rival you in cleverness. Lead me, and I will be behind you right away. And I will do my best to be as brave as I can be." 125

Odysseus was quick to form a plan.
He told him, "Here is what I think is best.
The three of you should wash and change your clothes, and make the slave girls go put on clean dresses. 130 Then let the godlike singer take the lyre and play a clear and cheerful dancing tune, so passersby or neighbors hearing it will think it is a wedding. We must not allow the news about the suitors' murder to spread too far until we reach the woods of our estate, and there we can decide the best path forward offered us by Zeus." 135

They did as Lord Odysseus had said. 140
They washed and changed their tunics, and the slave girls prepared themselves. The singer took the lyre, and roused in them desire to hear sweet music, and dance. The house resounded with the thump of beating feet from all the dancing men and girls in pretty sashes. Those outside who heard the noises said to one another, 145

"So somebody is marrying the queen who had so many suitors! Headstrong woman!
She must have lacked the strength to wait it out and keep her husband's house safe till he came." 150
They spoke with no idea what really happened.

Eurynome the slave woman began to wash strong-willed Odysseus. She rubbed him with olive oil, and dressed him in a tunic and handsome cloak. And then Athena poured attractiveness from head to toe, and made him taller and stronger, and his hair grew thick and curly as a hyacinth. As when a craftsman whom Athena or Hephaestus<sup>4</sup> has trained in metalwork, so he can make beautiful artifacts, pours gold on silver— 155 160

4. Gods associated with skill in handicrafts and technology.

so she poured beauty on his head and shoulders.
 After his bath he looked like an immortal.
 He sat down in the same chair opposite his wife and said, 165

“Extraordinary woman!
 The gods have given you the hardest heart.
 No other wife would so reject a husband who had been suffering for twenty years and finally come home. Well, Nanny, make 170 a bed for me, so I can rest. This woman must have an iron heart!”

Penelope
 said shrewdly, “You extraordinary man!
 I am not acting proud, or underplaying this big event; yet I am not surprised 175 at how you look. You looked like this the day your long oars sailed away from Ithaca.
 Now, Eurycleia, make the bed for him outside the room he built himself. Pull out the bedstead, and spread quilts and blankets on it.” 180
 She spoke to test him, and Odysseus was furious, and told his loyal wife,

“Woman! Your words have cut my heart! Who moved my bed? It would be difficult for even a master craftsman—though a god could do it 185 with ease. No man, however young and strong, could pry it out. There is a trick to how this bed was made. I made it, no one else.
 Inside the court there grew an olive tree with delicate long leaves, full-grown and green, 190 as sturdy as a pillar, and I built the room around it. I packed stones together, and fixed a roof and fitted doors. At last I trimmed the olive tree and used my bronze to cut the branches off from root to tip 195 and planed it down and skillfully transformed the trunk into a bedpost. With a drill, I bored right through it. This was my first bedpost, and then I made the other three, inlaid with gold and silver and with ivory. 200
 I stretched ox-leather straps across, dyed purple.
 Now I have told the secret trick, the token.
 But woman, wife, I do not know if someone—a man—has cut the olive trunk and moved my bed, or if it is still safe.”

At that, 205
 her heart and body suddenly relaxed.

She recognized the tokens he had shown her.
 She burst out crying and ran straight towards him and threw her arms around him, kissed his face,
 and said,

“Do not be angry at me now, 210 Odysseus! In every other way you are a very understanding man.
 The gods have made us suffer: they refused to let us stay together and enjoy our youth until we reached the edge of age 215 together. Please forgive me, do not keep bearing a grudge because when I first saw you,
 I would not welcome you immediately.
 I felt a constant dread that some bad man would fool me with his lies. There are so many 220 dishonest, clever men. That foreigner<sup>5</sup> would never have got Helen into bed, if she had known the Greeks would march to war and bring her home again. It was a goddess who made her do it, putting in her heart 225 the passion that first caused my grief as well.
 Now you have told the story of our bed,
 the secret that no other mortal knows, except yourself and me, and just one slave, Actoris,<sup>6</sup> whom my father gave to me 230
 when I came here, who used to guard our room.
 You made my stubborn heart believe in you.”

This made him want to cry. He held his love, his faithful wife, and wept. As welcome as the land to swimmers, when Poseidon wrecks 235 their ship at sea and breaks it with great waves and driving winds; a few escape the sea and reach the shore, their skin all caked with brine.
 Grateful to be alive, they crawl to land.
 So glad she was to see her own dear husband, 240 and her white arms would not let go his neck.
 They would have wept until the rosy Dawn began to touch the sky, but shining-eyed Athena intervened. She held night back, restraining golden Dawn beside the Ocean, 245 and would not let her yoke her swift young colts, Shining and Bright. Odysseus, mind whirling,
 said,

5. The foreigner is Paris, who came from Troy in the Near East to Sparta in Greece.

6. Actoris is mentioned only here, and it is possible that she has died, to be replaced by Eurynome—which would explain why Penelope is sure that Actoris has not told the stranger the secret.

“Wife, we have not come yet to the end of all our troubles; there are more to come, many hard labors which I must complete. 250
 The spirit of Tiresias informed me, that day I went inside the house of Hades to ask about the journey home for me and for my men. But come now, let us go to bed together, wife; let us enjoy 255 the pleasure of sweet sleep.”

Penelope,
 who always thought ahead, said, “When you wish.
 The bed is yours. The gods have brought you home, back to your well-built house. But since a god has made you speak about these future labors, 260 tell me what they involve. I will find out eventually, and better to know now.”

He answered warily, “You really are extraordinary. Why would you make me tell you something to cause you pain? It hurts me too, 265 but I will tell the truth, not hide it from you.
 Tiresias foretold that I must travel through many cities carrying an oar, till I reach men who do not know the sea, and do not eat their food with salt, or use 270 boats painted red around the prow, or oars, which are the wings of ships. He said that I will know I have arrived when I encounter someone who calls the object on my back a winnowing fan.<sup>7</sup> Then I must fix my oar 275 firm in the earth, and make a sacrifice to Lord Poseidon, of a ram and ox and stud-boar, perfect animals, then come back home and give a hecatomb to all the deathless gods who live above the sky. 280
 If I do this, I will not die at sea;
 I will grow old in comfort and will meet a gentle death, surrounded by my people, who will be rich and happy.”

Sensibly
 Penelope said, “If the gods allow you 285 to reach old age in comfort, there is hope that there will be an end to all our troubles.”

They talked like this. Meanwhile, the slaves were working: Eurynome and Eurycleia laid soft blankets on the sturdy bed by torchlight. 290

7. I.e., the traveler will not recognize an oar, having never seen the sea.

The nurse went off to sleep; Eurynome picked up the torch and led them to their bed, then went to her room. Finally, at last, with joy the husband and the wife arrived back in the rites of their old marriage bed.

295

Meanwhile, the herdsmen and Telemachus stopped dancing, made the women stop, and went to bed inside the darkened house.

And when the couple had enjoyed their lovemaking, they shared another pleasure—telling stories. 300

 She told him how she suffered as she watched the crowd of suitors ruining the house, killing so many herds of sheep and cattle and drinking so much wine, because of her.
 Odysseus told her how much he hurt 305 so many other people, and in turn how much he had endured himself. She loved to listen, and she did not fall asleep until he told it all. First, how he slaughtered the Cicones, then traveled to the fields 310 of Lotus-Eaters; what the Cyclops did, and how he paid him back for ruthlessly eating his men. Then how he reached Aeolus, who welcomed him and helped him; but it was not yet his fate to come back home; a storm 315 snatched him and bore him off across the sea, howling frustration. Then, he said, he came to Laestrygonia, whose people wrecked his fleet and killed his men. And he described the cleverness of Circe, and his journey 320 to Hades to consult Tiresias, and how he saw all his dead friends, and saw his mother, who had loved him as a baby;
 then how he heard the Sirens' endless voices, and reached the Wandering Rocks and terrible 325 Charybdis, and how he had been the first to get away from Scylla. And he told her of how his crew devoured the Sun God's cattle; Zeus roared with smoke and thunder, lightning struck the ship, and all his loyal men were killed. 330
 But he survived, and drifted to Ogygia.
 He told her how Calypso trapped him there, inside her hollow cave, and wanted him to be her husband; she took care of him and promised she could set him free from death 335 and time forever. But she never swayed his heart. He suffered terribly, for years, and then he reached Phaeacia, where the people looked up to him as if he were a god, and sent him in a ship back home again 340 to his dear Ithaca, with gifts of bronze and gold and piles of clothes. His story ended; sweet sleep released his heart from all his cares.

Athena, bright-eyed goddess, stayed alert, and when she thought Odysseus had finished 345 with taking pleasure in his wife and sleep, she roused the newborn Dawn from Ocean's streams to bring the golden light to those on earth.
 Odysseus got up and told his wife,

"Wife, we have both endured our share of trouble: 350
 you wept here as you longed for my return, while Zeus and other gods were keeping me away from home, although I longed to come.
 But now we have returned to our own bed, as we both longed to do. You must look after 355 my property inside the house. Meanwhile, I have to go on raids, to steal replacements for all the sheep those swaggering suitors killed, and get the other Greeks to give me more, until I fill my folds. But first I will 360 go to the orchard in the countryside to see my grieving father. Then at dawn the news will spread that I have killed the suitors.
 Your orders, wife—though you are smart enough to need no orders—are, go with your slaves 365 upstairs, sit quietly, and do not talk to anyone."

He armed himself and called the herdsmen and Telemachus, and told them to put on armor too—breastplates of bronze.
 Odysseus led all of them outside. 370
 The light was bright across the earth. Athena hid them with night and brought them out of town.

[Restless Spirits]

Then Hermes called the spirits of the suitors out of the house. He held the golden wand with which he casts a spell to close men's eyes or open those of sleepers when he wants.
 He led the spirits and they followed, squeaking 5 like bats in secret crannies of a cave, who cling together, and when one becomes detached and falls down from the rock, the rest flutter and squeak—just so the spirits squeaked, and hurried after Hermes, lord of healing. 10

 On open roads they crossed the Ocean stream, went past the rock of Leucas and the gates of Helius the Sun, and skittered through the provinces of dreams, and soon arrived in fields of asphodel, the home of shadows 15 who have been worn to weariness by life.

They found Achilles' ghost there, and Patroclus, and Ajax, the most handsome of the Greeks after unmatched Achilles. Agamemnon had just arrived to join them, in deep grief 20 for his own death, and with him came the others killed by Aegisthus and his bodyguards.
 Achilles' ghost spoke first.

"O Agamemnon!
 Men used to say that out of all the heroes, Zeus, Lord of Lightning, favored you the most, 25 because you had command of a great army in Troy where Greeks endured the pain of war.
 But death, which no man living can avoid,
 was destined to arrive at the wrong time.
 If only you had died at Troy and won 30
 the glory of your rank as a commander!
 All of the Greeks and allies would have built a tomb for you, and afterwards your son would have received great honor. As it is, it was your fate to die a dreadful death." 35

The ghost of Agamemnon answered him, "Achilles, son of Peleus, you were lucky to die at Troy, away from Argos.
 The finest warriors of Greece and Troy fought round your corpse and died. You lay a hero, 40 magnificent amid the whirling dust, your days of driving chariots forgotten.<sup>8</sup>
 We fought all day, and would have fought forever, but Zeus sent winds to stop us. Then we brought you back to our ships, and laid you on a bier, 45 away from battle, and we bathed your skin in heated water and anointed you with oil. We wept for you and cut our hair.
 Your mother<sup>9</sup> heard the news, and with her nymphs she came up from the waves. An eerie wailing 50 sounded across the sea. The men began

8. Achilles is usually known as "swift-footed," a quick sprinter on foot rather than a horseman or driver of a chariot. The most famous episode in which he uses a chariot is near the end of the Iliad, when he drags the body of his slaughtered enemy, Hector, around the walls of Troy—a gesture of brutality that is forgotten in Achilles' own splendid death scene.

9. Thetis, a sea goddess.

to tremble, and they would have rushed on board, if wise old Nestor had not made them stop.
 He always had the best advice for us, and said, 'My lords, stay here. It is his mother, 55 coming with her immortal water nymphs to find her own dead son.' At this, the Greeks regained their courage. The old Sea King's daughters gathered around you weeping, and they dressed you in clothes of the immortals. All nine Muses 60 sang lamentations in their lovely voices.
 No one could keep from crying at the sound, so moving was their song. The gods and men were mourning seventeen long nights and days and then we gave you to the pyre, and killed 65 many fat sheep and cattle for your corpse.
 You burned in clothes from gods; you were anointed with oil and honey. Troops of warriors on foot and horseback, fully armed, went marching around your pyre, and made a mighty din. 70
 At last Hephaestus' flame consumed your flesh.
 When morning came, we gathered your white bones, Achilles, and anointed them with oil and unmixed wine. Your mother gave an urn of gold with double handles, which she said 75 Hephaestus made and Dionysus gave her.
 Your white bones lay inside it, Lord Achilles, mixed with the bones of your dead friend Patroclus.
 We laid the urn beside Antilochus, the friend you most respected after him. 80
 The army of Greek warriors assembled, and with all reverence we heaped a mound out on the headland by the Hellespont, large enough to be visible to those at sea, both now and in the years to come. 85 Your mother asked the gods for splendid prizes and put them in the midst of an arena, so the best athletes could compete for them.
 You have seen many burials of heroes, when young men tie their tunics to compete. 90
 But you would have been startled at the riches that silver-footed Thetis brought for you.
 You were so dearly loved by all the gods.
 You did not lose your name in death. Your fame will live forever; everyone will know 95 Achilles. As for me, what good was it that I wound up the war? When I came home Aegisthus and my wicked, fiendish wife murdered me. Zeus had planned it."

While they talked,
 Hermes the guide came near them, with the suitors 100 killed by Odysseus. The two great lords, astonished at the sight, rushed up to them, and Agamemnon's spirit recognized the son of his old friend, Melaneus, with whom he stayed in Ithaca. He said, 105

"Amphimedon! What happened to you all?
 Why have you all come down here to the land of darkness? You are all so young and strong;
 you must have been the best boys in your town.
 Maybe Poseidon raised great waves and winds 110 to wreck your fleet? Or were you all attacked by men on land while you were poaching cows or flocks of sheep, or fighting for a city and women? You must tell me! We are friends.
 Do you remember when I visited 115 your home, when Menelaus and myself were trying to persuade Odysseus to join the fleet and sail with us to Troy?
 It took a whole damned month to cross the sea;
 we had to work so hard to sway that man, 120 who sacked the city."<sup>1</sup>

Amphimedon's spirit answered, "Great General, Agamemnon, yes,
 I do remember everything you say.
 And I will tell, in every gruesome detail, the manner of our death. Odysseus 125 was gone for many years. We came to court his wife, who had no wish to marry us, but would not tell us no or make an end.
 She planned black death for us, and tricked us too.
 She set a mighty loom up in the hall, 130 and wove a wide fine cloth, and said to us,
 'Young suitors, now Odysseus is dead.
 I know that you are eager for the wedding,
 but wait till I am finished with this cloth, so that my weaving will not go to waste. 135
 It is a shroud for when Laertes dies, so that the women in the town do not blame me because a man who gained such wealth was buried with no winding-sheet.' Her words convinced us. So by day she wove the cloth, 140 and then at night by torchlight, she unwove it.
 For three long years she fooled us; when the hours

1. According to legend, Odysseus tried to get out of going to the Trojan War by feigning madness. The usual story is that he was demonstrating his insanity by plowing his field using a donkey and an ox yoked together (animals with different strides who would not plow well together). Palamedes, a Greek who had come on the embassy with Agamemnon and Menelaus, put the newborn Telemachus in front of the plow, and Odysseus veered away from his son—thus demonstrating his sanity.

and months had passed, the fourth year rolled around,
 and then a girl who knew the truth told us;
 and we found her unraveling her work. 145
 We made her finish it. When she had washed the marvelous huge sheet, she showed it to us, bright as the sun or moon. And then some spirit of ruin brought Odysseus from somewhere to Ithaca;<sup>2</sup> he went out to the fields, 150 to where the swineherd lived. His own dear son sailed in his black ship back from sandy Pylos.
 The two of them made plans to murder us.
 They showed up at the palace—first the boy, and then Odysseus propped on a stick 155 and dressed in dirty rags. He seemed to be a poor old homeless man, who suddenly appeared, led by the swineherd. None of us could recognize him, even those of us who were a little older than myself. 160
 We hurled insulting words and missiles at him, and for a while he patiently endured abuse in his own home. But when the will of Zeus awakened him, with his son's help, he put the splendid weapons in the storeroom 165 and locked the door. Then came his cunning plan:
 he told his wife to set for us the axes and bow. The competition meant our doom, the start of slaughter. None of us could string the mighty bow—we all were far too weak. 170
 But when it was his turn, we shouted out that nobody should give the bow to him, no matter what he said. Telemachus alone insisted that he ought to have it.
 At last Odysseus, with calm composure, 175 took it and strung it easily, and shot all through the iron axes. Then he stood astride the threshold with a fearsome scowl, and started shooting fast. His arrow struck Antinous, our leader. With sure aim 180 he shot his deadly arrows at more men; those nearest to him fell. It was apparent some god was helping them. Impelled by rage, they rushed around the palace killing us in turn. There was a dreadful noise of screaming 185 and broken skulls; the whole floor ran with blood.
 So, Agamemnon, we were killed. Our bodies still lie unburied in our killer's house.
 Our families at home do not yet know.

2. This passage seems to reflect a different version of the story, in which Odysseus arrives on Ithaca at the exact moment that Penelope is forced to finish the weaving, and also other versions in which Odysseus and Penelope collude together to kill the suitors.

They need to wash the black blood from our wounds and weep for us and lay our bodies out.
This is the honor due the dead.” 190

The ghost
of Agamemnon answered, “Lucky you, cunning Odysseus: you got yourself a wife of virtue—great Penelope. 195 How principled she was, that she remembered her husband all those years! Her fame will live forever, and the deathless gods will make a poem to delight all those on earth about intelligent Penelope. 200
Not like my wife<sup>3</sup>—who murdered her own husband!
Her story will be hateful; she will bring bad reputation to all other women, even the good ones.”

So they spoke together, standing in Hades, hidden in the earth. 205

Meanwhile, Odysseus and his companions had left the town and quickly reached the farm, won by Laertes long ago—he fought hard for it, and his house was there; the slaves, who had to do his wishes, lived and slept 210 and ate their food in quarters that surrounded the central house. One was from Sicily, the old slave woman who took care of him out in the countryside. Odysseus spoke to his slaves and to his son.

“Go in, 215
choose the best pig and kill it for our dinner.
And I will test my father, to find out if he will know me instantly on sight, or not—I have been absent for so long.”

At that he gave his weapons to the slaves. 220
They quickly went inside. Odysseus walked to the fruitful orchard on his quest.
He did not find old Dolius, the steward, nor any of his slaves or sons—he had led them to gather rocks to build dry-walls. 235 Odysseus’ father was alone, inside the well-built orchard, digging earth to make it level round a tree. He wore a dirty ragged tunic, and his leggings had leather patches to protect from scratches. 230 He wore thick gloves because of thorns, and had a cap of goatskin. He was wallowing in grief. The veteran, Odysseus, seeing his father worn by age and burdened by desperate, heartfelt sorrow, stopped beneath 235 a towering pear tree, weeping. Then he wondered whether to kiss his father, twine around him, and tell him that he had come home again,

 and everything that happened on the way—or question him. He thought it best to start 240 by testing him with teasing and abuse.
 With this in mind, Odysseus approached him,
 as he was digging round the plant, head down.
 His famous son stood at his side and said,

“Old man, you know your trade and take good care 245 of this neat garden. Every plant and vine, and tree—the figs, the pears, the olive trees—and bed of herbs is nicely tended. But I have to say something—please do not get angry at me—you do not take good care 250 of your own self. You are unkempt, old man.
 Your skin is rough and dirty and your clothes are rags. Your master is neglecting you, although you are not lazy. In your height and face, you seem a leader, not a slave. 255
 You look like someone who would bathe and eat and sleep on fluffy pillows and fine sheets, as is appropriate for older people.
 But tell me this: whose slave are you? Whose garden do you take care of? Also, have I come 260 to Ithaca, as somebody I met was telling me just now? But he was not a helpful man: when I was asking him about a friend of mine, an old guest-friend, whether he is alive or dead in Hades, 265
 this fellow would not say, or even listen.
 A while ago, in my own native land, I had a guest to stay with me, who was my dearest friend of all my visitors.
 He said he was from Ithaca, and that 270 Laertes was his father. I had brought him into my house, and welcomed him with warmth;
 I can afford to be quite generous.
 I gave him seven heaps of golden treasure, a bowl made all of silver and inlaid 275 with flowers, twelve unfolded cloaks, and twelve thick blankets, twelve fine mantles, and twelve tunics.
 Also I gave him four well-trained slave women, beautiful ones, whom he picked out himself.”

His father answered through his tears, “Yes, stranger, 280 you have reached Ithaca. But cruel men have taken over here. You will receive nothing for all those gifts. If you had found him still living in this land, he would have matched your gifts and welcomed you with open arms 285 before he sent you home. Initial kindness deserves due recompense. But tell me now, how long is it since that unlucky man visited you? Your guest was my own son!
 Perhaps fish ate him out at sea, so far 290 from home and family; or birds and beasts ate him on land. His mother did not lay his body out and weep for him; nor I, his father; nor Penelope his wife, a wise and wealthy woman. She has not 295 closed her own husband’s eyes or given him a funeral. The dead deserve this honor.
 But tell me now, who are you? From what city?
 Who are your parents? Do you have a ship docked somewhere, which conveyed you here with friends 300 and crew? Or did you sail as passenger on someone else’s ship, which now is gone?”

Lying Odysseus replied, “I will tell you the truth completely. I am from Alybas,<sup>4</sup> and I have a palace there. 305
 My name is Eperitus; I am son of King Apheidas, son of Polypemon.
 An evil spirit struck me and I came from Sicily against my will. My ship is docked away from town. It is five years 310 since poor, unfortunate Odysseus came to my home. As he was setting out we saw good omens—birds towards the right—so we were hopeful we would meet again as friends, and share more gifts.”

At this, a cloud 315
 of black grief wrapped itself around Laertes.
 He poured two handfuls of the ashy dust over his gray old head, and started sobbing.
 Odysseus felt heart-wrenched to see his own beloved father in this state; sharp pain 320 pierced through his nostrils.<sup>5</sup> He rushed up to him

4. Alybas is probably a made-up place, perhaps coined by analogy with alaomai, “to wander”; ancient scholars thought it was in southern Italy.
 The made-up name Eperitus suggests “picked” or “chosen.” The fictional father’s name, Apheidas, suggests “Generous,” and the grandfather,

Polypemon, “Rich” or “Much Suffering.”

5. The oddly specific physiological detail has been taken as metaphorical by some commentators, but it seems best to take it as entirely literal: the sudden welling up of tears puts pressure on the sinuses.

and threw his arms around him, kissing him,
and saying,

“Father! It is me! I have been gone for twenty years, and now am home, in my own father’s country. Stop your tears. 325
I will explain, though we do not have long.
I killed the suitors in my house; I took revenge for all the pain they caused.”

Laertes
answered, “If you are really my own son Odysseus come home, show me a sign; 330 let me be sure of it.”

Odysseus
was quick to answer. “First, look here: the scar
made by the boar’s white tusk when I had gone to Mount Parnassus. You and Mother sent me, to see my grandfather, Autolycus, 335 and get the gifts that he had promised me.
Next I will tell you all the trees that grow in this fine orchard, which you gave to me.
When I was little, I would follow you around the garden, asking all their names. 340 We walked beneath these trees; you named them all and promised them to me. Ten apple trees, and thirteen pear trees, forty figs, and fifty grapevines which ripen one by one—their clusters change as the weather presses from the sky, 345 sent down by Zeus.”

At that, Laertes’ heart and legs gave way; he recognized the signs Odysseus had given as clear proof.
He threw both arms around his ruthless son, who caught him as he fainted. When his breath 350 and mind returned, he said,

“O Father Zeus,
you gods are truly rulers of Olympus,
if it is true the suitors have been punished for all the monstrous things they did. But I am terrified the Ithacans may soon 355 attack us here, and spread the news around to all the towns of Cephallenia.”

Scheming Odysseus said, “Do not fear.
Come to the farmhouse, where I sent my boy to go with the two herdsmen, to prepare 360 dinner as fast as possible.”

With this,
 the son and father walked towards the house.
 They found them serving generous plates of meat and mixing wine. The slave from Sicily washed brave Laertes, and she rubbed his skin 365 with olive oil, and wrapped a handsome cloak around him. Then Athena, standing near, made him grow taller and more muscular.
 When he emerged, Odysseus was shocked to see him looking like a god. His words 370 flew fast.

“Oh, Father! You look different!
 A god has made you taller and more handsome.”

Thoughtful Laertes said, “O Father Zeus, Athena, and Apollo! If I were as strong as when I took the sturdy fortress 375 of Nericus, out on the mainland shore, when I was king of Cephallenia,
 I would have stood beside you yesterday, with weapons on my back, and fought with you against the suitors who were in our house! 380
 I would have brought so many of them down, you would have been delighted!”

So they spoke.
 The work of cooking dinner was complete, and they sat down on chairs and stools, and reached to take the food. The old slave Dolius 385 approached them with his sons, who had been working.<sup>6</sup> Their mother, the Sicilian old woman, had gone to call them. She took care of them, and also the old man, made weak by age.<sup>7</sup>
 They saw Odysseus and stared, then stopped, 390 astonished. But he spoke to reassure them.

“Old man, sit down and eat. The rest of you, put your surprise entirely out of mind.
 We have been waiting ages; we are eager to have our dinner here.”

But Dolius 395
 ran straight to him with arms outstretched, and took Odysseus' wrist and kissed his hand, and let his words fly out.

6. Dolius is also the father of Melanthe and Melanthius, who were slaughtered by Odysseus, unbeknownst to him.

7. Presumably the old man is Dolius, though the same slave also cares for old Laertes.

“My friend! You have come home! We are so very glad to see you!
 We never thought this day would come! The gods have brought you here! A heartfelt welcome to you! 400 I pray the gods will bless you!—Does your wife know you have come back home? Or should I send a message?”

But Odysseus said coolly, “Old man, she knows already. Do not bother.” 405

So Dolius sat back down on his chair.
 His sons were also clustering around their famous owner, Lord Odysseus, to welcome him and hold him in their arms.
 Then they sat down in turn beside their father. 410
 They had their meal together in the farmhouse.

Meanwhile, swift Rumor spread the news all through the city, of the suitors’ dreadful murder.
 When people heard, they rushed from all directions towards the palace of Odysseus, 415 with shouts and lamentations. Then they brought the bodies from the house and buried them.
 The ones from distant towns were sent back home by ship. The mourners gathered in the square, heartbroken. When the people were assembled, 420 Eupeithes first stood up and spoke to them.
 This man was inconsolable with grief for his dead son Antinous, the boy Odysseus killed first. His father wept, tears falling as he spoke.

“This scheming man,
 my friends, has done us all most monstrous wrongs. 425
 First, he took many good men off to sail with him, and lost the ships, and killed the men!
 Now he has come and murdered all the best of Cephallenia. Come on, before 430 he sneaks away to Pylos or to Elis, we have to act! We will be shamed forever unless we take revenge on him for killing our sons and brothers. I would have no wish to live; I would prefer to die and join 435 the boys already dead. We have to stop them escaping overseas! Come on, right now!”

He spoke in tears, and pity seized them all.
 But Medon and the bard had woken up;
 they came outside and stood among the crowd. 440
 They all were terrified, and Medon said,

“Now listen, Ithacans. Odysseus could not have done such things without the help of gods. I saw a god myself, disguised as Mentor, sometimes standing at his side, 445 giving him will to fight, and sometimes rushing all through the hall to make the suitors scatter.
 They fell like flies.”

Pale terror seized them all.
 Then Halitherses, an old warrior, the only one to know both past and future, 450 stood up; he wished them well. He said to them, “Now hear me, Ithacans. My friends, it was because of your own cowardice this happened.

 You did not listen to me, or to Mentor, when we were telling you to stop your sons 455 from acting stupidly. They did great wrong, through their impulsiveness; they skimmed the wealth of an important man, and disrespected his wife, believing he would never come.
 But listen now. We must not go and fight, 460 or we will bring more ruin on our heads.”

At that, some stayed there, huddling together, but more than half jumped up with shouts. They thought Eupeithes had the right idea. They rushed to arms, and strapped their gleaming armor on, 465 and gathered in a mass before the town.
 Eupeithes was their leader—to his cost.
 He thought he would avenge his murdered son.
 In fact, he would not come back home; it was his fate to die out there.

And then Athena 470
 spoke to the son of Cronus.

“Father Zeus,
 highest of powers! Tell what hidden thoughts lie in you. Will you now make yet more war and bitter strife, or join the sides in friendship?”

The Gatherer of Clouds replied, “My child, 475 why ask me this? The plan was your idea, to have Odysseus come take revenge.
 Do as you wish. But here is my advice.
 He has already punished all the suitors, so let them swear an oath that he will be 480 the king forever, and let us make sure the murder of their brothers and their sons will be forgotten. Let them all be friends, just as before, and let them live in peace and in prosperity.”

Athena was already eager; at these words she swooped down from Olympus.

Meanwhile, they had finished dinner, and battle-scarred Odysseus said, “Somebody must go and see if they are coming near.” A son of Dolius obeyed and went. As he stepped out, he stood across the threshold, and he saw them all near to the house. At once his words took wings.
He told Odysseus,

490

“Those men are near!
We have to arm, and fast!”

They quickly armed.
Odysseus, his son and their two slaves made four, and Dolius had his six sons.
Laertes and old Dolius were also needed as fighters, though they had gray hair.
When all of them were dressed in gleaming bronze, they opened up the gates and went outside; Odysseus was leading them. Athena came near, disguised as Mentor. When he saw her, weathered Odysseus was glad and turned towards Telemachus and said,

495

500

“Now, son,
soon you will have experience of fighting in battle, the true test of worth. You must not shame your father’s family; for years we have been known across the world for courage and manliness.”

505

Telemachus inhaled,
then said, “Just watch me, Father, if you want to see my spirit. I will bring no shame onto your family. You should not speak of shame.”

510

Laertes, thrilled, cried out, “Ah, gods!
A happy day for me! My son and grandson are arguing about how tough they are!”

515

With glinting eyes, Athena stood beside him and said, “You are my favorite, Laertes.

Pray to the bright-eyed goddess and her father, then lift and hurl your spear.”

As she said this, 520

Athena breathed great energy inside him.
Laertes quickly raised and hurled the spear, and struck Eupheithes through his bronze-cheeked helmet, which did not stop the weapon; it pierced through.
Then with a thud he fell; his armor clanged 525 around him on the ground. Odysseus charged the front line, his radiant son beside him; they hacked with swords and curving spears. They would have killed them all and made sure none of them could go back home—but then Athena spoke. 530
Her voice held back the fighters.

“Ithacans!

Stop this destructive war; shed no more blood, and go your separate ways, at once!”

Her voice

struck them with pale green fear and made them drop their weapons. They were desperate to save 535 their lives, and they turned back towards the city.
Unwavering Odysseus let out a dreadful roar, then crouched and swooped upon them, just like an eagle flying from above.
But Zeus sent down a thunderbolt, which fell 540 in front of his own daughter, great Athena.
She looked at him with steely eyes and said,

“Odysseus, you are adaptable;
you always find solutions. Stop this war, or Zeus will be enraged at you.”

He was 545

glad to obey her. Then Athena made the warring sides swear solemn oaths of peace for future times—still in her guise as Mentor.

SAPPHO

born ca. 630 B.C.E.

Sappho is the only ancient Greek female author whose work survives in more than tiny fragments. She was an enormously talented poet, much admired in antiquity; a later poet called her the “tenth Muse.” In the third century B.C.E., scholars at the great library in Alexandria arranged her poems in nine books, of which the first contained more than a thousand lines. But what we have now are pitiful remnants: one (or possibly two) complete short poems, and a collection of quotations from her work by ancient writers, supplemented by bits and pieces written on ancient scraps of papyrus found in excavations in Egypt. Yet these fragments fully justify the enthusiasm of the ancient critics; Sappho’s poems (insofar as we can guess at their nature from the fragments) give us the most vivid evocation of the joys and sorrows of desire in all Greek literature.

About Sappho’s life we know almost nothing. She was born about 630 B.C.E. on the fertile island of Lesbos, off the coast of Asia Minor, and spent most of her life there. Her poems suggest that she was married and had a daughter—although we should never assume that Sappho’s “I” implies autobiography. It is difficult to find any evidence to answer the questions that we most want to ask. Were these poems performed for women only, or for mixed audiences? Was it common for women to compose poetry on ancient Lesbos? How did Sappho’s work win acceptance in the male-dominated world of ancient Greece? We simply do not know. We also know frustratingly little about ancient attitudes toward female same-sex relationships. In the nineteenth century, Sappho’s poems were the inspiration for the coinage of the modern term lesbian. But no equivalent term was used in the ancient world. Sappho’s poems evoke a world in which girls lived an intense communal life of their own, enjoying activities and festivals in which only women took part, in which they were fully engaged with one another. Beyond the evidence of the poems themselves, however, little remains to put these works into historical context.

What we do know, and what we must always bear in mind while reading these poems, is that they were composed not to be read on papyrus or in a book but to be performed by a group of dancing, singing women and girls (a “chorus”), to the accompaniment of musical instruments. Other poets of the period composed in the choral genre, including Alcaeus, a male contemporary who was also from Lesbos. The ancient Greek equivalent of the short, nonnarrative literary form we refer to as “lyric poetry” was literally lyric: it was sung to the lyre or cithara, ancestors of the modern guitar. It is not really poetry but the lyrics to songs whose music is lost. These songs evoke many vivid actions, emotions, and images, which were presumably dramatized by the dancers, who might well, for example, have acted out the swift journey of Aphrodite’s chariot in poem 1 [“Deathless Aphrodite of the spangled mind”], “whipping their wings down the sky.”

Sappho’s poems were produced almost two hundred years after the Homeric epics, and we can read them as offering a response, and perhaps a challenge, to the (mostly masculine) world of epic. The Iliad concentrates on the battlefield, where men fight and die, while the Odyssey shows us the struggles of a male warrior to rebuild his homeland in the aftermath of war. By contrast, Sappho's poems focus on women more than men, and on feelings more than actions. Like Homer, Sappho often refers to the physical world in vivid detail (the stars, the trees, the flowers, the sunlight), as well as to the Olympian gods, and to mythology. But she interprets these topics very differently. In poem 44, she uses the characters of the Iliad but concentrates on the marriage of Hector and Andromache rather than the war. Aphrodite, goddess of love and sex, seems more important to Sappho than Zeus, the father of the gods. Poem 16 offers another reinterpretation of the Trojan War, as a story not about men fighting but about a woman in love: "Helen—left behind / her most noble husband / and went sailing off to Troy." Sappho emphasizes beauty and personal choices, and suggests that love matters more than armies, and more even than home, family, parents, or children.

But Sappho's vision of love is anything but sentimental. Many of these poems evoke intense negative emotions: alienation, jealousy, and rage. In poem 31, for example, the speaker describes her overwhelming feelings as she watches the woman she loves talking to a man: she trembles, her heart races, she feels close to death. The precise clinical detail of the narrator, as she observes herself, adds to the vividness of this account of emotional breakdown. Sappho is able to describe feelings both from the outside and from the inside, and painfully evokes a sense of distance from the beloved—and from herself: "I don't know what I should do. There are two minds in me," she says in a line from a lost poem (51). In poem 58 the speaker is suffering from a different kind of alienation: watching young girls dance and sing, she stands aside, unable to participate, and bitterly regrets the loss of her own youth.

Sappho repeatedly invokes the goddess associated with sexual desire: Aphrodite. It may be tempting to read Aphrodite as simply a personification of the speaker's own desires. But Sappho presents her as a real and terrifying force in the universe, who may afflict the speaker with all the "bittersweet" agony of love, and who may also be invoked—as in poem 1—to serve her rage and aggression, acting as Sappho's own military "ally" in her desire to inflict pain on the girl who has hurt her.

Some passages of Sappho, including the famous account of jealousy, poem 31, were preserved through quotation by other ancient writers. But many of these poems survived only on scraps of papyrus, mostly dug up from the trash-heaps of the ancient Egyptian city of Oxyrhynchus. It is exciting that we have even this much Sappho: much of our present text was discovered as late as the nineteenth century. Poem 58 was discovered (supplementing a known fragment) in 2004 in the papier-mâché-type wrapping used on an Egyptian mummy. The final poems in our selection—the "Brothers" poem and the "Cypris" poem—were made public only in 2014, as a result of a new papyrus discovery. Most of the papyrus finds are torn and crumpled, so that words and whole lines are often missing from the poems. Some of these gaps can be filled in from our knowledge of Sappho's dialect and the strict meter in which she wrote. In poem 16, for instance, at the end of the third stanza and the beginning of the fourth, the mutilated papyrus tells us that someone or something led Helen astray, and there are traces of a word that seems to have described Helen. The name Cypris (the "Cyprian One," the love goddess Aphrodite) and phrases that mean "against her will" or "as soon as she saw him [Paris]" would fit the spaces and the meter. Uncertain as these supplements are, they could help determine our understanding of the poem. The publication of the “New Sappho” poems is an exciting reminder that there are new discoveries to be made, even in literature from over three thousand years ago. The new pieces of Sappho have also broadened our understanding of this great poet, who composed her songs about journeys, time, mythology, and family, as well as about love, alienation, and desire.

Deathless Aphrodite of the spangled mind,<sup>2</sup> child of Zeus, who twists lures, I beg you do not break with hard pains, O lady, my heart

but come here if ever before 5 you caught my voice far off and listening left your father's golden house and came,

yoking your car. And fine birds brought you, quick sparrows<sup>3</sup> over the black earth 10 whipping their wings down the sky through midair—

they arrived. But you, O blessed one, smiled in your deathless face and asked what (now again) I have suffered and why 15 (now again) I am calling out and what I want to happen most of all in my crazy heart. Whom should I persuade (now again) to lead you back into her love? Who, O Sappho, is wronging you? 20

For if she flees, soon she will pursue.
If she refuses gifts, rather will she give them.
If she does not love, soon she will love even unwilling.

Come to me now: loose me from hard 25 care and all my heart longs to accomplish, accomplish. You be my ally.

2. Or “of the spangled throne”; the variant manuscripts preserve both readings (in the Greek there is a single letter's difference between them). The word translated here as “spangled” usually refers to a surface shimmering with bright contrasting colors. The reader can choose whether to imagine a goddess seated in splendor on a highly wrought throne or a love goddess whose mind is shifting and fickle.

Some say an army of horsemen, others a host of infantry, others a fleet of ships is the most beautiful thing on the black earth. But I say it's whatever you love.

It's perfectly easy to make this clear 5 to everyone. For she who surpassed all in beauty—Helen—left behind her most noble husband

4. This and the following Sappho poems and fragments are translated by Philip Freeman.

5. Ellipses represent places where the papyrus on which the poem is preserved is torn, and words, half-words, or whole lines are missing.

6. Presumably Anactoria is a girlfriend. The name may connote "princess," since anax means "leader" or "king." Anactoria was also an alternative name for the city of Miletus, a powerful city-state in Asia Minor.

7. A wealthy and powerful non-Greek people in Asia Minor, with whom Sappho, living in Lesbos just off the coast, is evidently familiar. A generation or so later, the Lydians would be absorbed into the expanding Persian Empire, but in Sappho's time they were at the height of their prosperity.

8. The sons of Atreus are Menelaus and Agamemnon. In the Odyssey (3.133ff.) we find the story of the brothers quarreling after the fall of Troy, and according to Homer, Menelaus stopped to pray to Zeus on Lesbos while Agamemnon traveled separately. Sappho's poem suggests a different legend, in which both brothers together came to her island, and prayed to Hera and Dionysos (son of Thyone) as well as Zeus.

9. Thyone is the new name given to Dionysos's mortal mother, Semele, after she was rescued from Hades by her son and became an Olympian goddess associated with frenzy.

3. This and the following Sappho poems and fragments are translated by Philip Freeman. This poem is our only surviving example of Sappho’s narrative poetry. It is composed in the same meter as Homer’s epics, dactylic hexameter (unlike all Sappho’s other surviving work). It tells the story of the wedding of Hector, prince of Troy, and Andromache, characters famous in myth who feature in the Iliad. Some scholars believe this poem may have been composed for performance at a wedding.

the reference is hard to construct.

3. Larichus is also a brother of Sappho's, presumably younger than Charaxus.

4. Cypris is Aphrodite, goddess of love and sex. Presumably this is a single stanza from a much longer poem.

ANCIENT ATHENIAN DRAMA

Modern readers usually find Athenian drama easy to appreciate, but the original performance contexts of Greek drama were radically different from anything modern readers and theatergoers have experienced. The city festivals of Athens, at which all new comedies and tragedies were first performed, involved a mixture of things we usually regard as wholly separate: politics, religion, music, poetry, serious drama, slapstick, open-air spectacles, and dance. For the combination of drama with song and dance, in a popular format performed for large audiences, our closest analogy might be the Broadway musical. But Broadway shows usually take place indoors, and have no obvious connection to politics or religion. To get a sense of the strangeness of Athenian dramatic festivals, imagine a major public political event, like the inauguration of a new American president, combine it with a major religious gathering like an evangelical rally, a papal audience, or the Hajj to Mecca, then add to the mix a Thanksgiving Day parade (with all the floats) and a grand open-air music festival. The resulting hybrid would be a modern equivalent of the two main Athenian religious occasions that included major dramatic performances: the Great Dionysia and the Lernaia. Both festivals included tragedy and comedy, although tragedy was more central to the Dionysia, while comedy played a larger role at the Lernaia.

Both festivals were held in honor of the god Dionysus, who was associated with wine and, more generally, with overturning the rules and conventions of the normal world. Dionysus was a wild figure: he rode a chariot pulled by leopards, dressed in strange, effeminate clothing and an ivy crown, and was accompanied by ecstatic, crazy women (the maenads) and hairy, half-goat men with permanent erections called satyrs. The Athenians knew him as an exotic, foreign god who originated somewhere in Asia Minor before being incorporated in the Olympian pantheon. We should remember the subversive, outsider status of this god when reading Athenian drama.

We know very little about the origins of tragedy or comedy. The word comedy seems to come from komos, a Greek word denoting a drunken procession. Aristotle tells us that tragedy (tragoidia in Greek) means “goat song,” and suggests that the genre originated as part of a ritual in which a goat was sacrificed or offered as a prize. Sometime in the late sixth century B.C.E., rural celebrations in honor of Dionysus became an official, annual part of the urban festival calendar. Originally, the main entertainment was probably choruses of dancers, who sang hymns and competed for prizes; later, some form of tragedy and, later still, comedy were added to the program. Thespis, from whose name we get the term thespian—and about whom we know next to nothing—is traditionally said to have invented tragedy in the year 534 B.C.E. He “stepped out of the Chorus,” creating a part for a single actor who could talk back to the chorus. The invention of the individual actor, distinct from the group, was enormously important: it paved the way for the whole subsequent history of Western drama.

Tragedy was something new in the late sixth century, but contests of poetry in performance had long been a part of Athenian culture. At the largest city festival, the Panathenaia (“All-Athenian,” in honor of the city’s goddess, Athena), performers called rhapsodes recited parts of Homer’s Iliad and Odyssey; the best performers won prizes. The Homeric poems were an essential model for later drama. Aeschylus supposedly called his own work “slices from the feast of Homer.” It was not merely the plots of Greek tragedy that were “Homeric,” although like the Iliad and Odyssey many tragedies dealt with the heroes who fought in the Trojan War. Dramatists also learned from Homer how to create vivid dialogue and fast, exciting narrative, as well as sympathy for a range of different characters, Greek and foreigner alike.

Each year at the Great Dionysia, three tragic poets were chosen by the official city governor (the archon) to produce a tetralogy of plays for each day’s entertainment. Performances began at dawn and included three tragedies, which might or might not concentrate on a linked set of stories, followed by a lighter play featuring satyrs (a “satyr play”). A rich Athenian citizen put up the money to pay for the costs of each day’s performance, including purchase of costumes and masks, and training of the chorus members and actors. These producers prided themselves on their participation, and gloated if the performance they had financed won the competition: at least one backer tried to rig the results by making a night raid to destroy the gold crowns and costumes that had been ordered for his rival’s chorus to wear. Before the dramatic performances began, the tribute paid to the city of Athens by her allies was heaped up in the theater for all to see, and the orphans of Athenian men killed in war in the previous year marched in front of the audience, wearing armor provided at the expense of the city. Athenian drama itself can be seen as a comparable display, a demonstration to foreigners and to the Athenians themselves of the city’s artistic and intellectual riches, as well as a meditation on its vulnerability.

The only complete works of Greek drama that have survived are a small selection of the tragedies of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, and a few comedies by Aristophanes. But of course far more people composed plays in this period, some of which were probably excellent; there were other poets—such as Agathon, a tragedian who appears in Plato’s Symposium—who were awarded first prize in the competitions. We have just the names of most of these other dramatists, along with some titles and some tantalizing fragments.

Similarly, the scripts are all that survive of Greek drama, and wishful thinking leads us to imagine that what we have is the most important part: we tend to think of these plays simply as “literature,” words on a page. But the words must have formed only a small part of the total effect of the original performances. Those sitting in the upper areas of the theater may well not have been able to hear everything, despite the good acoustics of the theater. The music, gestures, costumes, props, and visual effects may well have had a larger impact on most audience members than any individual detail of phrasing. Writing the script was also a tiny part of the work of a dramatist. The poet was also the director, composer, and choreographer of the plays he created; in the earliest days of drama, the poets were probably also actors in their own work. The prizes were not awarded for writing, but for the work of coaching the actors and dancers: the usual phrase to describe what a dramatist does is “to teach a chorus.”

The theater of Dionysus, where the plays were performed, held at least 13,000 people, perhaps as many as 17,000—a number comparable to the seating available in New York’s Madison Square Garden. This figure represents a high proportion of the male citizen body, estimated to have been about forty or sixty thousand people—although the total population of Athens, including women, children, foreigners, and slaves, may have been ten times that large.

It is possible that a few women came to the theater in the fifth century; women were almost certainly in attendance by the fourth century. We do not know whether slaves were present. In any case, the majority of the audience consisted of male citizens. In the participatory democracy of fifth-century Athens, the whole citizen body was eligible to participate in policy making, and citizens were accustomed to meet together in public to determine military and domestic policy, at least once a month and usually more often. The structure of the dramatic festival was reminiscent of other political assemblies, where citizens sat to hear speeches on several sides of a case and made their decisions between competing sides.

The theater was an open-air venue, with seating in the round. The central space, called the orchestra (which means “dancing area”), lay at the lowest point of the valley; on the slopes of the hill, spectators sat on wooden benches, surrounding the performance area on three sides. At one end of the orchestra was a wooden platform or stage, with a wooden building on it (the skēnē), which could be used to represent whatever interior space was necessary for the play: a palace, a house, a cave, or any other type of structure. There were thus three possible ways for actors to come on and off stage: to the left or right of the stage, or through the doors of the building. Entrances and exits tend to be particularly important in Greek drama, because they took a long time; the audience would have been watching the characters make their way into the playing area before they actually reached the stage. When reading these plays, it is a good idea to pay particular attention to the moments when a new character comes on.

There were also two major structural devices that expanded the possibilities of the playing space. The ekkuklēma (“trolley” or “thing that rolls out”) was a wooden platform on wheels, which could be trundled out from the central doors of the skēnē, and was conventionally used to represent the interior space. This was an essential device by which dramatists could bring the events from indoors before the eyes of the outdoor audience. The second device was the mēchanē (“machine” or “device”), a pulley system that allowed for the appearance and disappearance of actors in the air, above the skēnē building. Using the mēchanē, playwrights could make a god suddenly appear in the air above the palace, as a literal deus ex māchinā (“god from the machine”), to resolve the twists of the plot.

All the actors who performed in Athenian drama were men—including those playing female parts. All actors wore masks. Tragedy and comedy both used a tiny number of actors for the speaking parts. In the first few decades of the century, there were only two actors; later, three actors were used. This meant that the same actors had to play multiple roles, appearing in different masks as the play required. The use of masks, as well as the open-air space, must have necessitated a very different style of acting from that of modern cinema, television, or stage. Facial expressions would have been invisible behind the mask, and were therefore irrelevant; instead, actors must have relied on gestures, body language, and a strongly projected voice.

The dialogue sections of ancient Athenian plays usually show two—occasionally three—characters in confrontation or discussion with one another. Dialogue may be free-flowing and apparently natural. But dramatists made use of two important dialogue techniques. One is the agon (“contest” or “struggle”), in which one character makes a long, sometimes legalistic speech, arguing a particular case, and a second character replies with another speech, putting the case against. The other is stichomythia (“line-speech”), in which characters speak just a single line each—allowing for a fast-paced, usually argumentative exchange.

Greek drama was always composed in verse, but not in the epic meter of Homer, the hexameter (a line with a six-part pattern). The rhythm of the dialogue elements was iambic (based on a fairly flexible pattern of alternating short and long syllables), which was supposed to be the verse form closest to normal speech (like the iambic pentameter used by Shakespeare). The choral passages, by contrast, were composed in extremely complex meters, designed to be sung and accompanied by elaborate choreography. Athenian drama thus combined two very different theatrical experiences, interspersing plot-driven, character-heavy dialogue with music, poetry, and dance.

The chorus was composed of twelve—later, fifteen—masked dancers, of whom only one, the “leader,” had a speaking role. This group is used in different ways by the different dramatists, and varies radically from play to play.

The chorus is often a group of inhabitants of the place where the action occurs: it can be used to represent the voice of the ordinary person or the word on the street—although it does not always express common sense, and it frequently fails to get things right. Sometimes the chorus listens sympathetically to the main characters, acting as an internal audience and allowing for the revelation of inner thoughts that might otherwise be hard for the dramatist to bring out. Sometimes, on the other hand, the chorus is either neutral or positively hostile toward the main characters. Choruses can be characters themselves, with their own biases and preoccupations.

The choral songs and dances can allow the dramatist to put the events of the play in a broader perspective: the chorus may take us back in time, looking to earlier events in the same myth, or tracing parallels between this story and others; or it may reflect on the ethical, theological, and metaphysical implications of the events at hand. The poet may also use the chorus to provide a break from the main narrative, a switch to an entirely different mood or perspective. Choral songs can increase the dramatic tension or surprise, as when a cheerful, optimistic song is followed by disaster.

Mutilation and violent death, by murder or suicide, accident, fate, or the gods, are frequent events in Greek tragedy. The threat of violence—which may or may not be averted—provides a strong element in the interest of these plays. But compared to modern television drama or action movies, there is little visible horror. Dead bodies are often displayed onstage, but the actual killing usually takes place offstage. The messenger speech is therefore one of the most important conventions of Athenian drama. Long, vivid, blow-by-blow accounts of offstage disasters allow the audience to imagine and visualize events that the dramatist cannot or will not bring onstage.

The plots of Greek tragedy focus on a few traditional story patterns, set in the distant past and in non-Athenian city-states: Argos, Thebes, or Troy. Although tragedians used preexisting stories, they felt free, within reason, to shape the myths in their own way; for instance, Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides created very different plays focused on the story of Electra, daughter of the murdered Agamemnon. Tragedy was often relevant in some way to contemporary concerns, but its political and social perspectives are never as explicit as those of comedy.

Since Greek plays were always performed at a religious festival, we might expect them to be more obviously “religious” than they seem at first blush. Comedians often bring gods on stage, but they are not treated in a markedly reverent way: for instance, Dionysus in Aristophanes’ Frogs is a craven coward with a flatulence problem. The power of the gods is usually a more serious issue in tragedy, but even here, modern readers may be surprised at how cruel and unreliable the Greek gods often seem to be. It is perhaps helpful to remember that Athenians of the fifth century—unlike most believers in modern monotheistic religions—saw no necessary connection between religion and morality. Gods are, by definition, immortal and powerful; they need not also be nice. Athenian drama was an act of service to the gods in general, and to Dionysus in particular, because it overturned the everyday world and explored the power of the imagination, showing—in Euripides’ words—“how god makes possible the unexpected.” By serving the gods, displaying the strange and surprising ways that divine forces operate on human lives, Athenian dramatists were also serving their audiences, creating dramas that were gripping, profound, and unpredictable: qualities that readers still appreciate in these works today.

SOPHOCLES

ca. 496–406 B.C.E.

The seven surviving plays of Sophocles are often considered the most perfect achievement of ancient Athens. They show us people—presented with psychological depth and subtlety—who stand apart from others, on the edges of their social groups. Sophocles invites us to ask what it means to be part of a family, part of a city, part of a team or an army, or part of the human race. Can we choose to embrace or reject our family, friends, and society, or do we have to accept the place to which we were born? Is it a gesture of heroism or folly to take a stand as an outsider? What should we do if forced to choose between our family and a wider social group? Sophocles’ thought-provoking and compelling dramas explore themes that are just as relevant today as they were in the fifth century B.C.E., and they provide the classic treatments of mythic figures, such as Oedipus and Antigone, who have been central to later Western culture.

LIFE AND TIMES

Sophocles had an unusually long, successful, productive, and apparently happy life. He was born at the start of the fifth century, around 496 B.C.E., in the village of Colonus, which was a short distance north of Athens. His family was probably fairly wealthy—his father may have owned a workshop producing armor, a particularly marketable product at this time of war—and Sophocles seems to have been well educated. An essential element in Greek boys' education at this time was studying the Homeric poems, and Sophocles obviously learned this lesson well; in later times, he was called the "most Homeric" of the three surviving Athenian tragedians. He was a good-looking, charming boy and a talented dancer. In 480, when he was about fifteen or sixteen, he was chosen to lead a group of naked boys who danced in the victory celebrations for Athens's defeat of the Persian navy at Salamis. The beginning of his public career thus coincided with his city's period of greatest glory and international prestige.

Athens became the major power in the Mediterranean world in the middle decades of the fifth century B.C.E., a period known as the golden or classical age. The most important political figure in the newly dominant city-state was Pericles, a statesman who was also Sophocles' personal friend and who particularly encouraged the arts. Pericles seems to have instituted various legal measures to enable the theater to flourish: for instance, rich citizens were obliged to provide funding for theater productions, and the less wealthy may have had their theater tickets subsidized.

The prosperity of Sophocles' city took a sharp turn for the worse around 431 B.C.E., when the poet would have been in his mid-sixties. The Peloponnesian War, between Athens and Sparta, began at that time and would last until after Sophocles' death. Soon after the outbreak of war, Sophocles' friend Pericles died in a terrible plague that afflicted the whole city. In the last decades of the century, the city became increasingly impoverished and demoralized by war.

Sophocles worked in the Athenian theater all his life. He made some important technical changes in dramatic productions, introducing scene painting and increasing the number of chorus members from twelve to fifteen. His most important innovation was bringing in a third actor (a "tritagonist"). This allowed for three-way dialogues, and for a drama that concentrates on the complex interactions and relationships of individuals with one another. The chorus in Sophocles' dramas became far less central to the plot than it had been in Aeschylus; this is part of the reason why Sophocles' plays may seem more modern to twenty-first-century readers and audiences.

Another quality that makes Sophocles particularly accessible to modern readers is his interest in realistic characterization. Sophocles' most memorable characters are intense, passionate, and often larger than life, but always fully human. They frequently adopt positions that seem extreme, but for which they have the best of motives. Sophocles' tragedies ask us to consider when and how it is right to compromise, and to measure the slim divide between concession and selling out. Clashes between stubborn heroism and the voice of moderation are found in all Sophocles' surviving plays.

Contemporaries gave Sophocles' talent its due. He won first prize at the Great Dionysia for the first time in 468 B.C.E., defeating his older rival, Aeschylus; he was still under thirty at the time. Sophocles would defeat Aeschylus several more times in the course of his career. His output was large: he composed over a hundred and twenty plays. The seven that survive include the three Theban plays, dealing with Oedipus and his family: Oedipus the King, Antigone, and Oedipus at Colonos. These were written at intervals of many years, and were never intended to be performed together. The other four surviving tragedies are Ajax, about a strongman hero who is driven mad by Athena; Trachiniae, about Heracles' agonizing death at the hands of his jealous wife Deineira (who had thought the poison she gave him was a love potion); Electra, which focuses on the unending grief and rage of Agamemnon's daughter after her father's murder; and Philoctetes, about the Greek embassy to persuade an embittered, wounded hero to return to battle in Troy. The dating of most of these plays is uncertain, although we know Philoctetes is a late play, composed in 409 B.C.E. The judges at the Great Dionysia loved Sophocles' work: he won first prize over twenty times, and never came lower than second.

Sophocles seems to have been equally popular as a person, known for his mellow, easygoing temperament, his religious piety, and his appreciation for the beauty of adolescent boys. We are told that he had "so much charm of character that he was loved everywhere, by everyone." He was friendly with the prominent intellectuals of his day, including the world's first historian, Herodotus. He participated in the political activity of the city; he served under Pericles as a treasurer in 443 and 442 B.C.E., and was elected as a general under him in 441. After the Sicilian disaster in 413, in which Athens lost enormous numbers of men and ships, Sophocles—then in his eighties—was one of ten men elected to an emergency group created for policy formation. Sophocles' participation in public life suggests that he was seen as a trustworthy and wise member of the community. Sophocles was married and had five sons, one of whom, Iophon, became a tragedian himself.

Sophocles lived to advanced old age and was over ninety when he died.

OEDIPUS THE KING

Many first-time readers of Oedipus the King will already know the shocking secret that Oedipus eventually discovers: he killed his father and married his mother, without knowing what he was doing. The mythical background to this play is familiar to readers today, and would have been well known, in its broad outlines, to Sophocles' original audience. This is a drama not of surprise but of suspense: we watch Oedipus uncover the buried truth about himself and his parentage, of which he, unlike us, is ignorant. The mystery, gradually revealed to the spectators in the course of the play, is not what the king has done, but how he will discover what he has done, and how he will respond to this terrible new knowledge.

The legend holds that Laius (Laios), son of Labdacus and king of Thebes, learned long ago from the Delphic oracle (sacred to Apollo) that his son would kill him. When Laius had a son by his wife, Jocasta (Jokasta), he gave the baby to a shepherd to be exposed on Mount Cithaeron. Exposure, a fairly common practice in the ancient world, involved leaving a baby out in some wild place, presumably to die; it allowed parents to dispose of unwanted children without incurring blood guilt. Laius increased the odds against the child's survival by piercing and binding his feet, so there was no chance he could crawl away. But the shepherd felt sorry for the boy and saved him. He was adopted by the childless king and queen of Corinth, Polybus and Merope, and grew up believing himself to be their son.

One day another oracle warned Oedipus that he would kill his father and marry his mother. Oedipus fled Corinth in the direction of Thebes, to avoid this fate. At a place where three paths crossed, he encountered his real father, Laius, without knowing who he was; they quarreled, and Oedipus killed Laius. When he reached Thebes, he found the city oppressed by a dreadful female monster, a Sphinx—part human, part lion, often also depicted in Greek art with the wings of an eagle and the tail of a snake. The Sphinx refused to let anybody into the city unless they could answer her riddle: “What walks on four legs in the morning, two legs at noon, and three legs in the evening?” She strangled and devoured all travelers who failed to answer the riddle. But Oedipus gave the right answer: “Man.” (Human beings crawl on all fours in infancy, walk on two feet in adulthood, and use a cane in old age.) The Sphinx was defeated, and Oedipus was welcomed into the city as a savior. He married the newly widowed queen, Jocasta, and took over the throne.

When Sophocles’ play begins, Oedipus has been ruling Thebes successfully for many years, and has four children by Jocasta, two sons and two daughters. But a new trouble is now afflicting the city. Plague has come to Thebes, and the dying inhabitants are searching for the reason why the gods are angry with the city.

The city of Athens suffered a terrible plague in 429 B.C.E., and the play may well have been composed and performed soon afterward—although the dating is uncertain and disputed. Sophocles certainly seems to invite comparisons between the real Athens and the mythical Thebes. Oedipus himself can be seen as a typical fifth-century Athenian: he is optimistic, irascible, self-confident, both pious and skeptical in his attitudes toward religion, and a committed believer in the power of human reason.

In his Poetics, the philosopher Aristotle describes this play as the finest of all Greek tragedies. It includes two plot patterns that he thought were essential to good drama: a reversal of fortune (peripeteia), and a recognition (anagnorisis). Aristotle famously cites Oedipus as an example of someone whose fall into misfortune is the result not of bad deeds or evil character, but of some “mistake”—the Greek word is hamartia. Later critics applied the quite different concept of a “tragic flaw” to Oedipus, suggesting that we are supposed to see the disastrous events of the drama as somehow the king’s own fault. An important consideration against this reading is that in Oedipus at Colonus, a later play about the last days of Oedipus, Sophocles makes his hero give a compelling self-defense: “How is my nature evil— / if all I did was to return a blow?” There is a clear distinction in Greek thought between moral culpability—which is attached to deliberate, conscious actions—and religious pollution, which may afflict even those who are morally innocent. Readers must decide for themselves how far they think Sophocles goes in presenting his Oedipus as a sympathetic or even admirable figure.

Another popular approach to the play has been to see it as a classic “tragedy of fate,” in which a man is brought low by destiny or the gods. Here, we need to distinguish the myth—which can plausibly be seen as a story about the inevitable unfolding of divine will—from Sophocles’ treatment of the myth in his play, which suggests a more complex relationship between destiny and human action. Before Sophocles, Aeschylus had produced a trilogy that dealt with the family of Laius and Oedipus. This does not survive, but it is likely that it showed the gradual fulfillment of an inherited curse. In Sophocles’ play, our attention is focused less on the original events and their causes (the killing of Laius and the marriage to Jocasta) than on the process by which Oedipus uncovers what he has done.

Sophocles multiplies the number of oracles and messengers in the story, and Apollo—the god associated with prophecy, poetry, and interpretation, as well as with light and the sun—presides over the relentless unfolding of the truth. Oracles are only one of many types of riddling, ambiguous, or ambivalent language used in the play, which is concerned with all kinds of interpretation. Moments of dramatic irony, when the audience hears a meaning of which the speaker is unaware, are another important reminder that words may have more than one sense. For instance, Oedipus vows to fight in defense of Laius “as for my father”—speaking more truly than he knows. The interplay between literal and metaphorical meanings forms another essential technique in the play. Sophocles creates a relationship between literal and metaphorical blindness, between the light of the sun and the light of insight, between Oedipus as “father” of his people and as real father to his own siblings, and between sickness as a physical affliction and as a metaphor for pollution.

The riddle of the Sphinx defines humanity by the number of feet we use at different points in our lives. Sophocles seems to suggest that the name Oedipus is closely associated with feet: it can be read either as “Know-Foot” (from the verb oida, “to know,” and pous, “foot”—an appropriate name for the man who solved the Sphinx’s riddle), or as “Swell-Foot” (from the verb oidao, to swell—a reminder of the baby Oedipus’s wounded feet). The first interpretation of his name makes Oedipus seem like an Everyman figure, a representative of all humanity: he is the one who truly understands the human condition. The second reminds us of the ways in which Oedipus is not like us: his feet mark the fact that he was cast out by his parents, rejected from his city, and that he has, unwittingly, done things that seem to make it impossible for him to be part of any human community.

Sigmund Freud famously claimed that the Oedipus myth represents a psychological phenomenon, the “Oedipus complex,” which involves the (supposed) desire of all boys to kill their fathers and marry their mothers. But Sophocles’ Oedipus does not suffer from Freud’s complex: his terrible actions are committed in total ignorance, not through an unconscious desire for patricide or sex with his mother. Another way to think of Sophocles’ Oedipus is as a hero who, like Odysseus, struggles to find his way back home after many wanderings and encounters with terrible monsters—but finds himself in a perverted version of the homecoming story, in which the arrival is not the end but the beginning of a nightmare.

A play whose secret you already know might seem unlikely to be interesting. But it is impossible to be bored by Oedipus the King. The plot races to its terrible conclusion with the twisting, breakneck pace of a thrilling murder mystery, while the contradictory figure of Oedipus himself—the blind rationalist, the polluted king, the killer of his father, the son and husband of Jocasta, the hunter and the hunted, the stranger in his own home—is a commanding presence who dominates the stage even when he can no longer see.

OEDIPUS

Children, young sons and daughters of old Cadmus, why do you sit here with your suppliant crowns?<sup>3</sup>

The town is heavy with a mingled burden of sounds and smells, of groans and hymns and incense;

I did not think it fit that I should hear of this from messengers but came myself,—

I Oedipus whom all men call the Great.

[He turns to the PRIEST.]

You're old and they are young; come, speak for them.

What do you fear or want, that you sit here suppliant? Indeed I'm willing to give all that you may need; I would be very hard should I not pity suppliants like these.

PRIEST

O ruler of my country, Oedipus,

you see our company around the altar;

you see our ages; some of us, like these,

who cannot yet fly far, and some of us

heavy with age; these children are the chosen among the young, and I the priest of Zeus.

Within the marketplace sit others crowned with suppliant garlands, at the double shrine of Pallas and the temple where Ismenus<sup>4</sup> gives oracles by fire. King, you yourself have seen our city reeling like a wreck already; it can scarcely lift its prow out of the depths, out of the bloody surf.

A blight is on the fruitful plants of the earth,

A blight is on the cattle in the fields,

a blight is on our women that no children are born to them; a god<sup>5</sup> that carries fire, a deadly pestilence, is on our town, 30 strikes us and spares not, and the house of Cadmus is emptied of its people while black Death grows rich in groaning and in lamentation.

 We have not come as suppliants to this altar because we thought of you as of a god, 35 but rather judging you the first of men in all the chances of this life and when we mortals have to do with more than man.
 You came and by your coming saved our city, freed us from tribute which we paid of old 40 to the Sphinx,<sup>6</sup> cruel singer. This you did in virtue of no knowledge we could give you, in virtue of no teaching; it was a god that aided you, men say, and you are held with the god's assistance to have saved our lives. 45 Now Oedipus, Greatest in all men's eyes, here falling at your feet we all entreat you, find us some strength for rescue.
 Perhaps you'll hear a wise word from some god, perhaps you will learn something from a man 50 (for I have seen that for the skilled of practice the outcome of their counsels live the most).
 Noblest of men, go, and raise up our city, go,—and give heed. For now this land of ours calls you its savior since you saved it once. 55
 So, let us never speak about your reign as of a time when first our feet were set secure on high, but later fell to ruin.
 Raise up our city, save it and raise it up.
 Once you have brought us luck with happy omen; 60 be no less now in fortune.
 If you will rule this land, as now you rule it, better to rule it full of men than empty.
 For neither tower nor ship is anything when empty, and none live in it together. 65

OEDIPUS I pity you, children. You have come full of longing, but I have known the story before you told it only too well. I know you are all sick, yet there is not one of you, sick though you are,

5. The University of Chicago Press's original version of the translation uses capital G for god here, and repeatedly (e.g., again in the other instances of the word in this speech). This has been altered to avoid the implication of monotheism; ancient Greek texts often refer to "a god" or "the god" in the singular, especially when the speaker may not know which of the many gods has been at work.

6. Winged female monster who terrorized Thebes until her riddle was finally answered by Oedipus. The riddle comes in different variants and is never cited by Sophocles, but one common version goes: "What walks on four feet in the morning, two at noon, and three at night?" Oedipus answered, "Man," because humans crawl as babies, walk as adults, and hobble with a stick in old age.

that is as sick as I myself. 70
 Your several sorrows each have single scope and touch but one of you. My spirit groans for city and myself and you at once.
 You have not roused me like a man from sleep;
 know that I have given many tears to this, 75 gone many ways wandering in thought, but as I thought I found only one remedy and that I took. I sent Menoeceus' son Creon, Jocasta's brother, to Apollo, to his Pythian temple,<sup>7</sup> 80 that he might learn there by what act or word I could save this city. As I count the days, it vexes me what ails him; he is gone far longer than he needed for the journey.
 But when he comes, then, may I prove a villain, 85
 if I shall not do all the god commands.

PRIEST Thanks for your gracious words. Your servants here signal that Creon is this moment coming.

OEDIPUS His face is bright. O holy Lord Apollo, grant that his news too may be bright for us 90 and bring us safety.

PRIEST It is happy news,
 I think, for else his head would not be crowned with sprigs of fruitful laurel.

OEDIPUS We will know soon, he's within hail. Lord Creon, my good brother, 95 what is the word you bring us from the god?

[CREON enters.]

CREON A good word,—for things hard to bear themselves if in the final issue all is well
 I count complete good fortune.

OEDIPUS What do you mean?
 What you have said so far 100 leaves me uncertain whether to trust or fear.

CREON If you will hear my news before these others
 I am ready to speak, or else to go within.

OEDIPUS Speak it to all;
 the grief I bear, I bear it more for these 105 than for my own heart.

CREON I will tell you, then,
 what I heard from the god.
 King Phoebus<sup>8</sup> in plain words commanded us to drive out a pollution from our land,

7. Apollo is the “god from the shrine of Pytho” (line 175). Pytho was the site of Apollo's oracle, and was also known as Delphi; hence the use of “Delian Healer” in line 178.

8. I.e., Apollo, the god associated with archery, sunlight, poetry, prophecy, healing, and plague. His arrows could cause disease, as they do in the beginning of the Iliad.

- pollution grown ingrained within the land;
drive it out, said the god, not cherish it, till it's past cure. 110
- OEDIPUS           What is the rite of purification? How shall it be done?
- CREON   By banishing a man, or expiation of blood by blood, since it is murder guilt 115 which holds our city in this destroying storm.
- OEDIPUS   Who is this man whose fate the god pronounces?
- CREON   My Lord, before you piloted the state
we had a king called Laius.
- OEDIPUS   I know of him by hearsay. I have not seen him. 120
- CREON   The god commanded clearly: let someone punish with force this dead man's murderers.
- OEDIPUS   Where are they in the world? Where would a trace of this old crime be found? It would be hard to guess where.
- CREON           The clue is in this land; 125 that which is sought is found;
the unheeded thing escapes:
so said the god.
- OEDIPUS           Was it at home, or in the country that death came upon him, or in another country travelling? 130
- CREON   He went, he said himself, upon an embassy, but never returned when he set out from home.
- OEDIPUS   Was there no messenger, no fellow traveller who knew what happened? Such a one might tell something of use. 135
- CREON   They were all killed save one. He fled in terror and he could tell us nothing in clear terms of what he knew, nothing, but one thing only.
- OEDIPUS   What was it?
If we could even find a slim beginning 140 in which to hope, we might discover much.
- CREON   This man said that the robbers they encountered were many and the hands that did the murder were many; it was no man's single power.
- OEDIPUS   How could a robber dare a deed like this 145 were he not helped with money from the city, money and treachery?
- CREON           That indeed was thought.
But Laius was dead and in our trouble there was none to help.
- OEDIPUS   What trouble was so great to hinder you 150 inquiring out the murder of your king?
- CREON   The riddling Sphinx induced us to neglect mysterious crimes and rather seek solution of troubles at our feet.

OEDIPUS I will bring this to light again. King Phoebus fittingly took this care about the dead, and you too fittingly.
 And justly you will see in me an ally,
 a champion of my country and the god.
 For when I drive pollution from the land
 I will not serve a distant friend's advantage, but act in my own interest. Whoever he was that killed the king may readily wish to dispatch me with his murderous hand;
 so helping the dead king I help myself.

Come, children, take your suppliant boughs and go; up from the altars now. Call the assembly and let it meet upon the understanding that I'll do everything. God will decide whether we prosper or remain in sorrow.
 PRIEST Rise, children—it was this we came to seek,
 which of himself the king now offers us.
 May Phoebus who gave us the oracle come to our rescue and stay the plague.

[Exeunt all but the CHORUS.]

CHORUS STROPHE What is the sweet spoken word of the god from the shrine of Pytho rich in gold that has come to glorious Thebes?
 I am stretched on the rack of doubt, and terror and trembling hold my heart, O Delian Healer, and I worship full of fears for what doom you will bring to pass, new or renewed in the revolving years.
 Speak to me, immortal voice, child of golden Hope.

ANTISTROPHE First I call on you, Athene,<sup>9</sup> deathless daughter
 of Zeus,
 and Artemis,<sup>1</sup> Earth Upholder, who sits in the midst of the marketplace in the throne which men call Fame,
 and Phoebus, the Far Shooter, three averters of Fate, come to us now, if ever before, when ruin rushed upon the state, you drove destruction's flame away out of our land.

STROPHE Our sorrows defy number;
 all the ship's timbers are rotten;
 taking of thought is no spear for the driving away of the plague.
 There are no growing children in this famous land;
 there are no women bearing the pangs of childbirth.
 You may see them one with another, like birds swift on the wing,

9. I.e., Athena.

1. Sister of Apollo; goddess associated with hunting, childbirth, the moon, and protecting the weak.

quicker than fire unmastered, speeding away to the coast of the western god. 195

ANTISTROPHE In the unnumbered deaths of its people the city dies;
those children that are born lie dead on the naked earth unpitied, spreading contagion of death; and grey-haired mothers and wives 200
everywhere stand at the altar's edge, suppliant, moaning; the hymn to the healing god rings out but with it the wailing voices are blended.

From these our sufferings grant us, O golden Daughter of Zeus, glad-faced deliverance.

STROPHE There is no clash of brazen shields but our fight is with the war god, 205
a war god ringed with the cries of men, a savage god who burns us; grant that he turn in racing course backwards out of our country's bounds to the great palace of Amphitrite or where the waves of the Thracian sea<sup>2</sup> deny the stranger safe anchorage.

Whatsoever escapes the night at last the light of day revisits; 210 so smite the war god, Father Zeus, beneath your thunderbolt, for you are the Lord of the lightning, the lightning that carries fire.

ANTISTROPHE And your unconquered arrow shafts, winged by the golden corded bow, 215
Lycean King,<sup>3</sup> I beg to be at our side for help; and the gleaming torches of Artemis with which she scourges the Lycean hills,
and I call on the god with the turban of gold, who gave his name to this country of ours, the Bacchic god<sup>4</sup> with the wind-flushed face, Evian One, who travel 220 with the Maenad company,<sup>5</sup> combat the god that burns us with your torch of pine;
for the god that is our enemy is a god unhonoured among the gods.
[OEDIPUS returns.]

OEDIPUS For what you ask me—if you will hear my words, 225 and hearing welcome them and fight the plague, you will find strength and lightening of your load.
Hark to me; what I say to you, I say

2. Northernmost part of the Aegean Sea where it borders on Thrace in northern Greece. "Amphitrite": sea goddess and consort of Poseidon, god of the seas.

3. Common epithet for Apollo.

4. Dionysus, god of wine, theater, and madness, is closely associated with Thebes, since his mother, Semele, was a princess of Thebes. He is called "Evian One" from the traditional ritual cry made by his followers: "Evoi! Evoi!"

5. Dionysus's wild female followers.

as one that is a stranger to the story as stranger to the deed. For I would not 230 be far upon the track if I alone were tracing it without a clue. But now, since after all was finished, I became a citizen among you, citizens—now I proclaim to all the men of Thebes: 235 who so among you knows the murderer by whose hand Laius, son of Labdacus, died—I command him to tell everything to me,—yes, though he fears himself to take the blame on his own head; for bitter punishment 240 he shall have none, but leave this land unharmed.
 Or if he knows the murderer, another,
 a foreigner, still let him speak the truth.
 For I will pay him and be grateful, too.
 But if you shall keep silence, if perhaps 245 some one of you, to shield a guilty friend, or for his own sake shall reject my words—hear what I shall do then:
 I forbid that man, whoever he be, my land, my land where I hold sovereignty and throne; 250 and I forbid any to welcome him or cry him greeting or make him a sharer in sacrifice or offering to the gods, or give him water for his hands to wash.
 I command all to drive him from their homes, 255 since he is our pollution, as the oracle of Pytho's god proclaimed him now to me.
 So I stand forth a champion of the god and of the man who died.
 Upon the murderer I invoke this curse— 260 whether he is one man and all unknown, or one of many—may he wear out his life in misery to miserable doom!
 If with my knowledge he lives at my hearth
 I pray that I myself may feel my curse. 265
 On you I lay my charge to fulfill all this for me, for the god, and for this land of ours destroyed and blighted, by the god forsaken.

Even were this no matter of god's ordinance it would not fit you so to leave it lie, 270 unpurified, since a good man is dead and one that was a king. Search it out.
 Since I am now the holder of his office, and have his bed and wife that once was his,
 and had his line not been unfortunate 275 we would have common children—(fortune leaped upon his head)—because of all these things,

- I fight in his defence as for my father, and I shall try all means to take the murderer of Laius the son of Labdacus 280 the son of Polydorus and before him of Cadmus and before him of Agenor.<sup>6</sup> Those who do not obey me, may the gods grant no crops springing from the ground they plough nor children to their women! May a fate 285 like this, or one still worse than this consume them!
 For you whom these words please, the other Thebans, may Justice as your ally and all the gods live with you, blessing you now and for ever!
- CHORUS As you have held me to my oath, I speak: 290
 I neither killed the king nor can declare the killer; but since Phoebus set the quest it is his part to tell who the man is.
- OEDIPUS Right; but to put compulsion on the gods against their will—no man can do that. 295
- CHORUS May I then say what I think second best?
- OEDIPUS If there's a third best, too, spare not to tell it.
- CHORUS I know that what the Lord Teiresias sees, is most often what the Lord Apollo sees. If you should inquire of this from him 300 you might find out most clearly.
- OEDIPUS Even in this my actions have not been sluggard.
 On Creon's word I have sent two messengers and why the prophet is not here already I have been wondering.
- CHORUS His skill apart 305
 there is besides only an old faint story.
- OEDIPUS What is it?
 I look at every story.
- CHORUS It was said that he was killed by certain wayfarers.
- OEDIPUS I heard that, too, but no one saw the killer. 310
- CHORUS Yet if he has a share of fear at all, his courage will not stand firm, hearing your curse.
- OEDIPUS The man who in the doing did not shrink will fear no word.
- CHORUS Here comes his prosecutor: led by your men the godly prophet comes 315 in whom alone of mankind truth is native.
- [Enter TEIRESIAS, led by a little boy.]
- OEDIPUS Teiresias, you are versed in everything, things teachable and things not to be spoken, things of the heaven and earth-creeping things.

6. Cadmus, founder and first king of Thebes, was the son of Agenor. Polydorus was Cadmus's son and father of Labdacus, who was father of Laius.

- You have no eyes but in your mind you know with what a plague our city is afflicted. 320
 My lord, in you alone we find a champion, in you alone one that can rescue us.
 Perhaps you have not heard the messengers, but Phoebus sent in answer to our sending 325 an oracle declaring that our freedom from this disease would only come when we should learn the names of those who killed King Laius, and kill them or expel from our country.
 Do not begrudge us oracles from birds, 330 or any other way of prophecy within your skill; save yourself and the city, save me; redeem the debt of our pollution that lies on us because of this dead man.
 We are in your hands; pains are most nobly taken 335 to help another when you have means and power.
- TEIRESIAS Alas, how terrible is wisdom when it brings no profit to the man that's wise!
 This I knew well, but had forgotten it, else I would not have come here.
- OEDIPUS What is this? 340
 How sad you are now you have come!
- TEIRESIAS Let me go home. It will be easiest for us both to bear our several destinies to the end if you will follow my advice.
- OEDIPUS You'd rob us of this your gift of prophecy? You talk 345 as one who had no care for law nor love for Thebes who reared you.
- TEIRESIAS Yes, but I see that even your own words miss the mark; therefore I must fear for mine.
- OEDIPUS For god's sake if you know of anything, 350 do not turn from us; all of us kneel to you, all of us here, your suppliants.
- TEIRESIAS All of you here know nothing. I will not bring to the light of day my troubles, mine—rather than call them yours.
- OEDIPUS What do you mean? 355
 You know of something but refuse to speak.
 Would you betray us and destroy the city?
- TEIRESIAS I will not bring this pain upon us both, neither on you nor on myself. Why is it you question me and waste your labour? I 360 will tell you nothing.
- OEDIPUS You would provoke a stone! Tell us, you villain, tell us, and do not stand there quietly unmoved and balking at the issue.

- TEIRESIAS You blame my temper but you do not see your own that lives within you;<sup>7</sup> it is me you chide. 365
- OEDIPUS Who would not feel his temper rise at words like these with which you shame our city?
- TEIRESIAS Of themselves things will come, although I hide them and breathe no word of them. 370
- OEDIPUS Since they will come tell them to me.
- TEIRESIAS I will say nothing further.
Against this answer let your temper rage as wildly as you will.
- OEDIPUS Indeed I am so angry I shall not hold back a jot of what I think. For I would have you know 375
I think you were complotter of the deed and doer of the deed save in so far as for the actual killing. Had you had eyes I would have said alone you murdered him. 380
- TEIRESIAS Yes? Then I warn you faithfully to keep the letter of your proclamation and from this day forth to speak no word of greeting to these nor me; you are the land's pollution.
- OEDIPUS How shamelessly you started up this taunt!
How do you think you will escape? 385
- TEIRESIAS I have.
I have escaped; the truth is what I cherish and that's my strength.
- OEDIPUS And who has taught you truth?
Not your profession surely!
- TEIRESIAS You have taught me, for you have made me speak against my will. 390
- OEDIPUS Speak what? Tell me again that I may learn it better.
- TEIRESIAS Did you not understand before or would you provoke me into speaking?
- OEDIPUS I did not grasp it, not so to call it known. Say it again.
- TEIRESIAS I say you are the murderer of the king whose murderer you seek. 395
- OEDIPUS Not twice you shall say calumnies like this and stay unpunished.
- TEIRESIAS Shall I say more to tempt your anger more?
- OEDIPUS As much as you desire; it will be said in vain. 400
- TEIRESIAS I say that with those you love best you live in foulest shame unconsciously

7. "Temper" in the original Greek is a feminine noun, and there is a veiled reference to the one "that lives within you," i.e., Jocasta.

and do not see where you are in calamity.

OEDIPUS Do you imagine you can always talk like this, and live to laugh at it hereafter? 405

TEIRESIAS Yes, if the truth has anything of strength.

OEDIPUS It has, but not for you; it has no strength for you because you are blind in mind and ears as well as in your eyes.

TEIRESIAS You are a poor wretch to taunt me with the very insults which 410 everyone soon will heap upon yourself.

OEDIPUS Your life is one long night so that you cannot hurt me or any other who sees the light.

TEIRESIAS It is not fate that I should be your ruin, Apollo is enough; it is his care 415 to work this out.

OEDIPUS Was this your own design or Creon's?

TEIRESIAS Creon is no hurt to you,
but you are to yourself.

OEDIPUS Wealth, sovereignty, and skill outmatching skill for the contrivance of an envied life! 420

Great store of jealousy fill your treasury chests, if my friend Creon, friend from the first and loyal, thus secretly attacks me, secretly desires to drive me out and secretly suborns this juggling, trick-devising quack, 425 this wily beggar who has only eyes for his own gains, but blindness in his skill.

For, tell me, where have you seen clear, Teiresias, with your prophetic eyes? When the dark singer, the Sphinx, was in your country, did you speak word of deliverance to its citizens? 430

And yet the riddle's answer was not the province of a chance comer. It was a prophet's task and plainly you had no such gift of prophecy from birds nor otherwise from any god 435 to glean a word of knowledge. But I came, Oedipus, who knew nothing, and I stopped her.
I solved the riddle by my wit alone.

Mine was no knowledge got from birds. And now you would expel me, 440 because you think that you will find a place by Creon's throne. I think you will be sorry, both you and your accomplice, for your plot to drive me out. And did I not regard you as an old man, some suffering would have taught you that what was in your heart was treason. 445

CHORUS We look at this man's words and yours, my king, and we find both have spoken them in anger.

- We need no angry words but only thought how we may best hit the god's meaning for us. 450
- TEIRESIAS If you are king, at least I have the right no less to speak in my defence against you.
 Of that much I am master. I am no slave of yours, but Loxias,<sup>8</sup> and so I shall not enroll myself with Creon for my patron. 455 Since you have taunted me with being blind, here is my word for you.
 You have your eyes but see not where you are in sin, nor where you live, nor whom you live with.
 Do you know who your parents are? Unknowing 460 you are an enemy to kith and kin in death, beneath the earth, and in this life.
 A deadly footed, double striking curse, from father and mother both, shall drive you forth out of this land, with darkness on your eyes, 465 that now have such straight vision. Shall there be a place will not be harbour to your cries, a corner of Cithaeron<sup>9</sup> will not ring in echo to your cries, soon, soon,— when you shall learn the secret of your marriage, 470 which steered you to a haven in this house,— haven no haven, after lucky voyage?
 And of the multitude of other evils establishing a grim equality between you and your children, you know nothing. 475
 So, muddy with contempt my words and Creon's!
 Misery shall grind no man as it will you.
- OEDIPUS Is it endurable that I should hear such words from him? Go and a curse go with you!
 Quick, home with you! Out of my house at once! 480
- TEIRESIAS I would not have come either had you not called me.
- OEDIPUS I did not know then you would talk like a fool—or it would have been long before I called you.
- TEIRESIAS I am a fool then, as it seems to you—but to the parents who have bred you, wise. 485
- OEDIPUS What parents? Stop! Who are they of all the world?
- TEIRESIAS This day will show your birth and will destroy you.
- OEDIPUS How needlessly your riddles darken everything.
- TEIRESIAS But it's in riddle answering you are strongest.
- OEDIPUS Yes. Taunt me where you will find me great. 490
- TEIRESIAS It is this very luck that has destroyed you.
- OEDIPUS I do not care, if it has saved this city.
- TEIRESIAS Well, I will go. Come, boy, lead me away.
- OEDIPUS Yes, lead him off. So long as you are here,

8. Loxias is a title of Apollo.

9. Mountain range near Thebes, where Oedipus was left to die as a baby.

you'll be a stumbling block and a vexation; 495 once gone, you will not trouble me again.

TEIRESIAS I have said

what I came here to say not fearing your countenance: there is no way you can hurt me.
 I tell you, king, this man, this murderer (whom you have long declared you are in search of, 500 indicting him in threatening proclamation as murderer of Laius)—he is here.

In name he is a stranger among citizens but soon he will be shown to be a citizen true native Theban, and he'll have no joy 505 of the discovery: blindness for sight and beggary for riches his exchange, he shall go journeying to a foreign country tapping his way before him with a stick.
 He shall be proved father and brother both 510 to his own children in his house; to her that gave him birth, a son and husband both;
 a fellow sower in his father's bed with that same father that he murdered.
 Go within, reckon that out, and if you find me 515 mistaken, say I have no skill in prophecy.

[Exeunt separately TEIRESIAS and OEDIPUS.]

CHORUS STROPHE Who is the man proclaimed by Delphi's prophetic rock as the bloody-handed murderer, the doer of deeds that none dare name? 520
 Now is the time for him to run with a stronger foot than Pegasus<sup>1</sup> for the child of Zeus leaps in arms upon him with fire and the lightning bolt, 525 and terribly close on his heels are the Fates that never miss.

ANTISTROPHE Lately from snowy Parnassus<sup>2</sup> clearly the voice flashed forth, bidding each Theban track him down, 530
 the unknown murderer.
 In the savage forests he lurks and in the caverns like
 the mountain bull.
 He is sad and lonely, and lonely his feet 535 that carry him far from the navel of earth;<sup>3</sup> but its prophecies, ever living, flutter around his head.

1. Divine winged horse.

2. Mountain in central Greece near Delphi and thus sacred to Apollo.

3. Delphi was imagined to be the center of the earth and hence its navel.

STROPHE The augur has spread confusion, terrible confusion; 540
 I do not approve what was said nor can I deny it.
 I do not know what to say;
 I am in a flutter of foreboding;
 I never heard in the present 545 nor past of a quarrel between the sons of Labdacus and Polybus,<sup>4</sup> that I might bring as proof in attacking the popular fame of Oedipus, seeking 550 to take vengeance for undiscovered death in the line of Labdacus.

ANTISTROPHE Truly Zeus and Apollo are wise and in human things all knowing;
 but amongst men there is no 555 distinct judgment, between the prophet and me—which of us is right.
 One man may pass another in wisdom but I would never agree with those that find fault with the king 560 till I should see the word proved right beyond doubt. For once in visible form the Sphinx came on him and all of us saw his wisdom and in that test 565 he saved the city. So he will not be condemned by my mind.

[Enter CREON.]

CREON Citizens, I have come because I heard deadly words spread about me, that the king accuses me. I cannot take that from him.
 If he believes that in these present troubles 570
 he has been wronged by me in word or deed I do not want to live on with the burden of such a scandal on me. The report injures me doubly and most vitally—for I'll be called a traitor to my city 575 and traitor also to my friends and you.

CHORUS Perhaps it was a sudden gust of anger that forced that insult from him, and no judgment.

CREON But did he say that it was in compliance with schemes of mine that the seer told him lies? 580

CHORUS Yes, he said that, but why, I do not know.

CREON Were his eyes straight in his head? Was his mind right when he accused me in this fashion?

4. Polybus is Oedipus's adoptive father, the king of Corinth, husband of Merope.

CHORUS I do not know; I have no eyes to see what princes do. Here comes the king himself. 585

[Enter OEDIPUS.]

OEDIPUS You, sir, how is it you come here? Have you so much brazen-faced daring that you venture in my house although you are proved manifestly the murderer of that man, and though you tried, openly, highway robbery of my crown? 590

For god's sake, tell me what you saw in me, what cowardice or what stupidity, that made you lay a plot like this against me?
Did you imagine I should not observe the crafty scheme that stole upon me or 595 seeing it, take no means to counter it?

Was it not stupid of you to make the attempt, to try to hunt down royal power without the people at your back or friends? For only with the people at your back or money can the hunt end in the capture of a crown. 600

CREON Do you know what you're doing? Will you listen to words to answer yours, and then pass judgment?

OEDIPUS You're quick to speak, but I am slow to grasp you, for I have found you dangerous,—and my foe. 605

CREON First of all hear what I shall say to that.

OEDIPUS At least don't tell me that you are not guilty.

CREON If you think obstinacy without wisdom
a valuable possession, you are wrong. 610

OEDIPUS And you are wrong if you believe that one,
a criminal, will not be punished only because he is my kinsman.

CREON This is but just—but tell me, then, of what offense I'm guilty?

OEDIPUS Did you or did you not urge me to send to this prophetic mumblor?

CREON I did indeed, 615 and I shall stand by what I told you.

OEDIPUS How long ago is it since Laius . . .

CREON What about Laius? I don't understand.

OEDIPUS Vanished—died—was murdered?

CREON It is long,
a long, long time to reckon.

OEDIPUS Was this prophet 620
in the profession then?

CREON He was, and honoured as highly as he is today.

OEDIPUS At that time did he say a word about me?

CREON Never, at least when I was near him.

OEDIPUS You never made a search for the dead man? 625

CREON We searched, indeed, but never learned of anything.

OEDIPUS Why did our wise old friend not say this then?

CREON I don't know; and when I know nothing, I usually hold my tongue.

OEDIPUS You know this much,
and can declare this much if you are loyal.

630

CREON What is it? If I know, I'll not deny it.

OEDIPUS That he would not have said that I killed Laius had he not met you first.

CREON You know yourself whether he said this, but I demand that I should hear as much from you as you from me.

635

OEDIPUS Then hear,—I'll not be proved a murderer.

CREON Well, then. You're married to my sister.

OEDIPUS Yes,
that I am not disposed to deny.

CREON You rule
this country giving her an equal share in the government?

OEDIPUS Yes, everything she wants
she has from me.

640

CREON And I, as thirdsman to you, am rated as the equal of you two?

OEDIPUS Yes, and it's there you've proved yourself false friend.

CREON Not if you will reflect on it as I do.

Consider, first, if you think anyone would choose to rule and fear rather than rule and sleep untroubled by a fear if power were equal in both cases. I, at least, I was not born with such a frantic yearning to be a king—but to do what kings do.

645

And so it is with everyone who has learned wisdom and self-control. As it stands now, the prizes are all mine—and without fear.

650

But if I were the king myself, I must do much that went against the grain.

655

How should despotic rule seem sweeter to me than painless power and an assured authority?

I am not so besotted yet that I want other honours than those that come with profit.

Now every man's my pleasure; every man greets me;
now those who are your suitors fawn on me,— success for them depends upon my favour.

660

Why should I let all this go to win that?

My mind would not be traitor if it's wise;

I am no treason lover, of my nature, nor would I ever dare to join a plot.

665

Prove what I say. Go to the oracle at Pytho and inquire about the answers, if they are as I told you. For the rest, if you discover I laid any plot 670 together with the seer kill me, I say, not only by your vote but by my own.

 But do not charge me on obscure opinion without some proof to back it. It's not just lightly to count your knaves as honest men, 675 nor honest men as knaves. To throw away an honest friend is, as it were, to throw your life away, which a man loves the best.
 In time you will know all with certainty;
 time is the only test of honest men, 680
 one day is space enough to know a rogue.
 CHORUS His words are wise, king, if one fears to fall.
 Those who are quick of temper are not safe.
 OEDIPUS When he that plots against me secretly moves quickly, I must quickly counterplot. 685
 If I wait taking no decisive measure his business will be done, and mine be spoiled.
 CREON What do you want to do then? Banish me?
 OEDIPUS No, certainly; kill you, not banish you.<sup>5</sup>
 CREON I do not think that you've your wits about you. 690 OEDIPUS For my own interests, yes.
 CREON But for mine, too,
 you should think equally.
 OEDIPUS You are a rogue.
 CREON Suppose you do not understand?
 OEDIPUS But yet
 I must be ruler.
 CREON Not if you rule badly.
 OEDIPUS O city, city!
 CREON I too have some share 695
 in the city; it is not yours alone.
 CHORUS Stop, my lords! Here—and in the nick of time
 I see Jocasta coming from the house; with her help lay the quarrel that now stirs you.
 [Enter JOCASTA.]
 JOCASTA For shame! Why have you raised this foolish squabbling 700 brawl? Are you not ashamed to air your private griefs when the country's sick? Go in, you, Oedipus, and you, too, Creon, into the house. Don't magnify your nothing troubles.
 CREON Sister, Oedipus,
 your husband, thinks he has the right to do 705 terrible wrongs—he has but to choose between

5. Two lines omitted here owing to the confusion in the dialogue consequent on the loss of a third line. In the omitted lines, Oedipus accuses the Chorus of being jealous, and the Chorus accuses Oedipus of lacking trust.

- two terrors: banishing or killing me.
- OEDIPUS He's right, Jocasta; for I find him plotting with knavish tricks against my person.
- CREON That god may never bless me! May I die accursed, if I have been guilty of one tittle of the charge you bring against me! 710
- JOCASTA I beg you, Oedipus, trust him in this,
spare him for the sake of this his oath to god, for my sake, and the sake of those who stand here. 715
- CHORUS<sup>6</sup> Be gracious, be merciful, we beg of you.
- OEDIPUS In what would you have me yield?
- CHORUS He has been no silly child in the past.
He is strong in his oath now. 720 Spare him.
- OEDIPUS Do you know what you ask?
- CHORUS Yes.
- OEDIPUS Tell me then.
- CHORUS He has been your friend before all men's eyes; do not cast him away dishonoured on an obscure conjecture. 725
- OEDIPUS I would have you know that this request of yours really requests my death or banishment.
- CHORUS May the Sun god, king of gods, forbid! May I die without god's blessing, without friends' help, if I had any such thought. But my spirit is broken by my unhappiness for my wasting country; and this would but add troubles amongst ourselves to the other troubles. 730
- OEDIPUS Well, let him go then—if I must die ten times for it, or be sent out dishonoured into exile. 735
It is your lips that prayed for him I pitied, not his; wherever he is, I shall hate him.
- CREON I see you sulk in yielding and you're dangerous when you are out of temper; natures like yours are justly heaviest for themselves to bear. 740
- OEDIPUS Leave me alone! Take yourself off, I tell you.
- CREON I'll go, you have not known me, but they have,
and they have known my innocence.
[Exit.]
- CHORUS Won't you take him inside, lady?
- JOCASTA Yes, when I've found out what was the matter. 745
- CHORUS There was some misconceived suspicion of a story, and on the other side the sting of injustice.
- JOCASTA So, on both sides?
- CHORUS Yes.
- JOCASTA What was the story? 750

6. The meter changes in the original, marking an increase in emotional intensity, with presumably a different musical accompaniment.

CHORUS I think it best, in the interests of the country, to leave it where it ended.

OEDIPUS You see where you have ended, straight of judgment although you are, by softening my anger.

CHORUS Sir, I have said before and I say again—be sure that I would have been proved a madman, bankrupt in sane council, if I should put you away, you who steered the country I love safely when she was crazed with troubles. God grant that now, too, you may prove a fortunate guide for us. 755

JOCASTA Tell me, my lord, I beg of you, what was it that roused your anger so? 760

OEDIPUS Yes, I will tell you.

I honour you more than I honour them.

It was Creon and the plots he laid against me.

JOCASTA Tell me—if you can clearly tell the quarrel—

OEDIPUS Creon says

that I'm the murderer of Laius. 765

JOCASTA Of his own knowledge or on information?

OEDIPUS He sent this rascal prophet to me, since he keeps his own mouth clean of any guilt.

JOCASTA Do not concern yourself about this matter;

listen to me and learn that human beings have no part in the craft of prophecy. 770

Of that I'll show you a short proof.

There was an oracle once that came to Laius,—

I will not say that it was Phoebus' own, but it was from his servants—and it told him that it was fate that he should die a victim 775

at the hands of his own son, a son to be born of Laius and me. But, see now, he,

the king, was killed by foreign highway robbers

at a place where three roads meet—so goes the story; 780 and for the son—before three days were out after his birth King Laius pierced his ankles and by the hands of others cast him forth upon a pathless hillside. So Apollo failed to fulfill his oracle to the son, 785 that he should kill his father, and to Laius

also proved false in that the thing he feared, death at his son's hands, never came to pass.

So clear in this case were the oracles, so clear and false. Give them no heed, I say; 790 what god discovers need of, easily

he shows to us himself.

OEDIPUS O dear Jocasta,

as I hear this from you, there comes upon me a wandering of the soul—I could run mad.

JOCASTA What trouble is it, that you turn again 795 and speak like this?

- OEDIPUS                    I thought I heard you say that Laius was killed at a crossroads.
- JOCASTA   Yes, that was how the story went and still that word goes round.
- OEDIPUS                    Where is this place, Jocasta, where he was murdered?
- JOCASTA                    Phocis is the country                    800 and the road splits there, one of two roads from Delphi, another comes from Daulia.
- OEDIPUS                    How long ago is this?
- JOCASTA   The news came to the city just before you became king and all men's eyes looked to you.
What is it, Oedipus, that's in your mind?                    805
- OEDIPUS   What have you designed, O Zeus, to do with me?
- JOCASTA   What is the thought that troubles your heart?
- OEDIPUS   Don't ask me yet—tell me of Laius—How did he look? How old or young was he?
- JOCASTA   He was a tall man and his hair was grizzled                    810 already—nearly white—and in his form not unlike you.
- OEDIPUS                    O god, I think I have called curses on myself in ignorance.
- JOCASTA   What do you mean? I am terrified when I look at you.
- OEDIPUS                    I have a deadly fear                    815 that the old seer had eyes. You'll show me more if you can tell me one more thing.
- JOCASTA                    I will.
I'm frightened,—but if I can understand,
I'll tell you all you ask.
- OEDIPUS                    How was his company?
Had he few with him when he went this journey,                    820 or many servants, as would suit a prince?
- JOCASTA   In all there were but five, and among them a herald; and one carriage for the king.
- OEDIPUS   It's plain—its plain—who was it told you this?
- JOCASTA   The only servant that escaped safe home.                    825
- OEDIPUS   Is he at home now?
- JOCASTA                    No, when he came home again and saw you king and Laius was dead, he came to me and touched my hand and begged that I should send him to the fields to be my shepherd and so he might see the city                    830 as far off as he might. So I sent him away. He was an honest man, as slaves go, and was worthy of far more than what he asked of me.
- OEDIPUS   O, how I wish that he could come back quickly!                    835
- JOCASTA   He can. Why is your heart so set on this?

OEDIPUS O dear Jocasta, I am full of fears that I have spoken far too much; and therefore I wish to see this shepherd.

JOCASTA He will come;
but, Oedipus, I think I'm worthy too to know what it is that disquiets you.

840

OEDIPUS It shall not be kept from you, since my mind has gone so far with its forebodings. Whom should I confide in rather than you, who is there of more importance to me who have passed through such a fortune?

845

Polybus was my father, king of Corinth, and Merope, the Dorian, my mother.

I was held greatest of the citizens in Corinth till a curious chance befell me as I shall tell you—curious, indeed, but hardly worth the store I set upon it.

850

There was a dinner and at it a man, a drunken man, accused me in his drink of being bastard. I was furious but held my temper under for that day.

855

Next day I went and taxed my parents with it;
they took the insult very ill from him,
the drunken fellow who had uttered it.

So I was comforted for their part, but still this thing rankled always, for the story crept about widely. And I went at last to Pytho, though my parents did not know.

860

But Phoebus sent me home again unhonoured in what I came to learn, but he foretold other and desperate horrors to befall me, that I was fated to lie with my mother, 865

and show to daylight an accursed breed which men would not endure, and I was doomed to be murderer of the father that begot me.

870

When I heard this I fled, and in the days that followed I would measure from the stars the whereabouts of Corinth—yes, I fled to somewhere where I should not see fulfilled the infamies told in that dreadful oracle.

875

And as I journeyed I came to the place where, as you say, this king met with his death.

Jocasta, I will tell you the whole truth.

When I was near the branching of the crossroads, going on foot, I was encountered by 880

a herald and a carriage with a man in it, just as you tell me. He that led the way and the old man himself wanted to thrust me

- out of the road by force. I became angry and struck the coachman who was pushing me. 885
When the old man saw this he watched his moment, and as I passed he struck me from his carriage, full on the head with his two-pointed goad.
But he was paid in full and presently my stick had struck him backwards from the car 890 and he rolled out of it. And then I killed them all. If it happened there was any tie of kinship twixt this man and Laius, who is then now more miserable than I,
what man on earth so hated by the gods, 895 since neither citizen nor foreigner may welcome me at home or even greet me, but drive me out of doors? And it is I,
I and no other have so cursed myself.
And I pollute the bed of him I killed 900 by the hands that killed him. Was I not born evil?
Am I not utterly unclean? I had to fly and in my banishment not even see my kindred nor set foot in my own country, or otherwise my fate was to be yoked 905
in marriage with my mother and kill my father, Polybus who begot me and had reared me.
Would not one rightly judge and say that on me these things were sent by some malignant god?
O no, no, no—O holy majesty 910 of god on high, may I not see that day!
May I be gone out of men's sight before I see the deadly taint of this disaster come upon me.
- CHORUS Sir, we too fear these things. But until you see this man face to 915 face and hear his story, hope.
- OEDIPUS Yes, I have just this much of hope—to wait until the herdsman comes.
- JOCASTA And when he comes, what do you want with him?
- OEDIPUS I'll tell you; if I find that his story is the same as yours, I at least 920 will be clear of this guilt.
- JOCASTA Why—what so particularly did you learn from my story?
- OEDIPUS You said that he spoke of highway robbers who killed Laius. Now if he uses the same number, it was not I who killed him. One man cannot be the same as many. But if he speaks of a man travelling alone, then clearly the burden of the guilt inclines towards me. 925
- JOCASTA Be sure, at least, that this was how he told the story. He cannot unsay it now, for every one in the city heard it—not I alone. But, Oedipus, even if he diverges from what he said then, he shall never prove that the murder of Laius squares rightly with the prophecy—for Loxias declared that the king should be killed by 930 his own son. And that poor creature did not kill him surely,— for he died himself first. So as far as prophecy goes, henceforward

I shall not look to the right hand or the left.

OEDIPUS Right. But yet, send someone for the peasant to bring him here; 935 do not neglect it.

JOCASTA I will send quickly. Now let me go indoors. I will do nothing except what pleases you.

[Exeunt.]

CHORUS STROPHE May destiny ever find me pious in word and deed prescribed by the laws that live on high: 940 laws begotten in the clear air of heaven, whose only father is Olympus;
no mortal nature brought them to birth,
no forgetfulness shall lull them to sleep;
for the god is great in them and grows not old. 945

ANTISTROPHE Insolence<sup>7</sup> breeds the tyrant, insolence if it is glutted with a surfeit, unseasonable, unprofitable, climbs to the rooftop and plunges sheer down to the ruin that must be,
and there its feet are no service. 950
But I pray that the god may never abolish the eager ambition that profits the state.
For I shall never cease to hold the god as our protector.

STROPHE If a man walks with haughtiness of hand or word and gives no heed 955 to Justice and the shrines of gods despises—may an evil doom smite him for his ill-starred pride of heart!— if he reaps gains without justice and will not hold from impiety 960 and his fingers itch for untouchable things.
When such things are done, what man shall contrive to shield his soul from the shafts of the god?
When such deeds are held in honour, why should I honour the gods in the dance?<sup>8</sup> 965

ANTISTROPHE No longer to the holy place, to the navel of earth I'll go to worship, nor to Abae nor to Olympia,<sup>9</sup> 970 unless the oracles are proved to fit, for all men's hands to point at.
O Zeus, if you are rightly called the sovereign lord, all-mastering,

7. The word in Greek for "insolence" is hybris, which usually connotes violence.

8. The Greek verb used here, choreuein, connotes "dance in a chorus," linking the mythi-cal drama to the real theatrical performance.

9. Home to a great sanctuary of Zeus and Hera. "The navel of earth": Delphi. "Abae": oracular site near Thebes.

let this not escape you nor your ever-living power!

The oracles concerning Laius

975 are old and dim and men regard them not.

Apollo is nowhere clear in honour; god's service perishes.

[Enter JOCASTA, carrying garlands.]

JOCASTA Princes of the land, I have had the thought to go to the gods' temples, bringing in my hand garlands and gifts of incense, as you see.

980

For Oedipus excites himself too much at every sort of trouble, not conjecturing, like a man of sense, what will be from what was,

but he is always at the speaker's mercy,

when he speaks terrors. I can do no good by my advice, and so I came as suppliant to you, Lycaean Apollo,<sup>1</sup> who are nearest.

These are the symbols of my prayer and this my prayer: grant us escape free of the curse.

Now when we look to him we are all afraid;

990

he's pilot of our ship and he is frightened.

[Enter MESSENGER.]

MESSENGER Might I learn from you, sirs, where is the house of Oedipus?

Or best of all, if you know, where is the king himself?

CHORUS This is his house and he is within doors. This lady is his wife and mother of his children.

995

MESSENGER God bless you, lady, and god bless your household! God bless Oedipus' noble wife!

JOCASTA God bless you, sir, for your kind greeting! What do you want of us that you have come here? What have you to tell us?

MESSENGER Good news, lady. Good for your house and for your husband.

JOCASTA What is your news? Who sent you to us?

MESSENGER I come from Corinth and the news I bring will give you pleasure.

Perhaps a little pain too.

JOCASTA What is this news of double meaning?

1005

MESSENGER The people of the Isthmus will choose Oedipus to be their king.

That is the rumour there.

JOCASTA But isn't their king still old Polybus?

MESSENGER No. He is in his grave. Death has got him.

1010

JOCASTA Is that the truth? Is Oedipus' father dead?

MESSENGER May I die myself if it be otherwise!

JOCASTA (to a servant) Be quick and run to the king with the news!

O oracles of the gods, where are you now? It was from this man Oedipus fled, lest he should be his murderer! And now he is dead, in the course of nature, and not killed by Oedipus.

1015

[Enter OEDIPUS.]

OEDIPUS Dearest Jocasta, why have you sent for me?

1. Apollo was worshipped in rituals on Mount Lycaeon—literally, "Wolf Mountain."

JOCASTA Listen to this man and when you hear reflect what is the outcome of the holy oracles of the gods.

OEDIPUS Who is he? What is his message for me? 1020

JOCASTA He is from Corinth and he tells us that your father Polybus is dead and gone.

OEDIPUS What's this you say, sir? Tell me yourself.

MESSENGER Since this is the first matter you want clearly told:
Polybus has gone down to death. You may be sure of it. 1025

OEDIPUS By treachery or sickness?

MESSENGER A small thing will put old bodies asleep.

OEDIPUS So he died of sickness, it seems,—poor old man!

MESSENGER Yes, and of age—the long years he had measured.

OEDIPUS Ha! Ha! O dear Jocasta, why should one look to the Pythian hearth? Why should one look to the birds screaming overhead? They prophesied that I should kill my father! But he's dead, and hidden deep in earth, and I stand here who never laid a hand on spear against him,— 1030 unless perhaps he died of longing for me, and thus I am his murderer. But they,
the oracles, as they stand—he's taken them away with him, they're dead as he himself is,
and worthless. 1035

JOCASTA That I told you before now. 1040

OEDIPUS You did, but I was misled by my fear.

JOCASTA Then lay no more of them to heart, not one.

OEDIPUS But surely I must fear my mother's bed?

JOCASTA Why should man fear since chance is all in all for him, and he can clearly foreknow nothing? 1045 Best to live lightly, as one can, unthinkingly.
As to your mother's marriage bed,—don't fear it.
Before this, in dreams too, as well as oracles, many a man has lain with his own mother.
But he to whom such things are nothing bears his life most easily. 1050

OEDIPUS All that you say would be said perfectly if she were dead; but since she lives I must still fear, although you talk so well, Jocasta.

JOCASTA Still in your father's death there's light of comfort? 1055

OEDIPUS Great light of comfort; but I fear the living.

MESSENGER Who is the woman that makes you afraid?

OEDIPUS Merope, old man, Polybus' wife.

MESSENGER What about her frightens the queen and you?

OEDIPUS A terrible oracle, stranger, from the gods. 1060

MESSENGER Can it be told? Or does the sacred law forbid another to have knowledge of it?

OEDIPUS O no! Once on a time Loxias said that I should lie with my own mother and take on my hands the blood of my own father. 1065

And so for these long years I've lived away from Corinth; it has been to my great happiness;
but yet it's sweet to see the face of parents.

MESSENGER This was the fear which drove you out of Corinth?

OEDIPUS Old man, I did not wish to kill my father.

1070

MESSENGER Why should I not free you from this fear, sir, since I have come to you in all goodwill?

OEDIPUS You would not find me thankless if you did.

MESSENGER Why, it was just for this I brought the news,— to earn your thanks when you had come safe home.

1075

OEDIPUS No, I will never come near my parents.

MESSENGER Son,
it's very plain you don't know what you're doing.

OEDIPUS What do you mean, old man? For god's sake, tell me.

MESSENGER If your homecoming is checked by fears like these.

OEDIPUS Yes, I'm afraid that Phoebus may prove right.

1080

MESSENGER The murder and the incest?

OEDIPUS Yes, old man;
that is my constant terror.

MESSENGER Do you know that all your fears are empty?

OEDIPUS How is that, if they are father and mother and I their son?

MESSENGER Because Polybus was no kin to you in blood.

1085

OEDIPUS What, was not Polybus my father?

MESSENGER No more than I but just so much.

OEDIPUS How can
my father be my father as much as one that's nothing to me?

MESSENGER Neither he nor I begat you.

1090

OEDIPUS Why then did he call me son?

MESSENGER A gift he took you from these hands of mine.

OEDIPUS Did he love so much what he took from another's hand?

MESSENGER His childlessness before persuaded him.

OEDIPUS Was I a child you bought or found when I was given to him?

1095

MESSENGER On Cithaeron's slopes in the twisting thickets you were found.

OEDIPUS And why
were you a traveller in those parts?

MESSENGER I was in charge of mountain flocks.

1100

OEDIPUS You were a shepherd?
A hireling vagrant?

MESSENGER Yes, but at least at that time the man that saved your life, son.

OEDIPUS What ailed me when you took me in your arms?

MESSENGER In that your ankles should be witnesses.

1105

OEDIPUS Why do you speak of that old pain?

MESSENGER I loosed you;
the tendons of your feet were pierced and fettered,—

OEDIPUS My swaddling clothes brought me a rare disgrace.

MESSENGER So that from this you're called your present name.<sup>2</sup>

OEDIPUS Was this my father's doing or my mother's?

1110

For god's sake, tell me.

MESSENGER I don't know, but he who gave you to me has more knowledge than I.

OEDIPUS You yourself did not find me then? You took me from someone else?

MESSENGER Yes, from another shepherd.

1115

OEDIPUS Who was he? Do you know him well enough to tell?

MESSENGER He was called Laius' man.

OEDIPUS You mean the king who reigned here in the old days?

MESSENGER Yes, he was that man's shepherd.

OEDIPUS Is he alive
still, so that I could see him?

1120

MESSENGER You who live here would know that best.

OEDIPUS Do any of you here know of this shepherd whom he speaks about in town or in the fields? Tell me. It's time that this was found out once for all.

1125

CHORUS I think he is none other than the peasant whom you have sought to see already; but Jocasta here can tell us best of that.

OEDIPUS Jocasta, do you know about this man whom we have sent for? Is he the man he mentions?

1130

JOCASTA Why ask of whom he spoke? Don't give it heed;
nor try to keep in mind what has been said.
It will be wasted labour.

OEDIPUS With such clues
I could not fail to bring my birth to light.

JOCASTA I beg you—do not hunt this out—I beg you, if you have any care for your own life.
What I am suffering is enough.

1135

OEDIPUS Keep up
your heart, Jocasta. Though I'm proved a slave, thrice slave, and though my mother is thrice slave, you'll not be shown to be of lowly lineage.

JOCASTA O be persuaded by me, I entreat you;
do not do this.

OEDIPUS I will not be persuaded to let be the chance of finding out the whole thing clearly.

2. The name "Oedipus" suggests "swollen foot."

JOCASTA It is because I wish you well that I give you this counsel—and it's the best counsel. 1145

OEDIPUS Then the best counsel vexes me, and has for some while since.

JOCASTA Oedipus, may the god help you!
God keep you from the knowledge of who you are!

OEDIPUS Here, someone, go and fetch the shepherd for me; and let her find her joy in her rich family! 1150

JOCASTA O Oedipus, unhappy Oedipus! that is all I can call you, and the last thing that I shall ever call you.

[Exit.]

CHORUS Why has the queen gone, Oedipus, in wild grief rushing from us? I am afraid that trouble Will break out of this silence. 1155

OEDIPUS Break out what will! I at least shall be willing to see my ancestry, though humble.
Perhaps she is ashamed of my low birth, 1160 for she has all a woman's high-flown pride.
But I account myself a child of Fortune, beneficent Fortune, and I shall not be dishonoured. She's the mother from whom I spring; the months, my brothers, marked me, now as small, and now again as mighty. Such is my breeding, 1165 and I shall never prove so false to it, as not to find the secret of my birth.

CHORUS STROPHE If I am a prophet and wise of heart you shall not fail, Cithaeron, by the limitless sky, you shall not!— 1170 to know at tomorrow's full moon that Oedipus honours you,
as native to him and mother and nurse at once; and that you are honoured in dancing by us, as finding favour in sight of our king. 1175

Apollo, to whom we cry, find these things pleasing!

ANTISTROPHE Who was it bore you, child? One of the long-lived nymphs who lay with Pan—the father who treads the hills?<sup>3</sup> 1180 Or was she a bride of Loxias, your mother? The grassy slopes are all of them dear to him. Or perhaps Cyllene's king or the Bacchants' god that lives on the tops of the hills received you a gift from some one of the Helicon<sup>4</sup> nymphs, with whom he mostly plays? 1185

[Enter an old man, led by OEDIPUS' servants.]

3. Pan was a countryside god, patron of shepherds.

4. A mountain in Boeotia, supposedly inhabited by the Muses as well as nymphs (female nature spirits). Dionysus ("the Bacchants' god"), like Pan and the messenger god, Hermes ("Cyllene's king"), haunted the wild places.

OEDIPUS If someone like myself who never met him may make a guess,—I think this is the herdsman, whom we were seeking. His old age is consonant with the other. And besides, the men who bring him I recognize as my own servants. You perhaps may better me in knowledge since you've seen the man before. 1190

CHORUS You can be sure
 I recognize him. For if Laius had ever an honest shepherd, this was he.

OEDIPUS You, sir, from Corinth, I must ask you first, is this the man you spoke of? 1195

MESSENGER This is he before your eyes.

OEDIPUS Old man, look here at me and tell me what I ask you. Were you ever a servant of King Laius?

HERDSMAN I was,— no slave he bought but reared in his own house. 1200

OEDIPUS What did you do as work? How did you live?

HERDSMAN Most of my life was spent among the flocks.

OEDIPUS In what part of the country did you live?

HERDSMAN Cithaeron and the places near to it. 1205

OEDIPUS And somewhere there perhaps you knew this man?

HERDSMAN What was his occupation? Who?

OEDIPUS This man here,
 have you had any dealings with him?

HERDSMAN No—
 not such that I can quickly call to mind.

MESSENGER That is no wonder, master. But I'll make him remember what he does not know. For I know, that he well knows the country of Cithaeron, how he with two flocks, I with one kept company for three years—each year half a year—from spring till autumn time and then when winter came I drove my flocks to our fold home again and he to Laius's steadings. 1210 1215

Well—am I right or not in what I said we did?

HERDSMAN You're right—although it's a long time ago.

MESSENGER Do you remember giving me a child to bring up as my foster child?

HERDSMAN What's this?
 Why do you ask this question?

MESSENGER Look, old man, here he is—here's the man who was that child! 1220

HERDSMAN Death take you! Won't you hold your tongue?

OEDIPUS No, no,
 do not find fault with him, old man. Your words are more at fault than his.

HERDSMAN O best of masters, how do I give offense? 1225

OEDIPUS                               When you refuse to speak about the child of whom he asks you.
 HERDSMAN   He speaks out of his ignorance, without meaning.
 OEDIPUS   If you'll not talk to gratify me, you will talk with pain to urge you.
 HERDSMAN                               O please, sir, don't hurt an old man, sir. 1230 OEDIPUS [to the servants]   Here, one of you, twist his hands behind him.
 HERDSMAN                               Why, gods help me, why?
     What do you want to know?
 OEDIPUS                               You gave a child to him,—the child he asked you of?
 HERDSMAN                               I did. 1235
     I wish I'd died the day I did.
 OEDIPUS                               You will unless you tell me truly.
 HERDSMAN                               And I'll die far worse if I should tell you.
 OEDIPUS                               This fellow is bent on more delays, as it would seem.
 HERDSMAN   O no, no! I have told you that I gave it. 1240 OEDIPUS   Where did you get this child from? Was it your own or did you get it from another?
 HERDSMAN                               Not my own at all; I had it from someone.
 OEDIPUS   One of these citizens? or from what house?
 HERDSMAN   O master, please—I beg you, master, please 1245 don't ask me more.
 OEDIPUS                               You're a dead man if I ask you again.
 HERDSMAN                               It was one of the children of Laius.
 OEDIPUS   A slave? Or born in wedlock?
 HERDSMAN   O gods, I am on the brink of frightful speech. 1250 OEDIPUS   And I of frightful hearing. But I must hear.
 HERDSMAN   The child was called his child; but she within, your wife would tell you best how all this was.
 OEDIPUS   She gave it to you?
 HERDSMAN                               Yes, she did, my lord.
 OEDIPUS   To do what with it?
 HERDSMAN                               Make away with it. 1255 OEDIPUS   She was so hard—its mother?
 HERDSMAN                               Aye, through fear of evil oracles.
 OEDIPUS                               Which?
 HERDSMAN                               They said that he should kill his parents.
 OEDIPUS                               How was it that you 1260 gave it away to this old man?

HERDSMAN                    O master,
I pitied it, and thought that I could send it off to another country and this man was from another country. But he saved it for the most terrible troubles. If you are the man he says you are, you're bred to misery.

OEDIPUS    O, O, O, they will all come, all come out clearly! Light of the sun, let me look upon you no more after today!
I who first saw the light bred of a match accursed, and accursed in my living with them I lived with, cursed in my killing.

1270

[Exeunt all but the CHORUS.]

CHORUS STROPHE    O generations of men, how I count you as equal with those who live not at all!

1275

What man, what man on earth wins more of happiness than a seeming and after that turning away?
Oedipus, you are my pattern of this,
Oedipus, you and your fate!
Luckless Oedipus, whom of all men
I envy not at all.

1280

ANTISTROPHE    In as much as he shot his bolt beyond the others and won the prize of happiness complete—
O Zeus—and killed and reduced to nought the hooked taloned maid of the riddling speech, standing a tower against death for my land:
hence he was called my king and hence was honoured the highest of all honours; and hence he ruled in the great city of Thebes.

1290

STROPHE    But now whose tale is more miserable?
Who is there lives with a savager fate?
Whose troubles so reverse his life as his?
O Oedipus, the famous prince for whom a great haven
the same both as father and son sufficed for generation, how, O how, have the furrows ploughed by your father endured to bear you, poor wretch, and hold their peace so long?

ANTISTROPHE    Time who sees all has found you out against your will; judges your marriage accursed, begetter and begot at one in it.
O child of Laius,
would I had never seen you.

1305

I weep for you and cry
 a dirge of lamentation.
 To speak directly, I drew my breath from you at the first and so now I lull my mouth to sleep with your name.

1310

[Enter a SECOND MESSENGER.]

SECOND MESSENGER O Princes always honoured by our country, what deeds you'll hear of and what horrors see, what grief you'll feel, if you as true-born Thebans care for the house of Labdacus's sons.
 Phasis nor Ister<sup>5</sup> cannot purge this house,
 I think, with all their streams, such things it hides, such evils shortly will bring forth into the light, whether they will or not;
 and troubles hurt the most when they prove self-inflicted.

1315

1320

CHORUS What we had known before did not fall short of bitter groaning's worth; what's more to tell?

SECOND MESSENGER Shortest to hear and tell—our glorious queen Jocasta's dead.

CHORUS Unhappy woman! How?

SECOND MESSENGER By her own hand. The worst of what was done

you cannot know. You did not see the sight.
 Yet in so far as I remember it

You'll hear the end of our unlucky queen.

1330

When she came raging into the house she went straight to her marriage bed, tearing her hair with both her hands, and crying upon Laius long dead—Do you remember, Laius, that night long past which bred a child for us to send you to your death and leave a mother making children with her son?

1335

And then she groaned and cursed the bed in which she brought forth husband by her husband, children by her own child, an infamous double bond.

1340

How after that she died I do not know,— for Oedipus distracted us from seeing.

He burst upon us shouting and we looked to him as he paced frantically around, begging us always: Give me a sword, I say, to find this wife no wife, this mother's womb, this field of double sowing whence I sprang and where I sowed my children! As he raved some god showed him the way—none of us there.

1345

Bellowing terribly and led by some invisible guide he rushed on the two doors,— 1350

5. Phasis is a large river in western Georgia; Ister is an ancient name for the Danube.

wrenching the hollow bolts out of their sockets, he charged inside. There, there, we saw his wife hanging, the twisted rope around her neck.
 When he saw her, he cried out fearfully 1355 and cut the dangling noose. Then, as she lay, poor woman, on the ground, what happened after,
 was terrible to see. He tore the brooches—the gold chased brooches fastening her robe—away from her and lifting them up high 1360 dashed them on his own eyeballs, shrieking out such things as: they will never see the crime
 I have committed or had done upon me!
 Dark eyes, now in the days to come look on forbidden faces, do not recognize 1365 those whom you long for—with such imprecations he struck his eyes again and yet again with the brooches. And the bleeding eyeballs gushed and stained his beard—no sluggish oozing drops but a black rain and bloody hail poured down. 1370

So it has broken—and not on one head but troubles mixed for husband and for wife.
 The fortune of the days gone by was true good fortune—but today groans and destruction and death and shame—of all ills can be named 1375 not one is missing.

CHORUS Is he now in any ease from pain?

SECOND MESSENGER He shouts for someone to unbar the doors and show him to all the men of Thebes, his father's killer, his mother's—no, I cannot say the word, 1380
 it is unholy—for he'll cast himself out of the land, he says, and not remain to bring a curse upon his house, the curse he called upon it in his proclamation. But he wants for strength, aye, and someone to guide him; 1385 his sickness is too great to bear. You, too, will be shown that. The bolts are opening.
 Soon you will see a sight to waken pity even in the horror of it.

[Enter the blinded OEDIPUS.]

CHORUS This is a terrible sight for men to see! 1390
 I never found a worse!
 Poor wretch, what madness came upon you!
 What evil spirit leaped upon your life to your ill-luck—a leap beyond man's strength!
 Indeed I pity you, but I cannot 1395 look at you, though there's much I want to ask and much to learn and much to see.

I shudder at the sight of you.

OEDIPUS O, O,
where am I going? Where is my voice 1400 borne on the wind to and fro?
Spirit, how far have you sprung?

CHORUS To a terrible place whereof men's ears may not hear, nor their eyes behold it.

OEDIPUS Darkness! 1405
Horror of darkness enfolding, resistless, unspeakable visitant sped by an ill wind in haste!
madness and stabbing pain and memory of evil deeds I have done!

CHORUS In such misfortunes it's no wonder 1410 if double weighs the burden of your grief.

OEDIPUS My friend,
you are the only one steadfast, the only one that attends on me;
you still stay nursing the blind man.
Your care is not unnoticed. I can know 1415 your voice, although this darkness is my world.

CHORUS Doer of dreadful deeds, how did you dare so far to do despite to your own eyes?
what spirit urged you to it?

OEDIPUS It was Apollo, friends, Apollo, 1420 that brought this bitter bitterness, my sorrows to completion.
But the hand that struck me was none but my own.
Why should I see
whose vision showed me nothing sweet to see? 1425

CHORUS These things are as you say.

OEDIPUS What can I see to love?
What greeting can touch my ears with joy?
Take me away, and haste—to a place out of the way!
Take me away, my friends, the greatly miserable, 1430 the most accursed, whom the gods too hate above all men on earth!

CHORUS Unhappy in your mind and your misfortune, would I had never known you!

OEDIPUS Curse on the man who took 1435 the cruel bonds from off my legs, as I lay in the field.
He stole me from death and saved me, no kindly service.
Had I died then

I would not be so burdensome to friends. 1440

CHORUS I, too, could have wished it had been so.

OEDIPUS Then I would not have come to kill my father and marry my mother infamously.
Now I am godless and child of impurity, begetter in the same seed that created my wretched self. 1445
If there is any ill worse than ill, that is the lot of Oedipus.

CHORUS I cannot say your remedy was good;

you would be better dead than blind and living.

OEDIPUS What I have done here was best done—don't tell me

1450 otherwise, do not give me further counsel.

I do not know with what eyes I could look upon my father when I die and go under the earth, nor yet my wretched mother—those two to whom I have done things deserving 1455 worse punishment than hanging. Would the sight of children, bred as mine are, gladden me?

No, not these eyes, never. And my city, its towers and sacred places of the gods, of these I robbed my miserable self 1460

when I commanded all to drive him out, the criminal since proved by god impure and of the race of Laius.

To this guilt I bore witness against myself—with what eyes shall I look upon my people?

1465

No. If there were a means to choke the fountain of hearing I would not have stayed my hand from locking up my miserable carcass, seeing and hearing nothing; it is sweet to keep our thoughts out of the range of hurt.

1470

Cithaeron, why did you receive me? Why having received me did you not kill me straight?

And so I had not shown to men my birth.

O Polybus and Corinth and the house,

the old house that I used to call my father's—1475

what fairness you were nurse to, and what foulness festered beneath! Now I am found to be a sinner and a son of sinners. Crossroads, and hidden glade, oak and the narrow way

at the crossroads, that drank my father's blood 1480

offered you by my hands, do you remember still what I did as you looked on, and what I did when I came here? O marriage, marriage!

you bred me and again when you had bred bred children of your child and showed to men

1485

brides, wives and mothers and the foulest deeds that can be in this world of ours.

Come—it's unfit to say what is unfit to do.—I beg of you in god's name hide me somewhere outside your country, yes, or kill me, 1490

or throw me into the sea, to be forever out of your sight. Approach and deign to touch me for all my wretchedness, and do not fear.

No man but I can bear my evil doom.

CHORUS Here Creon comes in fit time to perform or give advice in what you ask of us. 1495

Creon is left sole ruler in your stead.

OEDIPUS Creon! Creon! What shall I say to him?
How can I justly hope that he will trust me?
In what is past I have been proved towards him an utter liar. 1500

[Enter CREON.]

CREON Oedipus, I've come not so that I might laugh at you nor taunt you with evil of the past. But if you still are without shame before the face of men 1505 reverence at least the flame that gives all life, our Lord the Sun, and do not show unveiled to him pollution such that neither land nor holy rain nor light of day can welcome.

[To a servant.]

Be quick and take him in. It is most decent that only kin should see and hear the troubles of kin. 1510

OEDIPUS I beg you, since you've torn me from my dreadful expectations and have come in a most noble spirit to a man 1515 that has used you vilely—do a thing for me.
I shall speak for your own good, not for my own.

CREON What do you need that you would ask of me?

OEDIPUS Drive me from here with all the speed you can to where I may not hear a human voice. 1520

CREON Be sure, I would have done this had not I wished first of all to learn from the god the course of action I should follow.

OEDIPUS But his word has been quite clear to let the parricide, the sinner, die. 1525

CREON Yes, that indeed was said.
But in the present need we had best discover what we should do.

OEDIPUS And will you ask about a man so wretched?

CREON Now even you will trust
the god. 1530

OEDIPUS So. I command you—and will beseech you—to her that lies inside that house give burial as you would have it; she is yours and rightly you will perform the rites for her. For me—never let this my father's city have me living a dweller in it. Leave me live 1535 in the mountains where Cithaeron is, that's called my mountain, which my mother and my father while they were living would have made my tomb.

 So I may die by their decree who sought indeed to kill me. Yet I know this much:
 no sickness and no other thing will kill me.
 I would not have been saved from death if not for some strange evil fate. Well, let my fate go where it will.

1540

1545

Creon, you need not care about my sons; they're men and so wherever they are, they will not lack a livelihood.
 But my two girls—so sad and pitiful—whose table never stood apart from mine, and everything I touched they always shared—O Creon, have a thought for them! And most I wish that you might suffer me to touch them and sorrow with them.

1550

[Enter Antigone and Ismene, OEDIPUS' two daughters.]

O my lord! O true noble Creon! Can I really be touching them, as when I saw?
 What shall I say?

1555

Yes, I can hear them sobbing—my two darlings!
 and Creon has had pity and has sent me what I loved most?

Am I right?

1560

CREON You're right: it was I gave you this because I knew from old days how you loved them as I see now.

OEDIPUS God bless you for it, Creon, and may the god guard you better on your road than he did me!

O children,
 where are you? Come here, come to my hands, a brother's hands which turned your father's eyes, those bright eyes you knew once, to what you see,
 a father seeing nothing, knowing nothing, begetting you from his own source of life.

1570

I weep for you—I cannot see your faces—
 I weep when I think of the bitterness there will be in your lives, how you must live before the world. At what assemblages of citizens will you make one? to what 1575

gay company will you go and not come home in tears instead of sharing in the holiday?
 And when you're ripe for marriage, who will he be,
 the man who'll risk to take such infamy as shall cling to my children, to bring hurt on them and those that marry with them? What 1580

curse is not there? “Your father killed his father and sowed the seed where he had sprung himself and begot you out of the womb that held him.” 1585

These insults you will hear. Then who will marry you?

No one, my children; clearly you are doomed to waste away in barrenness unmarried.

Son of Menoeceus,<sup>6</sup> since you are all the father left these two girls, and we, their parents, both 1590 are dead to them—do not allow them wander like beggars, poor and husbandless.

They are of your own blood.

And do not make them equal with myself in wretchedness; for you can see them now 1595 so young, so utterly alone, save for you only.

Touch my hand, noble Creon, and say yes.

If you were older, children, and were wiser, there’s much advice I’d give you. But as it is, 1600 let this be what you pray: give me a life wherever there is opportunity to live, and better life than was my father’s.

CREON Your tears have had enough of scope; now go within the house.

OEDIPUS I must obey, though bitter of heart.

CREON In season, all is good. 1605

OEDIPUS Do you know on what conditions I obey?

CREON You tell me them, and I shall know them when I hear.

OEDIPUS That you shall send me out to live away from Thebes.

CREON That gift you must ask of the god.

OEDIPUS But I’m now hated by the gods.

CREON So quickly you’ll obtain your prayer.

OEDIPUS You consent then?

CREON What I do not mean, I do not use to say. 1610

OEDIPUS Now lead me away from here.

CREON Let go the children, then, and come.

OEDIPUS Do not take them from me.

CREON Do not seek to be master in everything, for the things you mastered did not follow you throughout your life.

[As CREON and OEDIPUS go out.]

CHORUS You that live in my ancestral Thebes, behold this Oedipus,— 1615 him who knew the famous riddles and was a man most masterful; not a citizen who did not look with envy on his lot—see him now and see the breakers of misfortune swallow him!
Look upon that last day always. Count no mortal happy till he has passed the final limit of his life secure from pain. 1620

6. Creon is Menoeceus’s son.

EURIPIDES

ca. 480–406 B.C.E.

---

Euripides strikes many readers as the liveliest, funniest, and most provocative of the three great Athenian tragedians whose work survives. A younger contemporary of Aeschylus and Sophocles, Euripides lived through most of the cultural and political turmoil of the fifth century B.C.E., and was seen as one of the most influential voices for the revolutionary new ideas that were developing in this period. Controversial in his own time for his use of colloquial language and his depictions of unheroic heroes, sexually promiscuous women, and cruel, violent gods, Euripides has lost none of his power to shock, provoke, amuse, and engage his audiences.

LIFE AND TIMES

We know little of Euripides' personal life. He seems to have been married twice, and had three sons. He was a productive but only moderately successful tragedian: he wrote over ninety plays, but won first prize only four times. He specialized in unexpected plot twists and novel approaches to his mythological material: for instance, his play about Helen of Troy (Helen) makes her an entirely virtuous woman who never committed adultery or ran off with Paris. There are many moments of humor in Euripides, far more than in Aeschylus or Sophocles. At the same time, his vision is often very dark. His later plays about the Trojan War (such as Hecuba and Trojan Women) can be read as terrible indictments of the suffering caused to women, children, and families by the contemporary Peloponnesian War between Athens and Sparta.

He spent most of his life in Athens, but in his old age went to visit Macedonia, where he died. It has often been suggested that he left Athens in outrage at the city's failure to appreciate him, but there is no evidence for this. Euripides was probably always popular with audiences, albeit less so with the judges of the dramatic competition, who perhaps felt an obligation to uphold civic ideals. Euripides continued to be widely read, quoted, and enjoyed for generations after his death.

Medea was first performed in the spring of 431 B.C.E., immediately before the outbreak of the Peloponnesian War. It was a time of prosperity for the city: the Greeks had defeated the Persians in the year of Euripides' birth, and now the Athenian Empire extended across the Mediterranean. Athens was deeply proud of the political, artistic, and intellectual achievements of the citizens.

It was also a time of new, antitraditional ideas, brought by the Sophists, men from other societies who came to Athens to teach "cleverness" or "wisdom"—sophia. The Sophists were seen by some as a mark of Athens' progressive openness to new modes of thought, but by others as a dangerous influence, liable to corrupt the city's young men. The tragedies of Euripides were associated by the comic dramatist Aristophanes, and probably many others, with the iconoclasm of the Sophists. Many contemporaries found the plays shocking and controversial. Euripides uses traditional myths, but he shifts attention away from the deeds of heroes toward domestic wrangling, and shows up moral and psychological weaknesses. Euripides was seen as a cynical realist about human nature: Sophocles said that while he showed people as they ought to be, Euripides showed them as they are.

Euripides put male heroes onstage in humiliated positions: they are bedraggled and dressed in rags, or are presented as obvious cowards, liars, or brutes. Euripides' outspoken, lustful, or violent, though often sympathetic, women were found particularly outrageous by his contemporaries. Lower-class characters and slaves were prominent, and sympathetically portrayed. In religious terms, too, his plays were challenging and controversial: his characters often question the old Greek myths about the gods, and the gods themselves often seem arbitrary or cruel in their dealings with humanity. Euripides also included vivid and realistic descriptions of violence, as in the messenger speech of the Medea, a horrifying account of how the princess Creusa's hair was burned up by her golden crown, while her poisoned dress corroded her skin and finally ripped the flesh from her bones.

THE WORK

Medea, like almost all Greek tragedies, is based on a traditional story. According to myth, the hero Jason was told by his uncle, Pelias, that he could not claim his rightful inheritance, the throne of Iolcus, unless he could perform a seemingly impossible quest: cross the Black Sea to the distant barbarian land of Colchis, ruled by the savage king Aeetes, and bring back to Greece the Golden Fleece, which was guarded by a dragon. Jason assembled a group of the finest Greek heroes, and built the world's first ship—the Argo—to take them to Colchis. Once they arrived, King Aeetes set Jason the task of plowing a field with a team of fire-breathing bulls. Luckily, the king's daughter, Medea, fell in love with Jason. She was skilled in magic, and enabled him to plow the field, lull the dragon to sleep, steal the fleece, and escape back to Greece; she killed her own brother to distract the attention of their enraged Colchian pursuers. When they arrived in Iolcus, Pelias, going back on his word, tried to hang onto power. Medea got back at him by persuading Pelias' daughters that they could make their father immortal by boiling him alive—which was, of course, untrue. After the scandal was discovered, Jason and Medea were forced into exile. The couple had children, and eventually moved to Corinth. There, Jason decided to divorce Medea and marry a native Corinthian princess instead. With that, the action of Medea begins.

The most well-known part of the myth was the story of the quest of the Argonauts (sailors in the Argo) for the Golden Fleece. But Euripides focuses not on this heroic narrative but on its squalid aftermath, and he seems to have invented certain key aspects of the story. In previous versions, the children were either murdered by Creon's family or, according to another story, accidentally killed by Medea, when she tried to use magic to make them immortal. The shocking events at the end of this play would not have been anticipated by Euripides' audience.

Euripides' concentration on the domestic troubles in Corinth, rather than the heroic quest, allows him to present Jason in a disturbingly unheroic light: as a cad who struggles to muster unconvincing strategic and rhetorical arguments to justify his shabby treatment of his first wife. Although Jason tries to talk like a Sophist, it is Medea who is the real possessor of sophia in the play. The term sophia has negative and positive connotations: it can suggest deep understanding, but it can also imply mere cleverness. The play invites us to consider which character is the smartest: Jason, with his dodges and evasions, or Medea, with her unpredictable, cruel stratagems.

Medea is strongly marked as an outsider in three crucial ways: as a woman in a male-dominated world; as a foreigner or “barbarian” in a Greek city; and as a smart person surrounded by fools. On all these grounds, the play initially seems to invite us to side with Medea. She is obviously the wronged party in her relationship with Jason; and yet, even as she expresses her devastation at the betrayal, she never presents herself as a victim. Rather, she is fierce, “like a bull or a lioness,” and highly articulate in her analysis of her situation. She claims even the male values of military honor for herself and for all women, suggesting in one famous passage that women who undergo the pain and danger of childbirth are far braver than men who fight in war: “I would rather face battle / three times than go through childbirth once.” It is tempting to read these lines as proto-feminist, and to see Euripides, the clever poet, as sympathetic to his clever heroine, and as a defender of the rights and dignity of women and foreigners, before an audience of Athenian male citizens.

But as the play goes on, our vision of Medea is likely to change. We may begin to see her not as strong and brave, but as frighteningly violent; not as wise, but as too clever by half. This is a disturbing play that forces readers to revise their feelings several times. Is Medea sensible in her defense of her honor and her rights, or is she driven crazy by the gods of passion? Or should we see her as an agent of the gods, imposing divine justice on oath-breaking humans? Is Euripides challenging or confirming Greek male prejudices against foreigners and women? Is he recommending new forms of wisdom, or warning against the false cleverness of upstarts and outsiders? And what does it say about the city of Athens that it is the Athenian king, Aegeus, who will welcome this terrifying figure into his community?

Thematically, the most important threads in the play include the opposition of order and chaos, and the idea of time, especially the reversal of time. The Nurse opens the play by wishing that history could be reversed, that the Argo had never set sail: the play begins with a desire to undo the beginning of the story. Medea is the granddaughter of a god, Helios, the Sun, which associates her closely with the regular passing of time, in the sun’s rising and setting. Her violent revenge at the injustice done to her can be seen as an attempt to do the impossible: to undo, by violence, her life history ever since the sailing of the Argo, to regain her lost honor and resume her old self, an unmarried princess. It can also be seen as an attempt at justice, a restoration of order out of chaos—but at a terrible cost, and in violation of all moderation and humanity.

Medea is an endlessly fascinating play that seems strikingly modern in its examination of family life, infidelity, failed sexual relationships, the experience of immigrants in a foreign land, and how it feels to be an oppressed or marginalized member of society. It also points to the fear, felt by many people both ancient and modern, that the apparently weaker members of a community, such as women and resident aliens, may be smarter than their masters, and may, if pushed far enough, rise up to destroy their oppressors.

CHARACTERS

MEDEA	AEGEUS, King of Athens
JASON	MESSENGER
Medea's NURSE	CHORUS of Corinthian women
TUTOR of Medea and Jason's sons	Medea and Jason's Two BOYS, sons
CREON, King of Corinth	Attendants

SETTING    Corinth, in front of the house in which Medea and Jason have been living.

[Enter Medea's NURSE from inside the house.]

NURSE    If only the Argo<sup>2</sup> had not slipped through the dark Clashing Rocks<sup>3</sup> and landed at Colchis, if only that pine tree had not been cut down high on Mount Pelion and made into oars for the heroes who went out for the Golden Fleece, 5 sent by King Pelias. Then my mistress Medea would never have sailed to the towers of Iolcus,<sup>4</sup> overwhelmed by her love for Jason.
She would not have talked the daughters of Pelias into killing their father,<sup>5</sup> then fled here to Corinth<sup>6</sup> 10 with her husband and sons—where even in exile she has charmed the citizens of her new home, doing whatever she could to help out Jason.
That is the strongest safeguard there is:
when a wife always sides with her husband. 15
But now they're at odds, their bond is infected.
Deserting his children along with my mistress, Jason has climbed into a royal bed, with the daughter of Creon,<sup>7</sup> king of this land.
Poor Medea feels cruelly dishonored: 20 she keeps shouting about their oaths and bringing up the solemn pledge of their joined right hands;
she keeps calling on the gods to witness what kind of thanks she gets from Jason.
She stays in bed and won't eat; she hurts all over. 25

1. Translated by Sheila H. Murnaghan.

2. The first ship constructed by Jason for his quest for the Golden Fleece.

3. Colchis, home of Medea, lay on the other side of the Black Sea from Corinth, past the rocks near the mouth of the Bosphorus.

4. Thessaly, in Greece.

5. Pelias, Jason's uncle, reneged on a promise to give Jason the throne of Iolchus if he brought back the Golden Fleece. In revenge, Medea persuaded Pelias's daughters to boil him alive, believing that they would make him young again.

6. After the scandal of Pelias's murder, Jason and Medea had to go into exile, to Corinth.

7. Creon, king of Corinth, is not the same as the Creon (Kreon) of Thebes in Sophocles' Theban plays.

She's been weeping constantly since she heard that she has been cast off by her husband.
 She stares at the ground. When friends give advice, she listens no more than a stone or the sea, though sometimes she turns her pale neck away, 30 and sighs to herself about her dear father, her homeland, her house—all those she betrayed when she left with the man who now rejects her.
 Poor thing, this disaster has made her learn how hard it is to be cut off from home. 35
 She hates her sons, gets no joy from seeing them.
 I am afraid that she's planning something [I know her: she's relentless and will not put up with being mistreated. I can imagine her sharpening a knife and stabbing someone, 40 sneaking into the house where the wedding bed's made, to kill the king and his daughter's new bridegroom]<sup>8</sup>
 and will only cause herself more trouble.
 She is fierce. If you get into a fight with her,
 you won't come out singing a victory song. 45

[Enter the TUTOR with the two BOYS.]

But here are the boys coming back from the track, not thinking about their mother's problems—
 young minds don't like to dwell on trouble.

TUTOR Old servant of my mistress's house, why do you stand here alone by the door, 50 pouring out your troubles to yourself?
 Surely Medea doesn't want you to leave her?

NURSE Old tutor of the sons of Jason, when slaves are true-hearted, if their masters' luck takes a turn for the worse, they suffer, too. 55
 I felt so wretched about my mistress that I craved the relief of coming out here to tell her sad story to heaven and earth.

TUTOR That poor woman has not stopped lamenting?

NURSE If only! Her pain's still in its early stages. 60

TUTOR What a fool, even if she is my mistress!

She still doesn't know her latest troubles.

NURSE What is it, old man? Don't keep it to yourself.

TUTOR No, nothing. I shouldn't have said what I did.

NURSE Please don't leave a fellow slave in the dark. 65

If it really matters, I won't tell anyone.

TUTOR I heard someone talking, though he didn't notice.

I was watching the old men playing checkers there where they sit by the spring of Peirene.<sup>9</sup>

8. Words in brackets here and throughout are considered by most scholars to be later additions to the text, sometimes inserted by actors, sometimes by scholars and editors [translator's note].

9. A spring in Corinth.

He said that Creon, the king here in Corinth, is planning to exile these boys from the city, along with their mother. Whether this is true
I have no idea. I certainly hope not. 70

NURSE Would Jason really put his sons through that, even if he is on bad terms with their mother? 75

TUTOR Old loyalties are trumped by new ones;
and that man is no friend to this household.

NURSE We're done for, if we face a new wave of troubles when we haven't bailed ourselves out from the last.

TUTOR But now's not the right time for her to find out. 80
So you should keep quiet. Don't say a word.

NURSE Children, do you hear how your father treats you?
He is my master: I can't curse him. But—it's clear he's willing to hurt his own family.

TUTOR And who isn't? It should be clear to you 85 that all people put themselves before others [sometimes with good reason, sometimes for gain] if this father prefers his new wife to his children.

NURSE Go inside, boys. It will all be fine.
Now you, make sure they are kept by themselves, 90 not near their mother while she's so distraught.
She looks at them the way a mad bull would,
as if she's about to make some move.
She won't stop raging until she crushes someone—better her enemies than people she loves. 95

MEDEA [from inside] It's too much, too much to bear!
I can't take any more. I want to die!

NURSE Boys, see what I mean! Your mother keeps stirring up her angry heart.
Quickly, quickly, into the house, 100
but don't go near her: stay out of view.
Don't get too close, be on the watch for her vengeful heart and her self-willed, savage temper.

Go on inside, quick as you can. 105
Her grief is like a thundercloud which her mounting fury will ignite.
And then what will she do, this proud-to-the-core, uncurbable spirit stung by sorrows? 110

[Exit the TUTOR and the BOYS into the house. Enter MEDEA.]

MEDEA I'm abused, I'm abused, that's why I cry.
Boys, you are cursed, your mother is loathsome.
You might as well die along with your father.
Let the whole house come down!

NURSE No, no! I don't like the sound of that. 115 Why blame your sons for their father's offenses? Why turn on them?

Children, I'm sick with fear for you.
 Our rulers have frightening tempers; rarely governed, always in charge, 120
 they can't let go of their anger.
 Better to stay on a level plain.
 I'd rather grow old in safety and not lead a life of grandeur.
 "Moderation" is a fine motto, 125 and we do well to live by it.
 Reaching for more never brings any real advantage in human life—only greater ruin when an angry god comes down on a house. 130

[Enter the CHORUS of Corinthian women.]

CHORUS I heard a voice! I heard the cry of that poor Colchian woman!
 Tell us, old nurse, has she still not calmed down?
 I'm sure I could hear through the double doors her wailing voice. 135
 I get no joy from the grief in this house.
 I consider myself a friend.

NURSE There is no house. That's all gone.
 The husband's possessed by a royal bed.
 The wife wastes away in the innermost room, and will not be comforted 140
 by anything a friend can say.

MEDEA Let it come! A thunderbolt Straight through my head!
 Why stay alive? In death 145
 I can rest from a life I hate.

CHORUS O Zeus, O Earth, O Light!
 Do you hear the grief
 in that girl's sad song?
 Why this foolish lust 150
 for a fatal resting place?
 You want death to hurry up?
 Do not ever ask for that.
 So your husband adores someone else.
 You should not rage at him. 155
 Zeus will stand up for you.
 Do not ruin yourself mourning that man.

MEDEA Mighty Themis! Holy Artemis!<sup>1</sup>
 Do you see what I suffer—even after I bound my hateful husband with solemn oaths? 160

1. Themis, whose name means "Right" or "Lawfulness," is a female Titan associated with order and keeping promises. Artemis, a daughter of Zeus, is a goddess who protects virgins and women in childbirth.

I'd gladly watch him and his new bride being smashed to pieces with their whole house for the huge wrong they have done to me.
 My father! My city!—shamefully lost when I killed my brother.<sup>2</sup>

165

NURSE You can hear what gods she calls on:
 unfailing Themis and great Zeus, who oversees the oaths of mortals.
 There is no way she'll end her anger with just some empty gesture.

170

CHORUS If she would meet us face-to-face
 and listen to our words,
 she might let go of the rage in her heart,
 and soften her harsh temper.
 I am always eager
 to help a friend.

175

Go bring her out of the house.
 Tell her we're on her side.
 You have to act before she can hurt those boys in there: grief spurs her on.

180

NURSE I doubt I can persuade her, but I'll do as you ask me to,
 and make one last attempt.
 When we try to speak to her,
 she glares at us like a bull or a lioness with newborn cubs.
 I have to say our ancestors showed very little sense when they invented melodies for revels, festivals, and feasts, the sweetest sounds in life, but made no songs or harmonies to soothe the bitter grief that leads to death and devastation and brings whole houses down.
 A musical cure for that would be worth having. Why should people sing when they're gathered at a feast and there's joy enough already in the meal's abundance?

185

190

195

200

[Exit the NURSE into the house.]

CHORUS I hear the pain in her loud laments;
 she shouts out high and shrill,
 at the faithless husband who spurns her bed.

2. After the theft of the Golden Fleece, Jason and Medea were pursued by the outraged Colchians. To slow them down, Medea killed her brother, Aspyrtus, and threw his body parts behind her.

She calls on Themis to hear her wrongs, daughter of Zeus, upholder of oaths.
 Because of an oath, she crossed to Greece, sailing on the dark night waves of the Black Sea's watery gate.<sup>3</sup> 205

[Enter MEDEA from the house, with attendants.]

MEDEA Women of Corinth, I have left the house 210 to avoid offending you. With many people, you know that they're proud whether they stay home or go out. But others are seen as aloof just because they choose to lead quiet lives.
 People aren't fair when they judge with their eyes. 215
 Not taking the trouble to look inside, they hate someone on sight who's done them no harm.
 So a stranger really has to fit in.
 It's not good when even a self-willed native is out of touch and rude to fellow citizens. 220
 In my case, this unexpected calamity has crushed my spirit. I am finished, friends, done with life's joys. I wish I were dead.
 My husband, who was everything to me, is actually, I now see, the worst of men. 225
 Of all living, breathing, thinking creatures, women are the most absolutely wretched.
 First, you have to pay an enormous sum to buy a husband who, to make things worse, gets to be the master of your body.<sup>4</sup> 230 And it's a gamble: you're as likely to get a bad one as a good one. Divorce means disgrace for women, and you can't say no to a husband.
 Finding herself among strange laws and customs,
 a wife needs to be clairvoyant; she has not 235 learned at home how to deal with her mate.
 If we work hard at all these things, and our husbands don't chafe at the yoke, then that's an enviable life. Otherwise, we're better off dead.
 A man who feels oppressed by the company at home, 240 goes out and gets relief for his low spirits [turning to a friend or someone else his age], but we can only look to that one other person.
 They tell us that we enjoy a sheltered life, staying at home while they are out fighting. 245 How wrong they are! I would rather face battle three times than go through childbirth once.
 But it isn't the same for you as for me.
 This is your city. The houses you grew up in,

3. The "gate" is the Bosphorus Strait, connecting the Black Sea to the Mediterranean.

4. In ancient Greece, the bride's family had to pay a dowry to the husband.

all your daily pleasures, your friends, are here. 250
 I am alone, without a city, disowned by my husband, snatched from a foreign land.
 I have no mother, brother, or other family to shelter me now that disaster has struck.
 So I have just one thing to ask of you: 255
 if some plan or scheme occurs to me by which I can get back at my husband [and the king and his daughter, Jason's new wife], say nothing. A woman is usually quite timid, shying away from battles and weapons, 260 but if her marriage bed's dishonored, no one has a deadlier heart.

CHORUS I will do that. You are right to pay him back, Medea. I can see why you're aggrieved.
 [Enter CREON.]

But here is Creon, ruler of this land, 265 coming to announce some new decision.

CREON You, with your scowls and your spite for your husband, Medea, I command you to leave this land.
 Take your two sons and go into exile—and no delaying. I have authority 270 over this decree, and I'm not going home until I've placed you outside our borders.

MEDEA Oh no! I am completely destroyed.
 My enemies are spreading their sails to the wind, and I can't disembark from disaster. 275

But bad as things are, I have to ask:
 what's your reason, Creon, for throwing me out?

CREON I'll come right out and say it: I'm afraid that you'll do my daughter some incurable harm.
 There are many signs that point to this. 280

You are clever and skilled at causing damage, and you feel injured in your empty bed.
 People have told me you're threatening us all:
 the bride's father, the bridegroom, and the bride.
 So I'm acting first to protect myself. 285
 I would rather earn your hatred now than regret later on that I was too lenient.

MEDEA Not again!
 Creon, the same thing keeps happening:
 my reputation gets me into trouble. 290

No man who has his wits about him would raise his sons to be too clever.
 Not only will they be considered lazy, they'll be resented by their fellow citizens.
 When you propose a clever plan to dullards, 295 they see you as useless rather than clever;
 and those who are thought to be sophisticated are bothered when the people think you're smarter.

This is exactly what has happened to me.

I'm clever, so I'm envied by one group [to some I'm idle, to some the reverse] 300 and annoy the rest—cleverness has limits.

I know you're afraid I'll do you some harm.
But why be worried? I am in no position to go on the offensive against a king. 305

How have you wronged me? You gave your daughter to the man you wanted to. The one I hate is my husband. You were acting sensibly.

I don't blame you because you're doing well.
Marry her off! Best of luck to all! But— 310 just let me stay. I may have been mistreated, but I'll keep quiet, yielding to my betters.

CREON Your words sound pleasing, but I am afraid that you have some evil plan in your heart.
In fact, I trust you less than I did before. 315
A hot-tempered woman—or man—is easier to guard against than a silent, clever one.
No, you have to leave at once. Enough talking.
It is decided: you are my enemy, and none of your tricks can keep you here. 320

[MEDEA kneels and grasps CREON's knees and hand in a gesture of ritual supplication.]

MEDEA No! By your knees! By your daughter the bride!

CREON Your words are wasted. You will never convince me.

MEDEA You're ignoring my prayers and driving me out?

CREON I care about my family, not about you.

MEDEA My lost home! I can't stop thinking about it. 325

CREON That's what means most to me, after my children.

MEDEA Oh, what a disaster to fall in love!

CREON That depends, I'd say, on the circumstances.

MEDEA Zeus, be sure to notice who's making me suffer.

CREON Don't be a fool! Go, and take my troubles with you. 330

MEDEA I have troubles too, far more than I need.

CREON My guards are preparing to throw you out.

MEDEA No, not that! Creon, I implore you.

CREON So you're determined to make this difficult.

MEDEA I will leave. I don't ask you to change that. 335

CREON Then why keep pressing me? Let go of my hand.

MEDEA Just let me stay here for one more day so I can work out my plans for exile and make some arrangements for my sons, since their father is not inclined to help. 340

Show them some pity. You have children yourself;

It's only natural to wish these boys well.

I'm not worried about exile for myself

but I feel the hardship it brings my sons.

CREON I'm really not a tyrant at heart: 345 to my own cost, I have listened to others.
 Even though I know it's not a good idea, you get your wish. But I warn you, if tomorrow's sun finds you and your boys still inside the borders of this country, 350 you will die. I say it, and I mean it.
 So stay on, if you must, for this one day;
 you won't have time to do the harm I fear.
 [Exit CREON. MEDEA stands up.]

CHORUS Poor, poor woman, 355 weighed down by troubles, where can you turn? What welcome, what house, what sheltering land [will you find]?
 Medea, some god has tossed you into a sea of constant trials. 360

MEDEA It's bad all around. Who would deny that?
 But don't imagine that everything's settled.
 There are struggles ahead for the bridal pair,
 and many ordeals for the bride's father.
 Would I have fawned on him like that 365 without something to gain or a secret plan?
 There wouldn't have been that talking and touching.
 But he is such a credulous fool:
 when he had a chance to throw me out and foil my plans, he gave me one more day to make corpses out of my three tormenters— 370
 the father, the daughter, and my own husband.
 I can think of many routes to their death;
 I'm not sure, friends, which one to try first, whether to set the newlyweds' house on fire, 375 or stab someone's liver with a sharpened sword, silently entering the bridal bedroom.
 But there is a risk: if I am caught sneaking into the house, I will lose my life and give my enemies a chance to laugh. 380
 The safest course is the one I know best:
 to poison them with deadly drugs.
 That's it, then.
 But once they are dead—then what city will take me in? Where is the friend 385 who will save my life by giving me shelter?
 Nowhere. So I will wait a little while,
 and if some tower of safety appears
 I will kill them with a hidden trick.
 But if I am forced to act in the open, 390
 I will strike with a sword. Ready to die,
 I will go to the very edge of daring.

By Hecate,<sup>5</sup> whom I most revere, the goddess who is my chosen ally, who haunts the darkest corners of my house, 395
 they will not get away with causing this pain.
 I will make sure they find their marriage bitter, and bitter the tie with Creon, bitter my exile.
 Now Medea, use everything you know;
 you must plot and scheme as you approach 400
 the dreadful act that will test your spirit.
 Do you see what is being done to you?
 Do not be mocked by this Sisyphean wedding;<sup>6</sup>
 You spring from a noble father and Helios the sun.
 You have the skill, and along with that 405 a woman's nature—useless for doing good but just right for contriving evil.

CHORUS Sacred streams are flowing backwards; right and wrong are turned around.
 It's men who do the shady scheming, 410 swear by the gods, then break their oaths.
 News of this will bring us glory, rightful honor for the female race;
 women will at last be free from the taint of ugly rumors. 415 Enough of ancient poets' legends that tell of us as breaking faith!
 The lord of song, divine Apollo, did not grant the lyre's sweet music for the speaking of our minds, 420 or I could have made an answer to the stories spread by men.
 Time's long record speaks on both sides.
 Mad with love, you left your father.
 Sailing through the briny border 425 of the double Clashing Rocks,<sup>7</sup> you settled in a land of strangers.
 Now your husband's left your bed;
 so you're banished from this country,
 a lonely exile without rights. 430

All over Greece, oaths prove hollow;
 shame has melted into air.
 And for you there's no safe harbor
 in your lost paternal home,

5. Goddess associated with the moon and with witchcraft.

6. I.e., in the spirit of Sisyphus, a legendary Corinthian trickster, punished in Hades with the eternal task of pushing a rock uphill only to have it roll down again [translator's note].

7. The path between the cliffs is the Bosphorus Strait.

no escaping from your troubles, as you watch a royal princess take your marriage and your house.

[Enter JASON.]

JASON This is not the first time that I've observed how impossible a stubborn person can be.
 You had the chance to stay in this country, going along with what your betters had planned, but you're being thrown out for your pointless rants, and there's nothing I can do. Fine! Don't stop talking about "that disgusting Jason."
 But for what you've said about the rulers—you are lucky that it's only exile.
 The king gets more and more angry. I've tried to calm him down, hoping you could stay.
 Yet you keep up this nonsense, raving on against the king. So you're being thrown out.
 Still, I am not one to abandon family.
 I'm here now to look out for your interests, so you and the boys don't leave without money or other provisions. Exile's not easy.
 Maybe you can't stop hating me,
 but I'll always want what is best for you.

MEDEA You really are disgusting! That sums up what I have to say about your spinelessness.
 You've really come here, when you are hated [by me and the gods and everyone else]?
 It's not some daring noble endeavor to look friends in the face after you've wronged them, but the lowest and sickest of human failings:
 shamelessness. Still, it is good that you came.
 If I name all your appalling actions,
 I'll get some relief, and you'll feel much worse.
 Let me start at the very beginning:
 I saved you, as every Greek knows who shipped out with you on the Argo, when you had to bring the fire-breathing bulls under a yoke and sow a deadly field.<sup>8</sup>
 And that serpent, which never slept and held the Golden Fleece in winding coils,
 I killed it, bringing you the light of salvation.<sup>9</sup>
 And as for me, I cheated my father and followed you to Iolcus<sup>1</sup> and Mt. Pelion,

8. Jason was challenged by Medea's father, King Aeetes, to plow a field with a pair of fire-breathing bulls and sow it with dragon's teeth, which would instantly grow into armed men. With Medea's help, he succeeded.

9. The Golden Fleece had hung from a tree, around which coiled a fierce dragon; Medea succeeded in defeating the dragon.

1. Ancestral kingdom of Jason.

infatuated, not thinking straight.
 I made Pelias die in the most gruesome way,
 at his daughters' hands; I ruined his house.
 All of this I did for you, you lowlife, 480 and you have deserted me for someone new even though we have children. If we didn't, you could be forgiven for wanting her.
 Our oaths mean nothing to you. I can't tell if you think those gods have lost their power, 485 or imagine that the rules have changed for mortals—since you're well aware that you broke a promise.
 My right hand here—to think I let you touch it, and to clasp my knees.<sup>2</sup> I was abused by a swindler, deceived by false hopes. 490 Still, let me ask you for some friendly advice.
 [But why should I think you'd help me now?
 Well, if I ask you, it'll make you look worse.]
 So where should I go? To my father's house which I betrayed when I ran off with you? 495
 To the poor daughters of Pelias? I'm sure I'd be welcome there, where I killed their father.
 That is how it stands: my friends at home hate me now, and those I should have treated well I turned into enemies by helping you. 500
 For what I did, you made me the envy of all Greek women—with such a marvelous catch, such a loyal husband that I'm being expelled,
 a miserable outcast from this country, without any friends, alone with my sons. 505 It doesn't look so good for the bridegroom—children out begging with the woman who saved him.
 Zeus, you should have given us a touchstone for human nature as you did for gold!
 We need a way to tell from someone's looks 510 whether or not he's base on the inside.

CHORUS There is a dreadful, incurable anger when former lovers fall to fighting.

JASON It seems I'll have to be a skillful speaker, and, like a careful pilot, reef in my sails 515
 if I have any hope of outrunning the surging onslaught of your angry words.
 You make much of the help you gave me, but I say that it was Aphrodite<sup>3</sup> alone who assured the success of my venture. 520

2. Touching a person's right hand and knees was a way of asking for a favor, assuming the position of a supplicant. Medea is implying that Jason has failed to pay her back for the favors she did him.

3. Goddess of love, beauty, and sex.

You may be quick-witted, but like it or not,
 I could tell how you were compelled by Eros's sure arrows to save my life.<sup>4</sup>
 But no need to tally this up exactly:
 whatever you did was helpful enough. 525 Still, it's my view that you got much more out of my being saved than I ever did.
 First of all, you are living in Greece, not some foreign country. Here you find justice and the rule of law; force has no standing. 530 And all of Greece knows how clever you are; you're famous. If you lived at the ends of the earth, no one would ever have heard of you.
 I see no point in a house full of gold, or a gift for singing better than Orpheus,<sup>5</sup> 535 without the good fortune of being well known.
 So—since you have turned this into a contest,
 those are the things I accomplished for you.
 Now, on this royal marriage that you dislike,
 I can show you that I acted wisely, 540 soberly, and in the best interest of you and the boys. Just stay calm for a moment.
 When I moved here from the city of Iolcus,
 I was dragged down by impossible problems.
 What better solution could there be 545 for an exile like me than to marry the princess?
 You are upset, but it's not what you think, that I'm sick of you and smitten with this girl, or want some prize for having lots of children;
 I am satisfied with the ones we've got. 550
 It's so we'll live well and won't be in need.
 And that is important. I can tell you:
 everyone steers clear of a penniless friend.
 I will raise our sons as befits our family and add some brothers to the boys you gave me. 555 Bringing them together in a single tribe, I'll prosper. What are more children to you?
 In my case, having new offspring benefits the older ones. Is that such a bad plan?
 You wouldn't say so if it weren't for the sex. 560
 You women reach the point where you think if all's well in the bedroom everything's fine;
 but if some trouble arises there,
 you insist on rejecting whatever's best.

4. I.e., Cupid, god of sex—the son of Aphrodite. Eros shoots arrows that inspire desire.

5. Orpheus, son of the god Apollo and the muse Calliope, was a poet-singer with semimag-ical powers: even wild animals were enchanted by his songs. Orpheus was famously devoted to his wife, Eurydice; when she died, he traveled down to the underworld to try to rescue her.

- We should have some other way of getting children. 565
 Then there would be no female race, and mankind would be free from trouble.
- CHORUS Jason, you've put together a polished speech.
 But, at the risk of disagreeing, I say that you do wrong to desert your wife. 570
- MEDEA I'm clearly different from everyone else.
 To me, a scoundrel who is good at speaking should have to pay a special price for that.
 Since he knows he can gloss over his crimes, he'll try anything. But cleverness has limits. 575 That's what you are. So don't try to impress me with clever words. A single point refutes you: if you were so noble, you would have gotten my consent to this marriage, not kept it secret.
- JASON Oh yes, I'm sure you would have agreed 580
 if I had told you then, when even now you can't help reacting with fury.
- MEDEA That wasn't it. You thought a foreign wife would be an embarrassment in years to come.
- JASON You need to understand. It is not for the woman 585 that I'm taking on this royal marriage.
 It's what I told you before. I only want to give you protection and safeguard our children by fathering royal siblings for them.
- MEDEA Spare me a life of shameful wealth 590 or a good situation that eats at my soul.
- JASON You know what you really need to pray for?
 The sense not to see a good thing as shameful, not to think you're suffering when you're doing fine.
- MEDEA Go on, be cruel. You have a safe home here, 595 while I'll be cast out with nowhere to go.
- JASON You chose that. Don't blame anyone else.
- MEDEA How? I betrayed you by marrying somebody?
- JASON By rudely cursing the royal family.
- MEDEA Well, I'll bring a curse to your house too. 600
- JASON I have had enough of squabbling with you, but if you want some money from me to provide for you and the boys in exile, just say so. I want to be generous and can contact friends who will treat you well. 605
 You would be an idiot to turn me down.
 You'll be better off if you forget your anger.
- MEDEA I want nothing to do with your friends.
 I won't take anything you give. Don't bother.
 No good comes from a bad man's gifts. 610
- JASON Well, the gods will witness how eager I am to do what I can for you and the boys.
 You are so stubborn that you reject what's good and snub your friends. You will suffer all the more.

 MEDEA Just go! I'm sure that staying away this long 615 has left you longing for your new bride.
 Go play the groom. And maybe I'm right to hope you will have a marriage that makes you weep.

[Exit JASON.]

CHORUS Overwhelming love never leads to virtue, or a good reputation. 620
 Just enough Aphrodite is the greatest blessing.
 Goddess, don't aim at me with your golden bow and arrows dipped in desire.

I choose to be wooed by sober restraint—the best gift of the gods. 625
 I won't have Aphrodite stirring up quarrels by making me fall for a stranger. She should grant us harmonious marriages.

Beloved country! Beloved home!
 May I never lose my city; 630 that is a life without hope,
 the hardest of trials to bear.
 Better, far better to die,
 than ever come to that.
 There is no deeper pain 635 than being cut off from home.

I have seen it for myself;
 no one had to tell me.
 For you have no city,
 no friends who feel for you 640
 in your bitter struggles.
 Whoever doesn't honor friends with an open heart, deserves an awful death
 and is no friend of mine. 645

[Enter AEGEUS.]<sup>6</sup>

AEGEUS Hello, Medea! And all good wishes—the warmest of greetings among true friends.

MEDEA Good wishes to you, son of wise Pandion, Aegeus! Where are you coming from?

AEGEUS Straight from Apollo's ancient oracle.<sup>7</sup> 650

MEDEA What took you there, to the center of the earth?<sup>8</sup>

AEGEUS I wanted to know how I might have children.

6. This stage direction is a modern guess, though presumably the direction of Aegeus's entrance must differ from those of all previous entrances in the play—underscoring the unex-pectedness of his arrival.

7. Delphi.

8. At Delphi was a stone that was supposedly the navel of the Earth.

MEDEA Goodness! Have you been childless all this time?
 AEGEUS Yes, childless—thanks, I am sure, to some god.
 MEDEA Do you have a wife, or do you sleep alone? 655
 AEGEUS I'm married; I have a wife who shares my bed.
 MEDEA And what did Apollo say about children?
 AEGEUS Subtler words than a man can make sense of.
 MEDEA Am I allowed to know what he said?
 AEGEUS Of course. I need the help of your clever mind. 660 MEDEA Then if it's allowed, tell me what he said.
 AEGEUS Not to untie the foot of the wineskin . . . <sup>9</sup> MEDEA Before doing what? Or arriving where?
 AEGEUS Before I get back to my ancestral hearth.
 MEDEA And what's your reason for landing here? 665
 AEGEUS There's a man called Pittheus, king of Troezen.<sup>1</sup>
 MEDEA Son of Pelops,<sup>2</sup> said to be very pious.
 AEGEUS I want to ask him about the prophecy.
 MEDEA Yes, he's wise and knows about such things.
 AEGEUS And he's my most trusted comrade at war. 670 MEDEA Well, good luck! I hope you get what you want.
 AEGEUS But why are you looking so red-eyed and pale?
 MEDEA It turns out I have the worst possible husband.
 AEGEUS What are you saying? Tell me what's upset you.
 MEDEA Jason mistreats me though I've given him no cause. 675 AEGEUS What is he doing? Explain what you mean.
 MEDEA He put another woman in charge of our house.
 AEGEUS Would he do something so improper?
 MEDEA He would. So I, once prized, am now dismissed.
 AEGEUS Is he in love? Or has he fallen out with you? 680
 MEDEA So much in love that he's abandoned his family.
 AEGEUS Well, if he's that bad, forget about him.
 MEDEA He's in love with the thought of a royal match.
 AEGEUS Then tell me: who is the new wife's father?
 MEDEA Creon, who rules right here in Corinth. 685 AEGEUS Well, I can see why you are angry.
 MEDEA Devastated. And I'm being expelled.
 AEGEUS From bad to worse! What's the reason for that?
 MEDEA Creon has declared me an exile from Corinth.
 AEGEUS And Jason accepts this? That's not right. 690 MEDEA He protests now, but he'll gladly put up with it.
 So I'm reaching out my hands to your face and making myself your suppliant.
 Take pity on me in my wretched state,

9. Wine was sometimes stored in animal skins, the leg being used as a spigot for dispensing drinks. The imagery suggests both "Don't get drunk" and "Don't have sex."

1. Pittheus will give his daughter Aethra to Aegeus, after getting him drunk; the Athenian hero Theseus will be conceived in this way.

2. Pelops, son of Tantalus, was served up as food to the gods by his father. The gods restored him to life, and he became the founder of the Peloponnesse.

- don't let me become a lonely outcast. 695
 Take me into your country and your house.
 Do this, and may the gods grant your wish.
 May you live out the happy life you long for.
 You don't know how lucky you are to find me:
 I can take care of your lack of children. 700
 I know the right drugs to make you a father.
- AEGEUS There are many reasons why I want to help.
 First the gods, who favor suppliants, and then the children you say I could have—something where I'm really at a loss. 705
 So, if you can get yourself to my land,
 I will try to give you proper shelter.
 [I should make one thing plain to you:
 I'm not willing to take you away from here.]
 If you leave this place on your own 710 and arrive at my house also on your own, you will be safe. I will not hand you over.
 But I can't offend my friends while I'm here.
- MEDEA Agreed. Now if you could make a formal pledge, then I will feel you've treated me perfectly. 715
- AEGEUS You don't trust me? What's on your mind?
- MEDEA I trust you. But Pelias' family hates me, and Creon, too. If you are bound by oaths, you can't let them take me from your land.
 If you just say yes and don't swear by the gods, 720 you might end up being gracious and giving in to their demands. I'm completely powerless, while they have wealth and status on their side.
- AEGEUS You clearly have this all figured out.
 So if you think I should, I won't refuse. 725
 This will put me in a stronger position, with a good excuse to give your enemies, and it helps you. Name the gods I should swear by.
- MEDEA Swear by the Earth and by the Sun, father of my father,<sup>3</sup> and the entire race of gods. 730
- AEGEUS To do—or not to do—what? Say it.
- MEDEA Not ever to cast me out from your land, and if some enemy tries to lead me away,
 not to allow it while you live and breathe.
- AEGEUS I swear by the Earth and the light of the Sun, and all the gods, I will do as you say. 735
- MEDEA Good. And the penalty if you break the oath?
- AEGEUS Whatever ungodly people have to suffer.
- MEDEA A good journey to you. All is in place.
 I will come to your city as soon as I can, 740 once I have fulfilled my plans and desires.

3. Helios, the Sun, is father of Aeetes, king of Colchis, Medea's father.

CHORUS May Hermes,<sup>4</sup> guide of travelers, speed you to your home,
 and may you gain your heart's desire, for you are an honorable man, Aegeus, that is clear to me. 745

[Exit AEGEUS.]

MEDEA O Zeus, O Justice born of Zeus, O Sun!
 Now, friends, I know I am on the path to glorious victory over my enemies.
 Now I feel sure they will have to pay. 750
 I was at a loss, and then this man appeared, who will be a safe haven when my plots are done.
 I can fasten my mooring line to him when I have made my way to Athens.
 And now I will tell you what I have I mind; 755 listen to this, though I doubt you will like it.
 I will send a trusted servant to Jason who will ask him to meet me face to face.
 When he comes, I will give a soothing speech about how I agree with him and now believe 760 that his faithless marriage is a first-rate plan, advantageous and well thought through.
 Then I'll plead for the children to stay behind;
 not that I want to leave them in this hostile land [and have my children mistreated by enemies]; 765 it's part of a trick to kill the king's daughter.
 I'll send them to her with gifts in their hands [for the bride, so they won't have to leave], a delicate robe and a golden crown.
 Once she takes this finery and puts it on, 770 she—and whoever touches her—will die because of poisons I will spread on the gifts.
 That's all there is to say on that subject.
 But the thought of what I have to do next fills me with grief: I need to kill the children, 775 no one should hope to spare them that.
 Once I've torn Jason's house apart, I'll leave and pay no price for the poor boys' death.
 I will bring myself to this unholy act because I cannot let my enemies laugh. 780 [So be it! Why should I live? I have no country, no home, no way of escaping my troubles.]
 It was a bad mistake to leave my home swayed by the words of a man from Greece, but with the gods' help I will punish him. 785
 He won't see the children we had grow up

4. Hermes, the messenger god, was the child of Zeus by the nymph Maia.

and he won't be able to have any more with his brand-new bride: no, she's doomed to an agonizing death from my drugs.

No one should think I am meek and mild or passive. I am quite the opposite:
harsh to enemies and loyal to friends,
the kind of person whose life has glory.

790

CHORUS Now that you have shared this plan with me,
I want to help you and to honor human law,
and so I say to you: don't do this thing.

795

MEDEA I see why you say that, but there's no other way;
you haven't been through the troubles I have.

CHORUS You would be able to kill your own children?

MEDEA It is the surest way to wound my husband.

800

CHORUS And to make yourself impossibly wretched.

MEDEA So be it. We have done enough talking.

[MEDEA turns to her attendants.]

One of you servants, go bring Jason here.
And you, the friends I trust with my closest secrets,
if you respect me and have women's hearts,
you will say nothing about my plan.

805

[Exit one of MEDEA's attendants.]

CHORUS The sons of Erechtheus,<sup>5</sup> long blessed with wealth, Athenian offspring of the Olympian gods, raised in a land untouched by war, nourished by the glorious arts, stride easily through the radiant air, where once, it's said, the holy Muses<sup>6</sup> gave birth to golden Harmony.

810

I've heard that Aphrodite dips her cup in the streams of clear Cephissus,<sup>7</sup> and sends sweet breezes through the land.
Crowned with a twining garland of fragrant, blooming roses, she sets Desire at Wisdom's side to foster all that's good.

815

820

How can that land of sacred streams, that open-hearted city,
be a fitting home for you,
unholy woman,
killer of children?

825

5. Athenians. Erechtheus was a legendary king of Athens.

6. The Muses are the daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne (Memory). They inspire poetic and musical creation, and their birthplace is Pieria.

7. River in Athens.

Think what it is to strike a child!
 Think who you are killing!
 By every sacred thing
 I beg of you:
 spare those boys.

830

How can you find the will,
 how can you steel your mind,
 to lift your hand against your sons,
 to do this awful thing?
 How will you stop your tears,
 when you see them dying?
 They will huddle at your knees, and you will not be able to spill their blood
 with a steady heart.

835

840

[Enter JASON.]

JASON You called me, so I've come. You may hate me, but I won't let you down. I'm eager to hear what you think you may need from me after all.

MEDEA Jason, please overlook what I said before.

845

You should be willing to put up with my fits,
 for the sake of the love that we once shared.
 And I have been thinking all of this over and berating myself for being obtuse.
 Why turn on those who wish me well, picking a fight with the country's rulers and my husband, who serves us all by marrying a princess and giving our sons new royal brothers? Why be angry?
 The gods will provide, so how can I lose?
 Shouldn't I think of the boys? I can't forget that I'm an exile and have no friends.

When I look at it that way, I can see
 I've been confused and my rage was pointless.
 I'm all for it now. I think you are wise to arrange this connection. I'm the fool:
 I should have thrown myself into these plans and helped them along, tending the bed and gladly serving your new bride.

860

It's just that women are . . . well, not quite wicked, but anyway you shouldn't copy us and get caught up in silly quarrels.
 Please forgive me: I was wrong before and now I understand much better.
 Boys, boys! Come out of the house to greet your father and talk to him.

870

[Enter the TUTOR and the two BOYS from the house.]

End your anger towards one you should love just as I, your mother, am doing.
 We have made our peace, there is no more strife.
 So take his hand. But oh, when I think of all the trouble the future conceals!

875

My children, in your lives to come,
 will you reach out a loving arm to me?
 I am so quick to weep and full of fear.
 I'm making up my quarrel with your father but even so my eyes are filled with tears.

880

CHORUS Tears are coming to my eyes as well.

I only hope there's nothing worse ahead.

JASON I'm pleased with your present behavior, Medea, and I forgive the past: of course a woman minds if her husband decides to import a new wife.

885

But now your feelings have turned around,
 and you recognize the better course at last.
 That shows you are a sensible woman.
 Now boys, don't think I've been a negligent father.
 With the gods' help, I've secured your position.

890

I am quite sure that you will be leaders here in Corinth, you and your new siblings.
 Just be strong and stay well. I will do the rest, along with whatever god's on our side.

I hope to see you turning into fine young men, and towering over my enemies.

895

But you, why are your cheeks covered with tears?
 Why do you look pale and turn away?

Aren't you happy with what I am saying?

MEDEA It's nothing—just the thought of these children.

900

JASON Don't worry. I will take care of everything.

MEDEA You're right. I can rely on your promises.

It's just that women are made for tears.

JASON But why are you so sad about the children?

MEDEA I am their mother. And your hopes for their future filled me with fear that those things won't happen.

905

Now some of what you are here to discuss has been settled, so I'll move on to the rest:
 since the rulers have decided to banish me [and I really do see that it's for the best so I won't be in your way, or theirs, since I can't help seeming antagonistic],
 I will comply and leave the country.

910

But the boys should stay here and be raised by you;
 ask Creon to spare them this exile.

915

JASON I may not convince him, but I will try.

MEDEA You should get your bride to ask her father to let the boys stay here in this country.

JASON Good idea. She'll do it if I ask her:
she is a woman like any other. 920

MEDEA And I will be part of this effort, too.
I will send her the most splendid gifts that can be found anywhere in the world [a delicate robe and a golden crown] and the boys will take them. Now servants, 925 bring out the presents right away.

[Exit an attendant into the house.]

She will have many reasons to rejoice:
In you she has the best of husbands and she will wear the ornaments that my grandfather Helios left to his heirs. 930

[Enter the attendant with the gifts.]

Take these wedding presents, boys, carry them to the happy royal bride.

They will be perfect gifts for her.

JASON That's ridiculous! Don't deprive yourself.
Do you think the royal house needs dresses, 935 or gold? You should hold on to these things.
I am sure that her high regard for me will matter more than material objects.

MEDEA No. They say even the gods are moved by gifts.
For us, gold counts more than a million words. 940
Her fortunes are high, she has a god on her side, she's young and has power. I'd give my life, and not just gold, to save the boys from exile.

My sons, go into that fine rich house; appeal to your father's new wife, my mistress; 945 ask for reprieve from a life of exile, and hand her the gifts. It is essential that she herself take them from you.
Hurry! And bring back the good news that you have made your mother's wish come true. 950

[Exit JASON, the BOYS, and the TUTOR.]

CHORUS No more hoping that those children will live.
No more, for they are on the road to murder.
The bride will reach out for the golden chains, poor thing, she'll reach out for her doom.
With her own hands she will place in her hair 955 the finery of Death.

Lured by their lovely unearthly glow she'll put on the dress and the wrought-gold crown and make her marriage in the world below.
That is the trap into which she will fall, 960 poor thing, she will follow her destiny, inescapable Death.

And you, unlucky groom,
new member of the royal house,
you are not able to see that you're leading your boys to their life's end, and bringing a hateful death to your bride.
You have no idea of your fate.

965

And you, poor mother of these boys,
I also grieve for you,
since you are set on making them die because of the bed which your husband left.
He thoughtlessly abandoned you and lives with another wife.

970

[Enter the BOYS and the TUTOR.]

TUTOR Mistress! The boys are spared the fate of exile!
The princess gladly accepted the gifts with her own hands. She is on their side.
But . . .
why are you upset at this good fortune?
[Why have you turned your face away?
Why aren't you happy with what I'm saying?] 975

MEDEA Oh no!

TUTOR That doesn't fit with the news I brought.

MEDEA Oh no, oh no!

TUTOR What is it that I don't understand?

985

Was I wrong to think I was bringing good news?

MEDEA You bring the news you bring. It's not your fault.

TUTOR But why are you crying and turning away?

MEDEA I can't help it, old friend. Terrible plans have been devised by the gods—and by me.

990

TUTOR The boys' good standing here will bring you back.

MEDEA First I, in my grief, will bring others down.

TUTOR Other mothers have been torn from their children.

You are mortal and must accept misfortune.

MEDEA Yes, yes, I will. Now you go inside.

995

Take care of whatever the boys might need.

[Exit the TUTOR into the house.]

O boys, boys, you still have a city, and a home where, leaving me for good,
you will be cut off from your unhappy mother.
I will be an exile in a foreign land without the delight of watching you thrive, without the joy of preparing your weddings, tending the bath and the bed, lifting the torches.<sup>8</sup>
How much my own strong will has cost me!
I get nothing, boys, from raising you,

1005

8. Torches were an important feature of ancient weddings, which took place at night.

from running myself ragged with endless work.
 The birth pangs I endured were pointless.
 It pains me to think what hopes I had that you would care for me in old age and prepare me for burial when I die— 1010 the thing that everyone wants. But now that happy dream is dead. Deprived of you,
 I will live out my life in bitter grief.
 And you will embark on a different life with no more loving eyes for your mother. 1015
 But why, why, boys, are you looking at me?
 Why do you smile for this one last time?
 Oh, what should I do? I lost heart, my friends, as soon as I saw their beaming faces.
 I can't do it. So much for my plans! 1020
 I will take the boys away from here.
 Why make them suffer to hurt their father
 if it means I suffer twice as much myself?
 I can't do that. So much for my plans!
 But wait! Can I really bear to be laughed at 1025 and let my enemies go unpunished?
 I have to steel myself. I can't be weak and let those tender thoughts take over.
 Children, into the house. And anyone who is out of place at my sacrifice 1030 can stay away. I will not spare my hand.
 But oh . . .
 My angry heart, do not go through with this.
 For all your pain, let the children live.
 They can be with you and bring you joy. 1035
 And yet—by the vengeful spirits of deepest Hades—<sup>9</sup> there is no way I can allow my enemies to seize my children and to mistreat them.
 [It is certain that they have to die. And so I should kill them, since I gave them life.] 1040
 It is all in place: she cannot escape;
 the crown is on her head; the royal bride revels in her new dress. I heard it clearly.
 Having set out myself on the darkest road
 I will send my sons down one that's even darker. 1045
 I will talk to them. Give me, my children, give me, your mother, your hands to kiss.
 Oh this hand! this mouth! this face!
 Oh my dear ones, my noble sons!
 Be happy—but there. Your father wrecked 1050 what we had here. Oh the joy of holding them, of their tender skin, of their sweet breath.

Go in! Go in! I can no longer bear to look at you. My grief is too strong.
 I see the horror of what I am doing, but anger overwhelms my second thoughts—anger, boundless source of evil.

1055

[Exit the BOYS into the house.]

CHORUS I have often entered into complicated trains of thought, and pursued much deeper questions than women are supposed to tackle.
 For there's a Muse that favors me and confers the gift of wisdom, not on all, but on a few—[you'll find some women here and there] who are not strangers to that Muse.
 So I can say that those who never find themselves producing children are more fortunate by far than those who do.

1060

The childless never need to ask whether children are in the end, a curse or blessing in human life;
 and since they have none of their own,
 they are spared a world of trouble.

1075

Those parents who are blessed with houses full of growing children are constantly worn out by worry:
 will they be able to raise them well and leave behind enough to live on?
 And all along it isn't clear whether after all this care they'll turn out well or badly.

1080

Then there is one final drawback, the hardest thing of all to bear.

1085

When the parents find a way to give their children what they need to grow up strong and honest, but then luck turns: death scoops them up and carries their bodies down to Hades.

1090

What possible good can it do for the gods to impose on us this bitter, bitter sorrow as the price of having children?

MEDEA My friends, I have been waiting a long time now wondering how things would turn out in there.
 But now I see one of Jason's servants coming towards us. He is breathing hard, and it's clear he has something grim to report.

1095

[Enter the MESSENGER.]

- MESSENGER [Oh you have done a dreadful, lawless thing] 1100 Run, Medea! Run! Make your escape—get away in a ship or overland in a carriage.
- MEDEA And what has happened that means I should flee?
- MESSENGER The royal princess has fallen down dead, along with her father, because of your poison. 1105
- MEDEA You have brought the most wonderful news.
 I will always think of you as a true friend.
- MESSENGER What are you saying? Are you out of your mind?
 You have desecrated the royal hearth, and you're glad? Not terrified at what you've done? 1110
- MEDEA I have things to say in response to that.
 But please do not rush through your report.
 How exactly did they die? You will make me twice as happy if they died horribly.
- MESSENGER When your boys and their father first arrived 1115 at the new couple's house, there was much joy among the household slaves. We had been worried, but now a rumor was spreading through us that you and Jason had patched up your quarrel.
 One kissed their hands, another their golden heads, and I in my happiness followed along 1120
 into the women's rooms behind the children.
 The lady who had become our new mistress did not see at first that your sons were there;
 she just gazed adoringly at Jason. 1125
 But then suddenly she shut her eyes and turned her delicate face away, disgusted by the children's presence.
 But your husband mollified the girl, saying, "They are family, don't reject them, let your anger go, look this way again;
 can't you treat your husband's kin as your own, accept their gifts, and ask your father to spare the boys from exile for my sake?" She relented when she saw those fine presents, 1135 and granted him everything he asked.
 As soon as the boys and their father had left,
 she seized that elegant dress and put it on;
 she placed the golden crown on her head and arranged her hair in a shining mirror smiling at her reflected features. 1140 Then she jumped up from her chair and ran all over the house on her little white feet, delighted with her presents; she kept looking down to see how the dress fell against her ankle. 1145
 But then we saw something truly horrible:
 her color changed; she staggered sideways on shaking legs; she nearly hit the ground as she fell backwards into a chair.

 An older woman, thinking at first 1150 that she was possessed by some god like Pan,<sup>1</sup> raised a shout of joy. But then she saw the foaming mouth, the skin drained of blood, the eyeballs twisting in their sockets.
 She countered that shout of joy with a shriek 1155 of woe. One slave girl rushed to the father's room; another went straight to tell the husband about his bride's collapse. The whole house rang with the sound of their frantic footsteps.
 In the time it would take a swift runner 1160 to cover the last lap of a footrace, she came out of her speechless, sightless trance with an awful, chilling cry of pain.
 She was under a double assault:
 the golden crown she had put in her hair 1165 spewed out a torrent of consuming flames, while those fine robes she got from your children were eating away at her pale flesh.
 Burning in flames, she leapt up from her chair and shook her head from side to side 1170 trying to throw off the crown. But the bands held tight, and all of her shaking only made the flames blaze twice as high.
 She gave up the struggle and fell to the floor.
 Only a parent would have known who she was. 1175
 You really couldn't make out her eyes or the shape of her face. From the top of her head blood mixed with fire was streaming down;
 the flesh flowed off her bones like pine sap, loosened by the fangs of your unseen poison, 1180 a horrible sight. No one wanted to touch the corpse. Her fate taught us caution.
 But her poor father came in without warning;
 he entered the room and found the body.
 He began to wail and took it in his arms, 1185 kissed it, and spoke to it: "My poor child, what god has destroyed you in this cruel way, making me lose you when I'm at death's door?
 All I want is to die with you, dear child."
 When he stopped lamenting and tried to stand, 1190 he got tangled up in those silky robes, like a laurel shoot encircled by ivy.
 It was a horrible sort of wrestling match:
 he kept struggling to get up on his legs while she held him back. He pulled hard 1195

1. Half-man, half-goat, a pastoral god associated with wild, ecstatic behavior [translator's note].

but the flesh just came off his old bones.
 In the end, he stopped fighting for his life, worn out, no longer equal to the ordeal.
 Two corpses lie there, the girl and her father [nearby, a disaster that cries out for tears].

1200

I won't go into what this means for you;
 you'll find out what penalty you have to pay.
 The old truth comes home to me again:
 human life is an empty shadow.

People who believe themselves to be the deepest thinkers are the biggest fools.
 There isn't anyone who is truly blessed.
 Rich people may be luckier than others but I wouldn't really call them blessed.

1205

[Exit the MESSENGER.]

CHORUS A god is giving Jason what he deserves: trouble after trouble in a single day.
 [Poor girl, poor daughter of Creon,
 I feel for you: you have been sent to Hades to pay for Jason's marriage.]

1210

MEDEA Friends! My plan is clear: as fast as I can
 I will kill my sons and leave this land.
 I cannot hold back and let those boys be slaughtered by someone who loves them less.
 They have to die, so it is only right that I who gave them life should kill them.
 Arm yourself, my heart! Don't hesitate to do the unavoidable awful thing.
 I must pick up the sword and step across the starting line of a painful course.
 No weakening, no thoughts of the boys—how sweet they are, how you gave them birth.
 Forget your children for this one day;
 grieve afterwards. Even if you kill them, they still are loved—by you, unlucky woman.

1220

1225

[Exit MEDEA into the house.]

CHORUS Look, Mother Earth and Radiant Sun, look at this deadly woman, before she can raise her hand to spill the blood of her children, descendants of your golden line.
 I dread to think of immortal blood shed by mortal hands!
 Hold her back, Zeus-born light! Make her stop!
 Get this miserable murderous Fury out of the house!

1230

1235

All for nothing, your labor in childbirth, all for nothing, your dearly loved children, 1240

you who passed through the perilous border of the dark-faced Clashing Rocks.

Why has relentless anger settled in your heart,

1245

why this rage for death upon death?

The stain of kindred blood weighs heavy.

The gods send the killers evil pains to echo evil crimes.

FIRST BOY (in the house) No! No!

1250

CHORUS Do you hear? Do you hear that child's cry?

Oh that wretched, ill-starred woman!

FIRST BOY Help! How do I get away from our mother?

SECOND BOY I don't know how. There's no escape.

CHORUS Should I go in? I might prevent 1255

those boys from dying.

FIRST BOY Yes, by the gods, yes! Help us now!

SECOND BOY She has us cornered with her sword.

CHORUS Wretched woman, made of stone, made of iron!

I see you really have it in you 1260

to turn your deadly hand

against the boys you bore yourself.

I have only heard of one other woman, who raised her hand against her children:

Ino, driven wild by Zeus' wife<sup>2</sup> 1265

who made her wander far from home.

Poor woman, she plunged into the sea, and dragged her children to unholy death.

Stepping over the seacliff's edge,

she died along with her two sons.

1270

Is any awful thing impossible now?

How much disaster has been caused by the pain of women in marriage!

[Enter JASON.]

JASON You women there beside the house, is Medea inside, the perpetrator 1275

of these terrible crimes? Has she escaped?

Unless she burrows deep in the earth or else grows wings and flies through the air, the royal family will make her pay.

After she killed such powerful people,

1280

does she think she can get away scot-free?

Still, I'm mainly worried about the children.

Those she abused can do the same to her,

2. Ino, a daughter of Cadmus, king of Thebes, was driven mad by Dionysos to participate—along with Cadmus's mother—in the dismemberment of her nephew, Pentheus. Later, she was married to King Athamas and, driven mad by Hera, she leapt into the sea with one or more of their sons.

- but I am here now to save my boys.
 More suffering for me if Creon's kinsmen try to punish them for their mother's crime. 1285
- CHORUS Poor man, you don't know all of your troubles, or you would not have said what you just did.
- JASON What is it? Does she want to kill me too?
- CHORUS The boys are dead. Their mother killed them. 1290
- JASON What are you saying? Those words are death to me.
- CHORUS Don't think of your children as among the living.
- JASON She killed them . . . where? In the house or outside?
- CHORUS If you open the doors, you will see how they died.
- JASON Servants, draw back these bolts at once, 1295
 open the doors, so I can see both evils:
 the slain children and the woman I will punish.
 [Enter MEDEA in a winged chariot above the house, with the BOYS' bodies.]<sup>3</sup>
- MEDEA Why do you keep banging on the doors to get at the boys and me who killed them?
 Don't exert yourself. If you have something to say, 1300
 I'm here, go ahead. But you'll never touch me.
 This chariot from my grandfather the Sun protects me from an enemy's hands.
- JASON You abomination, most hateful of women to the gods, to me, to the whole human race. 1305
 You were actually able to drive a sword into sons you had borne; you've made me childless.
 How can you live and see the light of the sun, when you have committed this sacrilege and ought to be dead? Now I see what I missed 1310 when I brought you from that barbarian place into a Greek home. You are an evil being:
 you betrayed your father and your native land.
 The gods are crushing me for what you did when you killed your brother at the family hearth 1315 before you boarded the beautiful Argo.
 That's how you started. Then you married me, you bore me children and you killed them
 just because of some sexual grievance.
 No Greek woman would ever do that. 1320
 To think I bound myself to you instead in a hateful, ruinous marriage with an inhuman wife, a lioness more savage than Etruscan Scylla.<sup>4</sup>
 All the angry words I could hurl at you 1325 carry no sting, you are so brazen.

3. The stage mechanism used in the original production would have been the mechane, a crane typically used for divine appearances in Athenian tragedy.

4. Scylla is the sea monster near Etruria (modern-day Italy) who threatens Odysseus and his men in the Odyssey.

- To hell with you, you filthy child-killer!
 All that is left for me is to mourn my fate;
 I have lost the joy of my new marriage;
 the children that I fathered and brought up are gone. I'll never speak with them again. 1330
- MEDEA I could refute your speech at length, but Father Zeus already knows how you were treated by me and what you did.
 There is no way you could reject my bed and lead a happy life laughing at me, 1335 you or the princess, no way that Creon who arranged all this could throw me out and not pay the price. So call me a lion, or Scylla lurking on the Etruscan plain, 1340 I've done what I had to: I've pierced your heart.
- JASON But it hurts you too, you share in this pain.
- MEDEA The pain is worth it if it kills your laughter.
- JASON O children, what a vicious mother you had!
- MEDEA O boys, your father's disease destroyed you! 1345
- JASON It was not my hand that slaughtered them.
- MEDEA No, your arrogance and your brand-new marriage.
- JASON You really think sex was a reason to kill them?
- MEDEA You think being spurned is trivial for a woman?
- JASON Yes, if she's sensible. You resent everything. 1350
- MEDEA Well, they are gone, and that will bite deep.
- JASON Oh, but they will avenge themselves on you.
- MEDEA The gods know which of us started this trouble.
- JASON Yes, they know your mind and it disgusts them.
- MEDEA Hate all you want. I loathe the sound of your voice. 1355
- JASON And I loathe yours. We won't find it hard to part.
- MEDEA Then what's to be done? I too am eager for that.
- JASON Let me bury these bodies and weep for them.
- MEDEA Absolutely not. I will bury them myself in the shrine of Hera of the Rocky Heights, where none of my enemies can get at them or wreck their graves. Here in the land of Sisyphus<sup>5</sup> I will institute a procession and sacred rites as atonement for this unholy murder.<sup>6</sup> Then I'll be off to the city of Erechtheus<sup>7</sup> to live with Aegeus, Pandion's son. 1360
 You will have a fitting death for a coward, hit on the head by a piece of the Argo—
 the bitter consequence of marrying me.

5. Corinth. Sisyphus was a notorious traitor, punished in the underworld for his deceitfulness by having to push a rock eternally up a hill, never managing to get it to the top without its rolling back down.

6. There was a sacred cult dedicated to "Hera of the rocky heights" at Corinth.

7. I.e., Athens.

JASON Let a Fury rise up to avenge these boys, and Justice that punishes bloodshed. 1370

MEDEA What god or spirit listens to you?
You broke your oaths, you betrayed a friend!

JASON Ha! Abomination! Child-killer!

MEDEA Just go home and bury your wife. 1375

JASON I am going, and without my children.

MEDEA This grief is nothing. Wait till you're old.

JASON O my children, so much loved!

MEDEA By their mother, not by you.

JASON And then you killed them?

MEDEA To punish you.

JASON Oh the misery! I just want to kiss them, to hold them in my arms. 1380

MEDEA Now you want to hug them, talk to them, when before you shoved them aside.

JASON By the gods,
just let me touch their soft skin.

MEDEA Not possible. Your words are useless. 1385

JASON Zeus, do you hear? I am shut out, dismissed by this vicious animal,
this lioness stained with children's blood.

With all my being I grieve for them and summon the gods to witness how you destroyed my children, and will not let me touch their bodies or bury them in proper tombs. 1390

I wish I had never fathered them to see them slaughtered by you. 1395

[Exit MEDEA in the chariot.]

CHORUS In all that Olympian Zeus watches over, Much is accomplished that we don't foresee.
What we expect does not come about;
the gods clear a path for the unexpected.
That is how things happened here. 1400

VIRGIL

70–19 B.C.E.

---

Virgil's Aeneid is the greatest epic poem from ancient Rome. It has been one of the most profoundly influential works of all classical literature in the later Western cultural and literary tradition. The Aeneid can be described in ways that make it sound off-putting: as a work of nationalistic propaganda for a nation that no longer exists, or as a twelve-book poem about the importance of doing your duty. But such descriptions are entirely false to most readers' experience of this emotionally engaging and thought-provoking story. The Aeneid is an absorbing book, full of adventure, beauty, magic, dreams, love, loss, and violence. The characters make hard choices and have complex inner lives. The poem is also a profound meditation on the rights and wrongs of empire and colonialism that prompts us to ask whether civilizations, even the best of them, are ever founded without enormous personal and military cost.

LIFE AND TIMES

Virgil, whose full Roman name was Publius Vergilius Maro, was born near the peaceful northern Italian town of Mantua. His father probably owned land, and Virgil's poetry often shows a nostalgic appreciation for the quiet life of the Italian countryside. Before composing the Aeneid, Virgil wrote two books with a rural setting: the Eclogues, a set of ten poems featuring the songs and sorrows of fictional shepherds, and the Georgics, a four-book account of the struggles and triumphs of life on a farm. Ostensibly, neither of these texts has much to do with the subject of the Aeneid, which is about the quest to found an empire. But Virgil's poetic focus is surprisingly consistent throughout his career. Whether the setting is an empire or a village garden, he is interested in the value and pathos of the human struggle to build a home, even in hostile or near-impossible conditions. The farmer in the Georgics, whose hard work is washed away by a violent storm, is just as much a hero as the shipwrecked Trojans in the Aeneid.

When Virgil was young, the world beyond Mantua saw great political and military unrest. Rome, through its impressive military discipline, had already become the dominant power in the Mediterranean world; the city had defeated its main rival, the North African state of Carthage, some two generations before (in 146 B.C.E.). Now Rome was engaged in various further wars, struggling to expand the empire both eastward and westward. These wars generated greater glory for the nation, but also greater instability at home. In Virgil's childhood, Rome was still a Republic. No single man had control of the country; instead, government was divided among the people, the magistrates, and the Senate (an assembly of councilmen). But power was shifting away from the Senate and toward the military generals responsible for Rome's victories abroad. After a series of civil wars, Julius Caesar, one of these generals, became dictator of Rome. He was assassinated in 44 B.C.E., when Virgil was twenty-six. More civil wars followed, causing disruption both at home and abroad: many country landowners—including some around Mantua, though apparently not Virgil's family—were forced to leave their homes to make room for veterans returning from war. Finally, some twelve years after the assassination, Julius Caesar's adopted great-nephew Octavian defeated the joint forces of Antony and Cleopatra, and took control of Rome. In this volatile environment, Octavian was careful not to style himself "dictator," as Julius had done. Instead, he claimed to be restoring the old ways of the Republic. He named himself "Augustus" ("The Respected One"), the "Princeps" ("First Man"), and "Emperor Caesar." Throughout his rule, Augustus was interested in controlling his public image: he knew that careful manipulation of information was essential if he were to avoid the fate of his great-uncle. In this context, it is not surprising that the emperor had a close personal relationship with the writers of Rome, who would, as Augustus knew, play an important part in shaping his public image even after his death. Augustus hoped that Virgil would provide him with a great national epic to justify, glorify, and immortalize Augustan Roman power.

We do not know how happy Augustus was with the poem that Virgil actually produced, although apparently the poet read parts of it aloud to the emperor and his sister, to great emotional effect: the sister fainted. It is possible that Augustus had hoped for a more direct account of his own glorious deeds. But perhaps he was smart enough to realize that direct propaganda never has much of a shelf life. We also do not know whether Virgil himself was satisfied with his creation. He was apparently a quiet man, moderate in his ways; thanks to Augustus's favor, he was given an expensive villa in Rome, but he seems to have preferred the quiet life of the country. He never married. As a poet, he was a perfectionist, willing to spend many hours editing his work. We are told that he compared himself to a mother bear who licks her cubs into shape. This process shows in the complex rhythms and careful patterns of Virgil's poetic style. He died of a fever at the age of fifty-one, while returning from a trip to Greece. The Aeneid was still incomplete, and apparently he gave orders from his deathbed for it to be burned. Fortunately for us, Augustus countermanded the orders, and saved the poem for posterity.

THE AENEID

Virgil's masterpiece is about Rome, but only indirectly. The story takes us back in time to a period well before the foundation of the city. It tells how one civilization mutates into another, finding the origins of Rome in the destruction of Troy. The poem follows the Trojan Aeneas as he escapes with his father, son, and a few companions from the smoking ruins of his home. On the journey to find a new home in the "western land," he has many adventures, including an affair with Dido, the beautiful queen of Carthage, and a trip down to the underworld, to meet his dead father. When he arrives in Italy, he struggles to establish a base in his new land—where some of the native inhabitants are far from welcoming.

The Aeneid deals with universal themes, including the basic human need to find, or create, a home. The story is accessible even to those who know nothing about ancient history. But readers will find it helpful to think carefully about how Virgil incorporates his own times into this mythical story. When Virgil was writing, Rome had only recently emerged from a long, terrifying period of civil war. Aeneas, like Augustus, must show strong leadership to a people traumatized by years of violence. Virgil's account of the sack of Troy, including the horrible slaughter of old king Priam before the eyes of his family, is vivid and harrowing—and many contemporary readers would have witnessed similar scenes with their own eyes. But the historical parallels in this poem are complex, and one cannot simply identify Aeneas with Augustus. The affair between Aeneas and Dido looks further back in history, to the Roman wars with Carthage. This episode also invites comparison with events of the more recent past. Like Augustus's military and political rival Antony, Aeneas falls in love with a beautiful African queen; in this interpretation, Dido foreshadows Cleopatra, who also ended up killing herself. Once Aeneas has arrived in Italy, there are further questions. Is Aeneas a foreign invader, pushing the boundaries of his empire into new lands—as Augustus did? Or are these battles between different Italian peoples more like a civil war? Virgil's evocation of historical parallels is rich and fascinating precisely because they are so hard to pin down. Moreover, temporal paradoxes are created by telling "history in the future tense": from the Roman reader's point of view, Carthage has already been defeated; but from Dido's perspective, her city has just begun to be built.

Virgil's use of literary antecedents is equally interesting. His poem combines the themes of the Odyssey (the wanderer in search of home) and the Iliad (the hero in battle). He borrows Homeric turns of phrase, similes, sentiments, and whole incidents; for instance, his Aeneas, like Odysseus, passes the land of the Cyclops, and descends alive to the world of the dead; like Achilles, he receives a new set of armor from his goddess mother, and kills in rage to avenge a dead friend. But Virgil is not playing a sterile game of copying Homer. Rather, Homeric parallels are part of how the poem generates meaning. Virgil often uses several Homeric allusions at the same time. For instance, Turnus—the Italian prince who is originally engaged to Lavinia, the woman who will become Aeneas's wife—is in some ways like one of the suitors in the Odyssey: the rival who must be defeated and killed. But on another level, Turnus is like Hector, the doomed Trojan hero of the Iliad, who dies defending his city and his people. From Turnus's perspective, Aeneas himself is more like the suitors of the Odyssey: he is a usurper in a place where he does not belong.

The Aeneid's approach to storytelling is very different from that of the Homeric poems. Virgil often tells the parts of the story Homer left untold: for example, it is in Virgil, not Homer, that we get the full story of the Trojan Horse. On a more profound level, Virgil's presentation of war, peace, and human nature is quite unlike Homer's—it is both broader and deeper. Virgil is interested in communities that extend beyond the tribe or clan to the nation or the empire, and he evokes time that goes beyond the generations of a single family to the broad sweep of history. The characters, especially Aeneas, are more introspective and prone to ambivalent feelings than those in Homer; Virgil explores conflicts not just between one person and another but within an individual, between duty and the longings of the heart. In this way, Aeneas is a different kind of hero from any in Greek literature. The first time his name is mentioned, he is risking death by shipwreck and is overwhelmed by despair, wishing he could have died with his friends at Troy: he holds his hands to the sky and cries, "Three, four times blest, my comrades / lucky to die beneath the soaring walls of Troy." This is a close echo of the moment when Odysseus is shipwrecked after leaving Calypso's island and wishes he had died fighting at Troy instead of by drowning: "Those Greeks were lucky, three and four times over / who died upon the plain of Troy" (Odyssey 5.306–307). But the scenes are importantly different. Aeneas feels not only physical fear but also despair at being a survivor with no home to go to. We can contrast this sense of being totally lost with the first mention of Odysseus in the Odyssey: he longs for a home that still exists, whereas Aeneas's home has been destroyed. A little later, we see a different Aeneas when he talks to his men and tries to calm their fears, giving no hint of his own: "Call up your courage again," he tells them; "dismiss your grief and fear." From the start of the poem, Aeneas will be put in situations where he cannot allow himself to show or act on his deepest feelings.

Virgil also seems to question the values of the Homeric warrior code. Aeneas is not, like Achilles, a man fighting for his personal honor, against even the leaders of his own side; rather, he is, and must be, a consensus builder, a team player. Odysseus (Romanized as Ulysses) is presented in the Aeneid as a cruel brute, lacking in the mercy for the defeated that Aeneas’s father, Anchises, characterizes as an essential feature of the true Roman (“to spare the defeated, break the proud in war”). Moreover, Ulysses’ cleverness—epitomized by the invention of the Trojan Horse—seems in this poem to be more like wicked dishonesty. Truthfulness is an essential element in the Roman code of honor: this is partly why Dido’s accusation that Aeneas has deceived and betrayed her cuts so deeply.

Aeneas is often seen as the prototype of the ideal Roman ruler, devoted above all to pietas—a word from which we get pity and piety, and which covers both senses, though it is often translated as “duty.” But whereas duty may suggest adherence to a set of abstract moral principles, the Latin word connotes devotion to particular people and entities: to the gods above all, but also to one’s country, leaders, community, and family, especially father and sons. An iconic moment of Aeneas’s pietas comes as he leaves his burning city, carrying his lame old father on his shoulders, holding the images of his household gods, and leading his little son by the hand. This scene reminds us that Aeneas is struggling to hold on to a community and create continuity even from the ruins of his old home. The pietas that holds families and cities together is contrasted in this poem with furor (“rage,” “fury”), the wild passion that inspires bloodlust, both in Troy and on Italian shores.

But being good is not easy, and Virgil shows that Aeneas’s repression of his own feelings for the sake of devotion comes at an enormous cost. Moreover, the poem seems to suggest that duty can even be harmful to other people. Aeneas, on the instructions of the gods, abandons the great passion of his life, his love for Dido, who had convinced herself that their relationship was equivalent to marriage. In despair, she kills herself. Virgil makes us admire and sympathize with Dido, and in doing so, we are forced to question whether Aeneas’s mission is worthwhile. The Aeneid is not merely a celebration of Roman power; it is also an analysis of the costs of empire, both to the conquered and the conquerors. Moreover, we may wonder whether Rome itself—a city famously built by Romulus, who killed his brother Remus, a city defined by foreign and civil wars—is truly a civilization in which pietas is the defining value. This moral ambiguity continues up to the last lines of the poem, which many first-time readers will find shocking. We are left to wonder whether moderation or violence will be the truly defining quality of the future Roman Empire.

A NOTE ON THE TRANSLATION

Translation of this complex poem often reflects the ideological biases of the translator. Some versions make Virgil sound wholeheartedly enthusiastic about imperialism, eliminating much of his ambivalence; others make him sound unrelentingly gloomy about everything. Virgil's Latin is dignified, not colloquial, and has a beautiful, musical rhythm; but trying to reproduce this effect in modern English risks sounding merely pompous.

Several excellent recent translations have steered clear of these dangers and given us readable, fast-paced versions of the Aeneid. We have chosen Robert Fagles's translation, because it is particularly good at evoking the psychological depth of Virgil's characters, and it allows readers to experience the sheer narrative pleasure of reading the Aeneid.

BOOK I

[Safe Haven after Storm]

Wars and a man I sing—an exile driven on by Fate, he was the first to flee the coast of Troy, destined to reach Lavinian<sup>2</sup> shores and Italian soil, yet many blows he took on land and sea from the gods above—thanks to cruel Juno's<sup>3</sup> relentless rage—and many losses he bore in battle too, before he could found a city, bring his gods to Latium, source of the Latin race, the Alban lords and the high walls of Rome.<sup>4</sup>

5

Tell me,

Muse, how it all began. Why was Juno outraged?
 What could wound the Queen of the Gods with all her power?
 Why did she force a man, so famous for his devotion,<sup>5</sup> to brave such rounds of hardship, bear such trials?
 Can such rage inflame the immortals' hearts?

10

There was an ancient city held by Tyrian settlers,<sup>6</sup> Carthage, facing Italy and the Tiber River's mouth<sup>7</sup> but far away—a rich city trained and fierce in war.
 Juno loved it, they say, beyond all other lands in the world, even beloved Samos,<sup>8</sup> second best.
 Here she kept her armor, here her chariot too, and Carthage would rule the nations of the earth if only the Fates were willing. This was Juno's goal from the start, and so she nursed her city's strength.
 But she heard a race of men, sprung of Trojan blood, would one day topple down her Tyrian stronghold,

1. Translated by Robert Fagles.

2. Lavinium is the city founded in Italy by Aeneas, near the later city of Rome. It is named after his Latin wife, Lavinia. "Lavinian" here means "Italian."

3. Juno is queen of the gods, wife of Jupiter.

4. According to legend, after Aeneas died, his son Ascanius moved from Latium and founded the city of Alba Longa; from there came Romulus and Remus, who built the walls of Rome.

5. The Latin word is pietas: "piety," "duty," "loyalty."

6. Tyre was the main city of the Phoenicians, an ancient seafaring merchant people.

7. The Tiber runs through Rome.

8. A Greek island famous for its cult of Hera (equivalent to the Roman Juno).

breed an arrogant people ruling far and wide, 25 proud in battle, destined to plunder Libya.
 So the Fates were spinning out the future . . . <sup>9</sup>
 This was Juno's fear and the goddess never forgot the old campaign that she had waged at Troy for her beloved Argos.<sup>1</sup> 30
 No, not even now would the causes of her rage, her bitter sorrows drop from the goddess' mind.
 They festered deep within her, galled her still:
 the judgment of Paris, the unjust slight to her beauty, the Trojan stock she loathed, the honors showered on Ganymede 35 ravished to the skies.<sup>2</sup> Her fury inflamed by all this,
 the daughter of Saturn<sup>3</sup> drove over endless oceans Trojans left by the Greeks and brute Achilles.<sup>4</sup> Juno kept them far from Latium, forced by the Fates to wander round the seas of the world, year in, year out. 40
 Such a long hard labor it was to found the Roman people.

Now, with the ridge of Sicily barely out of sight, they spread sail for the open sea, their spirits buoyant, their bronze beaks churning the waves to foam as Juno, nursing deep in her heart the everlasting wound, 45 said to herself: "Defeated, am I? Give up the fight?
 Powerless now to keep that Trojan king from Italy?
 Ah but of course—the Fates bar my way.
 And yet Minerva could burn the fleet to ash and drown my Argive crews in the sea, and all for one, 50 one mad crime of a single man, Ajax, son of Oileus!<sup>5</sup> She hurled Jove's all-consuming bolt from the clouds, she shattered a fleet and whipped the swells with gales.
 And then as he gasped his last in flames from his riven chest she swept him up in a cyclone, impaled the man on a crag. 55
 But I who walk in majesty, I the Queen of the Gods, the sister and wife of Jove<sup>6</sup>—I must wage a war, year after year, on just one race of men!
 Who will revere the power of Juno after this—lay gifts on my altar, lift his hands in prayer?" 60

9. Refers to the Punic Wars of the third and second centuries B.C.E., in which Rome finally defeated Carthage; "Libya" is used as a generic term for the North African coast.

1. Argos is the homeland of Agamemnon and Menelaus; in the Iliad, Hera favors the Argives as they fight the Trojans and try to win back Helen, Menelaus's wife.

2. Paris, Prince of Troy, was asked to choose one of three goddesses: Hera, Athena (Minerva in Roman mythology), or Aphrodite (Venus to the Romans). He picked Aphrodite, and was rewarded with Helen, whom he took from her husband and led back to Troy. The second insult from the Trojans against Hera is that her husband, Zeus, once fell in love with a Trojan boy, Ganymede, and brought him up to heaven to be his cupbearer.

3. Saturn, the Roman god of agriculture, was the father of both Jupiter and Juno.

4. The greatest Greek warrior. These survivors are the few Trojans whom Achilles has not killed.

5. In the aftermath of the Greek victory at Troy, one of the Greek soldiers, this Ajax (who is not the same as the strong hero Telemonian Ajax) raped the Trojan princess Cassandra in the temple of Minerva. The goddess took revenge by setting fire to the Greek fleet, and then overwhelming it with a storm.

6. Alternative name of Jupiter.

With such anger seething inside her fiery heart the goddess reached Aeolia, breeding-ground of storms, their home swarming with raging gusts from the South.
 Here in a vast cave King Aeolus<sup>7</sup> rules the winds, brawling to break free, howling in full gale force 65
 as he chains them down in their dungeon, shackled fast.
 They bluster in protest, roaring round their prison bars with a mountain above them all, booming with their rage.
 But high in his stronghold Aeolus wields his scepter, soothing their passions, tempering their fury. 70 Should he fail, surely they'd blow the world away, hurling the land and sea and deep sky through space.
 Fearing this, the almighty Father banished the winds to that black cavern, piled above them a mountain mass and imposed on all a king empowered, by binding pact, 75 to rein them back on command or let them gallop free.

Now Juno made this plea to the Lord of Winds:
 "Aeolus, the Father of Gods and King of Men gave you the power to calm the waves or rouse them with your gales.
 A race I loathe is crossing the Tuscan Sea,<sup>8</sup> transporting 80 Troy to Italy, bearing their conquered household gods—thrash your winds to fury, sink their warships, overwhelm them or break them apart, scatter their crews, drown them all!
 I happen to have some sea-nymphs, fourteen beauties, Deiopea the finest of all by far . . . 85
 I'll join you in lasting marriage, call her yours and for all her years to come she will live with you and make you the proud father of handsome children.
 Such service earns such gifts."

Aeolus warmed to Juno's offer: "Yours is the task, my queen, 90 to explore your heart's desires. Mine is the duty to follow your commands. Yes, thanks to you I rule this humble little kingdom of mine.
 You won me the scepter, Jupiter's favors too, and a couch to lounge on, set at the gods' feasts— 95 you made me Lord of the Stormwind, King of Cloudbursts." With such thanks, swinging his spear around he strikes home at the mountain's hollow flank and out charge the winds through the breach he'd made, like armies on attack in a blasting whirlwind tearing through the earth. 100 Down they crash on the sea, the Eastwind, Southwind, all as one with the Southwest's squalls in hot pursuit, heaving up from the ocean depths huge killer-breakers rolling toward the beaches. The crews are shouting, cables screeching—suddenly cloudbanks blotting out 105
 the sky, the light of day from the Trojans' sight

7. Mythical king of the winds from the Odyssey.

8. Just west of central Italy; the Trojans have almost reached their destination.

as pitch-black night comes brooding down on the sea with thunder crashing pole to pole, bolt on bolt blazing across the heavens—death, everywhere men facing instant death. 110

At once Aeneas, limbs limp in the chill of fear, groans and lifting both his palms toward the stars cries out: “Three, four times blest, my comrades lucky to die beneath the soaring walls of Troy—before their parents’ eyes! If only I’d gone down 115 under your right hand—Diomedes, strongest Greek afiel—and poured out my life on the battle grounds of Troy!<sup>9</sup> Where raging Hector lies, pierced by Achilles’ spear, where mighty Sarpedon lies, where the Simois River swallows down and churns beneath its tides so many 120 shields and helmets and corpses of the brave!”<sup>1</sup>

Flinging cries

as a screaming gust of the Northwind pounds against his sail, raising waves sky-high. The oars shatter, prow twists round, taking the breakers broadside on and over Aeneas’ decks a mountain of water towers, massive, steep. 125
Some men hang on billowing crests, some as the sea gapes, glimpse through the waves the bottom waiting, a surge aswirl with sand.

Three ships the Southwind grips and spins against those boulders lurking in mid-ocean—rocks the Italians call the Altars, one great spine 130 breaking the surface—three the Eastwind sweeps from open sea on the Syrtes<sup>2</sup> reefs, a grim sight, girding them round with walls of sand.

One ship

that carried the Lycian<sup>3</sup> units led by staunch Orontes—before Aeneas’ eyes a toppling summit of water 135 strikes the stern and hurls the helmsman overboard, pitching him headfirst, twirling his ship three times, right on the spot till the ravenous whirlpool gulps her down.
Here and there you can sight some sailors bobbing in heavy seas, strewn in the welter now the weapons, men, stray spars 140 and treasures saved from Troy.

Now Ilioneus’ sturdy ship,

now brave Achates’, now the galley that carried Abas, another, aged Aletes, yes, the storm routs them all, down to the last craft the joints split, beams spring and the lethal flood pours in.

All the while Neptune<sup>4</sup> 145

9. In the Iliad, Aeneas is wounded by the Greek hero Diomedes, and is rescued by his mother, Aphrodite.

1. Hector, the greatest Trojan hero, is killed by Achilles in the Iliad. Sarpedon is another fighter on the Trojan side, the favorite of Zeus, who is killed by Achilles’ friend Patroclus. The Simois is the river at Troy, which in the Iliad becomes thick with the blood and bodies of those killed by Achilles.

2. A pair of shallow, sandy gulfs off the coast of Libya.

3. Region in modern-day Turkey, allied with Troy in the Iliad.

4. God of the sea (equivalent to the Greek Poseidon).

sensed the furor above him, the roaring seas first and the storm breaking next—his standing waters boiling up from the sea-bed, churning back. And the mighty god, stirred to his depths, lifts his head from the crests and serene in power, gazing out over all his realm, 150 he sees Aeneas' squadrons scattered across the ocean, Trojans overwhelmed by the surf and the wild crashing skies.
Nor did he miss his sister Juno's cunning wrath at work.
He summons the East- and Westwind, takes them to task:
"What insolence! Trusting so to your lofty birth? 155
You winds, you dare make heaven and earth a chaos, raising such a riot of waves without my blessings.
You—what I won't do! But first I had better set to rest the flood you ruffled so. Next time, trust me, you will pay for your crimes with more than just a scolding. 160 Away with you, quick! And give your king this message:
Power over the sea and ruthless trident is mine, not his—it's mine by lot, by destiny. His place, Eastwind, is the rough rocks where you are all at home.
Let him bluster there and play the king in his court, 165 let Aeolus rule his bolted dungeon of the winds!"

Quicker than his command he calms the heaving seas, putting the clouds to rout and bringing back the sun.
Struggling shoulder-to-shoulder, Triton and Cymothoë<sup>5</sup> hoist and heave the ships from the jagged rocks 170 as the god himself whisks them up with his trident, clearing a channel through the deadly reefs, his chariot skimming over the cresting waves on spinning wheels to set the seas to rest. Just as, all too often, some huge crowd is seized by a vast uprising, 175
the rabble runs amok, all slaves to passion, rocks, firebrands flying. Rage finds them arms but then, if they chance to see a man among them, one whose devotion and public service lend him weight, they stand there, stock-still with their ears alert as 180
he rules their furor with his words and calms their passion.
So the crash of the breakers all fell silent once their Father, gazing over his realm under clear skies, flicks his horses, giving them free rein, and his eager chariot flies.

Now bone-weary, Aeneas' shipmates make a run 185 for the nearest landfall, wheeling prowls around they turn for Libya's coast. There is a haven shaped by an island shielding the mouth of a long deep bay, its flanks breaking the force of combers pounding in from the sea while drawing them off into calm receding channels. 190 Both sides of the harbor, rock cliffs tower, crowned by twin crags that menace the sky, overshadowing reaches of sheltered water, quiet and secure.

5. Triton is a lesser sea god; Cymothoë is a sea nymph.

Over them as a backdrop looms a quivering wood, above them rears a grove, bristling dark with shade, 195 and fronting the cliff, a cave under hanging rocks with fresh water inside, seats cut in the native stone, the home of nymphs. Never a need of cables here to moor a weathered ship, no anchor with biting flukes to bind her fast.

Aeneas puts in here with a bare seven warships 200 saved from his whole fleet. How keen their longing for dry land underfoot as the Trojans disembark, taking hold of the earth, their last best hope,
 and fling their brine-wracked bodies on the sand.
 Achates is first to strike a spark from flint, 205 then works to keep it alive in dry leaves, cups it around with kindling, feeds it chips and briskly fans the tinder into flame.
 Then, spent as they were from all their toil, they set out food, the bounty of Ceres,<sup>6</sup> drenched 210 in sea-salt, Ceres' utensils too, her mills and troughs, and bend to parch with fire the grain they had salvaged, grind it fine on stones.

While they see to their meal Aeneas scales a crag, straining to scan the sea-reach far and wide . . . is there any trace of Antheus now, 215 tossed by the gales, or his warships banked with oars?
 Or Capys perhaps, or Caicus' stern adorned with shields?<sup>7</sup>
 Not a ship in sight. But he does spot three stags roaming the shore, an entire herd behind them grazing down the glens in a long ranked line. 220
 He halts, grasps his bow and his flying arrows, the weapons his trusty aide Achates keeps at hand.
 First the leaders, antlers branching over their high heads, he brings them down, then turns on the herd, his shafts stampeding the rest like rabble into the leafy groves. 225 Shaft on shaft, no stopping him till he stretches seven hefty carcasses on the ground—a triumph, one for each of his ships—and makes for the cove, divides the kill with his whole crew and then shares out the wine that good Acestes,<sup>8</sup> princely man, had brimmed 230 in their casks the day they left Sicilian shores.

The commander's words relieve their stricken hearts:
 "My comrades, hardly strangers to pain before now, we all have weathered worse. Some god will grant us an end to this as well. You've threaded the rocks 235 resounding with Scylla's howling rabid dogs, and taken the brunt of the Cyclops' boulders, too.
 Call up your courage again. Dismiss your grief and fear.

6. Goddess of grain and harvest.
 7. Names of lost Trojan leaders.

8. King in Sicily who gave the Trojans shelter and extra supplies.

A joy it will be one day, perhaps, to remember even this.
 Through so many hard straits, so many twists and turns our course holds firm for Latium.<sup>9</sup> There Fate holds out a homeland, calm, at peace. There the gods decree the kingdom of Troy will rise again. Bear up.
 Save your strength for better times to come.”

Brave words.

Sick with mounting cares he assumes a look of hope and keeps his anguish buried in his heart.
 The men gird up for the game, the coming feast, they skin the hide from the ribs, lay bare the meat.
 Some cut it into quivering strips, impale it on skewers, some set cauldrons along the beach and fire them to the boil.
 Then they renew their strength with food, stretched out on the beachgrass, fill themselves with seasoned wine and venison rich and crisp. Their hunger sated, the tables cleared away, they talk on for hours, asking after their missing shipmates—wavering now between hope and fear: what to believe about the rest?
 Were the men still alive or just in the last throes, forever lost to their comrades’ farflung calls?
 Aeneas most of all, devoted to his shipmates, deep within himself he moans for the losses . . .
 now for Orontes, hardy soldier, now for Amycus, now for the brutal fate that Lycus may have met, then Gyas and brave Cloanthus, hearts of oak.

Their mourning was over now as Jove from high heaven, gazing down on the sea, the whitecaps winged with sails, the lands outspread, the coasts, the nations of the earth, paused at the zenith of the sky and set his sights on Libya, that proud kingdom. All at once, as he took to heart the struggles he beheld, Venus<sup>1</sup> approached in rare sorrow, tears abrim in her sparkling eyes, and begged: “Oh you who rule the lives of men and gods with your everlasting laws and your lightning bolt of terror, what crime could my Aeneas commit against you, what dire harm could the Trojans do that after bearing so many losses, this wide world is shut to them now? And all because of Italy.
 Surely from them the Romans would arise one day as the years roll on, and leaders would as well, descended from Teucer’s<sup>2</sup> blood brought back to life, to rule all lands and seas with boundless power—you promised! Father, what motive changed your mind?
 With that, at least, I consoled myself for Troy’s demise, that heart-rending ruin—weighing fate against fate.
 But now after all my Trojans suffered, still the same disastrous fortune drives them on and on. 285

What end, great king, do you set to their ordeals?

“Antenor<sup>3</sup> could slip out from under the Greek siege, then make his passage through the Illyrian gulfs and,
safe through the inlands where the Liburnians rule, he struggled past the Timavus River’s source.<sup>4</sup> 290
There, through its nine mouths as the mountain caves roar back, the river bursts out into full flood, a thundering surf that overpowers the fields.
Reaching Italy, he erected a city for his people, a Trojan home called Padua—gave them a Trojan name, 295 hung up their Trojan arms and there, after long wars, he lingers on in serene and settled peace.

“But we,
your own children, the ones you swore would hold the battlements of heaven—now our ships are lost, appalling! We are abandoned, thanks to the rage 300 of a single foe, cut off from Italy’s shores.
Is this our reward for reverence,<sup>5</sup> this the way you give us back our throne?”

The Father of Men and Gods, smiling down on her with the glance that clears the sky and calms the tempest, 305 lightly kissing his daughter on the lips, replied: “Relieve yourself of fear, my lady of Cythera,<sup>6</sup>
the fate of your children stands unchanged, I swear.
You will see your promised city, see Lavinium’s walls and bear your great-hearted Aeneas up to the stars on high. 310 Nothing has changed my mind. No, your son, believe me—since anguish is gnawing at you, I will tell you more, unrolling the scroll of Fate to reveal its darkest secrets. Aeneas will wage a long, costly war in Italy, crush defiant tribes 315 and build high city walls for his people there and found the rule of law. Only three summers will see him govern Latium, three winters pass in barracks after the Latins have been broken.
But his son Ascanius, now that he gains the name 320 of Iulus—Ilus he was, while Ilium ruled on high<sup>7</sup>— will fill out with his own reign thirty sovereign years, a giant cycle of months revolving round and round, transferring his rule from its old Lavinian home to raise up Alba Longa’s mighty ramparts. 325

3. Trojan leader who escaped the city’s sack and settled in northern Italy.

4. Illyrium was a district, the Liburnians a people, and Timavus a river on the coast of the northern Adriatic sea.

5. Pietas.

6. Greek island where there was a cult of Aphrodite.

7. Ilium is another name for Troy (hence the title of Homer’s epic poem: the Iliad). The Julian family, which included Julius Caesar and Augustus, claimed descent from Iulus (Julus), originally name Ascanius.

There, in turn, for a full three hundred years the dynasty of Hector will hold sway till Ilia, a royal priestess great with the brood of Mars, will bear the god twin sons.<sup>8</sup> Then one, Romulus, reveling in the tawny pelt of a wolf that nursed him, 330 will inherit the line and build the walls of Mars and after his own name, call his people Romans.<sup>9</sup>
 On them I set no limits, space or time:
 I have granted them power, empire without end.
 Even furious Juno, now plaguing the land and sea and sky 335 with terror: she will mend her ways and hold dear with me these Romans, lords of the earth, the race arrayed in togas.
 This is my pleasure, my decree. Indeed, an age will come, as the long years slip by, when Assaracus'<sup>1</sup> royal house will quell Achilles' homeland, brilliant Mycenae too, 340 and enslave their people, rule defeated Argos.
 From that noble blood will arise a Trojan Caesar, his empire bound by the Ocean, his glory by the stars:
 Julius, a name passed down from Iulus, his great forebear.
 And you, in years to come, will welcome him to the skies, 345
 you rest assured—laden with plunder of the East, and he with Aeneas will be invoked in prayer.<sup>2</sup> Then will the violent centuries, battles set aside, grow gentle, kind. Vesta<sup>3</sup> and silver-haired Good Faith and Romulus flanked by brother Remus will make the laws. 350
 The terrible Gates of War with their welded iron bars will stand bolted shut,<sup>4</sup> and locked inside, the Frenzy of civil strife will crouch down on his savage weapons, hands pinioned behind his back with a hundred brazen shackles, monstrously roaring out from his bloody jaws."
 So 355
 he decrees and speeds the son of Maia<sup>5</sup> down the sky to make the lands and the new stronghold, Carthage, open in welcome to the Trojans, not let Dido, unaware of fate, expel them from her borders.
 Down through the vast clear air flies Mercury, 360 rowing his wings like oars and in a moment stands on Libya's shores, obeys commands and the will of god is done.

8. Ilia, also known as Rhea Silvia, was a priestess sworn to religious celibacy. She was raped by Mars, the god of war, and gave birth to twins, Romulus and Remus. Her brother, jealous of his own power, ordered that the babies be killed; but instead, his servant abandoned them in the wild, to be rescued by a wolf that suckled them and raised them.

9. Virgil omits the fact that Romulus killed his brother, Remus, to gain sole power over the city.

1. An early king of Troy.

2. The "Trojan Caesar" is either Julius Caesar, who made Rome an empire, or Augustus himself, who had plundered "the East" by defeating the Egyptian queen Cleopatra.

3. Vesta is the goddess of the hearth, representative of home life.

4. There were real Gates of War in the temple of Janus, which Augustus shut in 25 B.C.E.—the first time they had been shut since 235 B.C.E.

5. A daughter of Atlas who was impregnated by Jupiter and gave birth to Mercury (Roman version of Hermes), the messenger god.

The Carthaginians calm their fiery temper and Queen Dido, above all, takes to heart a spirit of peace and warm good will to meet the men of Troy. 365

But Aeneas, duty-bound,
 his mind restless with worries all that night, reached a firm resolve as the fresh day broke.
 Out he goes to explore the strange terrain . . . 370 what coast had the stormwinds brought him to?
 Who lives here? All he sees is wild, untilled—what men, or what creatures? Then report the news to all his comrades. So, concealing his ships in the sheltered woody narrows overarched by rocks and screened around by trees and trembling shade, 375 Aeneas moves out, with only Achates at his side, two steel-tipped javelins balanced in his grip.
 Suddenly, in the heart of the woods, his mother crossed his path. She looked like a young girl, 380 a Spartan girl decked out in dress and gear or Thracian Harpalyce tiring out her mares, outracing the Hebrus River's rapid tides.<sup>6</sup> Hung from a shoulder, a bow that fit her grip, a huntress for all the world, she'd let her curls 385 go streaming free in the wind, her knees were bare, her flowing skirts hitched up with a tight knot.

She speaks out first: "You there, young soldiers, did you by any chance see one of my sisters?
 Which way did she go? Roaming the woods, 390 a quiver slung from her belt, wearing a spotted lynx-skin, or in full cry, hot on the track of some great frothing boar?"
 So Venus asked and the son of Venus answered:
 "Not one of your sisters have I seen or heard . . . 395
 but how should I greet a young girl like you?
 Your face, your features—hardly a mortal's looks and the tone of your voice is hardly human either.
 Oh a goddess, without a doubt! What, are you Apollo's sister? Or one of the breed of Nymphs? 400
 Be kind, whoever you are, relieve our troubled hearts.
 Under what skies and onto what coasts of the world have we been driven? Tell us, please. Castaways, we know nothing, not the people, not the place—lost, hurled here by the gales and heavy seas. 405 Many a victim will fall before your altars, we'll slaughter them for you!"

6. The goddess Venus is dressed like a Spartan, a famously athletic and militaristic Greek people, or Harpalyce, a girl who lived in the wilds and devoted herself to hunting. The Hebrus is a river in Thrace. In Greco-Roman tradition, hunting was considered antithetical to sex and marriage.

But Venus replied:

“Now there’s an honor I really don’t deserve.

It’s just the style for Tyrian girls to sport

a quiver and high-laced hunting boots in crimson. 410

What you see is a Punic<sup>7</sup> kingdom, people of Tyre and Agenor’s town, but the border’s held by Libyans hard to break in war. Phoenician Dido is in command, she sailed from Tyre, in flight from her own brother.

Oh it’s a long tale of crime, long, twisting, dark, 415

but I’ll try to trace the high points in their order . . .

“Dido was married to Sychaeus, the richest man in Tyre, and she, poor girl, was consumed with love for him.

Her father gave her away, wed for the first time,

a virgin still, and these her first solemn rites. 420

But her brother held power in Tyre—Pygmalion, a monster, the vilest man alive.

A murderous feud broke out between both men.

Pygmalion, catching Sychaeus off guard at the altar, slaughtered him in blood. That unholy man, so blind 425 in his lust for gold he ran him through with a sword, then hid the crime for months, deaf to his sister’s love, her heartbreak. Still he mocked her with wicked lies, with empty hopes. But she had a dream one night.

The true ghost of her husband, not yet buried, 430 came and lifting his face—ashen, awesome in death—showed her the cruel altar, the wounds that pierced his chest and exposed the secret horror that lurked within the house.

He urged her on: ‘Take flight from our homeland, quick!’

And then he revealed an unknown ancient treasure, 435

an untold weight of silver and gold, a comrade to speed her on her way.

“Driven by all this,

Dido plans her escape, collects her followers fired by savage hate of the tyrant or bitter fear.

They seize some galleys set to sail, load them with gold— 440

the wealth Pygmalion craved—and they bear it overseas and a woman leads them all. Reaching this haven here, where now you will see the steep ramparts rising, the new city of Carthage—the Tyrians purchased land as large as a bull’s-hide could enclose but cut in strips for size 445 and called it Byrsa, the Hide, for the spread they’d bought.

But you, who are you? What shores do you come from?

Where are you headed now?”

He answered her questions, drawing a labored sigh from deep within his chest:

“Goddess, if I’d retrace our story to its start, 450

if you had time to hear the saga of our ordeals, before I finished the Evening Star would close the gates of Olympus, put the day to sleep . . .

7. I.e., Carthaginian.

From old Troy we come—Troy it's called, perhaps you've heard the name—sailing over the world's seas 455 until, by chance, some whim of the winds, some tempest drove us onto Libyan shores. I am Aeneas, duty-bound.
 I carry aboard my ships the gods of house and home we seized from enemy hands. My fame goes past the skies.
 I seek my homeland—Italy—born as I am from highest Jove. 460
 I launched out on the Phrygian sea with twenty ships, my goddess mother marking the way, and followed hard on the course the Fates had charted. A mere seven, battered by wind and wave, survived the worst.
 I myself am a stranger, utterly at a loss, 465 trekking over this wild Libyan wasteland, forced from Europe, Asia too, an exile—”

Venus could bear no more of his laments and broke in on his tale of endless hardship: “Whoever you are, I scarcely think the Powers hate you:
 you enjoy the breath of life, you've reached a Tyrian city. 470
 So off you go now. Take this path to the queen's gates.
 I have good news. Your friends are restored to you, your fleet's reclaimed. The winds swerved from the North and drove them safe to port. True, unless my parents 475 taught me to read the flight of birds for nothing.
 Look at those dozen swans triumphant in formation!
 The eagle of Jove<sup>8</sup> had just swooped down on them all from heaven's heights and scattered them into open sky, but now you can see them flying trim in their long ranks, 480 landing or looking down where their friends have landed—home, cavorting on ruffling wings and wheeling round the sky in convoy, trumpeting in their glory.
 So homeward bound, your ships and hardy shipmates anchor in port now or approach the harbor's mouth, 485 full sail ahead. Now off you go, move on, wherever the path leads you, steer your steps.”

At that,
 as she turned away her neck shone with a rosy glow,
 her mane of hair gave off an ambrosial fragrance, her skirt flowed loose, rippling down to her feet 490 and her stride alone revealed her as a goddess.
 He knew her at once—his mother—and called after her now as she sped away: “Why, you too, cruel as the rest? So often you ridicule your son with your disguises! 495 Why can't we clasp hands, embrace each other, speak out, and tell the truth?”

Reproving her so, he makes his way toward town but Venus screens the travelers off with a dense mist,

8. The eagle, king of the birds, was associated with Jupiter.

pouring round them a cloak of clouds with all her power, 500 so no one could see them, no one reach and hold them, cause them to linger now or ask why they had come.
 But she herself, lifting into the air, wings her way toward Paphos,<sup>9</sup> racing with joy to reach her home again where her temples stand and a hundred altars steam 505 with Arabian incense, redolent with the scent of fresh-cut wreaths.

Meanwhile the two men are hurrying on their way as the path leads,
 now climbing a steep hill arching over the city, looking down on the facing walls and high towers. 510 Aeneas marvels at its mass—once a cluster of huts—he marvels at gates and bustling hum and cobbled streets.
 The Tyrians press on with the work, some aligning the walls, struggling to raise the citadel, trundling stones up slopes;
 some picking the building sites and plowing out their boundaries, 515 others drafting laws, electing judges, a senate held in awe.
 Here they're dredging a harbor, there they lay foundations deep for a theater, quarrying out of rock great columns to form a fitting scene for stages still to come.
 As hard at their tasks as bees in early summer, 520 working the blooming meadows under the sun escorting a new brood out, young adults now, or pressing oozing honey into the combs, the nectar brimming the bulging cells, or gathering up the plunder workers haul back in, or closing ranks like an army, 525 driving the drones, that lazy crew, from home.
 The hive seethes with life, exhaling the scent of honey sweet with thyme.

"How lucky they are,"
 Aeneas cries, gazing up at the city's heights,
 "their walls are rising now!" And on he goes, 530 cloaked in cloud—remarkable—right in their midst he blends in with the crowds, and no one sees him.

Now deep in the heart of Carthage stood a grove, lavish with shade, where the Tyrians, making landfall, still shaken by wind and breakers, first unearthed that sign: 535 Queen Juno had led their way to the fiery stallion's head that signaled power in war and ease in life for ages.
 Here Dido of Tyre was building Juno a mighty temple, rich with gifts and the goddess' aura of power.
 Bronze the threshold crowning a flight of stairs, 540 the doorposts sheathed in bronze, and the bronze doors groaned deep on their hinges.

Here in this grove
 a strange sight met his eyes and calmed his fears for the first time. Here, for the first time,

9. Greek island where there was a cult center of Aphrodite.

Aeneas dared to hope he had found some haven, for all his hard straits, to trust in better days. 545
 For awaiting the queen, beneath the great temple now, exploring its features one by one, amazed at it all,
 the city's splendor, the work of rival workers' hands and the vast scale of their labors—all at once he sees, 550 spread out from first to last, the battles fought at Troy, the fame of the Trojan War now known throughout the world, Atreus' sons and Priam—Achilles, savage to both at once.<sup>1</sup> Aeneas came to a halt and wept, and "Oh Achates," he cried, "is there anywhere, any place on earth 555 not filled with our ordeals? There's Priam, look!
 Even here, merit will have its true reward . . .
 even here, the world is a world of tears and the burdens of mortality touch the heart.
 Dismiss your fears. Trust me, this fame of ours 560 will offer us some haven."

So Aeneas says,
 feeding his spirit on empty, lifeless pictures, groaning low, the tears rivering down his face as he sees once more the fighters circling Troy.
 Here Greeks in flight, routed by Troy's young ranks, 565 there Trojans routed by plumed Achilles in his chariot.
 Just in range are the snow-white canvas tents of Rhesus—he knows them at once, and sobs—Rhesus' men betrayed in their first slumber, droves of them slaughtered by Diomedes splattered with their blood, lashing 570 back to the Greek camp their highstrung teams before they could ever savor the grass of Troy or drink at Xanthus' banks.<sup>2</sup>

Next Aeneas sees
 Troilus<sup>3</sup> in flight, his weapons flung aside, unlucky boy, no match for Achilles' onslaught— 575 horses haul him on, tangled behind an empty warcar, flat on his back, clinging still to the reins, his neck and hair dragging along the ground, the butt of his javelin scrawling zigzags in the dust.

And here the Trojan women are moving toward the temple of Pallas,<sup>4</sup> their deadly foe, 580 their hair unbound as they bear the robe, their offering, suppliants grieving, palms beating their breasts but Pallas turns away, staring at the ground.

And Hector—
 three times Achilles has hauled him round the walls of Troy

1. That is, Achilles was angry with Greeks as well as Trojans. Atreus' sons: Agamemnon and Menelaus, the Greek commanders in the Trojan War.

2. Rhesus, king of Thrace, came to help the Trojans, but was slaughtered by Odysseus and Diomedes in a night raid. An oracle had proclaimed that if Rhesus's horses ate Trojan grass and drank from the river Xanthus, Troy would not fall.

3. Troilus was a young son of King Priam of Troy.

4. Athena, who was hostile to Troy.

and now he's selling his lifeless body off for gold. 585 Aeneas gives a groan, heaving up from his depths, he sees the plundered armor, the car, the corpse of his great friend, and Priam reaching out with helpless hands . . . <sup>5</sup>

He even sees himself swept up in the melee, clashing with Greek captains, 590 sees the troops of the dawn and swarthy Memnon's<sup>6</sup> arms.
 And Penthesilea leading her Amazons bearing half-moon shields<sup>7</sup>— she blazes with battle-fury out in front of her army, cinching a golden breastband under her bared breast,
 a girl, a warrior queen who dares to battle men.

And now 595
 as Trojan Aeneas, gazing in awe at all the scenes of Troy, stood there, spellbound, eyes fixed on the war alone,
 the queen aglow with beauty approached the temple,
 Dido, with massed escorts marching in her wake.
 Like Diana urging her dancing troupes along 600 the Eurotas' banks or up Mount Cynthus' ridge<sup>8</sup> as a thousand mountain-nymphs crowd in behind her, left and right—with quiver slung from her shoulder, taller than any other goddess as she goes striding on and silent Latona<sup>9</sup> thrills with joy too deep for words. 605 Like Dido now, striding triumphant among her people, spurring on the work of their kingdom still to come.
 And then by Juno's doors beneath the vaulted dome, flanked by an honor guard beside her lofty seat, the queen assumed her throne. Here as she handed down 610 decrees and laws to her people, sharing labors fairly, some by lot, some with her sense of justice, Aeneas suddenly sees his men approaching through the crowds, Antheus, Sergestus, gallant Cloanthus, other Trojans the black gales had battered over the seas 615 and swept to far-flung coasts.

Aeneas, Achates,
 both were amazed, both struck with joy and fear.
 They yearn to grasp their companions' hands in haste but both men are unnerved by the mystery of it all.
 So, cloaked in folds of mist, they hide their feelings, 620 waiting, hoping to see what luck their friends have found.
 Where have they left their ships, what coast? Why have they come?
 These picked men, still marching in from the whole armada, pressing toward the temple amid the rising din to plead for some goodwill.

5. Having killed Hector, Achilles dragged his corpse around the city behind his chariot, until Priam came to ransom his son's body.

6. King of the Ethiopians, who fought on the Trojan side.

7. The Amazons were a race of warrior women who fought for Troy.

8. Diana (Artemis in Greek mythology) is the virgin goddess associated with hunting. She was born on Delos, the island location of Mount Cynthus; Eurotas was a river in Sparta where she was worshipped.

9. Leto, Diana's mother.

Once they had entered, 625 allowed to appeal before the queen—the eldest,
 Prince Ilioneus, calm, composed, spoke out:
 “Your majesty, empowered by Jove to found your new city here and curb rebellious tribes with your sense of justice—we poor Trojans, 630 castaways, tossed by storms over all the seas;
 we beg you: keep the cursed fire off our ships!
 Pity us, god-fearing men! Look on us kindly, see the state we are in. We have not come to put your Libyan gods and homes to the sword, 635 loot them and haul our plunder toward the beach.
 No, such pride, such violence has no place in the hearts of beaten men.

“There is a country—
 the Greeks called it Hesperia, Land of the West, an ancient land, mighty in war and rich in soil. 640 Oenotrians<sup>1</sup> settled it; now we hear their descendants call their kingdom Italy, after their leader, Italus.
 Italy-bound we were when, surging with sudden breakers stormy Orion<sup>2</sup> drove us against blind shoals and from the South came vicious gales to scatter us, whelmed by the sea, 645 across the murderous surf and rocky barrier reefs:
 We few escaped and floated toward your coast.
 What kind of men are these? What land is this,
 that you can tolerate such barbaric ways?
 We are denied the sailor’s right to shore— 650 attacked, forbidden even a footing on your beach.
 If you have no use for humankind and mortal armor, at least respect the gods. They know right from wrong.
 They don’t forget.

“We once had a king, Aeneas . . . 655 none more just, none more devoted to duty, none more brave in arms. If Fate has saved that man, if he still draws strength from the air we breathe, if he’s not laid low, not yet with the heartless shades, fear not, nor will you once regret the first step you take to compete with him in kindness. 660
 We have cities too, in the land of Sicily, arms and a king, Acestes, born of Trojan blood.
 Permit us to haul our storm-racked ships ashore, trim new oars, hew timbers out of your woods, so that, if we are fated to sail for Italy—king and crews restored— 665 to Italy, to Latium we will sail with buoyant hearts.
 But if we have lost our haven there, if Libyan waters hold you now, my captain, best of the men of Troy, and all our hopes for Iulus have been dashed, at least we can cross back over Sicilian seas, 670

the straits we came from, homes ready and waiting, and seek out great Acestes for our king.”

So Ilioneus closed. And with one accord the Trojans murmured Yes.

Her eyes lowered,

Dido replies with a few choice words of welcome: 675 “Cast fear to the winds, Trojans, free your minds.
 Our kingdom is new. Our hard straits have forced me to set defenses, station guards along our far frontiers.
 Who has not heard of Aeneas’ people, his city, Troy, her men, her heroes, the flames of that horrendous war? 680
 We are not so dull of mind, we Carthaginians here.
 When he yokes his team, the Sun shines down on us as well.
 Whatever you choose, great Hesperia—Saturn’s fields—or the shores of Eryx with Acestes as your king,<sup>3</sup>
 I will provide safe passage, escorts and support 685 to speed you on your way. Or would you rather settle here in my realm on equal terms with me?
 This city I build—it’s yours. Haul ships to shore.
 Trojans, Tyrians: they will be all the same to me.
 If only the storm that drove you drove your king 690 and Aeneas were here now! Indeed, I’ll send out trusty men to scour the coast of Libya far and wide.
 Perhaps he’s shipwrecked, lost in woods or towns.”

Spirits lifting at Dido’s welcome, brave Achates and captain Aeneas had long chafed to break free 695 of the mist, and now Achates spurs Aeneas on:
 “Son of Venus, what feelings are rising in you now?
 You see the coast is clear, our ships and friends restored.
 Just one is lost. We saw him drown at sea ourselves.
 All else is just as your mother promised.” 700

He’d barely ended when all at once the mist around them parted, melting into the open air, and there Aeneas stood, clear in the light of day,
his head, his shoulders, the man was like a god.
His own mother had breathed her beauty on her son, 705 a gloss on his flowing hair, and the ruddy glow of youth, and radiant joy shone in his eyes. His beauty fine as a craftsman’s hand can add to ivory, or aglow as silver or Parian marble<sup>4</sup> ringed in glinting gold.

Suddenly, surprising all, he tells the queen: 710 “Here I am before you, the man you are looking for,
 Aeneas the Trojan, plucked from Libya’s heavy seas.
 You alone have pitied the long ordeals of Troy—unspeakable—

3. Hesperia is “the western land,” that is, Italy.
In Roman mythology, the Titan god Saturn, when driven out by Jupiter, fled to Italy and established the Golden Age. Eryx: city in Sicily.

4. That is, marble from the island of Paros; famous for its whiteness.

and here you would share your city and your home with us, this remnant left by the Greeks. We who have drunk deep of each and every disaster land and sea can offer. 715

Stripped of everything, now it's past our power to reward you gift for gift, Dido, theirs as well, whoever may survive of the Dardan<sup>5</sup> people still, strewn over the wide world now. But may the gods, 720
if there are Powers who still respect the good and true, if justice still exists on the face of the earth, may they and their own sense of right and wrong bring you your just rewards.

What age has been so blest to give you birth? 725
What noble parents produced so fine a daughter?
So long as rivers run to the sea, so long as shadows travel the mountain slopes and the stars range the skies, your honor, your name, your praise will live forever, whatever lands may call me to their shores."

With that, 730
he extends his right hand toward his friend Ilioneus, greeting Serestus with his left, and then the others, gallant Gyas, gallant Cloanthus.

Tyrian Dido marveled, first at the sight of him, next at all he'd suffered, then she said aloud: "Born of a goddess, even so 735 what destiny hunts you down through such ordeals?
What violence lands you on this frightful coast?
Are you that Aeneas whom loving Venus bore to Dardan Anchises on the Simois' banks at Troy?
Well I remember . . . Teucer came to Sidon once, 740 banished from native ground, searching for new realms, and my father Belus helped him.<sup>6</sup> Belus had sacked Cyprus, plundered that rich island, ruled with a victor's hand.
From that day on I have known of Troy's disaster, known your name, and all the kings of Greece. 745 Teucer, your enemy, often sang Troy's praises, claiming his own descent from Teucer's ancient stock.
So come, young soldiers, welcome to our house.
My destiny, harrying me with trials hard as yours, led me as well, at last, to anchor in this land. 750 Schooled in suffering, now I learn to comfort those who suffer too."

With that greeting
she leads Aeneas into the royal halls, announcing offerings in the gods' high temples as she goes.
Not forgetting to send his shipmates on the beaches 755 twenty bulls and a hundred huge, bristling razorbacks and a hundred fattened lambs together with their mothers:
gifts to make this day a day of joy.

5. Dardanus founded the city of Dardania, just above Troy; hence the Dardans or Dardanians are the Trojans.

6. After the fall of Troy, Teucer (a Trojan archer who fought on the Greek side) was exiled and later founded Salamis, a city on the island of Cyprus. (This Teucer is not the legendary founder of Troy; see line 279.)

Within the palace
 all is decked with adornments, lavish, regal splendor.
 In the central hall they are setting out a banquet, 760 draping the gorgeous purple, intricately worked, heaping the board with grand displays of silver and gold engraved with her fathers' valiant deeds, a long, unending series of captains and commands, traced through a line of heroes since her country's birth. 765

Aeneas—a father's love would give the man no rest—quickly sends Achates down to the ships to take the news to Ascanius, bring him back to Carthage.
 All his paternal care is focused on his son.
 He tells Achates to fetch some gifts as well, 770 plucked from the ruins of Troy: a gown stiff with figures stitched in gold, and a woven veil with yellow sprays of acanthus round the border.
 Helen's glory, gifts she carried out of Mycenae, fleeing Argos for Troy to seal her wicked marriage— 775
 the marvelous handiwork of Helen's mother, Leda.
 Aeneas adds the scepter Ilione used to bear, the eldest daughter of Priam; a necklace too, strung with pearls, and a crown of double bands, one studded with gems, the other, gold. Achates, 780 following orders, hurries toward the ships.

But now Venus is mulling over some new schemes, new intrigues. Altered in face and figure, Cupid<sup>7</sup> would go in place of the captivating Ascanius, using his gifts to fire the queen to madness, 785 weaving a lover's ardor through her bones.
 No doubt Venus fears that treacherous house and the Tyrians' forked tongues, and brutal Juno inflames her anguish too and her cares keep coming back as night draws on. 790
 So Venus makes an appeal to Love, her winged son:
 "You, my son, are my strength, my greatest power—you alone, my son, can scoff at the lightning bolts the high and mighty Father hurled against Typhoeus.<sup>8</sup> Help me, I beg you. I need all your immortal force. 795 Your brother Aeneas is tossed round every coast on earth, thanks to Juno's ruthless hatred, as you well know,
 and time and again you've grieved to see my grief.
 But now Phoenician Dido has him in her clutches, holding him back with smooth, seductive words, 800 and I fear the outcome of Juno's welcome here . . .
 She won't sit tight while Fate is turning on its hinge.
 So I plan to forestall her with ruses of my own and besiege the queen with flames, and no goddess will change her mood—she's mine, 805

 my ally-in-arms in my great love for Aeneas.

“Now how can you go about this? Hear my plan.
 His dear father has just sent for the young prince—he means the world to me—and he's bound for Carthage now, bearing presents saved from the sea, the flames of Troy. 810 I'll lull him into a deep sleep and hide him far away on Cythera's heights or high Idalium,<sup>9</sup> my shrines, so he cannot learn of my trap or spring it open while it's being set. And you with your cunning, forge his appearance—just one night, no more—put on 815
 the familiar features of the boy, boy that you are,
 so when the wine flows free at the royal board and Dido, lost in joy, cradles you in her lap, caressing, kissing you gently, you can breathe your secret fire into her, poison the queen 820 and she will never know.”

Cupid leaps at once to his loving mother's orders. Shedding his wings he masquerades as Iulus, prancing with his stride.
 But now Venus distils a deep, soothing sleep into Iulus' limbs, and warming him in her breast 825 the goddess spirits him off to her high Idalian grove where beds of marjoram breathe and embrace him with aromatic flowers and rustling shade.

Now Cupid is on the move, under her orders, bringing the Tyrians royal gifts, his spirits high as Achates leads him on. 830 Arriving, he finds the queen already poised on a golden throne beneath the sumptuous hangings, commanding the very center of her palace. Now Aeneas, the good captain, enters, then the Trojan soldiers, taking their seats on couches draped in purple. 835 Servants pour them water to rinse their hands, quickly serving them bread from baskets, spreading their laps with linens, napkins clipped and smooth.
 In the kitchens are fifty serving-maids assigned to lay out foods in a long line, course by course, 840 and honor the household gods by building fires high.
 A hundred other maids and a hundred men, all matched in age, are spreading the feast on trestles, setting out the cups.
 And Tyrians join them, bustling through the doors, filling the hall with joy, to take invited seats 845 on brocaded couches. They admire Aeneas' gifts, admire Iulus now—the glowing face of the god and the god's dissembling words—and Helen's gown and the veil adorned with a yellow acanthus border.

But above all, tragic Dido, doomed to a plague 850 about to strike, cannot feast her eyes enough, thrilled both by the boy and gifts he brings and the more she looks the more the fire grows.
 But once he's embraced Aeneas, clung to his neck to sate the deep love of his father, deluded father, 855 Cupid makes for the queen. Her gaze, her whole heart is riveted on him now, and at times she even warms him snugly in her breast, for how can she know, poor Dido, what a mighty god is sinking into her, to her grief?
 But he, recalling the wishes of his mother Venus, 860 blots out the memory of Sychaeus bit by bit, trying to seize with a fresh, living love
 a heart at rest for long—long numb to passion.

Then,
 with the first lull in the feast, the tables cleared away, they set out massive bowls and crown the wine with wreaths. 865
 A vast din swells in the palace, voices reverberating through the echoing halls. They light the lamps, hung from the coffered ceilings sheathed in gilt,
 and blazing torches burn the night away.
 The queen calls for a heavy golden bowl, 870 studded with jewels and brimmed with unmixed wine, the bowl that Belus<sup>1</sup> and all of Belus' sons had brimmed, and the hall falls hushed as Dido lifts a prayer:
 "Jupiter, you, they say, are the god who grants the laws of host and guest. May this day be one 875 of joy for Tyrians here and exiles come from Troy, a day our sons will long remember. Bacchus,<sup>2</sup> giver of bliss, and Juno, generous Juno, bless us now. And come, my people, celebrate with all goodwill this feast that makes us one!" 880

With that prayer, she poured a libation to the gods, tipping wine on the board, and tipping it, she was first to take the bowl, brushing it lightly with her lips, then gave it to Bitias—laughing, goading him on and he took the plunge, draining the foaming bowl, 885 drenching himself in its brimming, overflowing gold, and the other princes drank in turn. Then Iopas, long-haired bard, strikes up his golden lyre resounding through the halls. Giant Atlas<sup>3</sup> had been his teacher once, and now he sings 890 the wandering moon and laboring sun eclipsed, the roots of the human race and the wild beasts,
 the source of storms and the lightning bolts on high, Arcturus, the rainy Hyades and the Great and Little Bears,<sup>4</sup> and why the winter suns so rush to bathe themselves in the sea 895 and what slows down the nights to a long lingering crawl . . .

 And time and again the Tyrians burst into applause and the Trojans took their lead. So Dido, doomed, was lengthening out the night by trading tales as she drank long draughts of love—asking Aeneas 900 question on question, now about Priam, now Hector, what armor Memnon, son of the Morning, wore at Troy, how swift were the horses of Diomedes? How strong was Achilles?
 “Wait, come, my guest,” she urges, “tell us your own story, start to finish—the ambush laid by the Greeks, the pain 905 your people suffered, the wanderings you have faced.
 For now is the seventh summer that has borne you wandering all the lands and seas on earth.”

BOOK II

[The Final Hours of Troy]

Silence. All fell hushed, their eyes fixed on Aeneas now as the founder of his people, high on a seat of honor, set out on his story: “Sorrow, unspeakable sorrow, my queen, you ask me to bring to life once more,
 how the Greeks uprooted Troy in all her power, 5 our kingdom mourned forever. What horrors I saw, a tragedy where I played a leading role myself.
 Who could tell such things—not even a Myrmidon, a Dolopian,<sup>5</sup> or comrade of iron-hearted Ulysses<sup>6</sup>— and still refrain from tears? And now, too, 10 the dank night is sweeping down from the sky and the setting stars incline our heads to sleep.
 But if you long so deeply to know what we went through,
 to hear, in brief, the last great agony of Troy, much as I shudder at the memory of it all— 15
 I shrank back in grief—I’ll try to tell it now . . .

“Ground down by the war and driven back by Fate, the Greek captains had watched the years slip by until, helped by Minerva’s superhuman skill, they built that mammoth horse, immense as a mountain, 20 lining its ribs with ship timbers hewn from pine.
 An offering to secure safe passage home, or so they pretend, and the story spreads through Troy.
 But they pick by lot the best, most able-bodied men and stealthily lock them into the horse’s dark flanks 25 till the vast hold of the monster’s womb is packed with soldiers bristling weapons.

“Just in sight of Troy
 an island rises, Tenedos, famed in the old songs, powerful, rich, while Priam's realm stood fast.

 Now it's only a bay, a treacherous cove for ships. 30
 Well there they sail, hiding out on its lonely coast while we thought—gone! Sped home on the winds to Greece.
 So all Troy breathes free, relieved of her endless sorrow.
 We fling open the gates and stream out, elated to see the Greeks' abandoned camp, the deserted beachhead. 35
 Here the Dolopians<sup>7</sup> formed ranks—

“Here savage Achilles

pitched his tents—

“Over there the armada moored and here the familiar killing-fields of battle.
 Some gaze wonderstruck at the gift for Pallas, the virgin never wed<sup>8</sup>—transfixed by the horse, 40 its looming mass, our doom. Thymoetes leads the way.
 ‘Drag it inside the walls,’ he urges, ‘plant it high on the city heights!’ Inspired by treachery now or the fate of Troy was moving toward this end.
 But Capys with other saner heads who take his side, 45 suspecting a trap in any gift the Greeks might offer, tells us: ‘Fling it into the sea or torch the thing to ash or bore into the depths of its womb where men can hide!’
 The common people are split into warring factions.

“But now, out in the lead with a troop of comrades, 50 down Laocoön<sup>9</sup> runs from the heights in full fury, calling out from a distance: ‘Poor doomed fools, have you gone mad, you Trojans?
 You really believe the enemy's sailed away?
 Or any gift of the Greeks is free of guile? 55
 Is that how well you know Ulysses? Trust me, either the Greeks are hiding, shut inside those beams, or the horse is a battle-engine geared to breach our walls, spy on our homes, come down on our city, overwhelm us—or some other deception's lurking deep inside it. 60 Trojans, never trust that horse. Whatever it is,
 I fear the Greeks, especially bearing gifts.’

“In that spirit, with all his might he hurled a huge spear straight into the monster's flanks, the mortised timberwork of its swollen belly. 65 Quivering, there it stuck, and the stricken womb came booming back from its depths with echoing groans.
 If Fate and our own wits had not gone against us, surely Laocoön would have driven us on, now, to rip the Greek lair open with iron spears 70 and Troy would still be standing—proud fortress of Priam, you would tower still!

7. From Dolopia, a region in Greece.

9. A Trojan priest of Neptune.

8. The goddess Athena was famously a virgin.

“Suddenly, in the thick of it all, a young soldier, hands shackled behind his back, with much shouting Trojan shepherds were hauling him toward the king. 75
 They’d come on the man by chance, a total stranger.
 He’d given himself up, with one goal in mind:
 to open Troy to the Greeks and lay her waste.
 He trusted to courage, nerved for either end, to weave his lies or face his certain death. 80 Young Trojan recruits, keen to have a look, came scurrying up from all sides, crowding round, outdoing each other to make a mockery of the captive.
 Now, hear the treachery of the Greeks and learn from a single crime the nature of the beast . . . 85 Haggard, helpless, there in our midst he stood, all eyes riveted on him now, and turning a wary glance at the lines of Trojan troops he groaned and spoke:
 ‘Where can I find some refuge, where on land, on sea?
 What’s left for me now? A man of so much misery! 90
 Nothing among the Greeks, no place at all. And worse,
 I see my Trojan enemies crying for my blood.’

“His groans convince us, cutting all our show of violence short.
 We press him: ‘Tell us where you were born, your family.
 What news do you bring? Tell us what you trust to, 95 such a willing captive.’

“‘All of it, my king,
 I’ll tell you, come what may, the whole true story.
 Greek I am, I don’t deny it. No, that first.
 Fortune may have made me a man of misery but, wicked as she is, 100
 she can’t make Sinon a lying fraud as well.

“‘Now,
 perhaps you’ve caught some rumor of Palamedes,<sup>1</sup>
 Belus’ son, and his shining fame that rings in song.
 The Greeks charged him with treason, a trumped-up charge, an innocent man, and just because he opposed the war 105 they put him to death, but once he’s robbed of the light, they mourn him sorely. Now I was his blood kin, a youngster when my father, a poor man, sent me off to the war at Troy as Palamedes’ comrade.
 Long as he kept his royal status, holding forth 110 in the councils of the kings, I had some standing too, some pride of place. But once he left the land of the living, thanks to the jealous, forked tongue of our Ulysses—you’re no stranger to his story—I was shattered, I dragged out my life in the shadows, grieving, 115 seething alone, in silence . . .
 outraged by my innocent friend’s demise until

1. A Greek warrior who advised the Greeks to return home from Troy. Odysseus persuaded them that he was a traitor, and had him killed. He was descended from the Egyptian king Belus.

I burst out like a madman, swore if I ever returned in triumph to our native Argos, ever got the chance I'd take revenge, and my oath provoked a storm of hatred. 120
 That was my first step on the slippery road to ruin.
 From then on, Ulysses kept tormenting me, pressing charge on charge; from then on, he bruited about his two-edged rumors among the rank and file.
 Driven by guilt, he looked for ways to kill me, 125 he never rested until, making Calchas<sup>2</sup> his henchman—but why now? Why go over that unforgiving ground again?
 Why waste words? If you think all Greeks are one,
 if hearing the name Greek is enough for you,
 it's high time you made me pay the price. 130
 How that would please the man of Ithaca,<sup>3</sup> how the sons of Atreus would repay you!

“Now, of course,

we burn to question him, urge him to explain—blind to how false the cunning Greeks could be.
 All atremble, he carries on with his tale, 135 lying from the cockles of his heart:

“Time and again
 the Greeks had yearned to abandon Troy—bone-tired from a long hard war—to put it far behind and beat a clean retreat. Would to god they had.
 But time and again, as they were setting sail, 140 the heavy seas would keep them confined to port and the Southwind filled their hearts with dread and worst of all, once this horse, this mass of timber with locking planks, stood stationed here at last, the thunderheads rumbled up and down the sky. 145
 So, at our wit's end, we send Eurypylus off to question Apollo's oracle now, and back he comes from the god's shrine with these bleak words: “With blood you appeased the winds, with a virgin's sacrifice when you, you Greeks, first sought the shores of Troy.<sup>4</sup> 150 With blood you must seek fair winds to sail you home, must sacrifice one more Greek life in return.”

“As the word spread, the ranks were struck dumb and icy fear sent shivers down their spines.
 Whom did the god demand? Who'd meet his doom? 155
 Just that moment the Ithacan hailed the prophet, Calchas, into our midst—he'd twist it out of him, what was the gods' will? The army rose in uproar.
 Even then our soldiers sensed that I was the one,
 the target of that Ulysses' vicious schemes— 160 they saw it coming, still they held their tongues.

2. Greek prophet.

4. Iphigeneia was sacrificed by her father,

Agamemnon, to allow the winds to blow the fleet to Troy.

For ten days the seer, silent, closed off in his tent, refused to say a word or betray a man to death.
 But at last, goaded on by Ulysses' mounting threats but in fact conniving in their plot, he breaks his silence 165 and dooms me to the altar. And the army gave consent.
 The death that each man dreaded turned to the fate of one poor soul: a burden they could bear.

“The day of infamy soon came . . .
 the sacred rites were all performed for the victim, 170
 the salted meal strewn, the bands tied round my head.
 But I broke free of death, I tell you, burst my shackles, yes, and hid all night in the reeds of a marshy lake, waiting for them to sail—if only they would sail!
 Well, no hope now of seeing the land where I was born 175 or my sweet children, the father I longed for all these years.
 Maybe they'll wring from them the price for my escape, avenge my guilt with my loved ones' blood, poor things.
 I beg you, king, by the Powers who know the truth, by any trust still uncorrupt in the world of men, 180 pity a man whose torment knows no bounds.
 Pity me in my pain.
 I know in my soul I don't deserve to suffer.’

“He wept and won his life—our pity, too.
 Priam takes command, has him freed from the ropes 185 and chains that bind him fast, and hails him warmly: ‘Whoever you are, from now on, now you've lost the Greeks, put them out of your mind and you'll be one of us.
 But answer my questions. Tell me the whole truth.
 Why did they raise up this giant, monstrous horse? 190
 Who conceived it? What's it for? its purpose?
 A gift to the gods? A great engine of battle?’

“He broke off. Sinon, adept at deceit, with all his Greek cunning lifted his hands, just freed from their fetters, up to the stars 195 and prayed: ‘Bear witness, you eternal fires of the sky and you inviolate will of the gods! Bear witness, altar and those infernal knives that I escaped and the sacred bands I wore myself: the victim.
 It's right to break my sworn oath to the Greeks, 200
 it's right to detest those men and bring to light all they're hiding now. No laws of my native land can bind me here. Just keep your promise, Troy, and if I can save you, you must save me too—
 if I reveal the truth and pay you back in full. 205

“All the hopes of the Greeks, their firm faith in a war they'd launched themselves had always hinged on Pallas Athena's help.

But from the moment that godless Diomedes, flanked by Ulysses, the mastermind of crime, 210 attacked and tore the fateful image of Pallas out of her own hallowed shrine,<sup>5</sup> and cut down the sentries ringing your city heights and seized that holy image and even dared touch the sacred bands on the virgin goddess' head with hands reeking blood— 215 from that hour on, the high hopes of the Greeks had trickled away like a slow, ebbing tide . . .
 They were broken, beaten men,
 the will of the goddess dead set against them.
 Omens of this she gave in no uncertain terms. 220 They'd hardly stood her image up in the Greek camp when flickering fire shot from its glaring eyes and salt sweat ran glistening down its limbs and three times the goddess herself—a marvel—blazed forth from the ground, shield clashing, spear brandished. 225
 The prophet spurs them at once to risk escape by sea:
 "You cannot root out Troy with your Greek spears unless you seek new omens in Greece and bring the god back here"— the image they'd borne across the sea in their curved ships.
 So now they've sailed away on the wind for home shores, 230 just to rearm, recruit their gods as allies yet again, then measure back their course on the high seas and back they'll come to attack you all off guard.

"So Calchas read the omens. At his command they raised this horse, this effigy, all to atone 235 for the violated image of Pallas, her wounded pride, her power—and expiate the outrage they had done.
 But he made them do the work on a grand scale,
 a tremendous mass of interlocking timbers towering toward the sky, so the horse could not be trundled 240 through your gates or hauled inside your walls or guard your people if they revered it well in the old, ancient way. For if your hands should violate this great offering to Minerva, a total disaster—if only god would turn it 245 against the seer himself!—will wheel down on Priam's empire, Troy, and all your futures.
 But if your hands will rear it up, into your city, then all Asia in arms can invade Greece, can launch an all-out war right up to the walls of Pelops.<sup>6</sup> 250 That's the doom that awaits our sons' sons.'

"Trapped by his craft, that cunning liar Sinon, we believed his story. His tears, his treachery seized the men whom neither Tydeus' son<sup>7</sup> nor Achilles could defeat, nor ten long years of war, nor all the thousand ships.

255

“But a new portent strikes our doomed people now—a greater omen, far more terrible, fatal, shakes our senses, blind to what was coming.
Laocoön, the priest of Neptune picked by lot, was sacrificing a massive bull at the holy altar
when—I cringe to recall it now—look there!
Over the calm deep straits off Tenedos swim twin, giant serpents, rearing in coils, breasting the sea-swell side by side, plunging toward the shore, their heads, their blood-red crests surging over the waves, their bodies thrashing, backs rolling in coil on mammoth coil and the wake behind them churns in a roar of foaming spray, and now, their eyes glittering, shot with blood and fire, flickering tongues licking their hissing maws, yes, now they're about to land. We blanch at the sight, we scatter.
Like troops on attack they're heading straight for Laocoön—first each serpent seizes one of his small young sons, constricting, twisting around him, sinks its fangs in the tortured limbs, and gorges. Next Laocoön rushing quick to the rescue, clutching his sword—they trap him, bind him in huge muscular whorls, their scaly backs lashing around his midriff twice and twice around his throat—their heads, their flaring necks mounting over their victim writhing still, his hands frantic to wrench apart their knotted trunks, his priestly bands splattered in filth, black venom and all the while his horrible screaming fills the skies, bellowing like some wounded bull struggling to shrug loose from his neck an axe that's struck awry, to lumber clear of the altar . . .
Only the twin snakes escape, sliding off and away to the heights of Troy where the ruthless goddess holds her shrine, and there at her feet they hide, vanishing under Minerva's great round shield.

“At once,

I tell you, a stranger fear runs through the harrowed crowd.
Laocoön deserved to pay for his outrage, so they say,
he desecrated the sacred timbers of the horse,
he hurled his wicked lance at the beast's back.
'Haul Minerva's effigy up to her house,' we shout,
'Offer up our prayers to the power of the goddess!'
We breach our own ramparts, fling our defenses open, all pitch into the work. Smooth running rollers we wheel beneath its hoofs, and heavy hempen ropes we bind around its neck, and teeming with men-at-arms the huge deadly engine climbs our city walls . . .

7. Diomedes.

And round it boys and unwed girls sing hymns, thrilled to lay a hand on the dangling ropes as on and on it comes, gliding into the city, looming high over the city's heart.

“Oh my country!
Troy, home of the gods! You great walls of the Dardans long renowned in war!

305

“Four times it lurched to a halt at the very brink of the gates—four times the armor clashed out from its womb. But we, we forged ahead, oblivious, blind, insane, we stationed the monster fraught with doom on the hallowed heights of Troy.
Even now Cassandra<sup>8</sup> revealed the future, opening lips the gods had ruled no Trojan would believe.
And we, poor fools—on this, our last day—we deck the shrines of the gods with green holiday garlands all throughout the city . . .

310

“But all the while the skies keep wheeling on and night comes sweeping in from the Ocean Stream, in its mammoth shadow swallowing up the earth, and the Pole Star, and the treachery of the Greeks.
Dead quiet. The Trojans slept on, strewn throughout their fortress, weary bodies embraced by slumber.
But the Greek armada was under way now, crossing over from Tenedos, ships in battle formation under the moon's quiet light, their silent ally, homing in on the berths they know by heart—when the king's flagship sends up a signal flare, the cue for Sinon, saved by the Fates' unjust decree, and stealthily loosing the pine bolts of the horse,
he unleashes the Greeks shut up inside its womb.
The horse stands open wide, fighters in high spirits pouring out of its timbered cavern into the fresh air:
the chiefs, Thessandrus, Sthenelus, ruthless Ulysses rappeling down a rope they dropped from its side, and Acamas, Thoas, Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, captain Machaon, Menelaus, Epeus himself,
the man who built that masterpiece of fraud.
They steal on a city buried deep in sleep and wine, they butcher the guards, fling wide the gates and hug their cohorts poised to combine forces. Plot complete.

“This was the hour when rest, that gift of the gods most heaven-sent, first comes to beleaguered mortals, creeping over us now . . . when there, look,
I dreamed I saw Prince Hector before my eyes, my comrade haggard with sorrow, streaming tears,

340

8. Daughter of King Priam. Apollo fell in love with her and gave her the gift of unerring prophecy; but when she refused him, he turned the gift into a curse by ensuring that nobody would ever believe her predictions.

just as he once was, when dragged behind the chariot, black with blood and grime, thongs piercing his swollen feet— 345 what a harrowing sight! What a far cry from the old Hector home from battle, decked in Achilles' arms<sup>9</sup>—his trophies—or fresh from pitching Trojan fire at the Greek ships.
 His beard matted now, his hair clotted with blood, bearing the wounds, so many wounds he suffered 350 fighting round his native city's walls . . .
 I dreamed I addressed him first, in tears myself
 I forced my voice from the depths of all my grief:
 'Oh light of the Trojans—last, best hope of Troy!
 What's held you back so long? How long we've waited, 355
 Hector, for you to come, and now from what far shores?
 How glad we are to see you, we battle-weary men, after so many deaths, your people dead and gone, after your citizens, your city felt such pain.
 But what outrage has mutilated your face 360 so clear and cloudless once? Why these wounds?'

"Wasting no words, no time on empty questions, heaving a deep groan from his heart he calls out:
 'Escape, son of the goddess, tear yourself from the flames!
 The enemy holds our walls. Troy is toppling from her heights. 365
 You have paid your debt to our king and native land.
 If one strong arm could have saved Troy, my arm would have saved the city. Now, into your hands she entrusts her holy things, her household gods.
 Take them with you as comrades in your fortunes. 370 Seek a city for them, once you have roved the seas, erect great walls at last to house the gods of Troy!'

"Urging so, with his own hands he carries Vesta forth from her inner shrine, her image clad in ribbons, filled with her power, her everlasting fire.<sup>1</sup>
 "But now, 375
 chaos—the city begins to reel with cries of grief, louder, stronger, even though father's palace stood well back, screened off by trees, but still the clash of arms rings clearer, horror on the attack.
 I shake off sleep and scrambling up to the pitched roof 380
 I stand there, ears alert, and I hear a roar like fire assaulting a wheatfield, whipped by a Southwind's fury, or mountain torrent in full spate, flattening crops, leveling all the happy, thriving labor of oxen, dragging whole trees headlong down in its wake— 385 and a shepherd perched on a sheer rock outcrop hears the roar, lost in amazement, struck dumb.
 No doubting the good faith of the Greeks now, their treachery plain as day.

9. In the Iliad, Achilles' companion Patroclus bears Achilles' arms (that is, his armor and weapons) into battle and is killed by Hector, who seizes them as trophies.

1. In the temple of Vesta, the hearth goddess, was a fire that was never allowed to go out.

“Already, there,
the grand house of Deiphobus<sup>2</sup> stormed by fire, crashing in ruins— 390

“Already his neighbor Ucalegon up in flames—

“The Sigeon straits<sup>3</sup> shimmering back the blaze, the shouting of fighters soars, the clashing blare of trumpets.
Out of my wits, I seize my arms—what reason for arms?
Just my spirit burning to muster troops for battle, 395 rush with comrades up to the city’s heights, fury and rage driving me breakneck on as it races through my mind what a noble thing it is to die in arms!

“But now, look,
just slipped out from under the Greek barrage of spears, 400 Panthus, Othrys’ son, a priest of Apollo’s shrine on the citadel—hands full of the holy things, the images of our conquered gods—he’s dragging along his little grandson, making a wild dash for our doors.

‘Panthus, where’s our stronghold? our last stand?’— 405 words still on my lips as he groans in answer:
‘The last day has come for the Trojan people, no escaping this moment. Troy’s no more.

Ilium, gone—our awesome Trojan glory.
Brutal Jupiter hands it all over to Greece, 410
Greeks are lording over our city up in flames.
The horse stands towering high in the heart of Troy, disgoring its armed men, with Sinon in his glory, gloating over us—Sinon fans the fires.

The immense double gates are flung wide open, 415 Greeks in their thousands mass there, all who ever sailed from proud Mycenae. Others have choked the cramped streets, weapons brandished now in a battle line of naked, glinting steel tense for the kill. Only the first guards 420 at the gates put up some show of resistance, fighting blindly on.’

“Spurred by Panthus’ words and the gods’ will, into the blaze I dive, into the fray, wherever the din of combat breaks and war cries fill the sky, 425 wherever the battle-fury drives me on and now I’m joined by Rhipeus, Epytus mighty in armor, rearing up in the moonlight—

Hypanis comes to my side, and Dymas too, flanked by the young Coroebus, Mygdon’s son. 430 Late in the day he’d chanced to come to Troy incensed with a mad, burning love for Cassandra:
son-in-law to our king, he would rescue Troy. Poor man, if only he’d marked his bride’s inspired ravings!

2. A son of Priam.

the Sigeion promontory overlooking Troy.

3. Channel leading into the Aegean Sea, near “Seeing their close-packed ranks, hot for battle, 435

 I spur them on their way: ‘Men, brave hearts, though bravery cannot save us—if you’re bent on following me and risking all to face the worst, look around you, see how our chances stand.
 The gods who shored our empire up have left us, 440
 all have deserted their altars and their shrines.
 You race to defend a city already lost in flames.
 But let us die, go plunging into the thick of battle.
 One hope saves the defeated: they know they can’t be saved!’
 That fired their hearts with the fury of despair.

“Now 445
 like a wolfpack out for blood on a foggy night, driven blindly on by relentless, rabid hunger, leaving cubs behind, waiting, jaws parched—so through spears, through enemy ranks we plow to certain death, striking into the city’s heart, 450 the shielding wings of the darkness beating round us.
 Who has words to capture that night’s disaster, tell that slaughter? What tears could match our torments now? An ancient city is falling, a power that ruled for ages, now in ruins. 455 Everywhere lie the motionless bodies of the dead, strewn in her streets, her homes and the gods’ shrines we held in awe. And not only Trojans pay the price in blood—at times the courage races back in their conquered hearts and they cut their enemies down in all their triumph. 460 Everywhere, wrenching grief, everywhere, terror and a thousand shapes of death.

“And the first Greek to cross our path? Androgeos leading a horde of troops and taking us for allies on the march, the fool, he even gives us a warm salute and calls out: 465 ‘Hurry up, men. Why holding back, why now, why drag your heels? Troy’s up in flames, the rest are looting, sacking the city heights.
 But you, have you just come from the tall ships?’ Suddenly, getting no password he can trust, 470 he sensed he’d stumbled into enemy ranks!
 Stunned, he recoiled, swallowing back his words like a man who threads his way through prickly brambles, pressing his full weight on the ground, and blindly treads on a lurking snake and back he shrinks in instant fear 475 as it rears in anger, puffs its blue-black neck.
 Just so Androgeos, seeing us, cringes with fear, recoiling, struggling to flee but we attack, flinging a ring of steel around his cohorts—panic takes the Greeks unsure of their ground 480 and we cut them all to pieces.
 Fortune fills our sails in that first clash and Coroebus, flushed, fired with such success, exults: 'Comrades, wherever Fortune points the way, wherever the first road to safety leads, let's soldier on. 485 Exchange shields with the Greeks and wear their emblems.

 Call it cunning or courage: who would ask in war?
 Our enemies will arm us to the hilt.'

"With that he dons

Androgeos' crested helmet, his handsome blazoned shield and straps a Greek sword to his hip, and comrades, 490 spirits rising, take his lead. Rhipeus, Dymas too and our corps of young recruits—each fighter arms himself in the loot that he just seized and on we forge, blending in with the enemy, battling time and again under strange gods, 495 fighting hand-to-hand in the blind dark and many Greeks we send to the King of Death.
 Some scatter back to their ships, making a run for shore and safety. Others disgrace themselves, so panicked they clamber back inside the monstrous horse, 500 burying into the womb they know so well.

"But, oh

how wrong to rely on gods dead set against you!
 Watch: the virgin daughter of Priam, Cassandra, torn from the sacred depths of Minerva's shrine, dragged by the hair, raising her burning eyes 505 to the heavens, just her eyes, so helpless, shackles kept her from raising her gentle hands.
 Coroebus could not bear the sight of it—mad with rage he flung himself at the Greek lines and met his death.
 Closing ranks we charge after him, into the thick of battle 510 and face our first disaster. Down from the temple roof come showers of lances hurled by our own comrades there, duped by the look of our Greek arms, our Greek crests that launched this grisly slaughter. And worse still, the Greeks roaring with anger—we had saved Cassandra— 515 attack us from all sides! Ajax, fiercest of all and Atreus' two sons and the whole Dolopian army, wild as a rampaging whirlwind, gusts clashing, the West- and the South- and Eastwind riding high on the rushing horses of the dawn, and the woods howl 520 and Nereus<sup>4</sup> thrashing his savage trident, churns up the sea exploding in foam from its rocky depths.
 And those Greeks we had put to rout, our ruse in the murky night stampeding them headlong on throughout the city—back they come, the first 525 to see that our shields and spears are naked lies, to mark the words on our lips that jar with theirs.
 In a flash, superior numbers overwhelm us.
 Coroebus is first to go, cut down by Peneleus' right hand he sprawls 530 at Minerva's shrine, the goddess, power of armies.<sup>5</sup> Rhipeus falls too, the most righteous man in Troy, the most devoted to justice, true, but the gods had other plans.

"Hypanis, Dymas die as well, run through by their own men—

"And you, Panthus, 535 not all your piety, all the sacred bands you wore as Apollo's priest could save you as you fell.
 Ashes of Ilium, last flames that engulfed my world—
 I swear by you that in your last hour I never shrank from the Greek spears, from any startling hazard of war— 540 if Fate had struck me down, my sword-arm earned it all.
 Now we are swept away, Iphitus, Pelias with me, one weighed down with age and the other slowed by a wound Ulysses gave him—heading straight for Priam's palace, driven there by the outcries. 545

"And there, I tell you, a pitched battle flares!
 You'd think no other battles could match its fury, nowhere else in the city were people dying so.
 Invincible Mars<sup>6</sup> rears up to meet us face to face with waves of Greeks assaulting the roofs, we see them 550 choking the gateway, under a tortoise-shell of shields,<sup>7</sup> and the scaling ladders cling to the steep ramparts—just at the gates the raiders scramble up the rungs, shields on their left arms thrust out for defense, their right hands clutching the gables. 555 Over against them, Trojans ripping the tiles and turrets from all their roofs—the end is near, they can see it now, at the brink of death, desperate for weapons, some defense, and these, these missiles they send reeling down on the Greeks' heads—the gilded beams, 560 the inlaid glory of all our ancient fathers.
 Comrades below, posted in close-packed ranks, block the entries, swordpoints drawn and poised.
 My courage renewed, I rush to relieve the palace, brace the defenders, bring the defeated strength. 565

"There was a secret door, a hidden passage linking the wings of Priam's house—remote, far to the rear. Long as our realm still stood, Andromache, poor woman, would often go this way, unattended, to Hector's parents, taking the boy 570 Astyanax<sup>8</sup> by the hand to see grandfather Priam.
 I slipped through the door, up to the jutting roof where the doomed Trojans were hurling futile spears.

5. Minerva was a warrior goddess, often depicted carrying weapons.

6. God of war (equivalent of the Greek Ares).

7. Position adopted by Roman soldiers: packed tightly together, they put their shields above their heads, making the army look like a tortoise.

8. Son of Hector and his wife, Andromache.

There was a tower soaring high at the peak toward the sky, our favorite vantage point for surveying all of Troy 575 and the Greek fleet and camp. We attacked that tower with iron crowbars, just where the upper-story planks showed loosening joints—we rocked it, wrenched it free of its deep moorings and all at once we heaved it toppling down with a crash, trailing its wake of ruin to grind 580 the massed Greeks assaulting left and right. But on came Greek reserves, no letup, the hail of rocks, the missiles of every kind would never cease.

“There at the very edge of the front gates springs Pyrrhus, son of Achilles, prancing in arms, 585 aflash in his shimmering brazen sheath like a snake buried the whole winter long under frozen turf, swollen to bursting, fed full on poisonous weeds and now it springs into light, sloughing its old skin to glisten sleek in its newfound youth, its back slithering, 590 coiling, its proud chest rearing high to the sun, its triple tongue flickering through its fangs.
 Backing him now comes Periphas, giant fighter, Automedon too, Achilles’ henchman, charioteer who bore the great man’s armor—backing Pyrrhus, 595
 the young fighters from Scyros raid the palace, hurling firebrands at the roofs. Out in the lead, Pyrrhus seizes a double-axe and batters the rocky sill and ripping the bronze posts out of their sockets, hacking the rugged oaken planks of the doors, 600 makes a breach, a gaping maw, and there, exposed, the heart of the house, the sweep of the colonnades, the palace depths of the old kings and Priam lie exposed and they see the armed sentries bracing at the portals.

“But all in the house is turmoil, misery, groans, 605 the echoing chambers ring with cries of women, wails of mourning hit the golden stars.
 Mothers scatter in panic down the palace halls and embrace the pillars, cling to them, kiss them hard.
 But on he comes, Pyrrhus with all his father’s force, 610 no bolts, not even the guards can hold him back—under the ram’s repeated blows the doors cave in,
 the doorposts, prised from their sockets, crash flat.
 Force makes a breach and the Greeks come storming through, butcher the sentries, flood the entire place with men-at-arms. 615
 No river so wild, so frothing in spate, bursting its banks to overpower the dikes, anything in its way, its cresting tides stampeding in fury down on the fields to sweep the flocks and stalls across the open plain.
 I saw him myself, Pyrrhus crazed with carnage 620 and Atreus’ two sons just at the threshold—

“I saw

Hecuba with her hundred daughters and daughters-in-law,<sup>9</sup> saw Priam fouling with blood the altar fires he himself had blessed.

“Those fifty bridal-chambers filled with the hope of children’s children still to come, 625
the pillars proud with trophies, gilded with Eastern gold, they all come tumbling down—and the Greeks hold what the raging fire spares.

“Perhaps you wonder how Priam met his end.
When he saw his city stormed and seized, his gates 630 wrenched apart, the enemy camped in his palace depths, the old man dons his armor long unused, he clamps it round his shoulders shaking with age and, all for nothing, straps his useless sword to his hip, then makes for the thick of battle, out to meet his death. 635
At the heart of the house an ample altar stood, naked under the skies,
an ancient laurel bending over the shrine, embracing our household gods within its shade.
Here, flocking the altar, Hecuba and her daughters 640 huddled, blown headlong down like doves by a black storm—clutching, all for nothing, the figures of their gods.
Seeing Priam decked in the arms he’d worn as a young man, ‘Are you insane?’ she cries, ‘Poor husband, what impels you to strap that sword on now? Where are you rushing? 645 Too late for such defense, such help. Not even my own Hector, if he came to the rescue now . . .
Come to me, Priam. This altar will shield us all or else you’ll die with us.’

“With those words,
drawing him toward her there, she made a place 650
for the old man beside the holy shrine.

“Suddenly,
look, a son of Priam, Polites, just escaped from slaughter at Pyrrhus’ hands, comes racing in through spears, through enemy fighters, fleeing down the long arcades and deserted hallways—badly wounded, 655 Pyrrhus hot on his heels, a weapon poised for the kill, about to seize him, about to run him through and pressing home as Polites reached his parents and collapsed, vomiting out his life blood before their eyes.
At that, Priam, trapped in the grip of death, 660 not holding back, not checking his words, his rage:
‘You!’ he cries, ‘you and your vicious crimes!
If any power on high recoils at such an outrage, let the gods repay you for all your reckless work,

9. Wife of Priam, king of Troy. He had fifty sons and fifty daughters—not all by Hecuba.

grant you the thanks, the rich reward you've earned. 665 You've made me see my son's death with my own eyes, defiled a father's sight with a son's life blood.
 You say you're Achilles' son? You lie! Achilles never treated his enemy Priam so. No, he honored a suppliant's rights, he blushed to betray my trust, 670 he restored my Hector's bloodless corpse for burial, sent me safely home to the land I rule!

"With that

and with all his might the old man flings his spear—but too impotent now to pierce, it merely grazes Pyrrhus' brazen shield that blocks its way 675 and clings there, dangling limp from the boss, all for nothing. Pyrrhus shouts back: 'Well then, down you go, a messenger to my father, Peleus' son!<sup>1</sup> Tell him about my vicious work, how Neoptolemus<sup>2</sup> degrades his father's name—don't you forget. 680 Now—die!'

"That said, he drags the old man straight to the altar, quaking, slithering on through slicks of his son's blood, and twisting Priam's hair in his left hand, his right hand sweeping forth his sword—a flash of steel—he buries it hilt-deep in the king's flank. 685

"Such was the fate of Priam, his death, his lot on earth, with Troy blazing before his eyes, her ramparts down, the monarch who once had ruled in all his glory
 the many lands of Asia, Asia's many tribes.
 A powerful trunk is lying on the shore.<sup>3</sup> 690
 The head wrenched from the shoulders.
 A corpse without a name.

"Then, for the first time the full horror came home to me at last. I froze.

 The thought of my own dear father filled my mind when I saw the old king gasping out his life 695 with that raw wound—both men were the same age—and the thought of my Creusa, alone, abandoned, our house plundered, our little Iulus' fate.<sup>4</sup>
 I look back—what forces still stood by me?
 None. Totally spent in war, they'd all deserted, 700

1. Achilles was the son of Peleus. He was already dead, before the final storming of Troy killed by Paris with an arrow to the heel, his only vulnerability.

2. Literally, "New Warrior," another name for Pyrrhus, Achilles' son.

3. The detail that the body is left "on the shore"—which makes no narrative sense, since Priam is killed in the center of the city—is an allusion to the assassination of Pompey the Great. In the Roman civil war of 49–45 B.C.E., Pompey, representing the more aristocratic party, was defeated by the more populist Julius Caesar, and eventually assassinated; his body was famously abandoned on the beach of Egypt.

4. Creusa is Aeneas's wife; Iulus is his son.

down from the roofs they'd flung themselves to earth or hurled their broken bodies in the flames.

[“So,<sup>5</sup>

at just that moment I was the one man left and then I saw her, clinging to Vesta's threshold, hiding in silence, tucked away—Helen of Argos. 705 Glare of the fires lit my view as I looked down, scanning the city left and right, and there she was . . .
terrified of the Trojans' hate, now Troy was overpowered, terrified of the Greeks' revenge, her deserted husband's rage—that universal Fury, a curse to Troy and her native land 710 and here she lurked, skulking, a thing of loathing cowering at the altar: Helen. Out it flared, the fire inside my soul, my rage ablaze to avenge our fallen country—pay Helen back, crime for crime.

“‘So, this woman,’ it struck me now, ‘safe and sound 715 she'll look once more on Sparta, her native Greece?
She'll ride like a queen in triumph with her trophies?
Feast her eyes on her husband, parents, children too?
Her retinue fawning round her, Phrygian<sup>6</sup> ladies, slaves?
That—with Priam put to the sword? And Troy up in flames? 720
And time and again our Dardan shores have sweated blood?
Not for all the world. No fame, no memory to be won for punishing a woman: such victory reaps no praise but to stamp this abomination out as she deserves, to punish her now, they'll sing my praise for that. 725
What joy, to glut my heart with the fires of vengeance, bring some peace to the ashes of my people!’

“Whirling words—I was swept away by fury now] when all of a sudden there my loving mother<sup>7</sup> stood 730 before my eyes, but I had never seen her so clearly, her pure radiance shining down upon me through the night, the goddess in all her glory, just as the gods behold her build, her awesome beauty. Grasping my hand she held me back, adding this from her rose-red lips:
‘My son, what grief could incite such blazing anger? 735
Why such fury? And the love you bore me once, where has it all gone? Why don't you look first where you left your father, Anchises, spent with age?
Do your wife, Creusa, and son Ascanius still survive?
The Greek battalions are swarming round them all, 740 and if my love had never rushed to the rescue, flames would have swept them off by now or enemy sword-blades would have drained their blood.
Think: it's not that beauty, Helen, you should hate,

5. This passage is bracketed because many scholars believe it does not belong in the poem, since it is contradicted by a passage in book VI (573–623). The contradiction may be evidence of the Aeneid's unfinished status at Virgil's death.

6. That is, Trojan. Phrygia was the region of modern-day Turkey that included Troy.

7. Venus.

not even Paris, the man that you should blame, no, 745 it's the gods, the ruthless gods who are tearing down the wealth of Troy, her toppling crown of towers.

Look around. I'll sweep it all away, the mist so murky, dark, and swirling around you now, it clouds your vision, dulls your mortal sight. 750

You are my son. Never fear my orders.
Never refuse to bow to my commands.

“There,
yes, where you see the massive ramparts shattered, blocks wrenched from blocks, the billowing smoke and ash—it's Neptune himself,<sup>8</sup> prising loose with his giant trident 755 the foundation-stones of Troy, he's making the walls quake, ripping up the entire city by her roots.

“There's Juno, cruellest in fury, first to commandeer the Scaean Gates,<sup>9</sup> sword at her hip and mustering comrades, shock troops streaming out of the ships.

“Already up on the heights— 760 turn around and look—there's Pallas holding the fortress, flaming out of the clouds, her savage Gorgon glaring.<sup>1</sup> Even Father himself, he's filling the Greek hearts with courage, stamina—Jove in person spurring the gods to fight the Trojan armies!

“Run for your life, my son. 765
Put an end to your labors. I will never leave you,
I will set you safe at your father's door.’

“Parting words. She vanished into the dense night.
And now they all come looming up before me, terrible shapes, the deadly foes of Troy, 770
the gods gigantic in power.

“Then at last
I saw it all, all Ilium settling into her embers, Neptune's Troy, toppling over now from her roots like a proud, veteran ash on its mountain summit, chopped by stroke after stroke of the iron axe as 775 woodsmen fight to bring it down, and over and over it threatens to fall, its boughs shudder, its leafy crown quakes and back and forth it sways till overwhelmed by its wounds, with a long last groan it goes—torn up from its heights it crashes down 780 in ruins from its ridge . . .

Venus leading, down from the roof I climb and win my way through fires and massing foes.
The spears recede, the flames roll back before me.

8. The god of the sea and of earthquakes (Poseidon in Greek mythology), who was hostile to the Trojans, since Laomedon, an early king of Troy, failed to repay him for helping to build the city walls.

9. The main entrance to Troy.

1. Pallas Athena's shield displays the head of a Gorgon: the monster that turns those who look at it to stone.

“At last, gaining the door of father’s ancient house, 785 my first concern was to find the man, my first wish to spirit him off, into the high mountain range, but father, seeing Ilium razed from the earth, refused to drag his life out now and suffer exile.
 ‘You,’ he argued, ‘you in your prime, untouched by age, 790 your blood still coursing strong, you hearts of oak, you are the ones to hurry your escape. Myself, if the gods on high had wished me to live on,
 they would have saved my palace for me here.
 Enough—more than enough—that I have seen 795 one sack of my city, once survived its capture.<sup>2</sup> Here I lie, here laid out for death. Come say your parting salutes and leave my body so.
 I will find my own death, sword in hand:
 my enemies keen for spoils will be so kind. 800 Death without burial? A small price to pay.
 For years now, I’ve lingered out my life, despised by the gods, a dead weight to men, ever since the Father of Gods and King of Mortals stormed at me with his bolt and scorched me with its fire.’<sup>3</sup> 805

“So he said, planted there. Nothing could shake him now.
 But we dissolved in tears, my wife, Creusa, Ascanius, the whole household, begging my father not to pull our lives down with him, adding his own weight to the fate that dragged us down. 810
 He still refuses, holds to his resolve, clings to the spot. And again I rush to arms, desperate to die myself. Where could I turn?
 What were our chances now, at this point?
 ‘What!’ I cried. ‘Did you, my own father, 815 dream that I could run away and desert you here?
 How could such an outrage slip from a father’s lips?
 If it please the gods that nothing of our great city shall survive—if you are bent on adding your own death to the deaths of Troy and of all your loved ones too, 820 the doors of the deaths you crave are spread wide open.
 Pyrrhus will soon be here, bathed in Priam’s blood, Pyrrhus who butchers sons in their fathers’ faces, slaughters fathers at the altar. Was it for this, my loving mother, you swept me clear of the weapons, 825 free of the flames? Just to see the enemy camped in the very heart of our house, to see my son, Ascanius, see my father, my wife, Creusa, with them, sacrificed, massacred in each other’s blood?

2. Troy had been sacked by Hercules, when the previous king (Laomedon) cheated him.
 3. When Anchises had his affair with Venus, he was sworn to secrecy. He broke his word and boasted about sleeping with the goddess, so Jupiter hurled a thunderbolt at him as punishment, making him lame.

“Arms, my comrades,
bring me arms! The last light calls the defeated. 830 Send me back to the Greeks, let me go back to fight new battles. Not all of us here will die today without revenge.’

“Now buckling on my sword again and working my left arm through the shieldstrap, grasping it tightly, just as I 835 was rushing out, right at the doors my wife, Creusa, look, flung herself at my feet and hugged my knees and raised our little Iulus up to his father.
‘If you are going off to die,’ she begged, ‘then take us with you too, 840 to face the worst together. But if your battles teach you to hope in arms, the arms you buckle on,
your first duty should be to guard our house.
Desert us, leave us now—to whom? Whom?
Little Iulus, your father and your wife, 845 so I once was called.’

“So Creusa cries,
her wails of anguish echoing through the house when out of the blue an omen strikes—a marvel!
Now as we held our son between our hands and both our grieving faces, a tongue of fire, 850 watch, flares up from the crown of Iulus’ head, a subtle flame licking his downy hair, feeding around the boy’s brow, and though it never harmed him, panicked, we rush to shake the flame from his curls and smother the holy fire, damp it down with water. 855
But Father Anchises lifts his eyes to the stars in joy and stretching his hands toward the sky, sings out: ‘Almighty Jove! If any prayer can persuade you now, look down on us—that’s all I ask—if our devotion has earned it, grant us another omen, Father, 860 seal this first clear sign.’

“No sooner said
than an instant peal of thunder crashes on the left and down from the sky a shooting star comes gliding, trailing a flaming torch to irradiate the night as it comes sweeping down. We watch it sailing 865 over the topmost palace roofs to bury itself, still burning bright, in the forests of Mount Ida,<sup>4</sup> blazing its path with light, leaving a broad furrow, a fiery wake, and miles around the smoking sulfur fumes.
Won over at last, my father rises to his full height 870 and prays to the gods and reveres that holy star:
‘No more delay, not now! You gods of my fathers, now I follow wherever you lead me, I am with you.
Safeguard our house, safeguard my grandson Iulus!

4. Mountain near Troy held sacred as the birthplace of Jupiter.

This sign is yours: Troy rests in your power. 875
 I give way, my son. No more refusals.
 I will go with you, your comrade.'

"So he yielded
 but now the roar of flames grows louder all through Troy and the seething floods of fire are rolling closer.
 'So come, dear father, climb up onto my shoulders! 880
 I will carry you on my back. This labor of love will never wear me down. Whatever falls to us now, we both will share one peril, one path to safety.
 Little Iulus, walk beside me, and you, my wife, follow me at a distance, in my footsteps. 885 Servants, listen closely . . .

Just past the city walls a gravemound lies where an old shrine of forsaken Ceres<sup>5</sup> stands with an ancient cypress growing close beside it—our fathers' reverence kept it green for years. 890 Coming by many routes, it's there we meet, our rendezvous. And you, my father, carry our hearthgods now, our fathers' sacred vessels.
 I, just back from the war and fresh from slaughter,
 I must not handle the holy things—it's wrong— 895 not till I cleanse myself in running springs.'

"With that,
 over my broad shoulders and round my neck I spread a tawny lion's skin for a cloak, and bowing down, I lift my burden up. Little Iulus, clutching my right hand, keeps pace with tripping steps. 900
 My wife trails on behind. And so we make our way along the pitch-dark paths, and I who had never flinched at the hurtling spears or swarming Greek assaults—now every stir of wind, every whisper of sound alarms me, anxious both for the child beside me 905 and burden on my back. And then, nearing the gates, thinking we've all got safely through, I suddenly seem to catch the steady tramp of marching feet and father, peering out through the darkness, cries:
 'Run for it now, my boy, you must. They're closing in,
 I can see their glinting shields, their flashing bronze!' 910

"Then in my panic something strange, some enemy power robbed me of my senses. Lost, I was leaving behind familiar paths, at a run down blind dead ends when—

"Oh dear god, my wife, Creusa— 915 torn from me by a brutal fate! What then, did she stop in her tracks or lose her way?
 Or exhausted, sink down to rest? Who knows?
 I never set my eyes on her again.

5. Roman goddess of agriculture (equivalent to the Greek Demeter).

I never looked back, she never crossed my mind— 920 Creusa, lost—not till we reached that barrow sacred to ancient Ceres where, with all our people rallied at last, she alone was missing. Lost to her friends, her son, her husband—gone forever.
 Raving, I blamed them all, the gods, the human race— 925 what crueler blow did I feel the night that Troy went down?
 Ascanius, father Anchises, and all the gods of Troy, entrusting them to my friends, I hide them well away in a valley's shelter, don my burnished gear and back I go to Troy . . . 930 my mind steeled to relive the whole disaster, retrace my route through the whole city now and put my life in danger one more time.

“First then,
 back to the looming walls, the shadowy rear gates by which I'd left the city, back I go in my tracks, 935 retracing, straining to find my footsteps in the dark, with terror at every turn, the very silence makes me cringe.
 Then back to my house I go—if only, only she's gone there—but the Greeks have flooded in, seized the entire place.
 All over now. Devouring fire whipped by the winds 940 goes churning into the rooftops, flames surging over them, scorching blasts raging up the sky.
 On I go and again I see the palace of Priam set on the heights, but there in colonnades deserted now, in the sanctuary of Juno, there 945 stand the elite watchmen, Phoenix, ruthless Ulysses guarding all their loot. All the treasures of Troy hauled from the burning shrines—the sacramental tables, bowls of solid gold and the holy robes they'd seized from every quarter—Greeks, piling high the plunder. 950 Children and trembling mothers rounded up in a long, endless line.

“Why, I even dared fling my voice through the dark, my shouts filled the streets as time and again, overcome with grief I called out ‘Creusa!’ Nothing, no reply, and again ‘Creusa!’ 955
 But then as I madly rushed from house to house, no end in sight, abruptly, right before my eyes
 I saw her stricken ghost, my own Creusa's shade.
 But larger than life, the life I'd known so well.
 I froze. My hackles bristled, voice choked in my throat, 960 and my wife spoke out to ease me of my anguish:
 ‘My dear husband, why so eager to give yourself to such mad flights of grief? It's not without the will of the gods these things have come to pass.
 But the gods forbid you to take Creusa with you, 965 bound from Troy together. The king of lofty Olympus<sup>6</sup>

6. Jupiter, who rules from Mount Olympus, the highest mountain in Greece.

won't allow it. A long exile is your fate . . .
 the vast plains of the sea are yours to plow until you reach Hesperian land, where Lydian Tiber<sup>7</sup> flows with its smooth march through rich and loamy fields, a land of hardy people. There great joy and a kingdom are yours to claim, and a queen to make your wife.
 Dispel your tears for Creusa, whom you loved.
 I will never behold the high and mighty pride of their palaces, the Myrmidons, the Dolopians, or go as a slave to some Greek matron, no, not I, daughter of Dardanus that I am, the wife of Venus' son.
 The Great Mother of Gods<sup>8</sup> detains me on these shores.
 And now farewell. Hold dear the son we share, we love together.'

"These were her parting words and for all my tears—I longed to say so much—dissolving into the empty air she left me now.
 Three times I tried to fling my arms around her neck, three times I embraced—nothing . . . her phantom sifting through my fingers, light as wind, quick as a dream in flight.

"Gone—
 and at last the night was over. Back I went to my people and I was amazed to see what throngs of new companions had poured in to swell our numbers, mothers, men, our forces gathered for exile, grieving masses.
 They had come together from every quarter, belongings, spirits ready for me to lead them over the sea to whatever lands I'd choose.
 And now the morning star was mounting above
 the high crests of Ida, leading on the day.
 The Greeks had taken the city, blocked off every gate.
 No hope of rescue now. So I gave way at last and lifting my father, headed toward the mountains."

Summary of Book III     Aeneas and his fleet travel across the Mediterranean. Along their way, they meet the monstrous bird-women (Harpies) and visit Andromache, widow of Hector. Anchises dies, and the storm carries the Trojans to Carthage.

7. "Hesperian" is literally "western." The River Tiber runs through Rome. "Lydian" is used as an alternative for "Etruscan," since the Etruscans were thought to come from Lydia in Asia Minor (modern-day Turkey).

8. Cybele is the mother goddess.

BOOK IV

[The Tragic Queen of Carthage]

But the queen—too long she has suffered the pain of love, hour by hour nursing the wound with her lifeblood, consumed by the fire buried in her heart.
 The man's courage, the sheer pride of his line, they all come pressing home to her, over and over. 5 His looks, his words, they pierce her heart and cling—no peace, no rest for her body, love will give her none.

A new day's dawn was moving over the earth, Aurora's torch cleansing the sky, burning away the dank shade of night as the restless queen, beside herself, confides now 10 to the sister of her soul: "Dear Anna, the dreams that haunt my quaking heart! Who is this stranger just arrived to lodge in our house—our guest?
 How noble his face, his courage, and what a soldier!
 I'm sure—I know it's true—the man is born of the gods. 15 Fear exposes the lowborn man at once. But, oh, how tossed he's been by the blows of fate. What a tale he's told, what a bitter bowl of war he's drunk to the dregs.
 If my heart had not been fixed, dead set against embracing another man in the bonds of marriage— 20 ever since my first love deceived me, cheated me by his death—if I were not as sick as I am of the bridal bed and torch,<sup>9</sup> this, perhaps,
 is my one lapse that might have brought me down.
 I confess it, Anna, yes. Ever since my Sychaeus, 25 my poor husband met his fate, and my own brother shed his blood and stained our household gods,<sup>1</sup> this is the only man who's roused me deeply, swayed my wavering heart . . .
 The signs of the old flame, I know them well. 30
 I pray that the earth gape deep enough to take me down or the almighty Father blast me with one bolt to the shades, the pale, glimmering shades in hell, the pit of night,
 before I dishonor you, my conscience, break your laws.
 He's carried my love away, the man who wed me first— 35 may he hold it tight, safeguard it in his grave."

She broke off, her voice choking with tears that brimmed and wet her breast.

But Anna answered:

"Dear one, dearer than light to me, your sister, would you waste away, grieving your youth away, alone, 40 never to know the joy of children, all the gifts of love?"

9. Torches were used at weddings in antiquity.

1. Sychaeus, the husband of Dido and a priest of Hercules, was murdered by her brother Pygmalion, the king of Tyre (a Phoenician city-state on the coast of modern-day Lebanon). Dido then fled and eventually used Sychaeus's wealth to found Carthage on the North African coast.

Do you really believe that's what the dust desires, the ghosts in their ashen tombs? Have it your way.
 But granted that no one tempted you in the past, not in your great grief, 45
 no Libyan suitor, and none before in Tyre, you scorned Iarbas<sup>2</sup> and other lords of Africa, sons bred by this fertile earth in all their triumph:
 why resist it now, this love that stirs your heart?
 Don't you recall whose lands you settled here, 50 the men who press around you? On one side the Gaetulian cities, fighters matchless in battle, unbridled Numidians—Syrtes, the treacherous Sandbanks.
 On the other side an endless desert, parched earth where the wild Barcan marauders<sup>3</sup> range at will. 55 Why mention the war that's boiling up in Tyre, your brother's deadly threats? I think, in fact, the favor of all the gods and Juno's backing drove these Trojan ships on the winds that sailed them here.
 Think what a city you will see, my sister, what a kingdom 60 rising high if you marry such a man! With a Trojan army marching at our side, think how the glory of Carthage will tower to the clouds! Just ask the gods for pardon, win them with offerings. Treat your guests like kings.
 Weave together some pretext for delay, while winter 65 spends its rage and drenching Orion<sup>4</sup> whips the sea—the ships still battered, weather still too wild.”

These were the words that fanned her sister's fire, turned her doubts to hopes and dissolved her sense of shame.
 And first they visit the altars, make the rounds, 70 praying the gods for blessings, shrine by shrine.
 They slaughter the pick of yearling sheep, the old way, to Ceres, Giver of Laws, to Apollo, Bacchus who sets us free and Juno above all, who guards the bonds of marriage.<sup>5</sup> Dido aglow with beauty holds the bowl in her right hand, 75 pouring wine between the horns of a pure white cow or gravely paces before the gods' fragrant altars, under their statues' eyes refreshing her first gifts, dawn to dusk. And when the victims' chests are splayed, Dido, her lips parted, pores over their entrails, 80 throbbing still, for signs . . . <sup>6</sup>
 But, oh, how little they know, the omniscient seers.
 What good are prayers and shrines to a person mad with love?
 The flame keeps gnawing into her tender marrow hour by hour

2. King of the Berbers who granted Dido the land on which to build her city; he then demanded her hand in marriage, but she refused him.

3. African groups living near Carthage.

4. Giant hunter said to stir the waves when he walks or wades across the sea.

5. Ceres: goddess of grain and agriculture.

Apollo: god of the sun, associated with civilization. Bacchus: god of wine. Juno: queen of the gods, goddess of marriage. All were associated with the foundation of cities.

6. It was Roman custom to inspect the entrails of the sacrificial victim and interpret any unusual features as signs of the future.

and deep in her heart the silent wound lives on. 85
 Dido burns with love—the tragic queen.
 She wanders in frenzy through her city streets like a wounded doe caught all off guard by a hunter stalking the woods of Crete, who strikes her from afar and leaves his winging steel in her flesh, and he's unaware 90 but she veers in flight through Dicte's<sup>7</sup> woody glades, fixed in her side the shaft that takes her life.

And now
 Dido leads her guest through the heart of Carthage, displaying Phoenician power, the city readied for him.
 She'd speak her heart but her voice chokes, mid-word. 95
 Now at dusk she calls for the feast to start again, madly begging to hear again the agony of Troy,
 to hang on his lips again, savoring his story.
 Then, with the guests gone, and the dimming moon quenching its light in turn, and the setting stars 100 inclining heads to sleep—alone in the echoing hall, distraught, she flings herself on the couch that he left empty.
 Lost as he is, she's lost as well, she hears him, sees him or she holds Ascanius back and dandles him on her lap, bewitched by the boy's resemblance to his father, 105 trying to cheat the love she dare not tell.
 The towers of Carthage, half built, rise no more,
 and the young men quit their combat drills in arms.
 The harbors, the battlements planned to block attack, all work's suspended now, the huge, threatening walls 110 with the soaring cranes that sway across the sky.

Now, no sooner had Jove's dear wife perceived that Dido was in the grip of such a scourge—no thought of pride could stem her passion now—than Juno approaches Venus and sets a cunning trap: 115
 "What a glittering prize, a triumph you carry home!
 You and your boy there, you grand and glorious Powers.
 Just look, one woman crushed by the craft of two gods!
 I am not blind, you know. For years you've looked askance at the homes of rising Carthage, feared our ramparts. 120
 But where will it end? What good is all our strife?
 Come, why don't we labor now to live in peace?
 Eternal peace, sealed with the bonds of marriage.
 You have it all, whatever your heart desires—Dido's ablaze with love, 125 drawing the frenzy deep into her bones. So, let us rule this people in common: joint command.
 And let her marry her Phrygian lover, be his slave and give her Tyrians over to your control, her dowry in your hands!"

Perceiving at once 130
 that this was all pretense, a ruse to shift the kingdom of Italy onto Libyan shores,

7. Mountain in Crete.

Venus countered Juno: "Now who'd be so insane as to shun your offer and strive with you in war?
 If only Fortune crowns your proposal with success! 135 But swayed by the Fates, I have my doubts. Would Jove want one city to hold the Tyrians and the Trojan exiles?
 Would he sanction the mingling of their peoples, bless their binding pacts? You are his wife, with every right to probe him with your prayers. 140
 You lead the way. I'll follow."

"The work is mine," imperious Juno carried on, "but how to begin this pressing matter now and see it through?
 I'll explain in a word or so. Listen closely.
 Tomorrow Aeneas and lovesick Dido plan to hunt 145 the woods together, soon as the day's first light climbs high and the Titan's<sup>8</sup> rays lay bare the earth.
 But while the beaters scramble to ring the glens with nets, I'll shower down a cloudburst, hail, black driving rain—
 I'll shatter the vaulting sky with claps of thunder. 150
 The huntsmen will scatter, swallowed up in the dark, and Dido and Troy's commander will make their way to the same cave for shelter. And I'll be there, if I can count on your own good will in this—
 I'll bind them in lasting marriage, make them one. 155 Their wedding it will be!"

So Juno appealed and Venus did not oppose her, nodding in assent and smiling at all the guile she saw through . . .

Meanwhile Dawn rose up and left her Ocean bed and soon as her rays have lit the sky, an elite band 160 of young huntsmen streams out through the gates, bearing the nets, wide-meshed or tight for traps and their hunting spears with broad iron heads, troops of Massylian<sup>9</sup> horsemen galloping hard, packs of powerful hounds, keen on the scent. 165 Yet the queen delays, lingering in her chamber with Carthaginian chiefs expectant at her doors.
 And there her proud, mettlesome charger prances in gold and royal purple, pawing with thunder-hoofs, champing a foam-flecked bit. At last she comes, 170 with a great retinue crowding round the queen who wears a Tyrian cloak with rich embroidered fringe.
 Her quiver is gold, her hair drawn up in a golden torque and a golden buckle clasps her purple robe in folds.
 Nor do her Trojan comrades tarry. Out they march, 175 young Iulus flushed with joy.
 Aeneas in command, the handsomest of them all, advancing as her companion joins his troop with hers.
 So vivid. Think of Apollo leaving his Lycian haunts

8. Hyperion, lord of the sun and one of the Titans (pre-Olympian gods). 9. North African tribe.

and Xanthus in winter spate, he's out to visit Delos, 180 his mother's isle,<sup>1</sup> and strike up the dance again while round the altars swirls a growing throng of Cretans, Dryopians, Agathyrsians with tattoos, and a drumming roar goes up as the god himself strides the Cynthian ridge,<sup>2</sup> his streaming hair 185 braided with pliant laurel leaves entwined in twists of gold, and arrows clash on his shoulders.
 So no less swiftly Aeneas strides forward now and his face shines with a glory like the god's.

Once the huntsmen have reached the trackless lairs 190 aloft in the foothills, suddenly, look, some wild goats flushed from a ridge come scampering down the slopes and lower down a herd of stags goes bounding across the open country, ranks massed in a cloud of dust, fleeing the high ground. But young Ascanius, 195 deep in the valley, rides his eager mount and relishing every stride, outstrips them all, now goats, now stags, but his heart is racing, praying—if only they'd send among this feeble, easy game some frothing wild boar or a lion stalking down 200 from the heights and tawny in the sun.

Too late—

The skies have begun to rumble, peals of thunder first and the storm breaking next, a cloudburst pelting hail and the troops of hunters scatter up and down the plain, Tyrian comrades, bands of Dardans, Venus' grandson Iulus 205 panicking, running for cover, quick, and down the mountain gulleys erupt in torrents. Dido and Troy's commander make their way to the same cave for shelter now.
 Primordial Earth and Juno, Queen of Marriage, give the signal and lightning torches flare 210 and the high sky bears witness to the wedding, nymphs on the mountaintops wail out the wedding hymn.
 This was the first day of her death, the first of grief, the cause of it all. From now on, Dido cares no more for appearances, nor for her reputation, either. 215
 She no longer thinks to keep the affair a secret, no, she calls it a marriage,
 using the word to cloak her sense of guilt.

Straightway Rumor flies through Libya's great cities, Rumor, swiftest of all the evils in the world. 220
 She thrives on speed, stronger for every stride, slight with fear at first, soon soaring into the air she treads the ground and hides her head in the clouds.
 She is the last, they say, our Mother Earth produced.

1. The sun god Apollo is imagined leaving Lycia when the river Xanthus floods, and going to Delos, which was sacred to his mother, Leto.

2. Mount Cynthus was on Delos. Cretans and Dryopians were Greek peoples; Agathyrsians were a Scythian people.

Bursting in rage against the gods, she bore a sister 225 for Coeus and Enceladus:<sup>3</sup> Rumor, quicksilver afoot and swift on the wing, a monster, horrific, huge and under every feather on her body—what a marvel—an eye that never sleeps and as many tongues as eyes and as many raucous mouths and ears pricked up for news. 230
 By night she flies aloft, between the earth and sky, whirring across the dark, never closing her lids in soothing sleep. By day she keeps her watch, crouched on a peaked roof or palace turret, terrorizing the great cities, clinging as fast 235 to her twisted lies as she clings to words of truth.
 Now Rumor is in her glory, filling Africa's ears with tale on tale of intrigue, bruited her song of facts and falsehoods mingled . . .
 “Here this Aeneas, born of Trojan blood, 240 has arrived in Carthage, and lovely Dido deigns to join the man in wedlock. Even now they warm the winter, long as it lasts, with obscene desire, oblivious to their kingdoms, abject thralls of lust.”

Such talk the sordid goddess spreads on the lips of men, 245 then swerves in her course and heading straight for King Iarbas, stokes his heart with hearsay, piling fuel on his fire.

Iarbas—son of an African nymph whom Jove had raped—raised the god a hundred splendid temples across the king's wide realm, a hundred altars too, 250 consecrating the sacred fires that never died, eternal sentinels of the gods.
 The earth was rich with blood of slaughtered herds and the temple doorways wreathed with riots of flowers.
 This Iarbas, driven wild, set ablaze by the bitter rumor, 255 approached an altar, they say, as the gods hovered round, and lifting a suppliant's hands, he poured out prayers to Jove: “Almighty Jove! Now as the Moors<sup>4</sup> adore you, feasting away on their gaudy couches, tipping wine in your honor—do you see this? Or are we all fools, Father, 260 to dread the bolts you hurl? All aimless then, your fires high in the clouds that terrify us so?
 All empty noise, your peals of grumbling thunder?
 That woman, that vagrant! Here in my own land she founded her paltry city for a pittance. 265
 We tossed her some beach to plow—on my terms—and then she spurns our offer of marriage, she embraces Aeneas as lord and master in her realm.
 And now this second Paris . . .
 leading his troupe of eunuchs, his hair oozing oil, 270
 a Phrygian bonnet tucked up under his chin, he revels

in all that he has filched, while we keep bearing gifts to your temples—yes, yours—coddling your reputation, all your hollow show!”

So King Iarbas appealed, his hand clutching the altar, and Jove Almighty heard 275 and turned his gaze on the royal walls of Carthage and the lovers oblivious now to their good name.
He summons Mercury,<sup>5</sup> gives him marching orders: “Quick, my son, away! Call up the Zephyrs,<sup>6</sup> glide on wings of the wind. Find the Dardan captain 280 who now malingers long in Tyrian Carthage, look, and pays no heed to the cities Fate decrees are his.
Take my commands through the racing winds and tell him this is not the man his mother, the lovely goddess, promised, not for this did she save him twice from Greek attacks. 285 Never. He would be the one to master an Italy rife with leaders, shrill with the cries of war, to sire a people sprung from Teucer’s noble blood<sup>7</sup> and bring the entire world beneath the rule of law.
If such a glorious destiny cannot fire his spirit, 290
if he will not shoulder the task for his own fame, does the father of Ascanius grudge his son the walls of Rome? What is he plotting now?
What hope can make him loiter among his foes, lose sight of Italian offspring still to come 295 and all the Lavinian fields?<sup>8</sup> Let him set sail!
This is the sum of it. This must be our message.”

Jove had spoken. Mercury made ready at once to obey the great commands of his almighty father.
First he fastens under his feet the golden sandals, 300 winged to sweep him over the waves and earth alike with the rush of gusting winds. Then he seizes the wand that calls the pallid spirits up from the Underworld and ushers others down to the grim dark depths, the wand that lends us sleep or sends it away, 305 that unseals our eyes in death.<sup>9</sup> Equipped with this,
he spurs the winds and swims through billowing clouds till in mid-flight he spies the summit and rugged flanks of Atlas, whose long-enduring peak supports the skies.<sup>1</sup> Atlas: his pine-covered crown is forever girded 310 round with black clouds, battered by wind and rain; driving blizzards cloak his shoulders with snow, torrents course down from the old Titan’s chin and shaggy beard that bristles stiff with ice.

5. The messenger god; Hermes in Greek mythology.

6. Personified winds. Zephyr is usually the gentle west wind.

7. Teucer was the first king of Troy.

8. Lavinium is the city Aeneas will found in Italy.

9. Mercury is the god who guides the dead to the underworld.

1. Atlas is a Titan who was condemned by Zeus to stand holding up the sky. The Greeks and later the Romans associated Atlas with the mountains of North Africa.

Here the god of Cyllene<sup>2</sup> landed first, 315 banking down to a stop on balanced wings.
 From there, headlong down with his full weight he plunged to the sea as a seahawk skims the waves, rounding the beaches, rounding cliffs to hunt for fish inshore.
 So Mercury of Cyllene flew between the earth and sky 320 to gain the sandy coast of Libya, cutting the winds that sweep down from his mother's father, Atlas.

Soon

as his winged feet touched down on the first huts in sight, he spots Aeneas founding the city fortifications, building homes in Carthage. And his sword-hilt 325 is studded with tawny jasper stars, a cloak of glowing Tyrian purple<sup>3</sup> drapes his shoulders, a gift that the wealthy queen had made herself, weaving into the web a glinting mesh of gold.
 Mercury lashes out at once: "You, so now you lay 330 foundation stones for the soaring walls of Carthage!
 Building her gorgeous city, doting on your wife.
 Blind to your own realm, oblivious to your fate!
 The King of the Gods, whose power sways earth and sky—he is the one who sends me down from brilliant Olympus, 335 bearing commands for you through the racing winds.
 What are you plotting now?
 Wasting time in Libya—what hope misleads you so?
 If such a glorious destiny cannot fire your spirit, [if you will not shoulder the task for your own fame,]<sup>4</sup> 340 at least remember Ascanius rising into his prime, the hopes you lodge in Iulus, your only heir—you owe him Italy's realm, the land of Rome!" This order still on his lips, the god vanished from sight into empty air.

Then Aeneas

was truly overwhelmed by the vision, stunned, his hackles bristle with fear, his voice chokes in his throat.
 He yearns to be gone, to desert this land he loves, thunderstruck by the warnings, Jupiter's command . . .
 But what can he do? What can he dare say now 350 to the queen in all her fury and win her over?
 Where to begin, what opening? Thoughts racing, here, there, probing his options, turning to this plan, that plan—torn in two until,
 at his wits' end, this answer seems the best. 355
 He summons Mnestheus, Sergestus, staunch Serestus, gives them orders: "Fit out the fleet, but not a word.
 Muster the crews on shore, all tackle set to sail, but the cause for our new course, you keep it secret."

2. Mercury was born on Mount Cyllene, in Greece.

3. Tyre was famed in the ancient world as the source of a rare purple dye (made from snail shells) often used to color royal vestments.

4. Bracketed because some editors believe the line does not belong in the text.

Yet he himself, since Dido who means the world to him knows nothing, never dreaming such a powerful love could be uprooted—he will try to approach her, find the moment to break the news gently,
 a way to soften the blow that he must leave.
 All shipmates snap to commands, glad to do his orders.

True, but the queen—
 who can delude a lover?—soon caught wind of a plot afoot, the first to sense the Trojans are on the move . . . She fears everything now, even with all secure. Rumor, vicious as ever, brings her word, already distraught, that Trojans are rigging out their galleys, gearing to set sail.
 She rages in helpless frenzy, blazing through the entire city, raving like some Maenad<sup>5</sup> driven wild when the women shake the sacred emblems, when the cyclic orgy, shouts of “Bacchus!” fire her on and Cithaeron echoes round with maddened midnight cries.

At last she assails Aeneas, before he’s said a word:
 “So, you traitor, you really believed you’d keep this a secret, this great outrage?—steal away in silence from my shores? Can nothing hold you back?
 Not our love? Not the pledge once sealed with our right hands?
 Not even the thought of Dido doomed to a cruel death?
 Why labor to rig your fleet when the winter’s raw, to risk the deep when the Northwind’s closing in?
 You cruel, heartless—Even if you were not pursuing alien fields and unknown homes, even if ancient Troy were standing, still,
 who’d sail for Troy across such heaving seas?
 You’re running away—from me? Oh, I pray you by these tears, by the faith in your right hand—what else have I left myself in all my pain?— by our wedding vows, the marriage we began, if I deserve some decency from you now,
 if anything mine has ever won your heart, pity a great house about to fall, I pray you,
 if prayers have any place—reject this scheme of yours!
 Thanks to you, the African tribes, Numidian warlords hate me, even my own Tyrians rise against me.
 Thanks to you, my sense of honor is gone,
 my one and only pathway to the stars,
 the renown I once held dear. In whose hands, my guest, do you leave me here to meet my death?
 ‘Guest’—that’s all that remains of ‘husband’ now.
 But why do I linger on? Until my brother Pygmalion

5. The Maenads (Bacchae) were female worshippers of Bacchus, who ran wild on Mount Cithaeron in a ritual held every other year—as depicted in Euripides’ Bacchae, in which one such god-frenzied woman kills her own son.

batters down my walls? Or Iarbas drags me off, his slave?
 If only you'd left a baby in my arms—our child—before you deserted me! Some little Aeneas playing about our halls, whose features at least would bring you back to me in spite of all, 410
 I would not feel so totally devastated, so destroyed.”

The queen stopped but he,
 warned by Jupiter now, his gaze held steady, fought to master the torment in his heart. At last he ventured a few words: “I . . . you have done me 415 so many kindnesses, and you could count them all.
 I shall never deny what you deserve, my queen, never regret my memories of Dido, not while I can recall myself and draw the breath of life.
 I'll state my case in a few words. I never dreamed 420
 I'd keep my flight a secret. Don't imagine that.
 Nor did I once extend a bridegroom's torch or enter into a marriage pact with you.
 If the Fates had left me free to live my life, to arrange my own affairs of my own free will, 425
 Troy is the city, first of all, that I'd safeguard, Troy and all that's left of my people whom I cherish.
 The grand palace of Priam would stand once more, with my own hands I would fortify a second Troy to house my Trojans in defeat. But not now. 430 Grynean Apollo's oracle says that I must seize on Italy's noble land, his Lycian lots say 'Italy!'<sup>6</sup>
 There lies my love, there lies my homeland now.
 If you, a Phoenician, fix your eyes on Carthage, a Libyan stronghold, tell me, why do you grudge 435
 the Trojans their new homes on Italian soil?
 What is the crime if we seek far-off kingdoms too?

“My father, Anchises, whenever the darkness shrouds the earth in its dank shadows, whenever the stars go flaming up the sky, my father's anxious ghost 440 warns me in dreams and fills my heart with fear.
 My son Ascanius . . . I feel the wrong I do to one so dear, robbing him of his kingdom, lands in the West, his fields decreed by Fate.
 And now the messenger of the gods—I swear it, 445 by your life and mine—dispatched by Jove himself has brought me firm commands through the racing winds.
 With my own eyes I saw him, clear, in broad daylight, moving through your gates. With my own ears I drank his message in. Come, stop inflaming us both with your appeals. I set sail for Italy— 450 all against my will.”

6. Grynia was an Aeolian city sacred to Apollo. Lycia is another cult center of Apollo.

Even from the start of his declaration, she has glared at him askance, her eyes roving over him, head to foot, with a look of stony silence . . . till abruptly she cries out 455 in a blaze of fury: "No goddess was your mother!
 No Dardanus sired your line, you traitor, liar, no, Mount Caucasus fathered you on its flinty, rugged flanks and the tigers of Hyrcania gave you their dugs to suck!<sup>7</sup> Why hide it? Why hold back? To suffer greater blows? 460 Did he groan when I wept? Even look at me? Never!
 Surrender a tear? Pity the one who loves him?
 What can I say first? So much to say. Now—neither mighty Juno nor Saturn's son, the Father,<sup>8</sup> gazes down on this with just, impartial eyes. 465
 There's no faith left on earth!
 He was washed up on my shores, helpless, and I,
 I took him in, like a maniac let him share my kingdom, salvaged his lost fleet, plucked his crews from death.
 Oh I am swept by the Furies, gales of fire!<sup>9</sup> Now 470 it's Apollo the Prophet, Apollo's Lycian oracles:
 they're his masters now, and now, to top it off,
 the messenger of the gods, dispatched by Jove himself, comes rushing down the winds with his grim-set commands.
 Really! What work for the gods who live on high, 475 what a concern to ruffle their repose!
 I won't hold you, I won't even refute you—go!— strike out for Italy on the winds, your realm across the sea.
 I hope, I pray, if the just gods still have any power, wrecked on the rocks midsea you'll drink your bowl 480 of pain to the dregs, crying out the name of Dido over and over, and worlds away I'll hound you then with pitch-black flames, and when icy death has severed my body from its breath, then my ghost will stalk you through the world! You'll pay, you shameless, ruthless— 485 and I will hear of it, yes, the report will reach me even among the deepest shades of Death!"

She breaks off
 in the midst of outbursts, desperate, flinging herself from the light of day, sweeping out of his sight, leaving him numb with doubt, with much to fear 490 and much he means to say.
 Catching her as she faints away, her women bear her back to her marble bridal chamber and lay her body down upon her bed.

But Aeneas
 is driven by duty now. Strongly as he longs 495 to ease and allay her sorrow, speak to her,

7. Dardanus was the legendary founder of Troy. The Caucasus mountains, between the Black and Caspian Seas, and Hyrcania, south of the Caspian, were notoriously wild, uncivilized regions.

8. Jupiter was the son of Saturn.

9. The Furies are spirits of vengeance who carry flaming torches.

turn away her anguish with reassurance, still,
 moaning deeply, heart shattered by his great love, in spite of all he obeys the gods' commands and back he goes to his ships. 500

Then the Trojans throw themselves in the labor, launching their tall vessels down along the beach and the hull rubbed sleek with pitch floats high again.
 So keen to be gone, the men drag down from the forest untrimmed timbers and boughs still green for oars. 505
 You can see them streaming out of the whole city, men like ants that, wary of winter's onset, pillage some huge pile of wheat to store away in their grange and their army's long black line goes marching through the field, trundling their spoils down some cramped, grassy track. 510
 Some put shoulders to giant grains and thrust them on,
 some dress the ranks, strictly marshal stragglers, and the whole trail seethes with labor.

What did you feel then, Dido, seeing this?
 How deep were the groans you uttered, gazing now 515 from the city heights to watch the broad beaches seething with action, the bay a chaos of outcries right before your eyes?

Love, you tyrant!

To what extremes won't you compel our hearts?
 Again she resorts to tears, driven to move the man, 520 or try, with prayers—a suppliant kneeling, humbling her pride to passion. So if die she must, she'll leave no way untried.

“Anna, you see the hurly-burly all across the beach, the crews swarming from every quarter? The wind cries for canvas, 525 the buoyant oarsmen crown their sterns with wreaths.

This terrible sorrow: since I saw it coming, Anna,
 I can endure it now. But even so, my sister, carry out for me one great favor in my pain.
 To you alone he used to listen, the traitor, 530 to you confide his secret feelings. You alone know how and when to approach him, soothe his moods.
 Go, my sister! Plead with my imperious enemy.

Remind him I was never at Aulis, never swore a pact with the Greeks to rout the Trojan people from the earth!<sup>1</sup> 535
 I sent no fleet to Troy, I never uprooted the ashes of his father, Anchises, never stirred his shade.

Why does he shut his pitiless ears to my appeals?
 Where's he rushing now? If only he would offer one last gift to the wretched queen who loves him: 540 to wait for fair winds, smooth sailing for his flight!
 I no longer beg for the long-lost marriage he betrayed,

1. The Greek forces mustered at Aulis before sailing to Troy. It was here that Agamemnon killed his daughter to make the wind blow.

nor would I ask him now to desert his kingdom, no, his lovely passion, Latium.<sup>2</sup> All I ask is time, blank time: some rest from frenzy, breathing room till my fate can teach my beaten spirit how to grieve. 545
 I beg him—pity your sister, Anna—one last favor, and if he grants it now, I'll pay him back, with interest, when I die.”

So Dido pleads and so her desolate sister takes him the tale of tears 550 again and again. But no tears move Aeneas now.
 He is deaf to all appeals. He won't relent.

The Fates bar the way and heaven blocks his gentle, human ears.
 As firm as a sturdy oak grown tough with age 555
 when the Northwinds blasting off the Alps compete, fighting left and right, to wrench it from the earth, and the winds scream, the trunk shudders, its leafy crest showers across the ground but it clings firm to its rock, its roots stretching as deep into the dark world below 560 as its crown goes towering toward the gales of heaven—so firm the hero stands: buffeted left and right by storms of appeals, he takes the full force of love and suffering deep in his great heart.
 His will stands unmoved. The falling tears are futile.<sup>3</sup>

Then, 565
 terrified by her fate, tragic Dido prays for death, sickened to see the vaulting sky above her.

And to steel her new resolve to leave the light, she sees, laying gifts on the altars steaming incense—shudder to hear it now—the holy water going black 570 and the wine she pours congeals in bloody filth.<sup>4</sup>

She told no one what she saw, not even her sister.
 Worse, there was a marble temple in her palace,
 a shrine built for her long-lost love, Sychaeus.

Holding it dear she tended it—marvelous devotion—draping the snow-white fleece and festal boughs. 575

Now from its depths she seemed to catch his voice, the words of her dead husband calling out her name while night enclosed the earth in its dark shroud, and over and over a lonely owl perched on the rooftops 580 drew out its low, throaty call to a long wailing dirge.

And worse yet, the grim predictions of ancient seers keep terrifying her now with frightful warnings.
 Aeneas the hunter, savage in all her nightmares, drives her mad with panic. She always feels alone, 585 abandoned, always wandering down some endless road, not a friend in sight, seeking her own Phoenicians in some godforsaken land. As frantic as Pentheus three.

seeing battalions of Furies, twin suns ablaze and double cities of Thebes before his eyes.<sup>5</sup> 590 Or Agamemnon's Orestes hounded off the stage, fleeing his mother armed with torches, black snakes, while blocking the doorway coil her Furies of Revenge.<sup>6</sup>

So, driven by madness, beaten down by anguish, Dido was fixed on dying, working out in her mind 595 the means, the moment. She approaches her grieving sister, Anna—masking her plan with a brave face aglow with hope, and says: “I’ve found a way, dear heart—rejoice with your sister—either to bring him back in love for me or free me 600 of love for him. Close to the bounds of Ocean, west with the setting sun, lies Ethiopian land, the end of the earth, where colossal Atlas turns on his shoulder the heavens studded with flaming stars.
 From there, I have heard, a Massylian priestess comes 605 who tended the temple held by Hesperian daughters.<sup>7</sup> She’d safeguard the boughs in the sacred grove and ply the dragon with morsels dripping loops of oozing honey and poppies drowsy with slumber.
 With her spells she vows to release the hearts 610 of those she likes, to inflict raw pain on others—to stop the rivers in midstream, reverse the stars in their courses, raise the souls of the dead at night and make earth shudder and rumble underfoot—you’ll see—and send the ash trees marching down the mountains. 615
 I swear by the gods, dear Anna, by your sweet life,
 I arm myself with magic arts against my will.<sup>8</sup>

“Now go,
 build me a pyre in secret, deep inside our courtyard under the open sky. Pile it high with his arms—he left them hanging within our bridal chamber— 620 the traitor, so devoted then! and all his clothes and crowning it all, the bridal bed that brought my doom.
 I must obliterate every trace of the man, the curse, and the priestess shows the way!”

She says no more
 and now as the queen falls silent, pallor sweeps her face. 625

5. Pentheus was the king of Thebes who, in Euripides' Bacchae, was driven mad so that he thought he saw two suns in the sky and was then killed by his own mother.

6. Agamemnon's son, Orestes, killed his mother in revenge for her killing his father. He was then driven mad by the Furies. The myth is the subject of Aeschylus's Oresteia and Euripides' Orestes.

7. The daughters of Hesperus, the Evening Star, tended a garden containing the golden apples that belonged to Hera. A never-sleeping dragon with a hundred heads also guarded the apples.

8. These allusions to witchcraft make Dido sound like Medea, the princess of Colchis with magical powers, who helped Jason steal the Golden Fleece from her father and escape back to Greece. Later, after several years of marriage, Jason abandoned Medea; she then, according to Euripides' Medea, took revenge by killing their children.

Still, Anna cannot imagine these outlandish rites would mask her sister's death. She can't conceive of such a fiery passion. She fears nothing graver than Dido's grief at the death of her Sychaeus.
 So she does as she is told.

630

But now the queen,
 as soon as the pyre was built beneath the open sky, towering up with pitch-pine and cut logs of oak—deep in the heart of her house—she drapes the court with flowers, crowning the place with wreaths of death, and to top it off she lays his arms and the sword he left style="text-align: right;">635

and an effigy of Aeneas, all on the bed they'd shared, for well she knows the future. Altars ring the pyre.
 Hair loose in the wind, the priestess thunders out the names of her three hundred gods, Erebus, Chaos and triple Hecate, Diana the three-faced virgin.<sup>9</sup>
 style="text-align: right;">640

She'd sprinkled water, simulating the springs of hell, and gathered potent herbs, reaped with bronze sickles under the moonlight, dripping their milky black poison, and fetched a love-charm ripped from a foal's brow, just born, before the mother could gnaw it off.
 style="text-align: right;">645

And Dido herself, standing before the altar, holding the sacred grain in reverent hands—with one foot free of its sandal, robes unbound<sup>1</sup>— sworn now to die, she calls on the gods to witness, calls on the stars who know her approaching fate.
 style="text-align: right;">650

And then to any Power above, mindful, evenhanded, who watches over lovers bound by unequal passion, Dido says her prayers.

655

The dead of night,
 and weary living creatures throughout the world are enjoying peaceful sleep. The woods and savage seas are calm, at rest, and the circling stars are gliding on in their midnight courses, all the fields lie hushed and the flocks and gay and gorgeous birds that haunt the deep clear pools and the thorny country thickets all lie quiet now, under the silent night, asleep.
 style="text-align: right;">660

But not the tragic queen . . .
 torn in spirit, Dido will not dissolve into sleep—her eyes, her mind won't yield to night.
 Her torments multiply, over and over her passion surges back into heaving waves of rage—
 style="text-align: right;">665

she keeps on brooding, obsessions roil her heart:
 "And now, what shall I do? Make a mockery of myself, go back to my old suitors, tempt them to try again?
 Beg the Numidians, grovel, plead for a husband—though time and again I scorned to wed their likes?
 style="text-align: right;">670

What then? Trail the Trojan ships, bend to the Trojans' every last demand? So pleased, are they, with all the help, the relief I lent them once? And memory of my service past stands firm in grateful minds! And even if I were willing, would the Trojans allow me to board their proud ships— 675 a woman they hate? Poor lost fool, can't you sense it, grasp it yet—the treachery of Laomedon's breed?<sup>2</sup> What now? Do I take flight alone, consorting with crews of Trojan oarsmen in their triumph?

Or follow them out with all my troops of Tyrians 680 thronging the decks? Yes, hard as it was to uproot them once from Tyre! How can I force them back to sea once more, command them to spread their sails to the winds?
No, no, die!

You deserve it—

end your pain with the sword!

You, my sister, you were the first, won over by my tears, 685 to pile these sorrows on my shoulders, mad as I was, to throw me into my enemy's arms. If only I'd been free to live my life, untested in marriage, free of guilt as some wild beast untouched by pangs like these!
I broke the faith I swore to the ashes of Sychaeus.” 690

Such terrible grief kept breaking from her heart as Aeneas slept in peace on his ship's high stern, bent on departing now, all tackle set to sail.
And now in his dreams it came again—the god, his phantom, the same features shining clear. 695 Like Mercury head to foot, the voice, the glow, the golden hair, the bloom of youth on his limbs and his voice rang out with warnings once again: “Son of the goddess, how can you sleep so soundly in such a crisis? Can't you see the dangers closing 700 around you now? Madman! Can't you hear the Westwind ruffling to speed you on? That woman spawns her plots, mulling over some desperate outrage in her heart, lashing her surging rage, she's bent on death.
Why not flee headlong? 705 Flee headlong while you can! You'll soon see the waves a chaos of ships, lethal torches flaring, the whole coast ablaze, if now a new dawn breaks and finds you still malingering on these shores.
Up with you now. Enough delay. Woman's a thing 710 that's always changing, shifting like the wind.”
With that he vanished into the black night.

Then, terrified by the sudden phantom, Aeneas, wrenching himself from sleep, leaps up and rouses his crews and spurs them headlong on: 715 “Quick! Up and at it, shipmates, man the thwarts!<sup>3</sup> Spread canvas fast! A god's come down from the sky

2. Laomedon, father of Priam and previous king of Troy, broke a promise to repay Apollo and Neptune for building his city walls.

3. I.e., take up positions on the rowing benches.

once more—I've just seen him—urging us on to sever our mooring cables, sail at once!
We follow you, blessed god, whoever you are—glad at heart we obey your commands once more.
Now help us, stand beside us with all your kindness, bring us favoring stars in the sky to blaze our way!"

720

Tearing sword from sheath like a lightning flash, he hacks the mooring lines with a naked blade.
Gripped by the same desire, all hands pitch in,
they hoist and haul. The shore's deserted now, the water's hidden under the fleet—they bend to it, churn the spray and sweep the clear blue sea.

725

By now
early Dawn had risen up from the saffron bed of Tithonus,<sup>4</sup> scattering fresh light on the world.
But the queen from her high tower, catching sight of the morning's white glare, the armada heading out to sea with sails trimmed to the wind, and certain the shore and port were empty, stripped of oarsmen—three, four times over she beat her lovely breast, she ripped at her golden hair and "Oh, by God," she cries, "will the stranger just sail off and make a mockery of our realm? Will no one rush to arms, come streaming out of the whole city, hunt him down, race to the docks and launch the ships?
Go, quick—bring fire!"

730

735

740

Hand out weapons!

Bend to the oars!

What am I saying? Where am I? What insanity's this that shifts my fixed resolve? Dido, oh poor fool, is it only now your wicked work strikes home?
It should have then, when you offered him your scepter.
Look at his hand clasp, look at his good faith now—that man who, they say, carries his fathers' gods, who stooped to shoulder his father bent with age!
Couldn't I have seized him then, ripped him to pieces, scattered them in the sea? Or slashed his men with steel, butchered Ascanius, served him up as his father's feast?<sup>5</sup> True, the luck of battle might have been at risk—well, risk away! Whom did I have to fear?
I was about to die. I should have torched their camp and flooded their decks with fire. The son, the father, the whole Trojan line—I should have wiped them out, then hurled myself on the pyre to crown it all!

745

750

755

4. The goddess Dawn had a human lover named Tithonus, whom she had made immortal (though not ageless) and brought to live with her.

5. These horrible possibilities have mythic precedents. Medea, when she eloped with Jason, ripped up her little brother's body and scattered the pieces on the sea, to distract their father as he tried to pursue the boat. Atreus, father of Agamemnon and Menelaus, killed his brother's children and served them to him at a feast.

“You, Sun, whose fires scan all works of the earth,<sup>6</sup> and you, Juno, the witness, midwife to my agonies— 760 Hecate greeted by nightly shrieks at city crossroads—and you, you avenging Furies and gods of dying Dido!
 Hear me, turn your power my way, attend my sorrows—
 I deserve your mercy—hear my prayers! If that curse of the earth must reach his haven, labor on to landfall— 765 if Jove and the Fates command and the boundary stone is fixed, still, let him be plagued in war by a nation proud in arms, torn from his borders, wrenched from Iulus’ embrace, let him grovel for help and watch his people die a shameful death! And then, once he has bowed down 770 to an unjust peace, may he never enjoy his realm and the light he yearns for, never, let him die before his day, unburied on some desolate beach!<sup>7</sup>

“That is my prayer, my final cry—I pour it out with my own lifeblood. And you, my Tyrians, 775 harry with hatred all his line, his race to come:
 make that offering to my ashes, send it down below.
 No love between our peoples, ever, no pacts of peace!
 Come rising up from my bones, you avenger still unknown, to stalk those Trojan settlers, hunt with fire and iron, 780 now or in time to come, whenever the power is yours.
 Shore clash with shore, sea against sea and sword against sword—this is my curse—war between all our peoples, all their children, endless war!”

With that, her mind went veering back and forth— 785 what was the quickest way to break off from the light, the life she loathed? And so with a few words she turned to Barce, Sychaeus’ old nurse—her own was now black ashes deep in her homeland lost forever:
 “Dear old nurse, send Anna my sister to me here. 790 Tell her to hurry, sprinkle herself with river water, bring the victims marked for the sacrifice I must make.
 So let her come. And wrap your brow with the holy bands.
 These rites to Jove of the Styx that I have set in motion,
 I yearn to consummate them, end the pain of love, 795 give that cursed Trojan’s pyre to the flames.”
 The nurse bustled off with an old crone’s zeal.

But Dido,
 trembling, desperate now with the monstrous thing afoot—her bloodshot eyes rolling, quivering cheeks blotched and pale with imminent death—goes bursting through 800 the doors to the inner courtyard, clambers in frenzy up the soaring pyre and unsheathes a sword, a Trojan sword she once sought as a gift, but not for such an end.

6. The sun (Helios) was sometimes personified as a god; he was the grandfather of Medea.

7. Another oblique reference to the assassination of Pompey after he was defeated by Julius Caesar in the civil war of 49–45 B.C.E (cf. book II, line 690).

And next, catching sight of the Trojan's clothes and the bed they knew by heart, delaying a moment 805 for tears, for memory's sake, the queen lay down and spoke her final words: "Oh, dear relics, dear as long as Fate and the gods allowed,
 receive my spirit and set me free of pain.
 I have lived a life. I've journeyed through 810 the course that Fortune charted for me. And now I pass to the world below, my ghost in all its glory.
 I have founded a noble city, seen my ramparts rise.
 I have avenged my husband, punished my blood-brother, our mortal foe. Happy, all too happy I would have been 815 if only the Trojan keels had never grazed our coast."
 She presses her face in the bed and cries out:
 "I shall die unavenged, but die I will! So—so—I rejoice to make my way among the shades.
 And may that heartless Dardan, far at sea, 820 drink down deep the sight of our fires here and bear with him this omen of our death!"

All at once, in the midst of her last words, her women see her doubled over the sword, the blood foaming over the blade, her hands splattered red. 825
 A scream goes stabbing up to the high roofs, Rumor raves like a Maenad through the shocked city—sobs, and grief, and the wails of women ringing out through homes, and the heavens echo back the keening din—for all the world as if enemies stormed the walls 830 and all of Carthage or old Tyre were toppling down and flames in their fury, wave on mounting wave were billowing over the roofs of men and gods.

Anna heard and, stunned, breathless with terror, raced through the crowd, her nails clawing her face, 835 fists beating her breast, crying out to her sister now at the edge of death: "Was it all for this, my sister?
 You deceived me all along? Is this what your pyre meant for me—this, your fires—this, your altars?
 You deserted me—what shall I grieve for first? 840
 Your friend, your sister, you scorn me now in death?
 You should have called me on to the same fate.
 The same agony, same sword, the one same hour had borne us off together. Just to think I built your pyre with my own hands, implored our fathers' gods 845 with my own voice, only to be cut off from you—how very cruel—when you lay down to die . . .
 You have destroyed your life, my sister, mine too, your people, the lords of Sidon and your new city here.
 Please, help me to bathe her wounds in water now, 850 and if any last, lingering breath still hovers, let me catch it on my lips."

With those words
 she had climbed the pyre's topmost steps and now, clasping her dying sister to her breast, fondling her she sobbed, stanching the dark blood with her own gown. 855 Dido, trying to raise her heavy eyes once more, failed—deep in her heart the wound kept rasping, hissing on.
 Three times she tried to struggle up on an elbow,
 three times she fell back, writhing on her bed.
 Her gaze wavering into the high skies, she looked 860 for a ray of light and when she glimpsed it, moaned.

Then Juno in all her power, filled with pity for Dido's agonizing death, her labor long and hard, sped Iris<sup>8</sup> down from Olympus to release her spirit wrestling now in a deathlock with her limbs. 865 Since she was dying a death not fated or deserved, no, tormented, before her day, in a blaze of passion—Proserpina had yet to pluck a golden lock from her head and commit her life to the Styx and the dark world below.<sup>9</sup> So Iris, glistening dew, comes skimming down from the sky 870 on gilded wings, trailing showers of iridescence shimmering into the sun, and hovering over Dido's head, declares:
 "So commanded, I take this lock as a sacred gift to the God of Death, and I release you from your body."

With that, she cut the lock with her hand and all at once 875 the warmth slipped away, the life dissolved in the winds.

Summary of Book V The Trojans see the flames of Dido's funeral pyre as they leave. They sail back to Sicily, where they mark the death of Anchises with funeral rites and games. The pilot of Aeneas's ship, Palinurus, is overwhelmed by sleep at the tiller, falls into the sea, and drowns.

BOOK VI

[The Kingdom of the Dead]

So as he speaks in tears Aeneas gives the ships free rein and at last they glide onto Euboean Cumae's beaches.<sup>1</sup> Swinging their prows around to face the sea, they moor the fleet with the anchors' biting grip and the curved sterns edge the bay. Bands of sailors, 5 primed for action, leap out onto land—Hesperian land.<sup>2</sup>
 Some strike seeds of fire buried in veins of flint,

8. Iris is the goddess who sometimes acts as messenger between heaven and earth; she appears as a rainbow (hence "iridescence").

9. Proserpina, queen of the underworld, would normally have taken a lock of Dido's hair to release her life; since her death is premature, Iris does it instead.

1. Cumae, a Greek colony on the Italian coast (in modern Campania, near Naples), was founded by immigrants from the island of Euboea. It was the seat of the Sibyl, a priestess of Apollo, for many centuries.

2. "Hesperian" means "western"; Hesperia is also a Greek name for Italy.

some strip the dense thickets, lairs of wild beasts, and lighting on streams, are quick to point them out.
 But devout Aeneas makes his way to the stronghold 10 that Apollo rules, throned on high, and set apart is a vast cave, the awesome Sybil's secret haunt where the Seer of Delos<sup>3</sup> breathes his mighty will, his soul inspiring her to lay the future bare.
 And now they approach Diana's<sup>4</sup> sacred grove 15 and walk beneath the golden roofs of god.

Daedalus,<sup>5</sup>

so the story's told, fleeing the realm of Minos, daring to trust himself to the sky on beating wings, floated up to the icy North, the first man to fly, and hovered lightly on Cumae's heights at last. 20 Here, on first returning to earth, he hallowed to you, Apollo, the oars of his rowing wings and here he built your grand, imposing temple.
 High on a gate he carved Androgeos' death<sup>6</sup> and then the people of Athens, doomed—so cruel— 25 to pay with the lives of seven sons. Year in, year out, the urn stands ready, the fateful lots are drawn.

Balancing these on a facing gate, the land of Crete comes rising from the sea. Here the cursed lust for the bull and Pasiphaë spread beneath him, duping both her mates, 30 and here the mixed breed, part man, part beast, the Minotaur—a warning against such monstrous passion. Here its lair, that house of labor, the endless blinding maze, but Daedalus, pitying royal Ariadne's love so deep,<sup>7</sup> unraveled his own baffling labyrinth's winding paths, 35 guiding Theseus' groping steps with a trail of thread.
 And you too, Icarus, what part you might have played in a work that great, had Daedalus' grief allowed it.
 Twice he tried to engrave your fall in gold and twice his hands, a father's hands, fell useless.

Yes,

and they would have kept on scanning scene by scene 40

3. Delos is the birthplace of Apollo, god of prophecy ("Seer").

4. Diana (equivalent to the Greek Artemis), sister of Apollo, was also worshipped at Cumae. She is identified in the original in her guise as Hecate, associated with witchcraft and ghosts.

5. Daedalus was the master craftsman of myth. When Pasiphaë, wife of King Minos of Crete, fell in love with a bull, Daedalus constructed an artificial cow for her to get inside, enabling her to have sex with the animal. She gave birth to the Minotaur, and Daedalus built a labyrinth to house him. He was fed on humans; the Athenians were forced to send fourteen young people a year to feed the monster. Daedalus later helped the Greek hero Theseus get through the labyrinth and kill the Minotaur. He was punished with imprisonment, but managed to escape to Cumae on wings he had constructed himself. His son Icarus, who accompanied him, flew too close to the sun on his wax wings, which melted, and the boy drowned in what is still called the Icarian Sea (part of the Aegean Sea, near Samos).

6. Son of King Minos, Androgeos was killed by the Athenians; in recompense, Minos demanded a yearly tribute of seven boys and seven girls from Athens, to be fed to the Minotaur.

7. Ariadne, daughter of Minos, fell in love with Theseus; Daedalus told her how to help him, by bringing him a ball of thread with which to mark his path through the labyrinth.

if Achates, sent ahead, had not returned, bringing Deiphobe, Glaucus' daughter, priestess of Phoebus and Diana too, and the Sibyl tells the king:

"This is no time for gazing at the sights.

45

Better to slaughter seven bulls from a herd unbroken by the yoke, as the old rite requires, and as many head of teething yearling sheep."

Directing Aeneas so—and his men are quick with the sacrifice she demands—

50

the Sibyl calls them into her lofty shrine.

Now carved out of the rocky flanks of Cumae lies an enormous cavern pierced by a hundred tunnels, a hundred mouths with as many voices rushing out, the Sibyl's rapt replies. They had just gained the sacred sill when the virgin cries aloud:

55

"Now is the time to ask your fate to speak!

The god, look, the god!"

So she cries before the entrance—suddenly all her features, all her color changes, her braided hair flies loose and her breast heaves, her heart bursts with frenzy, she seems to rise in height, the ring of her voice no longer human—the breath, the power of god comes closer, closer.
"Why so slow, Trojan Aeneas?" she shouts, "so slow to pray, to swear your vows? Not until you do will the great jaws of our spellbound house gape wide."
And with that command the prophetess fell silent.

65

An icy shiver runs through the Trojans' sturdy spines and the king's prayers come pouring from his heart:
"Apollo, you always pitied the Trojans' heavy labors!
You guided the arrow of Paris, pierced Achilles' body.<sup>8</sup>
You led me through many seas, bordering endless coasts, far-off Massylian tribes, and fields washed by the Syrtes,<sup>9</sup> and now, at long last, Italy's shores, forever fading, lie within our grasp. Let the doom of Troy pursue us just this far, no more. You too, you gods and goddesses, all who could never suffer Troy and Troy's high glory, spare the people of Pergamum now,<sup>1</sup> it's only right.
And you, you blessed Sibyl who knows the future, grant my prayer. I ask no more than the realm my fate decrees: let the Trojans rest in Latium, they and their roaming gods, their rootless powers!
Then I will build you a solid marble temple, Apollo and Diana, establish hallowed days,

80

8. Paris, prince of Troy, guided by Apollo, shot an arrow that pierced Achilles' only vulnerable spot, on his heel.

9. Quicksands off the coast of North Africa. Massylian tribes: veiled references to Carthage, since the Massylians lived adjacent to Carthage.

1. The Trojans. (Pergamum, or Pergamea, is the city that Aeneas founded in Crete after fleeing Troy.)

Apollo, in your name.<sup>2</sup> And Sibyl, for you too, 85 a magnificent sacred shrine awaits you in our kingdom.
 There I will house your oracles, mystic revelations made to our race, and ordain your chosen priests, my gracious lady. Just don't commit your words to the rustling, scattering leaves— 90 sport of the winds that whirl them all away.
 Sing them yourself, I beg you!" There Aeneas stopped.

But the Sibyl, still not broken in by Apollo, storms with a wild fury through her cave. And the more she tries to pitch the great god off her breast, the more his bridle 95 exhausts her raving lips, overwhelming her untamed heart, bending her to his will. Now the hundred immense mouths of the house swing open, all on their own, and bear the Sibyl's answers through the air:
 "You who have braved the terrors of the sea, 100 though worse remain on land—you Trojans will reach Lavinium's realm—lift that care from your hearts—but you will rue your arrival. Wars, horrendous wars, and the Tiber foaming with tides of blood, I see it all!
 Simois, Xanthus, a Greek camp—you'll never lack them here. 105 Already a new Achilles<sup>3</sup> springs to life in Latium, son of a goddess too! Nor will Juno ever fail to harry the Trojan race, and all the while, pleading, pressed by need—what tribes, what towns of Italy won't you beg for help! And the cause of this, 110 this new Trojan grief? Again a stranger bride, a marriage with a stranger once again.<sup>4</sup>
 But never bow to suffering, go and face it, all the bolder, wherever Fortune clears the way.
 Your path to safety will open first from where 115 you least expect it—a city built by Greeks!"<sup>5</sup>

Those words
 re-echoing from her shrine, the Cumaean Sibyl chants her riddling visions filled with dread, her cave resounds as she shrouds the truth in darkness—Phoebus whips her on in all her frenzy, twisting his spurs below her breast. 120
 As soon as her fury dies and raving lips fall still,
 the hero Aeneas launches in: "No trials, my lady, can loom before me in any new, surprising form.
 No, deep in my spirit I have known them all,
 I've faced them all before. But grant one prayer. 125 Since here, they say, are the gates of Death's king and the dark marsh where the Acheron<sup>6</sup> comes flooding up,

2. The Games to Apollo were established during the Second Punic War (218–201 B.C.E.); Augustus, Virgil's patron, built a temple to Apollo on the Palatine.

3. Achilles: most important warrior in the Iliad. Simois and Xanthus are rivers in Troy.

4. The first "stranger" or foreign bride was Helen, for whom the Trojan War was fought when she was taken from her husband by Paris.

5. Pallanteum, built by Arcadian Greeks and the future site of Rome.

6. The river of grief in the Underworld.

please, allow me to go and see my beloved father, meet him face to face.

Teach me the way, throw wide the sacred doors!

130

Through fires, a thousand menacing spears I swept him off on these shoulders, saved him from our enemies' onslaught.

He shared all roads and he braved all seas with me, all threats of the waves and skies—frail as he was but graced with a strength beyond his years, his lot.

135

He was the one, in fact, who ordered, pressed me on to reach your doors and seek you, beg you now.

Pity the son and father, I pray you, kindly lady!

All power is yours. Hecate<sup>7</sup> held back nothing, put you in charge of Avernus' groves. If Orpheus could summon up the ghost of his wife, trusting so 140 to his Thracian lyre and echoing strings; if Pollux could ransom his brother and share his death by turns, time and again traversing the same road up and down;

if Theseus, mighty Hercules—must I mention them?<sup>8</sup>

145

I too can trace my birth from Jove on high.”

So he prayed,

grasping the altar while the Sibyl gave her answer:

“Born of the blood of gods, Anchises' son, man of Troy, the descent to the Underworld is easy.

Night and day the gates of shadowy Death stand open wide, 150

but to retrace your steps, to climb back to the upper air—

there the struggle, there the labor lies. Only a few, loved by impartial Jove or borne aloft to the sky

by their own fiery virtue—some sons of the gods have made their way. The entire heartland here is thick with woods, Cocytus glides around it,<sup>9</sup> coiling dense and dark.

155

But if such a wild desire seizes on you—twice to sail the Stygian marsh, to see black Tartarus twice—<sup>1</sup>

if you're so eager to give yourself to this, this mad ordeal, 160

then hear what you must accomplish first.

“Hidden

deep in a shady tree there grows a golden bough, its leaves and its hardy, sinewy stem all gold, held sacred to Juno of the Dead, Proserpina.<sup>2</sup>

The whole grove covers it over, dusky valleys

165 enfold it too, closing in around it. No one

7. Diana, in her guise as goddess of magic.

8. These lines cite four mythical heroes who have preceded Aeneas in journeying to the Underworld. The first is Orpheus, the master singer, who went in search of his dead wife and used his music to persuade Hades to give her back (though he lost her again on the way up when he turned to look at her). The second is Pollux, who shared immortality with his twin brother Castor, so that they each spent six months of the year in the Underworld. The third, Theseus, went to try to carry off Persephone, wife of Hades. The last, Heracles, had to bring back Cerberus, three-headed guard dog of Hades, as one of his Twelve Labors.

9. One of the rivers of the Underworld, the river of lamentation.

1. Tartarus is the abyss in Hades used as prison for the Titans; the Styx is another river of the Underworld (hence “Stygian”).

2. Queen of the Underworld (hence, equivalent to Juno, Queen of the Upper World).

may pass below the secret places of earth before he plucks the fruit, the golden foliage of that tree.
 As her beauty's due, Proserpina decreed this bough shall be offered up to her as her own hallowed gift. 170
 When the first spray's torn away, another takes its place, gold too, the metal breaks into leaf again, all gold.
 Lift up your eyes and search, and once you find it, duly pluck it off with your hand. Freely, easily, all by itself it comes away, if Fate calls you on. 175
 If not, no strength within you can overpower it, no iron blade, however hard, can tear it off.

"One thing more I must tell you.
 A friend lies dead—oh, you could not know—his body pollutes your entire fleet with death 180 while you search on for oracles, linger at our doors.
 Bear him first to his place of rest, bury him in his tomb.
 Lead black cattle there, first offerings of atonement.
 Only then can you set eyes on the Stygian groves and the realms no living man has ever trod." 185 Abruptly she fell silent, lips sealed tight.

His eyes fixed on the ground, his face in tears, Aeneas moves on, leaving the cavern, turning over within his mind these strange, dark events.
 His trusty comrade Achates keeps his pace 190 and the same cares weigh down his plodding steps.
 They traded many questions, wondering, back and forth, what dead friend did the Sibyl mean, whose body must be buried?
 Suddenly, Misenus—out on the dry beach they see him, reach him now, cut off by a death all undeserved. 195 Misenus, Aeolus<sup>3</sup> son, a herald unsurpassed at rallying troops with his trumpet's cry, igniting the God of War with its shrill blare.
 He had been mighty Hector's friend, by Hector's side in the rush of battle, shining with spear and trumpet both. 200
 But when triumphant Achilles stripped Hector's life, the gallant hero joined forces with Dardan Aeneas, followed a captain every bit as strong. But then, chancing to make the ocean ring with his hollow shell, the madman challenged the gods to match him blast for blast 205 and jealous Triton<sup>4</sup>—if we can believe the story—snatched him up and drowned the man in the surf that seethed between the rocks.

So all his shipmates gathered round his body and raised a loud lament, devoted Aeneas in the lead. Then still in tears, 210 they rush to perform the Sibyl's orders, no delay, they strive to pile up trees, to build an altar-pyre rising to the skies. Then into an ancient wood and the hidden dens of beasts they make their way, and down crash the pines, the ilex rings to the axe, the trunks of ash and oak are split by the driving wedge, and they roll huge rowans down the hilly slopes. 215

Aeneas spurs his men in the forefront of their labors, geared with the same woodsmen's tools around his waist.
 But the same anxiety keeps on churning in his heart as he scans the endless woods and prays by chance: 220
 "If only that golden bough would gleam before us now on a tree in this dark grove! Since all the Sibyl foretold of you was true, Misenus, all too true."

No sooner said than before his eyes, twin doves chanced to come flying down the sky and lit on the green grass at his feet. His mother's birds—the great captain knew them and raised a prayer of joy:
 "Be my guides! If there's a path, fly through the air, set me a course to the grove where that rich branch shades the good green earth. And you, goddess, mother, don't fail me in this, my hour of doubt!" 230

With that he stopped in his tracks, watching keenly—what sign would they offer? Where would they lead?
 And on they flew, pausing to feed, then flying on as far as a follower's eye could track their flight and once they reached the foul-smelling gorge of Avernus, up they veered, quickly, then slipped down through the clear air to settle atop the longed-for goal, the twofold tree, its green a foil for the breath of gold that glows along its branch. 240
 As mistletoe in the dead of winter's icy forests leafs with life on a tree that never gave it birth, embracing the smooth trunk with its pale yellow bloom, so glowed the golden foliage against the ilex evergreen, so rustled the sheer gold leaf in the light breeze. 245 Aeneas grips it at once—the bough holds back—he tears it off in his zeal and bears it into the vatic Sibyl's shrine.

All the while the Trojans along the shore keep weeping for Misenus, paying his thankless ashes final rites. And first they build an immense pyre of resinous pitch-pine and oaken logs, weaving into its flanks dark leaves and setting before it rows of funereal cypress, crowning it all with the herald's gleaming arms.
 Some heat water in cauldrons fired to boiling, bathe and anoint the body chill with death. 250
 The dirge rises up. Then, their weeping over, they lay his corpse on a litter, swathe him round in purple robes that form the well-known shroud. 255

Some hoisted up the enormous bier—sad service—their eyes averted, after their fathers' ways of old, and thrust the torch below. The piled offerings blazed, frankincense, hallowed foods and brimming bowls of oil.
 And after the coals sank in and the fires died down,
 they washed his embers, thirsty remains, with wine.
 Corynaeus sealed the bones he culled in a bronze urn, then circling his comrades three times with pure water, sprinkling light drops from a blooming olive spray,
 he cleansed the men and voiced the last farewell.
 But devout Aeneas mounds the tomb—an immense barrow crowned with the man's own gear, his oar and trumpet—under a steep headland, called after the herald now and for all time to come it bears Misenus' name.<sup>5</sup>

The rite performed, Aeneas hurries to carry out the Sibyl's orders.
 There was a vast cave deep in the gaping, jagged rock, shielded well by a dusky lake and shadowed grove.
 Over it no bird on earth could make its way unscathed, such poisonous vapors steamed up from its dark throat to cloud the arching sky. Here, as her first step, the priestess steadies four black-backed calves, she tips wine on their brows, then plucks some tufts from the crown between their horns and casts them over the altar fire, first offerings, crying out to Hecate, mighty Queen of Heaven and Hell.
 Attendants run knives under throats and catch warm blood in bowls. Aeneas himself, sword drawn, slaughters a black-fleeced lamb to the Furies' mother, Night, and to her great sister, Earth, and to you, Proserpina, kills a barren heifer. Then to the king of the river Styx, he raises altars into the dark night and over their fires lays whole carcasses of bulls and pours fat oil over their entrails flaming up.
 Then suddenly, look, at the break of day, first light, the earth groans underfoot and the wooded heights quake and across the gloom the hounds seem to howl at the goddess coming closer.

"Away, away!"
 the Sibyl shrieks, "all you unhallowed ones—away from this whole grove! But you launch out on your journey, tear your sword from its sheath, Aeneas. Now for courage, now the steady heart!" And the Sibyl says no more but into the yawning cave she flings herself, possessed—he follows her boldly, matching stride for stride.

You gods
 who govern the realm of ghosts, you voiceless shades and Chaos—you, the River of Fire, you far-flung regions hushed in night—

5. The place is still called Capo Miseno (Cape of Misenus).

lend me the right to tell what I have heard, lend your power to reveal the world immersed in the misty depths of earth. 305

On they went, those dim travelers under the lonely night, through gloom and the empty halls of Death's ghostly realm, like those who walk through woods by a grudging moon's deceptive light when Jove has plunged the sky in dark 310 and the black night drains all color from the world.
There in the entryway, the gorge of hell itself, Grief and the pangs of Conscience make their beds, and fatal pale Disease lives there, and bleak Old Age, Dread and Hunger, seductress to crime, and grinding Poverty, 315 all, terrible shapes to see—and Death and deadly Struggle and Sleep, twin brother of Death, and twisted, wicked Joys and facing them at the threshold, War, rife with death, and the Furies' iron chambers, and mad, raging Strife whose blood-stained headbands knot her snaky locks. 320

There in the midst, a giant shadowy elm tree spreads her ancient branching arms, home, they say, to swarms of false dreams, one clinging tight under each leaf.
And a throng of monsters too—what brutal forms are stabled at the gates—Centaurs, mongrel Scyllas, 325 part women, part beasts, and hundred-handed Briareus and the savage Hydra of Lerna, that hissing horror, the Chimaera armed with torches—Gorgons, Harpies and triple-bodied Geryon, his great ghost.<sup>6</sup> And here, instantly struck with terror, Aeneas grips his sword 330 and offers its naked edge against them as they come, and if his experienced comrade had not warned him they are mere disembodied creatures, flimsy will-o'-the-wisps that flit like living forms, he would have rushed them all, 335 slashed through empty phantoms with his blade.

From there
the road leads down to the Acheron's Tartarean waves.
Here the enormous whirlpool gapes aswirl with filth, seethes and spews out all its silt in the Wailing River.<sup>7</sup>
And here the dreaded ferryman guards the flood, 340 grisly in his squalor—Charon . . .
his scraggly beard a tangled mat of white, his eyes fixed in a fiery stare, and his grimy rags hang down from his shoulders by a knot. But all on his own he punts his craft with a pole and hoists sail 345

6. Geryon was a terrifying giant. Centaurs are half human, half horse. Scylla is a female sea monster with several doglike heads, who features in the Odyssey. Briareus was one of three sons of Sky and Earth (Uranus and Gaia), with a hundred arms and fifty heads. The Hydra was a multiple-headed snake, defeated by Heracles. The Chimaera was a fire-breathing hybrid monster, usually imagined as a mix of lion, goat, and snake. Gorgons are snakelike monsters; Harpies are female birdlike monsters.

as he ferries the dead souls in his rust-red skiff.
He's on in years, but a god's old age is hale and green.

A huge throng of the dead came streaming toward the banks:
mothers and grown men and ghosts of great-souled heroes, their bodies stripped of life, and boys and unwed girls 350 and sons laid on the pyre before their parents' eyes.
As thick as leaves in autumn woods at the first frost that slip and float to earth, or dense as flocks of birds that wing from the heaving sea to shore when winter's chill drives them over the waves to landfalls drenched in sunlight. 355
There they stood, pleading to be the first ones ferried over, reaching out their hands in longing toward the farther shore.
But the grim ferryman ushers aboard now these, now those,
others he thrusts away, back from the water's edge.

Aeneas,
astonished, stirred by the tumult, calls out: "Tell me, 360
Sibyl, what does it mean, this thronging toward the river?
What do the dead souls want? What divides them all?
Some are turned away from the banks and others scull the murky waters with their oars!"

The aged priestess answered Aeneas briefly: 365
"Son of Anchises—born of the gods, no doubt—what you see are Cocytus' pools and Styx's marsh, Powers by which the gods swear oaths they dare not break.
And the great rout you see is helpless, still not buried.
That ferryman there is Charon. Those borne by the stream 370 have found their graves. And no spirits may be conveyed across the horrendous banks and hoarse, roaring flood until their bones are buried, and they rest in peace . . .
A hundred years they wander, hovering round these shores till at last they may return and see once more the pools 375 they long to cross."

Anchises' son came to a halt and stood there, pondering long, while pity filled his heart, their lot so hard, unjust. And then he spots two men, grief-stricken and robbed of death's last tribute:
Leucaspis and Orontes, the Lycian fleet's commander. 380 Together they sailed from Troy over windswept seas and a Southern gale sprang up and toppling breakers crushed their ships and crews.

Look,
the pilot Palinurus was drifting toward him now, fresh from the Libyan run where, watching the stars, 385 he plunged from his stern, pitched out in heavy seas.
Aeneas, barely sighting him grieving in the shadows, hailed him first: "What god, Palinurus, snatched you from our midst and drowned you in open waters?
Tell me, please. Apollo has never lied before. 390
This is his one reply that's played me false:

he swore you would cross the ocean safe and sound and reach Italian shores.<sup>8</sup> Is this the end he promised?”

But the pilot answered: “Captain, Anchises’ son, Apollo’s prophetic cauldron has not failed you— 395 no god drowned me in open waters. No, the rudder I clung to, holding us all on course—my charge—some powerful force ripped it away by chance and I dragged it down as I dropped headlong too.
By the cruel seas I swear I felt no fear for myself 400 to match my fear that your ship, stripped of her tiller, steersman wrenched away, might founder in that great surge.
Three blustery winter nights the Southwind bore me wildly over the endless waters, then at the fourth dawn, swept up on a breaker’s crest, I could almost sight it now—Italy! 405 Stroke by stroke I swam for land, safety was in my grasp, weighed down by my sodden clothes, my fingers clawing the jutting spurs of a cliff, when a band of brutes came at me, ran me through with knives, the fools, they took me for plunder worth the taking. 410
The tides hold me now and the stormwinds roll my body down the shore.
By the sky’s lovely light and the buoyant breeze I beg you, by your father, your hopes for Iulus rising to his prime,
pluck me up from my pain, my undefeated captain! 415 Or throw some earth on my body—you know you can—sail back to Velia’s port.<sup>9</sup> Or if there’s a way and your goddess mother makes it clear—for not without the will of the gods, I’m certain, do you strive to cross these awesome streams and Stygian marsh— 420 give me your pledge, your hand, in all my torment!
Take me with you over the waves. At least in death I’ll find a peaceful haven.”

So the pilot begged
and so the Sibyl cut him short: “How, Palinurus, how can you harbor this mad desire of yours? 425
You think that you, unburied, can lay your eyes on the Styx’s flood, the Furies’ ruthless stream, and approach the banks unsummoned? Hope no more the gods’ decrees can be brushed aside by prayer.
Hold fast to my words and keep them well in mind 430 to comfort your hard lot. For neighboring people living in cities near and far, compelled by signs from the great gods on high, will appease your bones, will build you a tomb and pay your tomb due rites and the site will bear the name of Palinurus 435 now and always.”

That promise lifts his anguish, drives, for a while, the grief from his sad heart.

He takes delight in the cape that bears his name.<sup>1</sup>

So now they press on with their journey under way and at last approach the river. But once the ferryman, 440 still out in the Styx's currents, spied them moving across the silent grove and turning toward the bank, he greets them first with a rough abrupt rebuke:
"Stop, whoever you are at our river's edge, in full armor too! Why have you come? Speak up, 445 from right where you are, not one step more! This is the realm of shadows, sleep and drowsy night.
The law forbids me to carry living bodies across in my Stygian boat. I'd little joy, believe me, when Hercules came and I sailed the hero over, 450 or Theseus, Pirithous,<sup>2</sup> sons of gods as they were with their high and mighty power. Hercules stole our watchdog—chained him, the poor trembling creature, dragged him away from our king's very throne! The others tried to snatch our queen from the bridal bed of Death!" 455

But Apollo's seer broke in and countered Charon:
"There's no such treachery here—just calm down—no threat of force in our weapons. The huge guard at the gates can howl for eternity from his cave, terrifying the bloodless shades, Persephone keep 460 her chastity safe at home behind her uncle's doors.
Aeneas of Troy, famous for his devotion, feats of arms, goes down to the deepest shades of hell to see his father.
But if this image of devotion cannot move you, here, this bough"—showing the bough enfolded in her robes— 465
"You know it well."

At this, the heaving rage subsides in his chest. The Sibyl says no more.
The ferryman, marveling at the awesome gift,
the fateful branch unseen so many years, swerves his dusky craft and approaches shore. 470
The souls already crouched at the long thwarts—he brusquely thrusts them out, clearing the gangways, quickly taking massive Aeneas aboard the little skiff.
Under his weight the boat groans and her stitched seams gape as she ships great pools of water pouring in. 475
At last, the river crossed, the ferryman lands, the seer and hero all unharmed in the marsh,
the repellent oozing slime and livid sedge.

These are the realms that monstrous Cerberus rocks with howls

squatting low in the cave that faced them there. 480

The Sibyl, seeing the serpents writhe around his neck, tossed him a sop, slumbrous with honey and drugged seed, and he, frothing with hunger, three jaws spread wide, snapped it up where the Sibyl tossed it—gone. 485

His tremendous back relaxed, he sags to earth and sprawls over all his cave, his giant hulk limp.
The watchdog buried now in sleep, Aeneas seizes the way in, quickly clear of the river's edge, the point of no return.

At that moment, cries— 490
they could hear them now, a crescendo of wailing, ghosts of infants weeping, robbed of their share of this sweet life, at its very threshold too:

all, snatched from the breast on that black day that swept them off and drowned them in bitter death. 495

Beside them were those condemned to die on a false charge.

But not without jury picked by lot, not without judge are their places handed down. Not at all.

Minos the grand inquisitor stirs the urn, he summons the silent jury of the dead, 500
he scans the lives of those accused, their charges.

The region next to them is held by those sad ghosts, innocents all, who brought on death by their own hands;
despising the light, they threw their lives away.

How they would yearn, now, in the world above 505 to endure grim want and long hard labor!

But Fate bars the way. The grisly swamp and its loveless, lethal waters bind them fast, Styx with its nine huge coils holds them captive.

Close to the spot, extending toward the horizon— 510
the Sibyl points them out—are the Fields of Mourning, that is the name they bear. Here wait those souls consumed by the harsh, wasting sickness, cruel love, concealed on lonely paths, shrouded by myrtle bowers.

Not even in death do their torments leave them, ever. 515

Here he glimpses Phaedra, Procris, and Eriphyle grieving, baring the wounds her heartless son had dealt her.<sup>4</sup>

Evadne, Pasiphaë, and Laodamia walking side by side, and another, a young man once, a woman now, Caeneus, turned back by Fate to the form she bore at first.<sup>5</sup> 520

3. Cerberus is the three-headed guard dog of Hades.

4. Eriphyle was bribed with a necklace to persuade her husband to join the Argive war against the Thebans, in which he was killed—their son then killed her. Phaedra, wife of Theseus, fell in love with her stepson Hippolytus and killed herself; Procris was jealous of her husband, who accidentally killed her while she was spying on him.

5. Caeneus was a woman who was changed into a man by Neptune and was changed back at death. Evadne was wife of the sacrilegious Capaneus, who was struck dead by lightning; she threw herself on his pyre. Pasiphaë was wife of Minos and the queen of Crete who fell in love with the bull and gave birth to the Minotaur. Laodamia, wife of the first Greek killed at Troy, chose to accompany him to the Underworld.

And wandering there among them, wound still fresh, Phoenician Dido drifted along the endless woods.
 As the Trojan hero paused beside her, recognized her through the shadows, a dim, misty figure—as one when the month is young may see or seem to see 525 the new moon rising up through banks of clouds—that moment Aeneas wept and approached the ghost with tender words of love: “Tragic Dido, so, was the story true that came my way?
 I heard that you were dead . . . 530
 you took the final measure with a sword.
 Oh, dear god, was it I who caused your death?
 I swear by the stars, by the Powers on high, whatever faith one swears by here in the depths of earth, I left your shores, my Queen, against my will. Yes, 535 the will of the gods, that drives me through the shadows now, these moldering places so forlorn, this deep unfathomed night—their decrees have forced me on. Nor did I ever dream my leaving could have brought you so much grief.
 Stay a moment. Don’t withdraw from my sight. 540 Running away—from whom? This is the last word that Fate allows me to say to you. The last.”

Aeneas, with such appeals, with welling tears, tried to soothe her rage, her wild fiery glance.
 But she, her eyes fixed on the ground, turned away, 545 her features no more moved by his pleas as he talked on than if she were set in stony flint or Parian marble rock.
 And at last she tears herself away, his enemy forever, fleeing back to the shadowed forests where Sychaeus, her husband long ago, answers all her anguish, 550 meets her love with love. But Aeneas, no less struck by her unjust fate, escorts her from afar with streaming tears and pities her as she passes.

From there they labor along the charted path and at last they gain the utmost outer fields 555 where throngs of the great war heroes live apart.
 Here Tydeus comes to meet him, Parthenopaeus shining in arms, and Adrastus’ pallid phantom.<sup>6</sup> Here, mourned in the world above and fallen dead in battle, sons of Dardanus, chiefs arrayed in a long ranked line. 560 Seeing them all, he groaned—Glaucus, Medon, Thersilochus, Antenor’s three sons and the priest of Ceres, Polyboetes, Idaeus too, still with chariot, still with gear in hand.<sup>7</sup>
 Their spirits crowding around Aeneas, left and right, beg him to linger longer—a glimpse is not enough— 565 to walk beside him and learn the reasons why he’s come.
 But the Greek commanders and Agamemnon’s troops in phalanx, spotting the hero and his armor glinting through the shadows—blinding panic grips them, some turn tail and run as they once ran back to the ships, some strain 570 to raise a battle cry, a thin wisp of a cry that mocks their gaping jaws.

And here he sees Deiphobus too, Priam's son mutilated, his whole body, his face hacked to pieces—Ah, so cruel—his face and both his hands, and his ears 575 ripped from his ravaged head, his nostrils slashed, disgraceful wound. He can hardly recognize him, a cowering shadow hiding his punishments so raw.
 Aeneas, never pausing, hails the ghost at once in an old familiar voice: "Mighty captain, 580 Deiphobus, sprung of the noble blood of Teucer, who was bent on making you pay a price so harsh?
 Who could maim you so? I heard on that last night that you, exhausted from killing hordes of Greeks, had fallen dead on a mangled pile of carnage. 585
 So I was the one who raised your empty tomb on Rhoeteum Cape and called out to your shade three times with a ringing voice. Your name and armor mark the site, my friend, but I could not find you, could not bury your bones in native soil 590
 when I set out to sea."

"Nothing, my friend," Priam's son replies,
 "you have left nothing undone. All that's owed Deiphobus and his shadow you have paid in full.
 My own fate and the deadly crimes of that Spartan whore<sup>8</sup> 595 have plunged me in this hell. Look at the souvenirs she left me!
 And how we spent that last night, lost in deluded joys, you know. Remember it we must, and all too well.
 When the fatal horse mounted over our steep walls, its weighted belly teeming with infantry in arms— 600 she led the Phrygian women round the city, feigning the orgiastic rites of Bacchus,<sup>9</sup> dancing, shrieking but in their midst she shook her monstrous torch, a flare from the city heights, a signal to the Greeks.
 While I in our cursed bridal chamber, there I lay, 605 bone-weary with anguish, buried deep in sleep, peaceful, sweet, like the peace of death itself.
 And all the while that matchless wife of mine is removing all my weapons from the house, even slipping my trusty sword from under my pillow. 610
 She calls Menelaus in and flings the doors wide open, hoping no doubt by this grand gift to him, her lover,
 to wipe the slate clean of her former wicked ways.

Why drag things out? They burst into the bedroom, Ulysses, that rouser of outrage right beside them, 615
 Aeolus' crafty heir.<sup>1</sup> You gods, if my lips are pure, I pray for vengeance now—deal such blows to the Greeks as they dealt me!
 But come, tell me in turn what twist of fate has brought you here alive? Forced by wanderings, 620 storm-tossed at sea, or prompted by the gods?
 What destiny hounds you on to visit these,
 these sunless homes of sorrow, harrowed lands?"

Trading words, as Dawn in her rose-red chariot crossed in mid-career, high noon in the arching sky, 625 and they might have spent what time they had with tales if the Sibyl next to Aeneas had not warned him tersely:
 "Night comes on, Aeneas. We waste our time with tears.
 This is the place where the road divides in two.
 To the right it runs below the mighty walls of Death, 630 our path to Elysium, but the left-hand road torments the wicked, leading down to Tartarus, path to doom."

"No anger, please, great priestess," begged Deiphobus.
 "Back I go to the shades to fill the tally out.
 Now go, our glory of Troy, go forth and enjoy 635 a better fate than mine." With his last words he turned in his tracks and went his way.

Aeneas

suddenly glances back and beneath a cliff to the left he sees an enormous fortress ringed with triple walls and raging around it all, a blazing flood of lava, 640 Tartarus' River of Fire, whirling thunderous boulders.
 Before it rears a giant gate, its columns solid adamant, so no power of man, not even the gods themselves can root it out in war. An iron tower looms on high where Tisiphone,<sup>2</sup> crouching with bloody shroud girt up, 645 never sleeping, keeps her watch at the entrance night and day.
 Groans resound from the depths, the savage crack of the lash, the grating creak of iron, the clank of dragging chains.
 And Aeneas froze there, terrified, taking in the din:
 "What are the crimes, what kinds? Tell me, Sibyl, 650 what are the punishments, why this scourging?
 Why such wailing echoing in the air?"

The seer rose to the moment: "Famous captain of Troy, no pure soul may set foot on that wicked threshold.
 But when Hecate put me in charge of Avernus' groves 655
 she taught me all the punishments of the gods, she led me through them all.

2. One of the three Furies, divine figures of vengeance.

Here Cretan Rhadamanthus<sup>3</sup> rules with an iron hand, censuring men, exposing fraud, forcing confessions when anyone up above, reveling in his hidden crimes, 660 puts off his day of atonement till he dies, the fool, too late. That very moment, vengeful Tisiphone, armed with lashes, springs on the guilty, whips them till they quail, with her left hand shaking all her twisting serpents, summoning up her savage sisters, bands of Furies. 665 Then at last, screeching out on their grinding hinge the infernal gates swing wide.

“Can you see that sentry crouched at the entrance? What a specter guards the threshold!
 Fiercer still, the monstrous Hydra, fifty black maws gaping, holds its lair inside.

“Then the abyss, Tartarus itself 670 plunges headlong down through the darkness twice as far as our gaze goes up to Olympus rising toward the skies.
 Here the ancient line of the Earth, the Titans’ spawn, flung down by lightning, writhe in the deep pit.
 There I saw the twin sons of Aloeus too,<sup>4</sup> giant bodies 675 that clawed the soaring sky with their hands to tear it down and thrust great Jove from his kingdom high above.

“I saw Salmoneus<sup>5</sup> too, who paid a brutal price for aping the flames of Jove and Olympus’ thunder.
 Sped by his four-horse chariot, flaunting torches, 680 right through the Greek tribes and Elis city’s heart he rode in triumph, claiming as his the honors of the gods.
 The madman, trying to match the storm and matchless lightning just by stamping on bronze with prancing horn-hoofed steeds!
 The almighty Father hurled his bolt through the thunderheads— 685 no torches for him, no smoky flicker of pitch-pines, no, he spun him headlong down in a raging whirlwind.

“Tityus too:<sup>6</sup> you could see that son of Earth, the mother of us all,
 his giant body splayed out over nine whole acres, a hideous vulture with hooked beak gorging down 690 his immortal liver and innards ever ripe for torture.
 Deep in his chest it nestles, ripping into its feast and the fibers, grown afresh, get no relief from pain.

“What need to tell of the Lapiths, Ixion, or Pirithous?<sup>7</sup> Above them a black rock—now, now slipping, teetering, 695

3. Brother of Minos and, like Minos, a king of Crete.

4. The Titans, who rebelled against Jupiter (Jove) and were destroyed.

5. King of Elis, punished for impiety because he pretended to Jupiter’s might by using torches to imitate lightning.

6. Tityos assaulted the goddess Latona and was punished by being stretched out and forever devoured by a vulture.

7. Pirithous, king of the Lapiths (known for their battle against the Centaurs) and friend of Theseus, tried to abduct Persephone and was chained up forever. Pirithous’s father, Ixion, who assaulted Juno, was punished by being stretched on a wheel. (The punishments of the tottering rock and the food always out of reach are more normally associated with Tantalus.)

watch, forever about to fall. While the golden posts of high festal couches gleam, and a banquet spreads before their eyes with luxury fit for kings . . .
 but reclining just beside them, the oldest Fury holds back their hands from even touching the food, surging up with her brandished torch and deafening screams. 700

“Here those who hated their brothers, while alive, or struck their fathers down or embroiled clients in fraud, or brooded alone over troves of gold they gained and never put aside 705 some share for their own kin—a great multitude, these—then those killed for adultery, those who marched to the flag of civil war and never shrank from breaking their pledge to their lords and masters: all of them, walled up here, wait to meet their doom.

“Don’t hunger to know their doom, 710 what form of torture or twist of Fortune drags them down.
 Some trundle enormous boulders, others dangle, racked to the breaking point on the spokes of rolling wheels.
 Doomed Theseus sits on his seat and there he will sit forever.
 Phlegyas,<sup>8</sup> most in agony, sounds out his warning to all, 715 his piercing cries bear witness through the darkness: ‘Learn to bow to justice. Never scorn the gods.
 You all stand forewarned!’

“Here’s one who bartered his native land for gold, he saddled her with a tyrant, set up laws for a bribe, 720 for a bribe he struck them down. This one forced himself on his daughter’s bed and sealed a forbidden marriage.
 All dared an outrageous crime and what they dared, they did.

“No, not if I had a hundred tongues and a hundred mouths and a voice of iron too—I could never capture 725 all the crimes or run through all the torments, doom by doom.”

So Apollo’s aged priestess ended her answer, then she added: “Come, press on with your journey. See it through, this duty you’ve undertaken. We must hurry now. 730
 I can just make out the ramparts forged by the Cyclops.<sup>9</sup>
 There are the gates, facing us with their arch.
 There our orders say to place our gifts.”

At that,
 both of them march in step along the shadowed paths, consuming the space between, and approach the doors. 735 Aeneas springs to the entryway and rinsing his limbs

8. King of the Lapiths and father of Ixion; he was punished for setting fire to the temple of Apollo at Delphi.

9. The entrance to Elysium (the Fortunate Groves) was built by the god Vulcan, with help from the Cyclopes, famous for metalworking.

with fresh pure water, there at the threshold, just before them, stakes the golden bough.

The rite complete at last,
their duty to the goddess performed in full, 740 they gained the land of joy, the fresh green fields, the Fortunate Groves where the blessed make their homes.
Here a freer air, a dazzling radiance clothes the fields and the spirits possess their own sun, their own stars.
Some flex their limbs in the grassy wrestling-rings, 745 contending in sport, they grapple on the golden sands.
Some beat out a dance with their feet and chant their songs.
And Orpheus himself, the Thracian priest with his long robes,<sup>1</sup> keeps their rhythm strong with his lyre's seven ringing strings, plucking now with his fingers, now with his ivory plectrum. 750

Here is the ancient line of Teucer, noblest stock of all, those great-hearted heroic sons born in better years, Ilus, and Assaracus, and Dardanus, founder of Troy.
Far off, Aeneas gazes in awe—their arms, their chariots, phantoms all, their lances fixed in the ground, their horses, 755 freed from harness, grazing the grasslands near and far.
The same joy they took in arms and chariots when alive, in currying horses sleek and putting them to pasture, follows them now they rest beneath the earth.

Others, look,

he glimpses left and right in the meadows, feasting, 760 singing in joy a chorus raised to Healing Apollo, deep in a redolent laurel grove where Eridanus River rushes up, in full spate, and rolls through woods in the high world above. And here are troops of men who had suffered wounds, fighting to save their country, 765 and those who had been pure priests while still alive, and the faithful poets whose songs were fit for Phoebus;
those who enriched our lives with the newfound arts they forged and those we remember well for the good they did mankind.
And all, with snow-white headbands crowning their brows, 770 flow around the Sibyl as she addresses them there, Musaëus<sup>2</sup> first, who holds the center of that huge throng, his shoulders rearing high as they gaze up toward him: “Tell us, happy spirits, and you, the best of poets, what part of your world, what region holds Anchises? 775
All for him we have come, we've sailed across the mighty streams of hell.”

And at once the great soul made a brief reply:
“No one's home is fixed. We live in shady groves, beliefs expounded by Anchises a little later in this book (line 836 ff.).

2. Legendary poet and musician.

we settle on pillowed banks and meadows washed with brooks. 780
 But you, if your heart compels you, climb this ridge and I soon will set your steps on an easy path.”

So he said and walking on ahead, from high above points out to them open country swept with light.
 Down they come and leave the heights behind. 785

Now father Anchises, deep in a valley's green recess, was passing among the souls secluded there, reviewing them, eagerly, on their way to the world of light above. By chance he was counting over his own people, all his cherished heirs, their fame and their fates, their values, acts of valor. 790
 When he saw Aeneas striding toward him over the fields, he reached out both his hands as his spirit lifted, tears ran down his cheeks, a cry broke from his lips: “You’ve come at last? Has the love your father hoped for mastered the hardship of the journey? Let me look at your face, my son, exchange some words, and hear your familiar voice. 795
 So I dreamed, I knew you’d come, I counted the moments—my longing has not betrayed me.
 Over what lands, what seas have you been driven, buffeted by what perils into my open arms, my son?
 How I feared the realm of Libya<sup>3</sup> might well do you harm!” 800

“Your ghost, my father,” he replied, “your grieving ghost, so often it came and urged me to your threshold!
 My ships are lying moored in the Tuscan sea.
 Let me clasp your hand, my father, let me— 805
 I beg you, don’t withdraw from my embrace!”

So Aeneas pleaded, his face streaming tears.
 Three times he tried to fling his arms around his neck, three times he embraced—nothing . . . the phantom sifting through his fingers, 810
 light as wind, quick as a dream in flight.

And now Aeneas sees in the valley's depths a sheltered grove and rustling wooded brakes and the Lethe<sup>4</sup> flowing past the homes of peace.
 Around it hovered numberless races, nations of souls like bees in meadowlands on a cloudless summer day 815 that settle on flowers, riots of color, swarming round the lilies' lustrous sheen, and the whole field comes alive with a humming murmur. Struck by the sudden sight, Aeneas, all unknowing, wonders aloud, and asks:
 “What is the river over there? And who are they 820 who crowd the banks in such a growing throng?”

3. Carthage.

4. River of forgetfulness.

His father Anchises answers: "They are the spirits owed a second body by the Fates. They drink deep of the river Lethe's currents there, long drafts that will set them free of cares, oblivious forever. 825
 How long I have yearned to tell you, show them to you, face to face, yes, as I count the tally out of all my children's children. So all the more you can rejoice with me in Italy, found at last." 830

"What, Father, can we suppose that any spirits rise from here to the world above, return once more to the shackles of the body? Why this mad desire, poor souls, for the light of life?"

"I will tell you, my son, not keep you in suspense," Anchises says, 835 and unfolds all things in order, one by one.

"First,
 the sky and the earth and the flowing fields of the sea, the shining orb of the moon and the Titan sun, the stars:
 an inner spirit feeds them, coursing through all their limbs, mind stirs the mass and their fusion brings the world to birth. 840
 From their union springs the human race and the wild beasts, the winged lives of birds and the wondrous monsters bred below the glistening surface of the sea. The seeds of life—fiery is their force, divine their birth, but they are weighed down by the bodies' ills or dulled 845 by earthly limbs and flesh that's born for death.
 That is the source of all men's fears and longings, joys and sorrows, nor can they see the heavens' light, shut up in the body's tomb, a prison dark and deep.

"True,
 but even on that last day, when the light of life departs, 850
 the wretches are not completely purged of all the taints, nor are they wholly freed of all the body's plagues.
 Down deep they harden fast—they must, so long engrained in the flesh—in strange, uncanny ways. And so the souls are drilled in punishments, they must pay for their old offenses. 855
 Some are hung splayed out, exposed to the empty winds, some are plunged in the rushing floods—their stains, their crimes scoured off or scorched away by fire.
 Each of us must suffer his own demanding ghost.
 Then we are sent to Elysium's broad expanse, 860 a few of us even hold these fields of joy till the long days, a cycle of time seen through, cleanse our hard, inveterate stains and leave us clear ethereal sense, the eternal breath of fire purged and pure.
 But all the rest, once they have turned the wheel of time 865 for a thousand years: God calls them forth to the Lethe, great armies of souls, their memories blank so that they may revisit the overarching world once more and begin to long to return to bodies yet again."

Anchises, silent a moment, drawing his son and Sibyl with him into the midst of the vast murmuring throng, 870 took his stand on a rise of ground where he could scan the long column marching toward him, soul by soul, and recognize their features as they neared.

“So come,
 the glory that will follow the sons of Troy through time, 875 your children born of Italian stock who wait for life, bright souls, future heirs of our name and our renown:
 I will reveal them all and tell you of your fate.

“There,
 you see that youth who leans on a tipless spear of honor?
 Assigned the nearest place to the world of light, 880
 the first to rise to the air above, his blood mixed with Italian blood, he bears an Alban name.<sup>5</sup> Silvius, your son, your last-born, when late in your old age your wife Lavinia brings him up, deep in the woods—a king who fathers kings in turn, 885
 he founds our race that rules in Alba Longa.

“Nearby,
 there’s Procas, pride of the Trojan people, then come Capys, Numitor, and the one who revives your name, Silvius Aeneas, your equal in arms and duty, famed, if he ever comes to rule the Alban throne.<sup>6</sup> 890 What brave young men! Look at the power they display and the oakleaf civic crowns that shade their foreheads.
 They will erect for you Nomentum, Gabii, Fidena town and build Collatia’s ramparts on the mountains, Pometia too, and Inuis’ fortress, Bola and Cora. 895 Famous names in the future, nameless places now.

“Here,
 a son of Mars, his grandsire Numitor’s comrade—Romulus, bred from Assaracus’ blood by his mother, Ilia.<sup>7</sup>
 See how the twin plumes stand joined on his helmet?
 And the Father of Gods himself already marks him out 900 with his own bolts of honor. Under his auspices, watch, my son, our brilliant Rome will extend her empire far and wide as the earth, her spirit high as Olympus.
 Within her single wall she will gird her seven hills, blest in her breed of men: like the Berecynthian Mother<sup>8</sup> 905 crowned with her turrets, riding her victor’s chariot through the Phrygian cities, glad in her brood of gods, embracing a hundred grandsons. All dwell in the heavens, all command the heights.

“Now turn your eyes this way

5. Aeneas’s son Ascanius is destined to found the Italian kingdom of Alba Longa; his descendants will later found the city of Rome.

6. These are all kings of Alba Longa.

7. Numitor was a king of Alba Longa. His daughter Ilia (also known as Rhea Silvia) was raped by the war-god Mars and gave birth to Romulus and Remus, who were raised by a wolf. Assaracus is a Trojan ancestor.

and behold these people, your own Roman people. 910 Here is Caesar<sup>9</sup> and all the line of Iulus soon to venture under the sky's great arch.
 Here is the man, he's here! Time and again you've heard his coming promised—Caesar Augustus!
 Son of a god, he will bring back the Age of Gold 915 to the Latian fields where Saturn once held sway, expand his empire past the Garamants and the Indians<sup>1</sup> to a land beyond the stars, beyond the wheel of the year, the course of the sun itself, where Atlas bears the skies<sup>2</sup> and turns on his shoulder the heavens studded with flaming stars. 920 Even now the Caspian and Maeotic kingdoms quake at his coming,<sup>3</sup> oracles sound the alarm and the seven mouths of the Nile churn with fear. Not even Hercules himself could cross such a vast expanse of earth, though it's true he shot the stag with its brazen hoofs, and brought peace 925 to the ravaged woods of Erymanthus, terrorized the Hydra of Lerna with his bow.<sup>4</sup> Not even Bacchus in all his glory, driving his team with vines for reins and lashing his tigers down from Nysa's soaring ridge.<sup>5</sup>
 Do we still flinch from turning our valor into deeds? 930
 Or fear to make our home on Western soil?

“But look,

who is that over there, crowned with an olive wreath and bearing sacred emblems? I know his snowy hair, his beard—the first king to found our Rome on laws, Numa,<sup>6</sup> sent from the poor town of Cures, paltry land, 935 to wield imperial power.

“And after him comes Tullus disrupting his country's peace to rouse a stagnant people, armies stale to the taste of triumph, back to war again.

 And just behind him, Ancus, full of the old bravado, even now too swayed by the breeze of public favor.<sup>7</sup>

"Now,
 the Decii and the Drusi—look over there—Torquatus too, with his savage axe, Camillus bringing home the standards.<sup>1</sup>
 But you see that pair of spirits? Gleaming in equal armor, equals now at peace, while darkness pins them down, but if they should reach the light of life, what war they'll rouse between them! Battles, massacres—Caesar,<sup>2</sup> the bride's father, marching down from his Alpine ramparts, Fortress Monaco, Pompey her husband set to oppose him with the armies of the East.

"No, my sons, never inure

 he will conquer Corinth and, famed for killing Achaeans, drive his victor's chariot up the Capitol's heights.
 And there is Paullus,<sup>4</sup> and he will rout all Argos and Agamemnon's own Mycenae and cut Perseus down—the heir of Aeacus, born of Achilles' warrior blood—and avenge his Trojan kin and Minerva's violated shrine.<sup>5</sup>

"Who,
 noble Cato, could pass you by in silence? Or you, Cossus?
 Or the Gracchi and their kin? Or the two Scipios, both thunderbolts of battle, Libya's scourge?
 Or you, Fabricius, reared from poverty into power?
 Or you, Serranus the Sower, seeding your furrow?
 You Fabii, where do you rush me, all but spent?
 And you, famous Maximus, you are the one man whose delaying tactics save our Roman state.<sup>6</sup>

"Others,<sup>7</sup> I have no doubt, draw from the block of marble features quick with life, that climb the sky and foretell the times they rise. 980

 But you, Roman, remember, rule with all your power the peoples of the earth—these will be your arts:
 to put your stamp on the works and ways of peace,
 to spare the defeated, break the proud in war.”

They were struck with awe as father Anchises paused, 985 then carried on: “Look there, Marcellus<sup>8</sup> marching toward us, decked in splendid plunder he tore from a chief he killed, victorious, towering over all. This man on horseback, he will steady the Roman state when rocked by chaos, mow the Carthaginians down in droves, the rebel Gauls. 990
 He is only the third to offer up to Father Quirinus the enemy’s captured arms.”

Aeneas broke in now, for he saw a young man walking at Marcellus’ side,<sup>9</sup> handsome, striking, his armor burnished bright but his face showed little joy, his eyes cast down. 995 “Who is that, Father, matching Marcellus stride for stride?
 A son, or one of his son’s descendants born of noble stock?
 What acclaim from his comrades! What fine bearing, the man himself! True, but around his head a mournful shadow flutters black as night.”

“My son,” 1000
 his tears brimming, father Anchises started in, “don’t press to know your people’s awesome grief.
 Only a glimpse of him the Fates will grant the world, not let him linger longer. Too mighty, the Roman race, it seemed to You above, if this grand gift should last. 1005 Now what wails of men will the Field of Mars send up to Mars’ tremendous city! What a cortege you’ll see, old Tiber, flowing past the massive tomb just built!
 No child of Troy will ever raise so high the hopes of his Latin forebears, nor will the land of Romulus take 1010 such pride in a son she’s borne. Mourn for his virtue!
 Mourn for his honor forged of old, his sword arm never conquered in battle. No enemy could ever go against him in arms and leave unscathed, whether he fought on foot or rode on horseback, 1015 digging spurs in his charger’s lathered flanks.
 Oh, child of heartbreak! If only you could burst the stern decrees of Fate! You will be Marcellus.
 Fill my arms with lilies, let me scatter flowers, lustrous roses—piling high these gifts, at least, 1020 on our descendant’s shade—and perform a futile rite.”

8. Another military hero, successful in the Second Punic War.

9. The young man is the Marcellus who married Augustus’s daughter Julia and would have been the heir to the empire, but died at the age of 19, in 23 B.C.E.

So they wander over the endless fields of air, gazing at every region, viewing realm by realm.
 Once Anchises has led his son through each new scene and fired his soul with a love of glory still to come, 1025 he tells him next of the wars Aeneas still must wage, he tells of Laurentine peoples, tells of Latinus' city,<sup>1</sup> and how he should shun or shoulder each ordeal that he must meet.

There are twin Gates of Sleep.
 One, they say, is called the Gate of Horn 1030 and it offers easy passage to all true shades.
 The other glistens with ivory, radiant, flawless, but through it the dead send false dreams up toward the sky.
 And here Anchises, his vision told in full, escorts his son and Sibyl both and shows them out now 1035 through the Ivory Gate.

Aeneas cuts his way to the waiting ships to see his crews again, then sets a course straight on to Caieta's harbor.<sup>2</sup> Anchors run from prows, the sterns line the shore.

Summary of Books VII–VIII Back in the upper world, Aeneas travels to the Trojan exiles' promised land, Latium, in central Italy. In the capital city, Laurentum, he meets Latinus, king of the Latin race, who has one daughter, Lavinia. An oracle has foretold that she must marry a stranger, and the Latin people welcome Aeneas as their future king. But Amata, Latinus's wife, had hoped her daughter would marry Turnus, leader of the rival Rutulian tribe. Juno, jealous of Trojan success, rouses the people to war and leads the native Italians against the invading Trojans. Meanwhile, Aeneas has a vision of the god of the River Tiber, who tells him that his son will found the city of Alba Longa, and that he should visit the Greek tribe of Arcadians, ruled by Evander. Evander welcomes him, and shows him the future site of Rome. Evander sends his son, Pallas, with troops of Arcadians and Etrurians, to fight with Aeneas. Meanwhile, Venus has had her husband Vulcan forge a new set of armor for Aeneas, which she brings him as he and his troops are resting, readying themselves for battle.

Down come captain Aeneas and all his fighters picked for battle, water their horses well 715 and weary troops take rest.

But the goddess Venus, lustrous among the cloudbanks, bearing her gifts, approached and when she spotted her son alone,
 off in a glade's recess by the frigid stream, she hailed him, suddenly there before him: "Look, 720

1. Latium, home of the "Laurentine peoples." 2. Modern-day Gaeta, on the west coast of Italy.

just forged to perfection by all my husband's skill:
the gifts I promised! There's no need now, my son, to flinch from fighting swaggering Latin ranks or challenging savage Turnus to a duel!"

With that, Venus reached to embrace her son and set the brilliant armor down before him under a nearby oak. 725

Aeneas takes delight
in the goddess' gifts and the honor of it all as he runs his eyes across them piece by piece.
He cannot get enough of them, filled with wonder, 730 turning them over, now with his hands, now his arms, the terrible crested helmet plumed and shooting fire,
the sword-blade honed to kill, the breastplate, solid bronze, blood-red and immense, like a dark blue cloud enflamed by the sun's rays and gleaming through the heavens. 735
Then the burnished greaves of electrum,<sup>3</sup> smelted gold, the spear and the shield, the workmanship of the shield, no words can tell its power . . .

There is the story of Italy, Rome in all her triumphs. There the fire-god forged them, well aware of the seers and schooled in times to come, 740 all in order the generations born of Ascanius' stock and all the wars they waged.

And Vulcan forged them too,
the mother wolf stretched out in the green grotto of Mars, twin boys at her dugs, who hung there, frisky, suckling without a fear as she with her lithe neck bent back, 745 stroking each in turn, licked her wolf pups into shape with a mother's tongue.<sup>4</sup>

Not far from there
he had forged Rome as well and the Sabine women brutally dragged from the crowded bowl when the Circus games were played and abruptly war broke out afresh, the sons of Romulus 750 battling old King Tatius' hardened troops from Cures.<sup>5</sup> Then when the same chiefs had set aside their strife, they stood in full armor before Jove's holy altar, lifting cups, and slaughtered a sow to bind their pacts.

Nearby,
two four-horse chariots, driven to left and right, had torn 755 Mettus apart—man of Alba, you should have kept your word—and Tullus hauled the liar's viscera through the brush as blood-drops dripped like dew from brakes of thorns.<sup>6</sup>

Porsenna,

3. Alloy of gold and silver.

4. Romulus and Remus, first builders of Rome's walls, who were suckled by the wolf.

5. At the first games in the Roman arena (the Circus), Roman men seized the Sabine women, provoking their king, Tatius, to make war in revenge.

6. Mettus, king of Alba Longa, broke a promise to Tullus, third king of Rome, and was brutally punished.

there, commanding Romans to welcome banished Tarquin back, mounted a massive siege to choke the city—Aeneas' heirs rushing headlong against the steel in freedom's name. 760 See Porsenna to the life, his likeness menacing, raging, and why? Cocles dared to rip the bridge down, Cloelia burst her chains and swam the flood.<sup>7</sup>

Crowning the shield, guarding the fort atop the Tarpeian Rock, Manlius 765 stood before the temple, held the Capitol's heights.
 The new thatch bristled thick on Romulus' palace roof and here the silver goose went ruffling through the gold arcades, squawking its warning—Gauls attack the gates! Gauls swarming the thickets, about to seize the fortress, 770 shielded by shadows, gift of the pitch-dark night.<sup>8</sup> Gold their flowing hair, their war dress gold, striped capes glinting, their milky necks ringed with golden chokers, pairs of Alpine pikes in their hands, flashing like fire, and long shields wrap their bodies. 775

Here Vulcan pounded out the Salii, dancing priests of Mars, the Luperci,<sup>9</sup> stripped, their peaked caps wound with wool, bearing their body-shields that dropped from heaven,
 and chaste matrons, riding in pillowed coaches, led the sacred marches through the city.

Far apart 780
 on the shield, what's more, he forged the homes of hell, the high Gates of Death and the torments of the doomed, with you, Catiline,<sup>1</sup> dangling from a beetling crag, cringing before the Furies' open mouths.

And set apart,
 the virtuous souls, with Cato<sup>2</sup> giving laws.

And amidst it all 785
 the heaving sea ran far and wide, its likeness forged in gold but the blue deep foamed in a sheen of white and rounding it out in a huge ring swam the dolphins, brilliant in silver, tails sweeping the crests to cut the waves in two.

And here in the heart 790 of the shield: the bronze ships, the battle of Actium,<sup>3</sup> you could see it all, the world drawn up for war, Leucata Headland seething, the breakers molten gold.
 On one flank, Caesar Augustus leading Italy into battle,

7. When the Etruscan tyrant Tarquin was banished from Rome, the Etruscan general Lars Porsenna attacked the city from a bridge, and took a girl—Cloelia—hostage; but a Roman, Cocles (better known as Horatius), tore down the bridge, and rescued both girl and city.

8. In 390 B.C.E. Manlius defended Rome against the invading Gauls; he was woken by geese, who were the first to hear the attack.

9. Priests of Lupercus, the Roman equivalent of Pan, the countryside god.

1. Conspirator who tried to overthrow the Roman Republic in the first century B.C.E.

2. Cato the Younger, defender of the Republic, who killed himself after the victory of Julius Caesar at Utica.

3. Site, on the northwestern Greek coast, of a major naval engagement in which Octavian (later called Augustus) defeated Antony and Cleopatra in 31 B.C.E.

the Senate and People too, the gods of hearth and home 795 and the great gods themselves. High astern he stands, the twin flames shoot forth from his lustrous brows and rising from the peak of his head, his father's star.
 On the other flank, Agrippa<sup>4</sup> stands tall as he steers his ships in line, impelled by favoring winds and gods 800 and from his forehead glitter the beaks of ships on the Naval Crown, proud ensign earned in war.

And opposing them comes Antony leading on the riches of the Orient, troops of every stripe—victor over the nations of the Dawn and blood-red shores 805 and in his retinue, Egypt, all the might of the East and Bactra, the end of the earth, and trailing in his wake, that outrage, that Egyptian wife!<sup>5</sup> All launch in as one, whipping the whole sea to foam with tugging, thrashing oars and cleaving triple beaks 810 as they make a run for open sea. You'd think the Cyclades<sup>6</sup> ripped up by the roots, afloat on the swells, or mountains ramming against mountains, so immense the turrets astern as sailors attack them, showering flaming tow and hot bolts of flying steel, and the fresh blood running 815 red on Neptune's fields. And there in the thick of it all the queen is mustering her armada, clacking her native rattles, still not glimpsing the twin vipers hovering at her back,<sup>7</sup> as Anubis<sup>8</sup> barks and the queen's chaos of monster gods train their spears on Neptune, Venus, and great Minerva. 820 And there in the heart of battle Mars rampages on, cast in iron, with grim Furies plunging down the sky and Strife in triumph rushing in with her slashed robes and Bellona<sup>9</sup> cracking her bloody lash in hot pursuit.
 And scanning the melee, high on Actium's heights 825
 Apollo bent his bow and terror struck them all, Egypt and India, all the Arabians, all the Sabaeans wheeled in their tracks and fled, and the queen herself—you could see her calling, tempting the winds, her sails spreading and now, now about to let her sheets run free. 830 Here in all this carnage the God of Fire forged her pale with imminent death, sped on by the tides and Northwest Wind.
 And rising up before her, the Nile immersed in mourning opens every fold of his mighty body, all his rippling robes, inviting into his deep blue lap and secret eddies 835
 all his conquered people.

But Caesar<sup>1</sup> in triple triumph,

4. Son-in-law of Augustus, and admiral.

5. Although Actium was a battle between two Roman factions in a civil war, it is presented here as a conflict between the disciplined West and the luxurious East. The "Egyptian wife" is Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, with whom the Roman general Antony was having an affair.

6. Greek islands.

7. Anticipating her death, since Cleopatra poisoned herself with snakes.

8. Dog-headed Egyptian god.

9. Goddess of war.

1. Augustus, who took on the title "Caesar."

borne home through the walls of Rome, was paying eternal vows of thanks to the gods of Italy:
 three hundred imposing shrines throughout the city.
 The roads resounded with joy, revelry, clapping hands, 840 with bands of matrons in every temple, altars in each and the ground before them strewn with slaughtered steers.
 Caesar himself, throned at brilliant Apollo's snow-white gates, reviews the gifts brought on by the nations of the earth and he mounts them high on the lofty temple doors 845 as the vanquished people move in a long slow file, their dress, their arms as motley as their tongues.
 Here Vulcan had forged the Nomad race, the Africans with their trailing robes, here the Leleges, Carians, Gelonian<sup>2</sup> archers bearing quivers, Euphrates flowing now 850 with a humbler tide, the Morini brought from the world's end, the two-horned Rhine and the Dahae never conquered, Araxes River bridling at his bridge.<sup>3</sup>

Such vistas

the God of Fire forged across the shield that Venus gives her son. He fills with wonder— 855 he knows nothing of these events but takes delight in their likeness, lifting onto his shoulders now the fame and fates of all his children's children.

Summary of Books IX–XI     The war becomes bloody and violent. Jupiter orders a council of the gods, reminding them that there was supposed to be peace between Trojans and Italians; but he ends up renouncing responsibility: "the Fates will find the way," he declares. Pallas, son of Evander, enters battle and is killed by Turnus. Aeneas longs to kill Turnus in revenge, but cannot find him; Juno has spirited him away. Attempts at peace-making fail, and many are killed on both sides, including a warrior princess named Camilla. Turnus insists on fighting Aeneas in single combat. Aeneas and King Latinus agree that if Turnus wins, the Trojans will leave, but if Turnus loses, Aeneas will not enslave the native Italians, but will join with them on equal terms to form a new nation. But the truce soon breaks, fighting starts again, and Aeneas is wounded. After Venus heals him, he returns to battle in full armor, and eventually the Trojans and their allies attack Latium, where Turnus has his stronghold. Turnus decides to fight him and again they agree to single combat; everybody else draws back to leave space for the fight.

FROM BOOK XII

[The Sword Decides All]

* * *

Latinus himself is struck that these two giant men, sprung from opposing ends of the earth, have met,

2. The Lelegians and Carians were ancient peoples of Asia Minor; the Gelonians were a Scythian people of southern Russia.

3. Peoples and places indicating the vast extent of the Roman Empire under Augustus: the Euphrates is a river in Mesopotamia; the Morini were a Gaulish tribe in modern-day Belgium, beyond the Rhine River; the Dahae were a tribe from east of the Caspian Sea; the Araxes River (in modern-day Armenia) once had a bridge built by Alexander that was swept away by floods.

face to face, to let their swords decide.

But they,
as soon as the battlefield lay clear and level, charge at speed, rifling their spears at long range, 825
then rush to battle with shields and clanging bronze.
The earth groans as stroke after stroke they land with naked swords: fortune and fortitude mix in one assault. Charging like two hostile bulls fighting up on Sila's woods or Taburnus' ridges,<sup>4</sup> 830 ramping in mortal combat, both brows bent for attack and the herdsman back away in fear and the whole herd stands by, hushed, afraid, and the heifers wait and wonder, who will lord it over the forest? who will lead the herd?— while the bulls battle it out, horns butting, locking, 835 goring each other, necks and shoulders roped in blood and the woods resound as they grunt and bellow out.
So they charge, Trojan Aeneas and Turnus, son of Daunus,<sup>5</sup> shields clang and the huge din makes the heavens ring.
Jove himself lifts up his scales, balanced, trued, 840 and in them he sets the opposing fates of both . . .
Whom would the labor of battle doom? Whose life would weigh him down to death?

Suddenly Turnus
flashes forward, certain he's in the clear and raising his sword high, rearing to full stretch 845 strikes—as Trojans and anxious Latins shout out, with the gaze of both armies riveted on the fighters.
But his treacherous blade breaks off, it fails Turnus in mid-stroke—enraged, his one recourse, retreat, and swifter than Eastwinds, Turnus flies as soon 850
as he sees that unfamiliar hilt in his hand, no defense at all. They say the captain, rushing headlong on to harness his team and board his car to begin the duel, left his father's sword behind and hastily grabbed his charioteer Metiscus' blade. 855 Long as the Trojan stragglers took to their heels and ran, the weapon did its work, but once it came up against the immortal armor forged by the God of Fire, Vulcan, the mortal sword burst at a stroke, brittle as ice, and glinting splinters gleamed on the tawny sand. 860
So raging Turnus runs for it, scours the field, now here, now there, weaving in tangled circles as Trojans crowd him hard, a dense ring of them shutting him in, with a wild swamp to the left and steep walls to the right.

Nor does Aeneas flag, 865 though slowed down by his wound, his knees unsteady, cutting his pace at times but he's still in full fury,

4. Sila and Taburnus are mountainous, forested areas in southern Italy.      5. King of Apulia.

hot on his frantic quarry's tracks, stride for stride.
 Alert as a hunting hound that lights on a trapped stag, hemmed in by a river's bend or frightened back by the ropes 870 with blood-red feathers<sup>6</sup>—the hound barking, closing, fast as the quarry, panicked by traps and the steep riverbanks, runs off and back in a thousand ways but the Umbrian hound,<sup>7</sup> keen for the kill, hangs on the trail, his jaws agape—and now, now he's got him, thinks he's got him, yes 875 and his jaws clap shut, stymied, champing the empty air.
 Then the shouts break loose, and the banks and rapids round resound with the din, and the high sky thunders back. Turnus—even in flight he rebukes his men as he races, calling each by name, demanding his old familiar sword. 880 Aeneas, opposite, threatens death and doom to once to anyone in his way, he threatens his harried foes that he'll root their city out and, wounded as he is, keeps closing for the kill. And five full circles they run and reel as many back, around and back, 885 for it's no mean trophy they're sporting after now, they race for the life and the lifeblood of Turnus.

By chance a wild olive, green with its bitter leaves, stood right here, sacred to Faunus,<sup>8</sup> revered by men in the old days, sailors saved from shipwreck. 890
 On it they always fixed their gifts to the local god and they hung their votive clothes in thanks for rescue.
 But the Trojans—no exceptions, hallowed tree that it was—chopped down its trunk to clear the spot for combat.
 Now here the spear of Aeneas had stuck, borne home 895 by its hurling force, and the tough roots held it fast.
 He bent down over it, trying to wrench the iron loose and track with a spear the kill he could not catch on foot.
 Turnus, truly beside himself with terror—"Faunus!"
 he cried, "I beg you, pity me! You, dear Earth, 900 hold fast to that spear! If I have always kept your rites—a far cry from Aeneas' men who stain your rites with war."

So he appealed,
 calling out for the god's help, and not for nothing.
 Aeneas struggled long, wasting time on the tough stump, 905 no power of his could loose the timber's stubborn bite.
 As he bravely heaves and hauls, the goddess Juturna,<sup>9</sup> changing back again to the charioteer Metiscus, rushes in and returns her brother's sword to Turnus.

6. Hunters used ropes and nets decorated with feathers.

7. A dog breed known for its skill in hunting. (Umbria is a region of northern Italy.)

8. An old Roman god associated with the countryside and forest.

9. A nymph of Italian lakes and springs, sister of Turnus; Jupiter made her immortal after he had an affair with her.

But Venus, incensed that the nymph has had her brazen way, steps up and plucks Aeneas' spear from the clinging root.
 So standing tall, with their arms and fighting hearts refreshed—one who trusted all to his sword, the other looming fiercely with his spear—confronting each other, both men breathless, brace for the war-god's fray.

Now at the same moment
 Jove, the king of mighty Olympus, turns to Juno, gazing down on the war from her golden cloud, and says:
 "Where will it end, my queen? What is left at the last?
 Aeneas the hero, god of the land: you know yourself, you confess you know that he is heaven bound,
 his fate will raise Aeneas to the stars.

What are you plotting? What hope can make you cling to the chilly clouds? So, was it right for a mortal hand to wound, to mortify a god?
 Right to restore that mislaid sword to Turnus—for without your power what could Juturna do?— and lend the defeated strength? Have done at last.
 Bow to my appeals. Don't let your corrosive grief devour you in silence, or let your dire concerns come pouring from your sweet lips and plaguing me forever.
 We have reached the limit. To harass the Trojans over land and sea, to ignite an unspeakable war, degrade a royal house and blend the wedding hymn with the dirge of grief: all that lay in your power.
 But go no further. I forbid you now."

Jove said no more.
 And so, with head bent low, Saturn's daughter replied:
 "Because I have known your will so well, great Jove, against my own I deserted Turnus and the earth.
 Or else you would never see me now, alone on a windswept throne enduring right and wrong.
 No, wrapped in flames I would be up on the front lines, dragging the Trojan into mortal combat. Juturna?
 I was the one, I admit, who spurred her on to help her embattled brother, true, and blessed whatever greater daring it took to save his life, but never to shower arrows, never tense the bow.
 I swear by the unappeasable fountainhead of the Styx,<sup>1</sup>
 the one dread oath decreed for the gods on high.

"So,
 now I yield, Juno yields, and I leave this war I loathe.
 But this—and there is no law of Fate to stop it now—this I beg for Latium, for the glory of your people.
 When, soon, they join in their happy wedding-bonds—and wedded let them be—in pacts of peace at last, never command the Latins, here on native soil,

1. River in the Underworld; oaths sworn by the Styx could not be broken, even by the gods.

to exchange their age-old name, 955 to become Trojans, called the kin of Teucer, alter their language, change their style of dress.
 Let Latium endure. Let Alban kings hold sway for all time.
 Let Roman stock grow strong with Italian strength.
 Troy has fallen—and fallen let her stay— 960 with the very name of Troy!"

Smiling down,
 the creator of man and the wide world returned:
 "Now there's my sister. Saturn's second child—such tides of rage go churning through your heart.
 Come, relax your anger. It started all for nothing. 965
 I grant your wish. I surrender. Freely, gladly too.
 Latium's sons will retain their fathers' words and ways.
 Their name till now is the name that shall endure.
 Mingling in stock alone, the Trojans will subside.
 And I will add the rites and the forms of worship, 970 and make them Latins all, who speak one Latin tongue.
 Mixed with Ausonian<sup>2</sup> blood, one race will spring from them, and you will see them outstrip all men, outstrip all gods in reverence. No nation on earth will match the honors they shower down on you."

Juno nodded assent to this, 975 her spirit reversed to joy. She departs the sky and leaves her cloud behind.

His task accomplished,
 the Father turned his mind to another matter, set to dismiss Juturna from her brother's battles.
 They say there are twin Curses called the Furies . . . 980 Night had born them once in the dead of darkness, one and the same spawn, and birthed infernal Megaera,<sup>3</sup> wreathing all their heads with coiled serpents, fitting them out with wings that race the wind.
 They hover at Jove's throne, crouch at his gates 985 to serve that savage king and whet the fears of afflicted men whenever the king of gods lets loose horrific deaths and plagues or panics towns that deserve the scourge of war.
 Jove sped one of them down the sky, commanding: 990
 "Cross Juturna's path as a wicked omen!"

Down she swoops, hurled to earth by a whirlwind, swift as a darting arrow whipped from a bowstring through the clouds, a shaft armed by a Parthian,<sup>4</sup> tipped with deadly poison, shot by a Parthian 995 or a Cretan archer—well past any cure—hissing on unseen through the rushing dark.

2. Italian.

3. One of the Furies.

4. Parthia (a region in modern-day Iran) was known for its skillful archers.

So raced this daughter of Night and sped to earth.
 Soon as she spots the Trojan ranks and Turnus' lines she quickly shrinks into that small bird that often, 1000 hunched at dusk on deserted tombs and rooftops, sings its ominous song in shadows late at night. Shrunk so, the demon flutters over and over again in Turnus' face, screeching, drumming his shield with its whirring wings.
 An eerie numbness unnerved him head to toe with dread, 1005 his hackles bristled in horror, voice choked in his throat.

Recognizing the Fury's ruffling wings at a distance, wretched Juturna tears her hair, nails clawing her face, fists beating her breast, and cries to her brother:
 "How, Turnus, how can your sister help you now?
 What's left for me now, after all I have endured?
 What skill do I have to lengthen out your life?
 How can I fight against this dreadful omen?
 At last, at last I leave the field of battle.
 Afraid as I am, now frighten me no more, 1015 you obscene birds of night! Too well I know the beat of your wings, the drumbeat of doom.
 Nor do the proud commands of Jove escape me now, our great, warm-hearted Jove. Are these his wages for taking my virginity? Why did he grant me life 1020 eternal—rob me of our one privilege, death?
 Then, for a fact, I now could end this agony, keep my brother company down among the shades.
 Doomed to live forever? Without you, my brother, what do I have still mine that's sweet to taste? 1025
 If only the earth gaped deep enough to take me down, to plunge this goddess into the depths of hell!"

With that,
 shrouding her head with a gray-green veil and moaning low, down to her own stream's bed the goddess sank away.

All hot pursuit, Aeneas brandishes high his spear, 1030 that tree of a spear, and shouts from a savage heart:
 "More delay! Why now? Still in retreat, Turnus, why?
 This is no foot-race. It's savagery, swordplay cut-and-thrust!
 Change yourself into any shape you please, call up whatever courage or skill you still have left. 1035 Pray to wing your way to the starry sky or bury yourself in the earth's deep pits!"

Turnus shakes his head: "I don't fear you, you and your blazing threats, my fierce friend.
 It's the gods that frighten me—Jove, my mortal foe." 1040

No more words. Glancing around he spots a huge rock, huge, ages old, and lying out in the field by chance, placed as a boundary stone to settle border wars.

A dozen picked men could barely shoulder it up, men of such physique as the earth brings forth these days, 1045 but he wrenched it up, hands trembling, tried to heave it right at Aeneas, Turnus stretching to full height, the hero at speed, at peak strength. Yet he's losing touch with himself, racing, hoisting that massive rock in his hands and hurling, true, but his knees buckle, blood's like ice in his veins 1050 and the rock he flings through the air, plummeting under its own weight, cannot cover the space between them, cannot strike full force . . .

Just as in dreams
 when the nightly spell of sleep falls heavy on our eyes and we seem entranced by longing to keep on racing on, 1055 no use, in the midst of one last burst of speed we sink down, consumed, our tongue won't work, and tried and true, the power that filled our body fails—we strain but the voice and words won't follow.
 So with Turnus. Wherever he fought to force his way, 1060 no luck, the merciless Fury blocks his efforts.
 A swirl of thoughts goes racing through his mind,
 he glances toward his own Rutulians and their town, he hangs back in dread, he quakes at death—it's here.
 Where can he run? How can he strike out at the enemy? 1065 Where's his chariot? His charioteer, his sister? Vanished.

As he hangs back, the fatal spear of Aeneas streaks on—spotting a lucky opening he had flung from a distance, all his might and main. Rocks heaved by a catapult pounding city ramparts never storm so loudly, never 1070 such a shattering bolt of thunder crashing forth.
 Like a black whirlwind churning on, that spear flies on with its weight of iron death to pierce the breastplate's lower edge and the outmost rim of the round shield with its seven plies and right 1075 at the thick of Turnus' thigh it whizzes through, it strikes home and the blow drops great Turnus down to the ground, battered down on his bent knees.
 The Rutulians spring up with a groan and the hillsides round groan back and the tall groves far and wide 1080 resound with the long-drawn moan.

Turnus lowered
 his eyes and reached with his right hand and begged, a suppliant: "I deserve it all. No mercy, please," Turnus pleaded. "Seize your moment now. Or if some care for a parent's grief can touch you still, 1085
 I pray you—you had such a father, in old Anchises—pity Daunus in his old age and send me back to my own people, or if you would prefer, send them my dead body stripped of life. Here, the victor and vanquished, I stretch my hands to you, 1090 so the men of Latium have seen me in defeat.

Lavinia is your bride.
Go no further down the road of hatred.”

Aeneas, ferocious in armor, stood there, still, shifting his gaze, and held his sword-arm back, 1095 holding himself back too as Turnus’ words began to sway him more and more . . . when all at once he caught sight of the fateful sword-belt of Pallas,<sup>5</sup> swept over Turnus’ shoulder, gleaming with shining studs Aeneas knew by heart. Young Pallas, whom Turnus had overpowered, 1100 taken down with a wound, and now his shoulder flaunted his enemy’s battle-emblem like a trophy. Aeneas, soon as his eyes drank in that plunder—keepsake of his own savage grief—flaring up in fury, terrible in his rage, he cries: “Decked in the spoils 1105 you stripped from one I loved—escape my clutches? Never—Pallas strikes this blow, Pallas sacrifices you now, makes you pay the price with your own guilty blood!”
In the same breath, blazing with wrath he plants

OVID

43 B.C.E.–17 C.E.

---

Ovid (whose full name was Publius Ovidius Naso) was one of the smartest, most prolific, and most consistently entertaining of the Roman poets. During his long and productive career, he wrote funny, perceptive poems about sex and relationships in contemporary Rome, as well as vivid retellings of ancient myths. His way of telling stories remains extraordinary for its subtlety and its depth of psychological understanding. His work had a massive influence on the poets and artists of the Middle Ages, the Renaissance, and beyond, and it is one of our most important and accessible sources for the rich mythology of ancient Greece and Rome.

LIFE AND TIMES

Ovid was born into an aristocratic (“equestrian”) family, in the provincial Roman town of Sulmo, east of Rome. His father wanted him to become a lawyer, and therefore had him trained in rhetoric. Ovid’s writing shows the influence of rhetorical technique, in its polished, witty style. But Ovid had no real interest in the law. He was a natural poet, and at the age of twenty, to his father’s disappointment and disapproval, he quit his legal training. He held various minor governmental posts, but eventually became a full-time poet, with the financial aid of a rich patron called Messalla. Ovid became part of the literary circles of Rome: he knew the poets Propertius and Horace, and met Virgil, who was some twenty-seven years older.

Ovid married three times; he had been divorced twice before the age of thirty. His third wife seems to have had a daughter by a previous husband, but Ovid had no children of his own. Beyond that, we know little of Ovid’s personal life. He wrote a great deal about extramarital sex, but emphasized that his poetic persona should not be taken as autobiography, declaring, “My Muse is slutty, but my life is chaste.”

Ovid’s work included various collections of poems on mythological topics, such as the Fasti (never finished), on the Roman calendar, and a set of poetic letters, the Heroides, from mythical heroines like Helen of Troy to their boyfriends. But most notorious, in his own time and later, were his two books about sex and relationships: the Amores and the Ars Amatoria. These used the tradition of Roman love elegy, which had begun with Catullus and had been developed by Ovid’s friend Propertius, who evoked the desperate, abject longing of a man for a beloved and unreliable girlfriend. Ovid’s love poetry focuses less on feelings than on behavior, and less on love than on sex, which he treats in a light, knowing tone. He gives, for example, a titillating account of some hot afternoon sex; tells anecdotes about his girlfriend’s bad experiences with hair dye and about her attempted abortion; and offers advice about the best places to go and best lines to use for picking up a date.

All this was guaranteed to irritate the more conservative members of Roman society, who included—unfortunately for Ovid—the emperor, Augustus. Having seized power after winning the battle of Actium (in 31

B.C.E.), at the end of a long civil war, Augustus was eager to impose order on the fragmented society of Rome. A key element in his domestic strategy was to reform the morals and increase the population of the Roman elite, by promoting marriage and traditional family structures. New laws were imposed in 19–18 B.C.E. to encourage married couples to have children, and to punish adultery with exile. In this context, Ovid's Ars Amatoria seems deliberately calculated to enrage the emperor. The poem points up the hypocrisy of Roman sexual mores and suggests that, in fact, having lots of extramarital sex is far more traditional than Augustan family values, since the Romans have been doing it ever since the foundation of the city: it was through the rape of the Sabine women that the male inhabitants of the new city acquired wives and were able to supply Rome with future citizens.

Ovid seems to have gotten himself into even worse trouble by what he calls a mistake. We do not know exactly what happened; Ovid suggests that he saw something he should not have seen, perhaps involving the emperor's daughter, Julia, who was having an adulterous affair. Combined with the Ars Amatoria and Ovid's generally provocative stance toward Augustus, this mistake was the last straw; in 8 C.E., the emperor—acting, unusually, on his own initiative, without input from the Senate—condemned Ovid to permanent exile from Rome to Tomis, a remote town on the Black Sea, in modern Romania. He lived out the remaining eight years of his life in grim isolation, far from family and friends, in a cold, bleak place where, he claims, nobody even spoke Latin. Ovid wrote a series of poems from exile, mostly letters bemoaning his sufferings and pleading—to friends, family, acquaintances, the general public, and to the emperor himself—to be forgiven and to be allowed back home. All were unsuccessful; Ovid died in Tomis, alone and unforgiven.

METAMORPHOSES

At the time of his exile in 8 C.E., Ovid was finishing his greatest work, the Metamorphoses (Greek for “changes”). It is less obviously provocative than Ovid's love poetry, but it, too, provides a radical challenge both to Augustan moral and political values and to traditional poetic norms. Virgil had written what Augustus wanted to be the official epic of the new order. For all its innovations, the Aeneid focused on the deeds of a single hero, and it treated its culture's dominant values (such as duty, imperial power, and military honor) with respect. The Metamorphoses is recognizably epic; it is the only poem Ovid wrote in the epic meter, dactylic hexameter. But it can be seen as a critical response to Virgil, even an anti-Aeneid. Ovid produced a series of miniature stories strung together into a long narrative of fifteen books. The transitions between them, and the connections drawn by the narrator, are often transparently contrived—perhaps in mockery of the idea of narrative unity. There is no single hero, and no moral values are presented without irony. There is, however, an element common to these stories: change; and despite its leisurely and roundabout course, the narrative has a discernible direction—as Ovid says in his introduction, “from the world's beginning to the present day.” Starting with the creation of the world, the transformation of matter into living bodies (the first great metamorphosis), Ovid tells of human beings changed into animals, flowers, and trees. He proceeds through Greek myth to stories of early Rome and so to his own time, culminating in the ascension of the murdered Julius Caesar to the heavens in the form of a star and the divine promise that Augustus too, far in the future, will become a god; it is tempting to speculate that Ovid hoped—vainly—to improve his relationship with the emperor by means of these few lines. The last change of all is that of Ovid himself, who will, he declares, be transformed from a mortal man into his own immortal poem.

Change underlies both the narrative style and the vision of the world the poem projects. Virgil also told of a transformation, the new (Roman) order arising from the ruins of the old (Troy). But once the transformation was completed by the Augustan order, there was to be stability, permanence. Ovid tells of a world ceaselessly coming to be in a process that never ends. Augustan Rome is not the culminating point of history here, as it was in the Aeneid; indeed, the whole idea of a historical end or goal seems, in the Metamorphoses, impossible and absurd. Ovid's epic without a hero presents shifting perspectives and offers the reader no single point of view from which to judge his complex narratives. Against the forced imposition of political and moral unity he sets change itself.

Change is also central to the narrative manner of the Metamorphoses. Ovid constantly shifts his point of view, telling a story first from one character's perspective, and then from another's. One story is embedded in another, so that one narrative voice is piled on top of another, as when Venus tells Adonis the story of Atalanta. This story is set within the tale of Venus's love for Adonis and of his death, which is one of a series of stories sung by Orpheus in the poem's main narrative. In such cases, the immediate and the larger contexts give the same story different shades of meaning. And there are thematic connections between stories, so that motifs and images also change their meaning from one story to another, or over the course of a single story. Daphne and Syrinx are turned into plants (the laurel and the reed) that are henceforth attributes of the gods who tried to rape them, a form of appropriation that substitutes for sexual violence.

A common element of many stories in books I and II is the lust of male gods for female humans. On one level, the gods' desire is presented as ridiculous: when Jupiter turns himself into a bull, the narrator comments, "Majestic power and erotic love / do not get on together very well." But these stories are also focused on rape, and, at least some of the time, the narrator shows the terror and suffering of the human victim. These stories of rape may have political implications, for rape is the ultimate imposition of control. When powerful gods force themselves on defenseless women, the reader is invited to remember how easily authority can be abused.

But male gods are not the only sexual agents in the poem: women and goddesses, too, can be overwhelmed by desire, and can themselves become sexual predators. The stories selected here from later in the Metamorphoses bring out the complexity of Ovid's presentation of gender and sexuality. The story of Iphis and Ianthe suggests that social gender roles for women and men are more or less arbitrary: girls usually look different from boys, but their feelings may be exactly the same. That story has a happy ending, but the tales from book X show various ways in which desire causes pain, distorts our perceptions, and ends in disaster. The tale of Pygmalion may seem an exception, but we should remember that it begins with the artist's hatred of women for their loose morals, and that the story as a whole, whatever it may say about the power of art, can also be read as a fable of man's fabrication of woman—her person and her functions—according to his desires. These stories are narrated by Orpheus, the archetypal poet, after his failure to bring Eurydice back from the underworld. The pathology of desire is fundamental to Ovid's poem, since the lover hopes to stop time, to achieve permanent possession of the beloved; but all these stories show us how impossible such a dream is. The girl is always running from the god; the boy is always running from the goddess; Orpheus's wife cannot be brought back from the land of the dead. Reaching for the body of another, the lover's own body is transformed. The closest any of these characters can get to permanence is to be transformed into a growing (living, changing) plant that will always represent their unfulfilled longings.

FROM BOOK I

[Proem]

My mind leads me to speak now of forms changed into new bodies: O gods above, inspire this undertaking (which you've changed as well) and guide my poem in its epic sweep from the world's beginning to the present day.

5

[The Creation]

Before the seas and lands had been created, before the sky that covers everything, Nature displayed a single aspect only throughout the cosmos; Chaos was its name, a shapeless, unwrought mass of inert bulk and nothing more, with the discordant seeds of disconnected elements all heaped together in anarchic disarray.

10

The sun as yet did not light up the earth, nor did the crescent moon renew her horns, nor was the earth suspended in midair, balanced by her own weight, nor did the ocean extend her arms to the margins of the land.

15

Although the land and sea and air were present, land was unstable, the sea unfit for swimming,
and air lacked light; shapes shifted constantly,
and all things were at odds with one another,
for in a single mass cold strove with warm, wet was opposed to dry and soft to hard,
and weightlessness to matter having weight.

20

25

Some god (or kinder nature) settled this dispute by separating earth from heaven, and then by separating sea from earth

1. Translated by Charles Martin.

and fluid aether<sup>2</sup> from the denser air;
 and after these were separated out 30 and liberated from the primal heap, he bound the disentangled elements each in its place and all in harmony.

The fiery and weightless aether leapt to heaven's vault and claimed its citadel; 35
 the next in lightness to be placed was air;
 the denser earth drew down gross elements and was compressed by its own gravity; encircling water lastly found its place, encompassing the solid earth entire.<sup>3</sup> 40

Now when that god (whichever one it was) had given Chaos form, dividing it in parts which he arranged, he molded earth into the shape of an enormous globe, so that it should be uniform throughout. 45

And afterward he sent the waters streaming in all directions, ordered waves to swell under the sweeping winds, and sent the flood to form new shores on the surrounded earth;
 he added springs, great standing swamps and lakes, 50 as well as sloping rivers fixed between their narrow banks, whose plunging waters (all in varied places, each in its own channel) are partly taken back into the earth and in part flow until they reach the sea, 55 when they—received into the larger field of a freer flood—beat against shores, not banks.
 He ordered open plains to spread themselves, valleys to sink, the stony peaks to rise, and forests to put on their coats of green. 60

And as the vault of heaven is divided by two zones on the right and two on the left, with a central zone, much hotter, in between,
 so, by the care of this creator god,
 the mass that was enclosed now by the sky 65 was zoned in the same way, with the same lines inscribed upon the surface of the earth.
 Heat makes the middle zone unlivable, and the two outer zones are deep in snow;
 between these two extremes, he placed two others 70 of temperate climate, blending cold and warmth.<sup>4</sup>

2. A region of refined air, fiery in nature, believed to be above the "denser air" that was closer to the earth and composed the breathable atmosphere.

3. From Homer on, the ancients conceived of Ocean as a stream that surrounded the earth.

4. The sky, that is, is divided into five horizontal zones, and therefore so is the earth beneath it. On either side of the earth's uninhabitable torrid region, over which the sun passes, lies a temperate zone, and the northern one contains the inhabited, civilized lands on earth (ancient writers were vague about what the southern temperate zone contained). The two outermost zones, farthest from the sun, were too cold to live in.

Air was suspended over all of this, proportionately heavier than aether, as earth is heavier than water is.

He ordered mists and clouds into position, and thunder, to make test of our resolve,<sup>5</sup> and winds creating thunderbolts and lightning.

75

Nor did that world-creating god permit the winds to roam ungoverned through the air;
for even now, with each of them in charge of his own kingdom, and their blasts controlled, they scarcely can be kept from shattering the world, such is the discord between brothers.

80

Eurus<sup>6</sup> went eastward, to the lands of Dawn, the kingdoms of Arabia and Persia, and to the mountain peaks that lie below the morning's rays; and Zephyr took his place on the western shores warmed by the setting sun.
The frozen north and Scythia were seized by bristling Boreas; the lands opposite, continually drenched by fog and rain, are where the south wind, known as Auster, dwells.
Above these winds, he set the weightless aether,
a liquid free of every earthly toxin.

85

90

No sooner had he separated all within defining limits, when the stars, which formerly had been concealed in darkness, began to blaze up all throughout the heavens;
and so that every region of the world should have its own distinctive forms of life, the constellations and the shapes of gods occupied the lower part of heaven;
the seas gave shelter to the shining fishes, earth received beasts, and flighty air, the birds.

An animal more like the gods than these, more intellectually capable and able to control the other beasts, had not as yet appeared: now man was born, either because the framer of all things,
the fabricator of this better world, created man out of his own divine substance—or else because Prometheus<sup>7</sup> took up a clod (so lately broken off from lofty aether that it still contained some elements in common with its kin), and mixing it with water, molded it into the shape of gods, who govern all.

lean forward and look down toward the ground, he gave to man a face that is uplifted, 120 and ordered him to stand erect and look directly up into the vaulted heavens and turn his countenance to meet the stars;
 the earth, that was so lately rude and formless, was changed by taking on the shapes of men. 125

[Apollo and Daphne]

Daphne,<sup>8</sup> the daughter of the river god Peneus, was the first love of Apollo; this happened not by chance, but by the cruel 630 outrage of Cupid; Phoebus, in the triumph of his great victory against the Python,<sup>9</sup> observed him bending back his bow and said, “What are you doing with such manly arms, lascivious boy? That bow befits our brawn,<sup>1</sup> 635 wherewith we deal out wounds to savage beasts and other mortal foes, unerringly:
 just now with our innumerable arrows we managed to lay low the mighty Python, whose pestilential belly covered acres! 640 Content yourself with kindling love affairs with your wee torch—and don’t claim our glory!”

The son of Venus<sup>2</sup> answered him with this:
 “Your arrow, Phoebus, may strike everything:
 mine will strike you: as animals to gods, 645 your glory is so much the less than mine!”

He spoke, and soaring upward through the air on wings that thundered, in no time at all had landed on Parnassus<sup>3</sup> shaded height; and from his quiver drew two arrows out 650 which operated at cross-purposes, for one engendered flight, the other, love;
 the latter has a polished tip of gold,
 the former has a tip of dull, blunt lead;
 with this one, Cupid struck Peneus’ daughter, while the other pierced Apollo to his marrow. 655

One is in love now, and the other one won’t hear of it, for Daphne calls it joy to roam within the forest’s deep seclusion, where she, in emulation of the chaste 660 goddess Phoebe,<sup>4</sup> devotes herself to hunting;

one ribbon only bound her straying tresses.

Many men sought her, but she spurned her suitors, loath to have anything to do with men, and rambled through the wild and trackless groves untroubled by a thought for love or marriage.

665

Often her father said, "You owe it to me, child, to provide me with a son-in-law and grandchildren!"

"Let me remain a virgin, father most dear," she said, "as once before Diana's father, Jove, gave her that gift."

670

Although Peneus yielded to you, Daphne, your beauty kept your wish from coming true,
your comeliness conflicting with your vow:
at first sight, Phoebus loves her and desires to sleep with her; desire turns to hope, and his own prophecy deceives the god.

675

Now just as in a field the harvest stubble is all burned off, or as hedges are set ablaze when, if by chance, some careless traveler should brush one with his torch or toss away the still-smoldering brand at break of day—just so the smitten god went up in flames until his heart was utterly afire, and hope sustained his unrequited passion.

680

He gazes on her hair without adornment:
"What if it were done up a bit?" he asks,
and gazes on her eyes, as bright as stars,
and on that darling little mouth of hers, though sight is not enough to satisfy; he praises everything that he can see—her fingers, hands, and arms, bare to her shoulders—and what is hidden prizes even more.

685

She flees more swiftly than the lightest breeze, nor will she halt when he calls out to her:

695

"Daughter of Peneus, I pray, hold still, hold still! I'm not a foe in grim pursuit!
Thus lamb flees wolf, thus dove from eagle flies on trembling wings, thus deer from lioness, thus any creature flees its enemy,
but I am stalking you because of love!

700

"Wretch that I am: I'm fearful that you'll fall, brambles will tear your flesh because of me!
The ground you're racing over's very rocky,
slow down, I beg you, restrain yourself in flight, and I will follow at a lesser speed.

705

"Just ask yourself who finds you so attractive!
I'm not a caveman, not some shepherd boy, no shaggy guardian of flocks and herds—you've no idea, rash girl, you've no idea whom you are fleeing, that is why you flee!

710

“Delphi, Claros, Tenedos are all mine,
 I’m worshiped in the city of Patara!<sup>5</sup> Jove is my father, I alone reveal what was, what is, and what will come to be!
 The plucked strings answer my demand with song!

“Although my aim is sure, another’s arrow proved even more so, and my careless heart was badly wounded—the art of medicine is my invention, by the way, the source of my worldwide fame as a practitioner of healing through the natural strength of herbs.

720

“Alas, there is no herbal remedy for the love that I must suffer, and the arts that heal all others cannot heal their lord—”

725

He had much more to say to her, but Daphne pursued her fearful course and left him speechless, though no less lovely fleeing him; indeed, disheveled by the wind that bared her limbs and pressed the blown robes to her straining body even as it whipped up her hair behind her,
 the maiden was more beautiful in flight!

730

But the young god had no further interest in wasting his fine words on her; admonished by his own passion, he accelerates, and runs as swiftly as a Gallic hound<sup>6</sup> chasing a rabbit through an open field;
 the one seeks shelter and the other, prey—he clings to her, is just about to spring, with his long muzzle straining at her heels, while she, not knowing whether she’s been caught,
 in one swift burst, eludes those snapping jaws,
 no longer the anticipated feast;
 so he in hope and she in terror race.

735

But her pursuer, driven by his passion, outspeeds the girl, giving her no pause,
 one step behind her, breathing down her neck;
 her strength is gone; she blanches at the thought of the effort of her swift flight overcome, but at the sight of Peneus, she cries, “Help me, dear father! If your waters hold divinity, transform me and destroy that beauty by which I have too well pleased!”

740

745

Her prayer was scarcely finished when she feels a torpor take possession of her limbs—her supple trunk is girdled with a thin layer of fine bark over her smooth skin;
 her hair turns into foliage, her arms grow into branches, sluggish roots adhere to feet that were so recently so swift,

her head becomes the summit of a tree;
all that remains of her is a warm glow.

Loving her still, the god puts his right hand against the trunk, and even now can feel her heart as it beats under the new bark; 765 he hugs her limbs as if they were still human,
and then he puts his lips against the wood,
which, even now, is adverse to his kiss.

“Although you cannot be my bride,” he says,
“you will assuredly be my own tree, 770
O Laurel, and will always find yourself girding my locks, my lyre, and my quiver too—you will adorn great Roman generals when every voice cries out in joyful triumph along the route up to the Capitol; 775 you will protect the portals of Augustus, guarding, on either side, his crown of oak;<sup>7</sup> and as I am—perpetually youthful, my flowing locks unknown to the barber’s shears—so you will be an evergreen forever 780 bearing your brilliant foliage with glory!”

Phoebus concluded. Laurel shook her branches and seemed to nod her summit in assent.

[ Jove and Io ]

There is a grove in Thessaly,<sup>8</sup> enclosed on every side by high and wooded hills: 785 they call it Tempe. The river Peneus, which rises deep within the Pindus range, pours its turbulent waters through this gorge and over a cataract that deafens all its neighbors far and near, creating clouds 790 that drive a fine, cool mist along, until it drips down through the summits of the trees.

Here is the house, the seat, the inner chambers of the great river; here Peneus holds court in his rocky cavern and lays down the law 795 to water nymphs and tributary streams.

First to assemble were the native rivers, uncertain whether to congratulate,
or to commiserate with Daphne’s father:
the Sperchios, whose banks are lined with poplars, 800
the ancient Apidanus and the mild Aeas and Amprysus; others came later—rivers who, by whatever course they take,

eventually bring their flowing streams, weary of their meandering, to sea.

805

Inachus<sup>9</sup> was the only river absent, concealed in the recesses of his cave:
he added to his volume with the tears he grimly wept for his lost daughter Io, not knowing whether she still lived or not;
but since he couldn't find her anywhere, assumed that she was nowhere to be found—and in his heart, he feared a fate far worse.

810

For Jupiter had seen the girl returning from her father's banks and had accosted her:
"O maiden worthy of almighty Jove and destined to delight some lucky fellow (I know not whom) upon your wedding night, come find some shade," he said, "in these deep woods—" (showing her where the woods were very shady)
"while the sun blazes high above the earth!"

820

"But if you're worried about entering the haunts of savage beasts all by yourself, why, under the protection of a god you will be safe within the deepest woods—and no plebeian god, for I am he who bears the celestial scepter in his hand, I am he who hurls the roaming thunderbolt—don't run from me!"

825

But run she did, through Lerna and Lyrcea,<sup>1</sup> until the god concealed the land entirely beneath a dense dark mist and seized her and dishonored her.

830

Juno,<sup>2</sup> however, happened to look down on Argos, where she noticed something odd:
swift-flying clouds had turned day into night long before nighttime. She realized that neither falling mist nor rising fog could be the cause of this phenomenon, and looked about at once to find her husband, as one too well aware of the connivings of a mate so often taken in the act.

835

840

When he could not be found above, she said,
"Either I'm mad—or I am being had."
She glided down to earth from heaven's summit immediately and dispersed the clouds.

845

Having intuited his wife's approach, Jove had already metamorphosed Io into a gleaming heifer—a beauty still, even as a cow. Despite herself,

2. Wife of Jupiter (Hera in Greek).

Juno gave this illusion her approval, 850 and feigning ignorance, asked him whose herd this heifer had come out of, and where from; Jove, lying to forestall all inquiries as to her origin and pedigree, replied that she was born out of the earth. 855
 Then Juno asked him for her as a gift.

What could he do? Here is his beloved:
 to hand her over is unnatural,
 but not to do so would arouse suspicion;
 shame urged him onward while love held him back. 860 Love surely would have triumphed over shame, except that to deny so slight a gift to one who was his wife and sister both would make it seem that this was no mere cow!

Her rival given up to her at last, 865
 Juno feared Jove had more such tricks in mind, and couldn't feel entirely secure until she'd placed this heifer in the care of Argus, the watchman with a hundred eyes:
 in strict rotation, his eyes slept in pairs, 870
 while those that were not sleeping stayed on guard.
 No matter where he stood, he looked at Io, even when he had turned his back on her.

He let her graze in daylight; when the sun set far beneath the earth, he penned her in 875 and placed a collar on her indignant neck.
 She fed on leaves from trees and bitter grasses, and had no bed to sleep on, the poor thing, but lay upon the ground, not always grassy,
 and drank the muddy waters from the streams. 880

Having no arms, she could not stretch them out in supplication to her warden, Argus; and when she tried to utter a complaint she only mooed—a sound which terrified her, fearful as she now was of her own voice. 885

Io at last came to the riverbank where she had often played; when she beheld her own slack jaws and newly sprouted horns in the clear water, she fled, terrified!

Neither her naiad sisters<sup>3</sup> nor her father 890 knew who this heifer was who followed them and let herself be petted and admired.
 Inachus fed her grasses from his hand;
 she licked it and pressed kisses on his palm, unable to restrain her flowing tears. 895

If words would just have come, she would have spoken, telling them who she was, how this had happened, and begging their assistance in her case;

but with her hoof, she drew lines in the dust, and letters of the words she could not speak 900 told the sad story of her transformation.

"Oh, wretched me," cried Io's father, clinging to the lowing calf's horns and snowy neck.
"Oh, wretched me!" he groaned. "Are you the child for whom I searched the earth in every part? 905 Lost, you were less a grief than you are, found!

"You make no answer, unable to respond to our speech in language of your own, but from your breast come resonant deep sighs and—all that you can manage now—you moo! 910

"But I—all unaware of this—was busy arranging marriage for you, in the hopes of having a son-in-law and grandchildren.
Now I must pick your husband from my herd, and now must find your offspring there as well! 915

"Nor can I end this suffering by death;
it is a hurtful thing to be a god,
for the gates of death are firmly closed against me,
and our sorrows must go on forever."

And while the father mourned his daughter's loss, 920 Argus of the hundred eyes removed her to pastures farther off and placed himself high on a mountain peak, a vantage point from which he could keep watch in all directions.

The ruler of the heavens cannot bear 925
the sufferings of Io any longer, and calls his son, born of the Pleiades,<sup>4</sup>
and orders him to do away with Argus.

Without delay, he takes his winged sandals, his magic, sleep-inducing wand, and cap; 930 and so equipped, the son of father Jove glides down from heaven's summit to the earth, where he removes and leaves behind his cap and winged sandals, but retains the wand; and sets out as a shepherd, wandering 935 far from the beaten path, driving before him a flock of goats he rounds up as he goes, while playing tunes upon his pipe of reeds.

The guardian of Juno is quite taken by this new sound: "Whoever you might be, 940 why not come sit with me upon this rock," said Argus, "for that flock of yours will find the grass is nowhere greener, and you see that there is shade here suitable for shepherds."

The grandson of great Atlas takes his seat 945

4. Mercury (Hermes in Greek) was the son of Maia, one of the Pleiades or daughters of Atlas. They were changed into stars when the hunter Orion was pursuing them along with their mother Pleione, whom he wanted to rape.

and whiles away the hours, chattering of this and that—and playing on his pipes, he tries to overcome the watchfulness of Argus, struggling to stay awake; even though Slumber closes down some eyes, 950 others stay vigilant. Argus inquired how the reed pipes, so recently invented, had come to be, and Mercury responded:

“On the idyllic mountains of Arcadia,<sup>5</sup> among the hamadryads<sup>6</sup> of Nonacris, 955 one was renowned, and Syrinx<sup>7</sup> was her name.
 Often she fled—successfully—from Satyrs,<sup>8</sup> and deities of every kind as well, those of the shady wood and fruited plain.

“In her pursuits and in virginity 960 Diana was her model, and she wore her robe hitched up and girt above the knees just as her goddess did; and if her bow had been made out of gold, instead of horn, anyone seeing her might well have thought 965
 she was the goddess—as, indeed, some did.

“Wearing his crown of sharp pine needles, Pan<sup>9</sup> saw her returning once from Mount Lycaeus,<sup>1</sup> and began to say. . . .”

There remained to tell of how the maiden, having spurned his pleas, 970 fled through the trackless wilds until she came to where the gently flowing Ladon stopped her in her flight; how she begged the water nymphs to change her shape, and how the god, assuming that he had captured Syrinx, grasped instead 975 a handful of marsh reeds! And while he sighed, the reeds in his hands, stirred by his own breath, gave forth a similar, low-pitched complaint!

The god, much taken by the sweet new voice of an unprecedented instrument, 980 said this to her: “At least we may converse with one another—I can have that much.”

That pipe of reeds, unequal in their lengths, and joined together one-on-one with wax, took the girl’s name, and bears it to this day. 985

Now Mercury was ready to continue until he saw that Argus had succumbed, for all his eyes had been closed down by sleep.
 He silences himself and waves his wand

6. Tree nymphs.

7. The name means “shepherd’s pipe,” a musical instrument made of reeds.

8. Woodland creatures—half man, half goat, above those languid orbs to fix the spell. 990

Without delay he grasps the nodding head and where it joins the neck, he severs it with his curved blade and flings it bleeding down the steep rock face, staining it with gore.

O Argus, you are fallen, and the light 995 in all your lamps is utterly put out:
one hundred eyes, one darkness all the same!

But Saturn's daughter<sup>2</sup> rescued them and set those eyes upon the feathers of her bird,<sup>3</sup> filling his tail with constellated gems. 1000

Her rage demanded satisfaction, now:
the goddess set a horrifying Fury before the eyes and the imagination of her Grecian rival; and in her heart she fixed a prod that goaded Io on, 1005 driving her in terror through the world until at last, O Nile, you let her rest from endless labor; having reached your banks, she went down awkwardly upon her knees, and with her neck bent backward, raised her face 1010
as only she could do it, to the stars;
and with her groans and tears and mournful mooing, entreated Jove, it seemed, to put an end to her great suffering.

Jove threw his arms around the neck of Juno in embrace, 1015 imploping her to end this punishment:
"In future," he said, "put your fears aside:
never again will you have cause to worry—about this one." And swore upon the Styx.<sup>4</sup>

The goddess was now pacified, and Io 1020 at once began regaining her lost looks, till she became what she had been before;
her body lost all of its bristling hair,
her horns shrank down, her eyes grew narrower, her jaws contracted, arms and hands returned, 1025 and hooves divided themselves into nails;
nothing remained of her bovine nature,
unless it was the whiteness of her body.
She had some trouble getting her legs back, and for a time feared speaking, lest she moo, 1030 and so quite timidly regained her speech.

She is a celebrated goddess now, and worshiped by the linen-clad Egyptians.<sup>5</sup> Her son, Epaphus, is believed to be sprung from the potent seed of mighty Jove, 1035

FROM BOOK II

[Jove and Europa]

When Mercury had punished her for these impieties of thought and word,<sup>6</sup> he left Athena's city, and on beating wings 1145 returned to heaven where his father Jove took him aside and (without telling him that his new passion was the reason) said:

"Dear son, who does my bidding faithfully, do not delay, but with your usual 1150 swiftness fly down to earth and find the land that looks up to your mother<sup>7</sup> on the left, called Sidon<sup>8</sup> by the natives; there you will see a herd of royal cattle some way off upon a mountain; drive them down to shore." 1155

He spoke and it was done as he had ordered:
the cattle were immediately driven down to a certain place along the shore where the daughter of a great king used to play, accompanied by maidens all of Tyre.<sup>9</sup> 1160

Majestic power and erotic love do not get on together very well, nor do they linger long in the same place:
the father and the ruler of all gods, who holds the lightning bolt in his right hand 1165 and shakes the world when he but nods his head, now relinquishes authority and power, assuming the appearance of a bull to mingle with the other cattle, lowing as gorgeously he strolls in the new grass. 1170

He is as white as the untrampled snow before the south wind turns it into slush.
The muscles stand out bulging on his neck, and the dewlap<sup>1</sup> dangles on his ample chest;
his horns are crooked, but appear handmade, 1175 and flawless as a pair of matching gems.
His brow is quite unthreatening, his eye constellation Taurus.

excites no terror, and his countenance is calm.

The daughter of King Agenor<sup>2</sup> admires him, astonished by the presence of peacefulness and beauty in the beast; 1180 yet even though he seems a gentle creature, at first she fears to get too close to him, but soon approaching, reaches out her hand and pushes flowers into his white mouth. 1185

The lover, quite beside himself, rejoices, and as a preview of delights to come, kisses her fingers, getting so excited that he can scarcely keep from doing it!

Now he disports himself upon the grass, 1190 and lays his whiteness on the yellow sands;
and as she slowly overcomes her fear he offers up his breast for her caresses and lets her decorate his horns with flowers;
the princess dares to sit upon his back 1195 not knowing who it is that she has mounted, and he begins to set out from dry land,
a few steps on false feet into the shallows, then further out and further to the middle of the great sea he carries off his booty; 1200 she trembles as she sees the shore receding and holds the creature's horn in her right hand and with the other clings to his broad back, her garments streaming in the wind behind her.

FROM BOOK V

[Ceres and Proserpina]

As the Muse spoke,<sup>3</sup> Minerva could hear wings beating on air, and cries of greeting came from high in the trees. She peered into the foliage, 430 attempting to discover where those sounds, the speech of human beings to be sure,
were emanating from: why, from some birds!
Bewailing their sad fate, a flock of nine magpies (which mimic anyone they wish to) 435 had settled in the branches overhead.

Minerva having shown astonishment,
the Muse gave her a little goddess-chat:
"This lot has only recently been added to the throngs of birds. Why? They lost a contest! 440

2. Europa. Agenor was the Phoenician king.
3. Minerva (Athena in Greek) has come to Mount Helicon in central Greece, the home of the nine Muses (daughters of Zeus and Memory, they are patronesses of poetry and the other arts). One of the Muses has told her of an attempt recently made to trap and rape them by the wicked Pyreneus.

Their father was Pierus, lord of Pella,<sup>4</sup> their mother was Evippe of Paeonia; nine times she called upon Lucina's<sup>5</sup> aid and nine times she delivered. Swollen up with foolish pride because they were so many, 445 that crowd of simpleminded sisters went through all Haemonia and through Achaea<sup>6</sup> too, arriving here to challenge us in song:
 "We'll show you girls just what real class is<sup>7</sup>
 Give up tryin' to deceive the masses 450
 Your rhymes are fake: accept our wager
 Learn which of us is minor and which is major There's nine of us here and there's nine of you And you'll be nowhere long before we're through Nothin's gonna save you 'cuz your songs are lame 455
 And the way you sing 'em is really a shame
 So stop with, "Well I never!" and "This can't be real!"
 We're the newest New Thing and here is our deal
 If we beat you, obsolete you, then you just get gone
 From these classy haunts on Mount Helicon 460
 We give you Macedonia—if we lose
 An' that's an offer you just can't refuse
 So take the wings off, sisters, get down and jam
 And let the nymphs be the judges of our poetry slam!"
 "Shameful it was to strive against such creatures; 465 more shameful not to. Nymphs were picked as judges, sworn into service on their river banks, and took their seats on benches made of tufa.
 "And then—not even drawing lots!—the one who claimed to be their champion commenced; 470 she sang of war between the gods and Giants, giving the latter credit more than due and deprecating all that the great gods did;
 how Typhoeus,<sup>8</sup> from earth's lowest depths, struck fear in every celestial heart, 475 so that they all turned tail and fled, until, exhausted, they found refuge down in Egypt,
 where the Nile flows from seven distinct mouths;
 she sang of how earthborn Typhoeus pursued them even here and forced the gods 480 to hide themselves by taking fictive shapes:<sup>9</sup>
 "In Libya the Giants told the gods to scam

 “And then her song, accompanied on the lute, came to an end, and it was our turn—but possibly you haven’t got the time to listen to our song?”

“Oh, don’t think that,” Minerva said. “I want it word for word: 500 sing it for me just as you sang it then.”

The Muse replied: “We turned the contest over to one of us, Calliope,<sup>3</sup> who rose, and after binding up her hair in ivy and lightly strumming a few plaintive chords, 505 she vigorously launched into her song:

“‘Ceres<sup>4</sup> was first to break up the soil with a curved plowshare, the first to give us the earth’s fruits and to nourish us gently, and the first to give laws: every gift comes from Ceres.
 The goddess must now be my subject. Would that I could sing 510 a hymn that is worthy of her, for she surely deserves it.
 “‘Vigorous Sicily sprawled across the gigantic body of one who had dared aspire to rule in the heavens;
 the island’s weight held Typhoeus firmly beneath it.
 Often exerting himself, he strives yet again to rise up, 515 but there in the north, his right hand is held down by Pelorus, his left hand by you, Pachynus; off in the west, Lilybaeum<sup>5</sup> weighs on his legs, while Mount Etna<sup>6</sup> presses his head, as under it, raging Typhoeus coughs ashes and vomits up fire.
 Often he struggles, attempting to shake off the earth’s weight 520 and roll its cities and mountains away from his body.

 who fears that the earth’s crust will crack and break open,

1. Ammon, the chief Egyptian god, identified by the Greeks and Romans with Zeus/Jupiter. He had an important oracular cult in the Libyan desert (west of the Nile valley and part of Egypt under Roman rule).

2. Apollo, who was born on the island of Delos.

3. “Lovely Voice,” the Muse of epic poetry.

4. Goddess of grain (Demeter).

5. Mountains on the northeast, southeast, and western promontories of Sicily, respectively.

6. The large (and still active) volcano near the center of the east coast of Sicily.

7. Pluto or Hades, king of the dead.

dreading disaster, the tyrant left his tenebrous kingdom; borne in his chariot drawn by its team of black horses, he crisscrossed Sicily, checking the island's foundation. 525

"After his explorations had left him persuaded that none of its parts were in imminent danger of falling, his fears were forgotten, and Venus, there on Mount Eryx,<sup>8</sup> observed him relaxing, and said, as she drew Cupid near her, 530
"My son, my sword, my strong right arm and source of my power, take up that weapon by which all your victims are vanquished and send your swift arrows into the breast of the deity to whom the last part of the threefold realm<sup>9</sup> was allotted. 535

"You govern the gods and their ruler; you rule the defeated gods of the ocean and govern the one who rules them, too; why give up on the dead, when we can extend our empire into their realm? A third part of the world is involved here!
And yet the celestial gods spurn our forbearance, 540 and the prestige of Love is diminished, even as mine is.
Do you not see how Athena and huntress Diana have both taken leave of me?<sup>1</sup> The virgin daughter of Ceres desires to do likewise—and will, if we let her!
But if you take pride in our alliance, advance it 545 by joining her to her uncle!"<sup>2</sup>

"Venus ceased speaking and Cupid loosened his quiver, and, just as his mother had ordered, selected, from thousands of missiles, the one that was sharpest and surest and paid his bow the closest attention, and using one knee to bend its horn back almost double, 550 he pierces the heart of Dis with his barb-tipped arrow.

"Near Henna's<sup>3</sup> walls stands a deep pool of water, called Pergus: not even the river Cayster,<sup>4</sup> flowing serenely, hears more songs from its swans; this pool is completely surrounded by a ring of tall trees, whose foliage, just like an awning, 555 keeps out the sun and preserves the water's refreshing coolness;
the moist ground is covered with flowers of Tyrian purple;
here it is springtime forever. And here Proserpina was playfully picking its white lilies and violets, and, while competing to gather up more than her playmates, 560 filling her basket and stuffing the rest in her bosom, Dis saw her, was smitten, seized her and carried her off; his love was that hasty. The terrified goddess cried out for her mother, her playmates—but for her mother most often, since she had torn the uppermost seam of her garment, 565 and the gathered flowers rained down from her negligent tunic;
because of her tender years and her childish simplicity, even this loss could move her to maidenly sorrow.

8. Mountain in western Sicily with an important cult of Venus.

9. The underworld, ruled by Pluto. The other parts of the "threefold realm" are the sea (ruled by Neptune) and the sky or Mount Olympus (Jupiter).

1. Both were perpetual virgins.

2. Pluto (also called Dis) was the brother of Jupiter, the father by Ceres of Proserpina.

3. A city in central Sicily.

4. River in Lydia in Asia Minor, famous for its many swans.

“Her abductor rushed off in his chariot, urging his horses, calling each one by its name and flicking the somber, 570 rust-colored reins over their backs as they galloped through the deep lakes and the sulphurous pools of Palike that boil up through the ruptured earth, and where the Bacchiadae, a race sprung from Corinth, that city between the two seas, had raised their own walls between two unequal harbors.<sup>5</sup> 575

“There is a bay that is landlocked almost completely between the two pools of Cyane and Pisaean Arethusa, the residence of the most famous nymph in all Sicily, Cyane, who gave her very own name to the fountain.
 She showed herself now, emerged from her pool at waist level, 580 and recognizing the goddess, told Dis, “Go no further!
 You cannot become the son-in-law of great Ceres against her will: you should have asked and not taken!
 If it is right for me to compare lesser with greater,
 I accepted Anapis<sup>6</sup> when he desired to have me, 585 yielding to pleas and not—as in this case—to terror.”
 She spoke, and stretching her arms out in either direction, kept him from passing. That son of Saturn could scarcely hold back his anger; he urged on his frightening horses, and then, with his strong right arm, he hurled his scepter 590 directly into the very base of the fountain;
 the stricken earth opened a path to the underworld and took in the chariot rushing down into its crater.

“Cyane, lamenting not just the goddess abducted, but also the disrespect shown for her rights as a fountain, 595 tacitly nursed in her heart an inconsolable sorrow;
 and she who had once been its presiding spirit, reduced to tears, dissolved right into its substance.
 You would have seen her members beginning to soften, her bones and her fingertips starting to lose their old firmness; 600 her slenderest parts were the first to be turned into fluid:
 her feet, her legs, her sea-dark tresses, her fingers (for the parts with least flesh turn into liquid most quickly); and after these, her shoulders and back and her bosom and flanks completely vanished in trickling liquid; 605 and lastly the living blood in her veins is replaced by springwater, and nothing remains that you could have seized on.

“Meanwhile, the terrified mother was pointlessly seeking her daughter all over the earth and deep in the ocean.
 Neither Aurora, appearing with dew-dampened tresses, 610 nor Hesperus<sup>7</sup> knew her to quit; igniting two torches of pine from the fires of Etna, the care-ridden goddess used them to illumine the wintry shadows of nighttime;
 and when the dear day had once more dimmed out the bright stars, she searched again for her daughter from sunrise to sunset. 615

5. Syracuse, on the southeastern coast of Sicily, founded by Corinthian colonists in the 8th century B.C.E. The Bacchiadae were a leading family who then ruled Corinth.

6. A river that empties into the sea near Syracuse.

7. The evening star. “Aurora”: goddess of the dawn.

“Worn out by her labors and suffering thirst, with no fountain to wet her lips at, she happened upon a thatched hovel and knocked at its humble door, from which there came forth a crone who looked at the goddess, and, when asked for water, gave her a sweet drink, sprinkled with toasted barley. 620
 And, as she drank it, a boy with a sharp face and bold manner stood right before her and mocked her and said she was greedy.
 Angered by what he was saying, the goddess drenched him with all she had not yet drunk of the barley mixture.
 The boy’s face thirstily drank up the spots as his arms were 625 turned into legs, and a tail was joined to his changed limbs;
 so that he should now be harmless, the boy was diminished, and he was transformed into a very small lizard.
 Astonished, the old woman wept and reached out to touch him, but the marvelous creature fled her, seeking a hideout. 630
 He now has a name appropriate to his complexion,
Stellio, from the constellations spotting his body.

“To speak of the lands and seas the goddess mistakenly searched would take far too long; the earth exhausted her seeking;
 she came back to Sicily; and, as she once more traversed it, 635 arrived at Cyane, who would have told her the story had she not herself been changed; but, though willing in spirit, her mouth, tongue, and vocal apparatus were absent;
 nevertheless, she gave proof that was clear to the mother: Persephone’s girdle (which happened by chance to have fallen 640 into the fountain) now lay exposed on its surface.

“Once recognizing it, the goddess knew that her daughter had been taken, and tore her hair into utter disorder, and repeatedly struck her breasts with the palms of both hands.
 With her daughter’s location a mystery still, she reproaches 645
 the whole earth as ungrateful, unworthy her gift of grain crops, and Sicily more than the others, where she has discovered the proof of her loss; and so it was here that her fierce hand shattered the earth-turning plows, here that the farmers and cattle perished alike, and here that she bade the plowed fields 650 default on their trust by blighting the seeds in their keeping.
 Sicilian fertility, which had been everywhere famous,
 was given the lie when the crops died as they sprouted, now ruined by too much heat, and now by too heavy a rainfall; stars and winds harmed them, and the greedy birds devoured 655
 the seed as it was sown; the harvest of wheat was defeated by thorns and darnels and unappeasable grasses.

“Then Arethusa<sup>8</sup> lifted her head from the Elean waters and swept her dripping hair back away from her forehead, saying, “O Mother of Grain—and mother, too, of that virgin 660 sought through the whole world—here end your incessant labors, lest your great anger should injure the earth you once trusted, and which, unwillingly pillaged, has done nothing ignoble;

8. A spring in Syracuse. Its waters are “Elean” because they were believed to originate in the district of Pisa in Elis, a region of the western Peloponnesus in mainland Greece.

nor do I plead for my nation, since I am a guest here:
 my nation is Pisa, I am descended from Elis, 665 and live as a stranger in Sicily—this land that delights me more than all others on earth; here Arethusa dwells with her household gods. Spare it, merciful goddess, and when your cares and countenance both have been lightened, there will come an opportune time to tell you the reason 670 why I was taken from home and borne off to Ortygia<sup>9</sup> over a waste of waters. The earth gave me access, showed me a path, and, swept on through underground caverns,
 I raised my head here to an unfamiliar night sky.
 But while gliding under the earth on a Stygian river, 675
 I saw with my very own eyes your dear Proserpina; grief and terror were still to be seen in her features, yet she was nonetheless queen of that shadowy kingdom, the all-powerful consort of the underworld's ruler."

"The mother was petrified by the speech of the fountain, 680 and stood for a very long time as though she were senseless, until her madness had been driven off by her outrage, and then she set out in her chariot for the ethereal regions;
 once there, with her face clouded over and hair all disheveled, she planted herself before Jove and fiercely addressed him: 685
 "Jupiter, I have come here as a suppliant, speaking for my child—and yours: if you have no regard for her mother, relent as her father—don't hold her unworthy, I beg you, simply because I am the child's other parent!
 The daughter I sought for so long is at last recovered, 690 if to recover means only to lose much more surely,
 or if to recover means just to learn her location!
 Her theft could be borne—if only he would return her!
 Then let him do it, for surely Jove's daughter is worthy of a mate who's no brigand, even if my daughter isn't." 695

"Jupiter answered her, "She is indeed our daughter,
 the pledge of our love and our common concern, but if you will kindly agree to give things their right names, this is not an injury requiring my retribution, but an act of love by a son-in-law who won't shame you, 700 goddess, if you give approval; though much were lacking, how much it is to be Jove's brother! But he lacks nothing, and only yields to me that which the Fates have allotted.
 Still, if you're so keen on parting them, your Proserpina may come back to heaven—but only on one condition: 705 that she has not touched food, for so the Fates have required."

"He spoke and Ceres was sure she would get back her daughter, though the Fates were not, for the girl had already placated her hunger while guilelessly roaming death's formal gardens, where, from a low-hanging branch, she had plucked without thinking 710

a pomegranate, and peeling its pale bark off, devoured seven of its seeds. No one saw her but Ascalaphus (whom it is said that Orphne, a not undistinguished nymph among those of Avernus, pregnant by Acheron,<sup>1</sup> gave birth to there in the underworld's dark-shadowed forest);
 he saw, and by his disclosure, kept her from returning. 715

“Raging, the Queen of the Underworld turned that informer into a bird of ill omen: sprinkling the waters of Phlegethon<sup>2</sup> into the face of Ascalaphus, she gave him a beak and plumage and eyes quite enormous. 720 Lost to himself, he is clad now in yellow-brown pinions, his head increases in size and his nails turn to talons, but the feathers that spring from his motionless arms scarcely flutter;
 a filthy bird he's become, the grim announcer of mourning, a slothful portent of evil to mortals—the owl. 725

“That one, because of his tattling tongue, seems quite worthy of punishment,—but you, daughters of Acheloüs,<sup>3</sup> why do you have the plumage of birds and the faces of virgins?
 Is it because while Proserpina gathered her flowers, you, artful Sirens, were numbered among her companions? 730
 No sooner had you scoured the whole earth in vain for her than you desired the vast seas to feel your devotion, and prayed to the gods, whom you found willing to help you, that you might skim over the flood upon oars that were pinions, then saw your limbs turn suddenly golden with plumage. 735
 And so that your tunefulness, which the ear finds so pleasing, should not be lost, nor your gifts of vocal expression, your maidenly faces remain, along with your voices.

“But poised between his sorrowing sister and brother, great Jove divided the year into two equal portions, 740 so now in two realms the shared goddess holds sway, and as many months spent with her mother are spent with her husband.
 She changed her mind then, and changed her expression to match it, and now her fair face, which even Dis found depressing, beams as the sun does, when, after having been hidden 745 before in dark clouds, at last it emerges in triumph.

“Her daughter safely restored to her, kindhearted Ceres wishes to hear your story now, Arethusa—what did you flee from and what changed you into a fountain?
 The splashing waters are stilled: the goddess raises 750 her head from their depths and wrings dry her virid tresses, then tells the old tale of the river Alpheus'<sup>4</sup> passion.

““Once I was one of the nymphs who dwell in Achaëa,” she said, “and none had more zeal than I for traversing the mountain pastures or setting out snares for small game. 755

 But even though I did not seek to find fame as a beauty, men called me that, my courage and strength notwithstanding;
 nor was I pleased that my beauty was lauded so often,
 and for my corporeal nature (which most other maidens are wont to take pleasure in) I blushed like a rustic, 760 thinking it wrong to please men.

““Exhausted from hunting,
 I was on my way back from the Stymphalian forest,<sup>5</sup> and the fierce heat of the day was doubled by my exertions.
 By chance I came on a stream, gently and silently flowing, clear to the bottom, where you could count every pebble, 765 water so still you would scarcely believe it was moving.
 Silvery willows and poplars, which the stream nourished, artlessly shaded its banks as they sloped to the water.

““At once I approach and wiggle my toes in its wetness, then wade in up to my knees—not satisfied wholly, 770
 I strip off my garments and hang them up on a willow, and, naked, merge with the waters. I strike and stroke them, gliding below and thrashing about on the surface, then hear a strange murmur that seems to come from the bottom, which sends me scampering onto the near bank in terror: 775 ‘Why the great rush?’ Alpheus cries from his waters, then hoarsely repeating, ‘Why the great rush, Arethusa?’ Just as I am, I flee without clothing (my garments were on the bank opposite); aroused, Alpheus pursues me, my nakedness making me seem more ripe for the taking. 780

““Thus did I run, and thus did that fierce one press after,
 as doves on trembling pinions flee from the kestrel,
 as kestrels pursue the trembling doves and assault them.
 To Orchomenus and past, to Psophis, Cyllene, the folds of Maenalia, Erymanthus,<sup>6</sup> and Elis, 785 I continued to run, nor was he faster than I was;
 but since Alpheus was so much stronger, I couldn’t outrun him for long, given his greater endurance.

““Nonetheless, I still managed to keep on running across the wide fields, up wooded mountains, 790 on bare rocks, steep cliffs, in wastes wild and trackless; with the sun at my back, I could see his shadow before me, stretched out on the ground, unless my panic deceived me;
 but surely I did hear those frightening footsteps behind me, and felt his hot breath lifting the hair from my shoulders. 795 ““Worn with exertion, I cried out, ‘Help! Or I’m taken!

 Aid your armoreress, Diana—to whom you have often entrusted your bow, along with your quiver of arrows!’
 The goddess was moved by my plea and at once I was hidden in a dense cloud of fine mist:<sup>7</sup> the river god, clueless, circled around me, hidden in darkness, searching;

twice he unknowingly passed by the place where the goddess had hidden me, and twice he called, 'Yo! Arethusa!'

How wretched was I? Why, even as the lamb is, at hearing the howling of wolves around the sheepfold, or as the rabbit in the briar patch who glimpses the dog's fierce muzzle and feels too frightened to tremble.

““Alpheus remained there, for as he noticed no footprints heading away from the cloud, he continued to watch it.

An icy sweat thoroughly drenched the limbs that he looked for,
and the dark drops poured from every part of my body;
wherever my foot had been, there was a puddle, and my hair shed moisture. More swiftly than I can tell it,

I turned into liquid—even so, he recognized me, his darling there in the water, and promptly discarded the human form he had assumed for the occasion, reverting to river, so that our fluids might mingle.

Diana shattered the earth's crust; I sank down, and was swept on through sightless caverns, off to Ortygia, so pleasing to me because it's the goddess's birthplace;<sup>8</sup> and here I first rose up into the air as a fountain.”

““Here Arethusa concluded. The fruitful goddess summoned her team of dragons and yoked them onto her chariot; and guiding their heads with the reins, she was transported up through the middle air that lies between earth and heaven until she arrived in Athens, and, giving her carriage to Triptolemus,<sup>9</sup> ordered him to go off and scatter grain on the earth—some on land that had never been broken, and some on land that had been a long time fallow.

““The young man was carried high up over Europe and Asia until at last he came to the kingdom of Scythia.
Lyncus was king here; he brought him into his palace, and asked him his name, his homeland, the cause of his journey, and how he had come there.

“““My well-known homeland,” he answered, “is Athens; I am Triptolemus; neither by ship upon water nor foot upon land have I come here; the air itself parted to make me a path on which I coursed through the heavens.
I bear you the gifts of Ceres, which, sown in your broad fields, will yield a bountiful harvest of nourishing produce.”

““This the barbarian heard with great envy, and wishing that he himself might be perceived as the donor, took him in as a guest, and while the young man was sleeping, approached with a sword, and as he attempted to stab him, 845

“When our eldest sister had concluded her superb performance, with one voice the nymphs awarded victory to . . . the Muses!

“And when the others, in defeat, reviled us, I answered them: ‘Since you display such nerve in challenging the Muses, you deserve chastisement—even more so since you’ve added insult to outrage: our wise forbearance is not without its limits, as you’ll learn when we get to the penalties, and vent our righteous anger on your worthless selves.’

850

855

“Then the Pierides<sup>1</sup> mock our threats, and as they try to answer us by shouting vulgarity and giving us the finger, their fingers take on feathers and their arms turn into pinions! Each one sees a beak replace a sister’s face, as a new bird is added to the species of the forest; and as they try to beat upon their breasts, bemoaning their new situation, they all hang suspended, flapping in the air, the forest’s scandal—the P-Airides!<sup>2</sup>

“And even though they are all feathered now, their speech remains as fluent as it was,
and they are famous for their noisiness as well as for their love of argument.”

FROM BOOK IX

[Iphis and Isis]

Rumor might very well have spread the news of this unprecedented transformation<sup>3</sup> throughout the hundred towns of Crete, if they had not just had a wonder of their own to talk about—the change that came to Iphis.

960

For, once upon a time, there lived in Phaestus, not far from the royal capital at Cnossus, a freeborn plebeian named Ligdus, who was otherwise unknown and undistinguished, with no more property than fame or status,
and yet devout, and blameless in his life.

His wife was pregnant. When her time had come, he gave her his instructions with these words:
“There are two things I pray to heaven for on your account: an easy birth and a son.

1. The daughters of Pierus.

2. The translator’s pun on the name Pierides.

3. The transformation of Byblis, who loved her brother Caunus, into a fountain.

The other fate is much too burdensome, for daughters need what Fortune has denied us:
a dowry.

975

“Therefore—and may God prevent this happening, but if, by chance, it does and you should be delivered of a girl, unwillingly I order this, and beg pardon for my impiety—But let it die!”

980

He spoke, and tears profusely bathed the cheeks of the instructor and instructed both.
Telethusa continued to implore her husband, praying him not to confine their hopes so narrowly—to no avail, for he would not be moved from his decision.

985

Now scarcely able to endure the weight of her womb’s burden, as she lay in bed at midnight, a dream-vision came to her:
the goddess Io<sup>4</sup> stood (or seemed to stand) before her troubled bed, accompanied with solemn pomp by all her mysteries.

990

She wore her crescent horns upon her brow and a garland made of gleaming sheaves of wheat, and a queenly diadem; behind her stood the dog-faced god Anubis, and divine Bubastis (who defends the lives of cats), and Apis as a bull clothed in a hide of varied colors, with Harpocrates, the god whose fingers, pressed against his lips, command our silence; and one often sought by his devoted worshippers—Osiris;<sup>5</sup> and the asp, so rich in sleep-inducing drops.
She seemed to wake, and saw them all quite clearly.

995

1000

These were the words the goddess spoke to her:

1005

“O Telethusa, faithful devotee, put off your heavy cares! Disobey your spouse, and do not hesitate, when Lucina has lightened the burden of your labor, to raise this child, whatever it will be.

1010

I am that goddess who, when asked, delivers, and you will have no reason to complain that honors you have paid me were in vain.”
After instructing her, the goddess left.

1015

The Cretan woman rose up joyfully, lifted her hands up to the stars, and prayed that her dream-vision would be ratified.

Then going into labor, she brought forth a daughter—though her husband did not know it.

1020

4. Identified with the Egyptian Isis, goddess of fertility, marriage, and maternity, whose cult was widespread in the Roman world.

5. Husband of Isis, killed by his brother Set and restored to life by Isis; he is thus a figure of rebirth.

The mother (with intention to deceive) told them to feed the boy. Deception prospered, since no one knew the truth except the nurse.

The father thanked the gods and named the child for its grandfather, Iphis; since this name 1025 was given men and women both, his mother was pleased, for she could use it honestly.
So from her pious lie, deception grew.
She dressed it as a boy—its face was such that whether boy or girl, it was a beauty. 1030

Meanwhile, the years went by, thirteen of them:
your father, Iphis, has arranged for you a marriage to the golden-haired Ianthe, the daughter of a Cretan named Telestes, the maid most praised in Phaestus<sup>6</sup> for her beauty. 1035
The two were similar in age and looks, and had been taught together from the first.

First love came unexpected to both hearts and wounded them both equally—and yet their expectations were quite different: 1040 Ianthe can look forward to a time of wedding torches and of wedding vows, and trusts that one whom she believes a man will be her man. Iphis, however, loves with hopeless desperation, which increases 1045 in strict proportion to its hopelessness, and burns—a maiden—for another maid!

And scarcely holding back her tears, she cries, “Oh, what will be the end reserved for Iphis, gripped by a strange and monstrous passion known 1050 to no one else? If the gods had wished to spare me, they should have; if they wanted to destroy me,
they should have given me a natural affliction.

“Cows do not burn for cows, nor mares for mares;
the ram will have his sheep, the stag his does, 1055 and birds will do the same when they assemble; there are no animals whose females lust for other females! I wish that I were dead!

“That Crete might bring forth monsters of all kinds.
Queen Pasiphaë<sup>7</sup> was taken by a bull, 1060 yet even that was male-and-female passion!
My love is much less rational than hers, to tell the truth. At least she had the hope of satisfaction, taking in the bull through guile, and in the image of a cow, 1065 thereby deceiving the adulterer!

“If every form of ingenuity were gathered here from all around the world, if Daedalus<sup>8</sup> flew back on waxen wings, what could he do? Could all his learned arts transform me from a girl into a boy? 1070

Or could you change into a boy, Ianthé?
 “But really, Iphis, pull yourself together, be firm, cast off this stultifying passion:
 accept your birth—unless you would deceive yourself as well as others—look for love 1075 where it is proper to, as a woman should!
 Hope both creates and nourishes such love; reality deprives you of all hope.

“No watchman keeps you from her dear embrace, no husband’s ever-vigilant concern, no father’s fierceness, nor does she herself deny the gifts that you would have from her.
 And yet you are denied all happiness, nor could it have been otherwise if all 1085
 the gods and men had labored in your cause.

“But the gods have not denied me anything; agreeably, they’ve given what they could;
 my father wishes for me what I wish,
 she and her father both would have it be;
 but Nature, much more powerful than they are, 1090 wishes it not—sole source of all my woe!

“But look—the sun has risen and the day of our longed-for nuptials dawns at last!
 Ianthé will be mine—and yet not mine:
 we die of thirst here at the fountainside. 1095

“Why do you, Juno, guardian of brides, and you, O Hymen, god of marriage, come to these rites, which cannot be rites at all, for no one takes the bride, and both are veiled?” 1100

She said no more. Nor did her chosen burn less fiercely as she prayed you swiftly come, O god of marriage.

Fearing what you sought, Telethusa postponed the marriage day with one concocted pretext and another, 1105 a fictive illness or an evil omen.

But now she had no more excuses left,
 and the wedding day was only one day off.

She tears the hair bands from her daughter’s head and from her own, and thus unbound, she prayed 1110 while desperately clinging to the altar:

“O holy Isis, who art pleased to dwell and be worshiped at Paraetonium, at Pharos, in the Mareotic fields,

8. Fabled craftsman who devised the heifer disguise that enabled Pasiphaë to seduce the bull and, later, built the labyrinth for the Minotaur. Forced to flee Crete, he made wings of feathers held together by wax, for himself and his son, Icarus.

and where the Nile splits into seven branches; deliver us, I pray you, from our fear! 1115

“For I once saw thee and thy sacred emblems, O goddess, and I recognized them all and listened to the sound of brazen rattles<sup>9</sup> and kept your orders in my memory. 1120

“And that my daughter still looks on the light, and that I have not suffered punishment,
why, this is all your counsel and your gift;
now spare us both and offer us your aid.”

Warm tears were in attendance on her words. 1125
The altar of the goddess seemed to move—it did move, and the temple doors were shaken, and the horns (her lunar emblem) glowed with light,
and the bronze rattles sounded.

Not yet secure,
but nonetheless delighted by this omen, 1130
the mother left with Iphis following, as was her wont, but now with longer strides, darker complexion, and with greater force, a keener countenance, and with her hair shorter than usual and unadorned, 1135 and with more vigor than a woman has.

And you who were so recently a girl are now a boy! Bring gifts to the goddess!
Now boldly celebrate your faith in her!
They bring the goddess gifts and add to them 1140
a votive tablet with these lines inscribed:

GIFTS IPHIS PROMISED WHEN SHE WAS A MAID TRANSFORMED INTO A BOY HE GLADLY PAID

The next day's sun revealed the great wide world with Venus, Juno, and Hymen all together 1145 gathered beneath the smoking nuptial torches, and Iphis in possession of Ianthe.

FROM BOOK X<sup>1</sup>

[Pygmalion]

“Pygmalion observed how these women<sup>2</sup> lived lives of sordid indecenty, and, dismayed by the numerous defects of character Nature had given the feminine spirit, stayed as a bachelor, having no female companion. 315

9. Sistra, sacred rattles used in Isis's cult.

1. This selection of stories is part of the song sung by Orpheus, the legendary singer, after he has failed to redeem his wife, Eurydice, from the underworld. His theme, announced in the prologue of his song, is “young boys whom the gods have desired, / and . . . girls seized by forbidden and blameworthy passions.”

2. Orpheus has just told of the Propoetides of Cyprus, who, as punishment for having denied Venus's divinity, became the first women to prostitute themselves.

“During that time he created an ivory statue, a work of most marvelous art, and gave it a figure better than any living woman could boast of,
 and promptly conceived a passion for his own creation.
 You would have thought it alive, so like a real maiden 320 that only its natural modesty kept it from moving:
 art concealed artfulness. Pygmalion gazed in amazement, burning with love for what was in likeness a body.

“Often he stretched forth a hand to touch his creation, attempting to settle the issue: was it a body, 325 or was it—this he would not yet concede—a mere statue?
 He gives it kisses, and they are returned, he imagines;
 now he addresses and now he caresses it, feeling his fingers sink into its warm, pliant flesh, and fears he will leave blue bruises all over its body; 330 he seeks to win its affections with words and with presents pleasing to girls, such as seashells and pebbles, tame birds, armloads of flowers in thousands of different colors, lilies, bright painted balls, curious insects in amber;
 he dresses it up and puts diamond rings on its fingers, 335 gives it a necklace, a lacy brassiere and pearl earrings, and even though all such adornments truly become her,
 she does not seem to be any less beautiful naked.
 He lays her down on a bed with a bright purple cover and calls her his bedmate and slips a few soft, downy pillows 340 under her head as though she were able to feel them.

“The holiday honoring Venus has come, and all Cyprus<sup>3</sup> turns out to celebrate; heifers with gilded horns buckle under the deathblow<sup>4</sup> and incense soars up in thick clouds; having already brought his own gift to the altar, 345
 Pygmalion stood by and offered this fainthearted prayer:
 ‘If you in heaven are able to give us whatever we ask for, then I would like as my wife—’ and not daring to say, ‘—my ivory maiden,’ said, ‘—one like my statue!’ Since golden Venus was present there at her altar, 350
 she knew what he wanted to ask for, and as a good omen, three times the flames soared and leapt right up to the heavens.

“Once home, he went straight to the replica of his sweetheart, threw himself down on the couch and repeatedly kissed her;
 she seemed to grow warm and so he repeated the action, 355 kissing her lips and exciting her breasts with both hands.
 Aroused, the ivory softened and, losing its stiffness, yielded, submitting to his caress as wax softens when it is warmed by the sun, and handled by fingers, takes on many forms, and by being used, becomes useful. 360

3. Island in the eastern Mediterranean sacred to Venus.

4. I.e., as they are sacrificed.

“You can believe that Pygmalion offered the goddess his thanks in a torrent of speech, once again kissing 365 those lips that were not untrue; that she felt his kisses, and timidly blushing, she opened her eyes to the sunlight, and at the same time, first looked on her lover and heaven!
 The goddess attended the wedding since she had arranged it, and before the ninth moon had come to its crescent, a daughter 370 was born to them—Paphos,<sup>5</sup> who gave her own name to the island.

“She had a son named Cinyras, who would be regarded as one of the blessed, if he had only been childless.
 I sing of dire events: depart from me, daughters, depart from me, fathers; or, if you find my poems charming, 375 believe that I lie, believe these events never happened; or, if you believe that they did, then believe they were punished.

“If Nature allows us to witness such impious misdeeds, then I give my solemn thanks that the Thracian people and the land itself are far away from those regions<sup>6</sup> 380 where evil like that was begotten: let fabled Panchaea<sup>7</sup> be rich in balsam and cinnamon, costum and frankincense, the sweat that drips down from the trees; let it bear incense and flowers of every description: it also bears myrrh, and too great a price was paid for that new creation. 385

“Cupid himself denies that his darts ever harmed you, Myrrha, and swears that his torches likewise are guiltless;
 one of the three sisters,<sup>8</sup> bearing a venomous hydra and waving a Stygian firebrand, must have inspired your passion.
 Hating a parent is wicked, but even more wicked 390 than hatred is this kind of love. Princes elected from far and wide desire you, Myrrha; all Asia sends its young men to compete for your hand in marriage:
 choose from so many just one of these men for your husband, so long as a certain one is not the one chosen. 395

“She understood and struggled against her perversion, asking herself, ‘What have I begun? Where will it take me?
 May heaven and piety and the sacred rights of fathers restrain these unspeakable thoughts and repel my misfortune, if this indeed is misfortune; yet piety chooses 400 not to condemn this love outright: without distinctions animals copulate; it is no crime for the heifer to bear the weight of her father upon her own back; daughters are suitable wives in the kingdom of horses;
 the billy goats enter the flocks that they themselves sire, and birds are inseminated by those who conceive them: 405 blessed, the ones for whom such love is permitted!

“Human morality gives us such stifling precepts, and makes indecent what Nature freely allows us!

But people say there are nations where sons and their mothers, where fathers and daughters, may marry each other, increasing the bonds of piety by their redoubled affections.

Wretched am I, who hadn't the luck to be born there, injured by nothing more than mischance of location!

"Why do I obsess? Begone, forbidden desires; of course he is worthy of love—but love for a father!

So, then, if I were not the daughter of great Cinyras,
I would be able to have intercourse with Cinyras:
though he is mine, he is not mine, and our nearness ruins me: I would be better off as a stranger.

"It would be good for me to go far away from my country, as long as I could escape from my wicked desires, for what holds me here is the passion that I have to see him, to touch and speak to Cinyras and give him my kisses—
if nothing more is permitted. You impious maiden, what more can you imagine will ever be granted?

Are you aware how you confuse all rights and relations?
Would you be your mother's rival? The whore of your father?
Would you be called your son's sister? Your brother's own mother?
Do you not shudder to think of the serpent-coiffed sisters<sup>9</sup> thrusting their bloodthirsty torches into the faces of the guilty wretches that those three appear to and torture?

"But you, while your body is undefiled, keep your mind chaste, and do not break Nature's law with incestuous pairing.
Think what you ask for: the very act is forbidden, and he is devout and mindful of moral behavior—ah, how I wish that he had a similar madness!

"She spoke and Cinyras, whom an abundance of worthy suitors had left undecided, consulted his daughter, ran their names by her and asked whom she wished for a husband;
silent at first, she kept her eyes locked on her father, seething until the hot tears spilled over her eyelids:

Cinyras, attributing this to the fears of a virgin, bade her cease weeping, wiped off her cheeks, and kissed her; Myrrha rejoiced overmuch at his gesture and answered that she would marry a man 'just like you.' Misunderstanding the words of his daughter, Cinyras approved them, replying,
'May you be this pious always.' Hearing that last word, the virgin lowers her head, self-convicted of evil.

"Midnight: now sleep dissolves all the cares of the body; Cinyras' daughter, however, lies tossing, consumed by the fires of passion, repeating her prayers in a frenzy;
now she despairs, now she'll attempt it; now she is shamefaced, now eager: uncertain: What should she do now? She wavers, just like a tree that the axe blade has girdled completely, when only the last blow remains to be struck, and the woodsman cannot predict the direction it's going to fall in,

9. Again, the Furies.

she, after so many blows to her spirit, now totters,
 now leaning in one, and now in the other, direction, nor is she able to find any rest from her passion 460 save but in death. Death pleases her, and she gets up, determined to hang herself from a beam with her girdle:
 'Farewell, dear Cinyras: may you understand why I do this!' 465
 she said, as she fitted the noose around her pale neck.

"They say that, hearing her murmuring, her faithful old nurse in the next chamber arose and entered her bedroom:
 at sight of the grim preparations, she screams out, and striking her breasts and tearing her garments, removes the noose from around the girl's neck, and then, only then she collapses, and weeping, embraces her, asking her why she would do it. 470

"Myrrha remained silent, expressionless, with her eyes downcast, sorrowing only because her attempt was detected.
 But the woman persists, baring her flat breasts and white hair, and by the milk given when she was a babe in the cradle beseeches her to entrust her old nurse with the cause of her sorrow. 475
 The girl turns away with a groan; the nurse is determined to learn her secret, and promises not just to keep it:

"*'Speak and allow me to aid you,' she says, 'for in my old age,
 I am not utterly useless: if you are dying of passion, my charms and herbs will restore you; if someone wishes you evil, my rites will break whatever spell you are under;
 is some god wrathful? A sacrifice placates his anger.
 What else could it be? I can't think of anything—Fortune favors your family, everything's going quite smoothly, both of your parents are living, your mother, your father—'* 485 Myrrha sighed deeply, hearing her father referred to,
 but not even then did the nurse grasp the terrible evil in the girl's heart, although she felt that her darling suffered a passion of some kind for some kind of lover.

"Nurse was unyielding and begged her to make known her secret, 490 whatever it was, pressing the tearful girl to her bosom;
 and clasping her in an embrace that old age had enfeebled, she said, 'You're in love—I am certain! I will be zealous in aiding your cause, never you fear—and your father will be none the wiser!'

"Myrrha in frenzy leapt up 495 and threw herself onto the bed, pressing her face in the pillows:
 'Leave me, I beg you,' she said. 'Avoid my wretched dishonor;
 leave me or cease to ask me the cause of my sorrow:
 what you attempt to uncover is sinful and wicked!'

"The old woman shuddered: extending the hands that now trembled 500 with fear and old age, she fell at the feet of her darling, a suppliant, coaxing her now, and now attempting to scare her;
 threatening now to disclose her attempted self-murder, but pledging to aid her if she confesses her passion.

"She lifted her head with her eyes full of tears spilling over 505 onto the breast of her nurse and repeatedly tried to speak out, but repeatedly stopped herself short of confession, hiding her shame-colored face in the folds of her garments, until she finally yielded, blurting her secret:

 'O mother,' she cried, 'so fortunate you with your husband!' 510 and said no more but groaned.

"The nurse, who now understood it, felt a chill run through her veins, and her bones shook with tremor, and her white hair stood up in stiff bristles. She said whatever she could to dissuade the girl from her horrible passion, and even though Myrrha knew the truth of her warning, 515
 she had decided to die if she could not possess him.
 'Live, then,' the other replied, 'and possess your—' Not daring to use the word 'father,' she left her sentence unfinished, but called upon heaven to stand by her earlier promise.

"Now it was time for the annual feast days of Ceres; 520 the pious, and married women clad in white vestments, thronged to the celebration, offering garlands of wheat as firstfruits of the season; now for nine nights the intimate touch of their men is considered forbidden.
 Among these matrons was Cenchreïs, wife of Cinyras, 525 for her attendance during these rites was required.
 And so, while the queen's place in his bed was left vacant, the overly diligent nurse came to Cinyras, finding him drunk, and spoke to him of a maiden whose passion for him was real (although her name wasn't) 530 and praising her beauty; when asked the age of this virgin, she said, 'the same age as Myrrha.' Commanded to fetch her, nurse hastened home, and entering, cried to her darling, 'Rejoice, my dear, we have won!' The unlucky maiden could not feel joy in her heart, but only grim sorrow, 535 yet still she rejoiced, so distorted were her emotions.

"Now it is midnight, when all of creation is silent;
 high in the heavens, between the two Bears, Boötes<sup>1</sup> had turned his wagon so that its shaft pointed downward; Myrrha approaches her crime, which is fled by chaste Luna,<sup>2</sup> 540 while under black clouds the stars hide their scandalized faces; Night lacks its usual fires; you, Icarus,<sup>3</sup> covered your face and were followed at once by Erigone, whose pious love of her father merited heaven.

"Thrice Myrrha stumbles and stops each time at the omen, 545 and thrice the funereal owl sings her his poem of endings;
 nevertheless she continues, her shame lessened by shadows.
 She holds the left hand of her nurse, and gropes with the other blindly in darkness: now at the bedchamber's threshold, and now she opens the door: and now she is led within, 550 where her knees fail her; she falters, nearly collapsing,

3. More properly Icarius, a mythic Athenian.

her color, her blood, her spirit all flee together.

“As she approaches the crime, her horror increases; regretting her boldness, she wishes to turn back, unnoticed, but even as she holds back, the old woman leads her by the hand to the high bed, where she delivers her, saying, ‘Take her, Cinyras—she’s yours,’ and unites the doomed couple.
The father accepts his own offspring in his indecent bed and attempts to dispel the girl’s apprehensions, encouraging her not to be frightened of him, and addressing her, as it happened, with a name befitting her years: he called her ‘daughter’ while she called him ‘father,’ so the right names were attached to their impious actions.

“Filled with the seed of her father, she left his bedchamber, having already conceived, in a crime against nature which she repeated the following night and thereafter, until Cinyras, impatient to see his new lover after so many encounters, brought a light in,
and in the same moment discovered his crime and his daughter;
grief left him speechless; he tore out his sword from the scabbard; Myrrha sped off, and, thanks to night’s shadowy darkness, escaped from her death. She wandered the wide-open spaces, leaving Arabia, so rich in palms, and Panchaea, and after nine months, she came at last to Sabaea,<sup>4</sup> where she found rest from the weariness that she suffered, for she could scarcely carry her womb’s heavy burden.

“Uncertain of what she should wish for, tired of living but frightened of dying, she summed up her state in this prayer:
‘O gods, if there should be any who hear my confession,
I do not turn away from the terrible sentence that my misbehavior deserves; but lest I should outrage the living by my survival, or the dead by my dying, drive me from both of these kingdoms, transform me wholly, so that both life and death are denied me.’

“Some god did hear her confession, and heaven answered her final prayer, for, even as she was still speaking, the earth rose up over her legs, and from her toes burst roots that spread widely to hold the tall trunk in position;
her bones put forth wood, and even though they were still hollow, they now ran with sap and not blood; her arms became branches, and those were now twigs that used to be called her fingers, while her skin turned to hard bark. The tree kept on growing, over her swollen belly, wrapping it tightly, and growing over her breast and up to her neck; she could bear no further delay, and, as the wood rose, plunged her face down into the bark and was swallowed.

“Loss of her body has meant the loss of all feeling;
and yet she weeps, and the warm drops spill from her tree trunk; those tears bring her honor: the distillate myrrh preserves and will keep the name of its mistress down through the ages.

4. Arabia Felix, the southern tip of the Arabian Peninsula.

“But under the bark, the infant conceived in such baseness continued to grow and now sought a way out of Myrrha;
 the pregnant trunk bulged in the middle and its weighty burden pressed on the mother, who could not cry out in her sorrow nor summon Lucina with charms to aid those in childbirth. 605
 So, like a woman exerting herself to deliver, the tree groaned and bent over double, wet from its weeping.
 Gentle Lucina stood by the sorrowing branches, laid her hands onto the bark and recited the charms that aid in delivery; the bark split open; a fissure 610 ran down the trunk of the tree and its burden spilled out, a bawling boychild, whom naiads placed in soft grasses and bathed in the tears of its mother. Not even Envy could have found fault with his beauty, for he resembled one of the naked cherubs depicted by artists, 615 and would have been taken as one, if you had provided him with a quiver or else removed one from those others.

[Venus and Adonis]

“Time swiftly glides by in secret, escaping our notice, and nothing goes faster than years do: the son of his sister by his grandfather, the one so recently hidden 620 within a tree, so recently born, a most beautiful infant, now is an adolescent and now a young man even more beautiful than he was as a baby, pleasing now even to Venus and soon the avenger of passionate fires that brought his mother to ruin. 625 “For while her fond Cupid was giving a kiss to his mother, he pricked her unwittingly, right in the breast, with an arrow projecting out of his quiver; annoyed, the great goddess swatted him off, but the wound had gone in more deeply than it appeared to, and at the beginning deceived her. 630 “Under the spell of this fellow’s beauty, the goddess no longer takes any interest now in Cythera,<sup>5</sup> nor does she return to her haunts on the island of Paphos, or to fish-wealthy Cnidus or to ore-bearing Amathus;<sup>6</sup> she avoids heaven as well, now—preferring Adonis, 635 and clings to him, his constant companion, ignoring her former mode of unstrenuous self-indulgence, when she shunned natural light for the parlors of beauty;
 now she goes roaming with him through woods and up mountains and over the scrubby rocks with her garments hitched up 640 and girded around her waist like a nymph of Diana,<sup>7</sup> urging the hounds to pursue unendangering species, hoppety hares or stags with wide-branching antlers, or terrified does; but she avoids the fierce wild boars and rapacious wolves and bears armed with sharp claws, 645 and shuns the lions, sated with slaughter of cattle.

“And she warns you also to fear the wild beasts, Adonis, if only her warning were heeded. ‘Be bold with the timid,’ she said, ‘but against the daring, daring is reckless.
 Spare me, dear boy, the risk involved in your courage; 650 don’t rile the beasts that Nature has armed with sharp weapons, lest I should find the glory you gain much too costly!
 For lions and bristling boars and other fierce creatures look with indifferent eyes and minds upon beauty and youth and other qualities Venus is moved by; 655 pitiless boars deal out thunderbolts with their curved tusks, and none may withstand the frenzied assault of the lions, whom I despise altogether.’

“And when he asked why, she said, ‘I will tell you this story which will amaze you, with its retribution delivered for ancient wrongdoing. 660

“‘But this unaccustomed labor has left me exhausted—look, though—a poplar entices with opportune shade, and offers a soft bed of turf we may rest on together, as I would like to.’ And so she lay down on the grasses and on her Adonis, and using his breast as a pillow, 665
 she told this story, mixing her words with sweet kisses:

“‘Perhaps you’ll have heard of a maiden able to vanquish the swiftest of men in a footrace; this wasn’t a fiction, for she overcame all contestants; nor could you say whether she deserved praise more for her speed or her beauty. 670
 She asked some god about husbands. “A husband,” he answered, “is not for you, Atalanta: flee from a husband!
 But you will not flee—and losing yourself, will live on!”

“‘Frightened by his grim prediction, she went to the forest and lived there unmarried, escaping the large and persistent 675 throng of her suitors by setting out cruel conditions; “You cannot have me,” she said, “unless you outrun me;
 come race against me! A bride and a bed for the winner, death to the losers. Those are the rules of the contest.”

“‘Cruel? Indeed—but such was this young maiden’s beauty that a foolhardy throng of admirers took up the wager. 680
 As a spectator, Hippomenes sat in the grandstand, asking why anyone ever would risk such a danger, just for a bride, and disparaging their headstrong passion.
 However, as soon as he caught a glimpse of her beauty, 685 like mine or like yours would be if you were a woman,’ said Venus, ‘her face and her body, both bared for the contest, he threw up both hands and cried out, “I beg your pardons, who only a moment ago disparaged your efforts, but truly I had no idea of the trophy you strive for!” 690 “‘Praises ignited the fires of passion and made him hope that no young man proved to be faster than she was and fear that one would be. Jealous, he asked himself why he was leaving the outcome of this competition unventured: “God helps those who improve their condition by daring,” he said, addressing himself as the maiden flew by him. Though she seemed no less swift than a Scythian arrow, nevertheless, he more greatly admired her beauty, and the grace of her running made her seem even more lovely; the breezes blew back the wings attached to her ankles while her loose hair streamed over her ivory shoulders and her brightly edged knee straps fluttered lightly; a russet glow fanned out evenly over her pale, girlish body, as when a purple awning covers a white marble surface, staining its artless candor with counterfeit shadow. 695

“She crossed the finish line while he was taking it in, and Atalanta, victorious, was given a crown and the glory; the groaning losers were taken off: end of their story. But the youth, undeterred by what had become of the vanquished, stood on the track and fixed his gaze on the maiden: “Why seek such an easy victory over these sluggards? Contend with me,” he said, “and if Fortune makes me the winner, you will at least have been beaten by one not unworthy: I am the son of Megareus, grandson of Neptune, my great-grandfather; my valor is no less impressive than is my descent; if you should happen to triumph, you would be famous for having beaten Hippomenes.” 700

“And as he spoke, Atalanta’s countenance softened: she wondered whether she wished to win or to be won, and asked herself which god, jealous of her suitor’s beauty, sought to destroy him by forcing him into this marriage: “If I were judging, I wouldn’t think I was worth it! Nor am I moved by his beauty,” she said, “though I could be, but I am moved by his youth: his boyishness stirs me—but what of his valor? His mind so utterly fearless? 705

What of his watery origins? His relation to Neptune? What of the fact that he loves me and wishes to wed me, and is willing to die if bitter Fortune denies him?”

““Oh, flee from a bed that still reeks with the gore of past victims, while you are able to, stranger; marrying me is certain destruction! No one would wish to reject you, and you may be chosen by a much wiser young lady!”

““But why should I care for you—after so many have perished? Now he will learn! Let him die then, since the great slaughter of suitors has taught him nothing! He must be weary of living! So—must he die then, because he wishes to wed me, and is willing to pay the ultimate price for his passion? He shouldn’t have to! And even though it won’t be my fault, my victory surely will turn the people against me! 730

““If only you would just give it up, or if only, since you’re obsessed with it, you were a little bit faster! How very girlish is the boy’s facial expression! O poor Hippomenes! I wish you never had seen me! 735 740

You're worthy of life, and if only my life had been better, or if the harsh Fates had not prevented my marriage, 745
you would have been the one I'd have chosen to marry!"

"She spoke, and, moved by desire that struck without warning, loved without knowing what she was doing or feeling.
 Her father and people were clamoring down at the racecourse, when Neptune's descendent Hippomenes anxiously begged me: 750
 "Cytherian Venus, I pray you preside at my venture, aiding the fires that you yourself have ignited."

A well-meaning breeze brought me this prayer, so appealing that, I confess, it aroused me and stirred me to action, though I had scant time enough to bring off his rescue. 755

"There is a field upon Cyprus, known as Tamasus, famed for its wealth; in olden days it was given to me and provides an endowment now for my temples; and there in this field is a tree; its leaves and its branches glisten and shimmer, reflecting the gold they are made of; 760 now, as it happened, I'd just gotten back from a visit, carrying three golden apples that I had selected:
 and showing myself there to Hippomenes only, approached him and showed him how to use them to advantage.

"Both of them crouched for the start; when horns gave the signal, 765 they took off together, their feet barely brushing the surface;
 you would have thought they were able to keep their toes dry while skimming over the waves, and could touch on the ripened heads of wheat in the field without bending them under.

"Cries of support and encouragement cheered on the young man; 770
 "Now is the time," they screamed, "go for it, go for it, hurry, Hippomenes, give it everything that you've got now!
 Don't hold back! Victory!" And I am uncertain whether these words were more pleasing to him or to his Atalanta, for often, when she could have very easily passed him, 775 she lingered beside, her gaze full of desperate longing, until she reluctantly sped ahead of his features.

"And now Hippomenes, dry-mouthed, was breathlessly gasping, the finish line far in the distance; he threw out an apple, and the sight of that radiant fruit astounded the maiden, 780 who turned from her course and retrieved the glittering missile; Hippomenes passed her: the crowd roared its approval.

"A burst of speed now and Atalanta makes up for lost time:
 once more overtaking the lad, she puts him behind her!
 A second apple: again she falls back, but recovers, 785 now she's beside him, now passing him, only the finish remains: "Now, O goddess," he cries, "my inspiration, be with me!"

"With all the strength of his youth he flings the last apple to the far side of the field: this will really delay her!
 The maiden looked doubtful about its retrieval: I forced her 790 to get it and add on its weight to the burden she carried:
 time lost and weight gained were equal obstructions: the maiden (lest my account should prove longer than even the race was) took second place: the trophy bride left with the victor.

“But really, Adonis, wasn’t I worthy of being thanked for my troubles? Offered a gift of sweet incense?
Heedless of all I had done, he offered me neither!

Immediate outrage was followed by keen indignation;
and firmly resolving not to be spurned in the future,
I guarded against it by making this pair an example.

“Now they were passing a temple deep in the forest, built long ago by Echion to honor Cybele,<sup>8</sup> Mother of Gods, and now the length of their journey urged them to rest here, where unbridled desire possessed Hippomenes, moved by the strength of my godhead.

There was a dim and cave-like recess near the temple, hewn out of pumice, a shrine to the ancient religion, wherein a priest of these old rites had set a great many carved wooden idols. Hippomenes entered that place, and by his forbidden behavior defiled it;<sup>9</sup> in horror, the sacred images turned away from the act, and Cybele prepared to plunge the guilty pair in Stygian waters, but that seemed too easy; so now their elegant pale necks are cloaked in tawny manes; curved claws are their fingers; arms are now forelegs, and all the weight of their bodies shifts to their torsos; and now their tails sweep the arena;

fierce now, their faces; growls supplant verbal expression;
the forest now is their bedroom; a terror to others, meekly these lions champ at the bit of the harness on either side of the yoke of Cybele’s chariot.

“My darling, you must avoid these and all other wild beasts, who will not turn tail, but show off their boldness in battle;
flee them or else your courage will prove our ruin!”

“And after warning him, she went off on her journey, carried aloft by her swans; but his courage resisted her admonitions. It happened that as his dogs followed a boar they were tracking, they roused it from where it was hidden, and when it attempted to rush from the forest, Adonis

Ancient India

The Indian subcontinent stretches from the borders of Iran and Afghanistan to those of Myanmar, and from the edges of Tibet and China to the Indian Ocean; also called South Asia, it covers an area as large as western Europe. From about the fifth century B.C.E. onward, the ancient Greeks knew this region as Indos, a term adapted from the Persians; after the seventh century C.E., Muslim societies came to refer to it as al-Hind. For much of its long history, the subcontinent has not been politically united, but it has been remarkably cohesive in its social and cultural practices: it has evolved as a distinct “cultural zone” within Asia, very different in language, religion, art, population, and ways of life from the comparable cultural zones of China and the Middle East.

THE PREHISTORIC ORIGINS OF INDIAN LITERATURE

The kinds of stories ancient Indian literature tells, the forms they take, and the themes they explore are connected to the subcontinent’s past before the appearance of historical records. The earliest settled society in South Asia organized on a significant scale was that of the Indus Valley and Harappa

(ca. 2600–1900 B.C.E.), which established a far-flung network of small towns and ports across what are now Pakistan and western India. This civilization had extensive contacts with Mesopotamia during the period in which the epic Gilgamesh was being composed in Sumerian. The Indus-Harappan people had a writing system of their own, but it remains undeciphered, even though we know a great deal about their material culture. Conquered or gradually displaced by the Indo-Aryans, or overcome by economic, political, or natural disasters, this population receded from the subcontinent's prehistory by about 1900 B.C.E., some segments perhaps surviving among the aboriginal and other ancient groups dispersed across the Indian peninsula down to modern times.

The Indo-Aryan people may have begun to arrive on the Indian subcontinent as early as 2000 B.C.E., and to create a new settled society over the next few centuries in what are now northern Pakistan and India. Originally a nomadic pastoral people who moved with vast herds of cattle in search of grazing land, the Indo-Aryans branched off from the Indo-Iranian people, who probably migrated from the Caucasus Mountains region (modern Chechnya) to the plateau of Iran late in the third millennium B.C.E. The Indo-Iranians were themselves one of the major groups of the Indo-European people, who spread in many stages from their Caucasian homeland westward into Europe and eastward into Asia. One western Indo-European group, roughly contemporaneous with the earliest Indo-Iranians and Indo-Aryans, migrated to the Mediterranean region also around 2000 B.C.E., initially establishing the Mycenaean civilization and subsequently emerging in history as the ancient Greeks and Romans.

When the Indo-Aryans started settling in Punjab (now divided between India and Pakistan) in the second millennium B.C.E., they established an organized agrarian village society distinct from the urban society of their Indus-Harappan predecessors, who had focused on trade. This Indo-Aryan innovation, with its economic basis in agriculture (on small family farms) and animal husbandry (mainly of the domesticated cow), has proven to be the subcontinent's enduring social form of the past 3,500 years. In the mid-twentieth century, when it still had nearly 750,000 such villages, Mahatma Gandhi famously characterized India as a "land of villages"; and, in our own times, we still invoke the "holy cow"—an image that the Indo-Aryans created in their earliest poems on the subcontinent.

The Indo-Aryans brought with them the language that eventually became Sanskrit, the medium of the largest body of Indian literature, produced continuously from approximately 1200 B.C.E. to 1800 C.E. Sanskrit is intimately related to Greek and Latin: these languages share much of their grammar, use similar sentence structures, and draw on hundreds of common roots for their vocabularies. All three languages, along with ancient Persian, may therefore have evolved from a single source called proto-Indo-European, a language (lost since antiquity) presumably used by the ancestors of the Greeks, Romans, Indo-Iranians, and Indo-Aryans a few thousand years earlier.

But the connections among these scattered peoples are not merely linguistic. When they settled at the end of their respective migrations, they began to worship pantheons of gods, establish social hierarchies, practice rituals and customs, and adopt political models that strongly resembled one another. Most important, their songs, tales, and cycles of myths seemed to invoke a common stock of older memories, images, and narratives. By the first millennium B.C.E., Greek, Sanskrit, and Latin were highly differentiated from one another, and their emerging literatures—from, respectively, Homer (ca. eighth century B.C.E.); Vālmiki (ca. sixth century B.C.E.), the author of the original Rāmāyana; and Virgil (first century B.C.E.) onward—developed along independent trajectories. But they still contained remarkable echoes of one another that we cannot fully explain.

ORALITY AND WRITING IN INDIA

The first works on the subcontinent were hymns and ritual formulas (mantras) composed in Sanskrit, which were gathered with commentary and other theological material in four large groupings of discourse called the Vedas; these gave rise to an extensive, interconnected body of philosophy and mystical speculation called the Upaniṣads, fifty-two of which are important. Developed between approximately 1200 and 700 B.C.E., much of this literature was classified as scripture (śruti, revelation that is heard) and revealed knowledge (veda). Although the Vedic hymns are in verse, and some of them are poetry of the highest order, and even though the visionaries (ṛṣis) who "received them from the gods" are called kavis (poets), the texts themselves are not classified as kāvya (poetry): from this perspective, mantras are of divine origin and hence sacred, whereas poetry—no matter how beautiful and profound—is made by human authors and hence always mundane. Since divine revelation and knowledge need to be explained to human audiences, the Vedas and the Upaniṣads engendered many works of authoritative and specialized commentary (śāstras) as well as numerous compendiums and rule books (sūtras), which, by the latter half of the first millennium B.C.E., became part of the canon of Vedic religion and, centuries later, of classical Hinduism, one of the most important cultural forces on the subcontinent.

Although some of the essential commentaries and rule books were prepared after a writing system became available, the Hindu canon as a whole was transmitted orally throughout the ancient period. In this method of oral transmission, which is still practiced in our times, specialist priests and scholars belonging to the brāhmaṇa caste are trained from early childhood to memorize an entire work in multiple forms: by phoneme (sound unit), word, verse, chapter, and book; by mnemonic summaries of the whole work, and by its “indexed” words; and even by the reverse order of its verses. Taught orally for a dozen years, a good Vedic priest who specializes in the Ṛg-veda (ca. 1000 B.C.E.), for example, can recite all 1,028 hymns in its ten books, can confirm their correct order, can reproduce any individual verse at will, and can orally list every occurrence of a given word in the text. Unlike a bard, a Vedic reciter communicates divine revelation, and hence is not free to invent, embellish, or err. In post-Vedic times (starting ca. 500 B.C.E.), this method was extended to other kinds of composition in Sanskrit. In the classical period (ca. 400–1100 C.E.), for instance, poets and literary scholars memorized entire bodies of kāvya, so that their literature was always at hand—a practice that also continued well into the twentieth century.

Knowledge of the early writing system of the Indus-Harappan people did not survive the end of their civilization, around 1900 B.C.E. A new system of indigenous writing most likely reappeared around 500 B.C.E., and acquired its canonical form some 250 years later. This was the Brahmi script system, in which writing proceeds from left to right and uses alphabetical letters and diacritical marks to represent syllables (whole sounds), and hence is classified as an alpha-syllabary system, as distinct from the Greek and Latin scripts, which are strictly alphabetical. Brahmi migrated rapidly across South Asia after 250 B.C.E., spawning what would eventually become, over the next 1,500 years or so, the dozen distinct script systems in which most of the languages of the region are recorded. These include Sanskrit, Bengali, Hindi, Marathi, Kannada, and Tamil, among other languages, Urdu being among the few exceptions written in a modified Persian-Arabic script, which arrived from outside the subcontinent. During the same period, Brahmi also migrated out of India and became a transnational phenomenon of world importance: it engendered the scripts of Tibetan (Tibet), Burmese (Myanmar), Thai (Thailand), Javanese and Sumatran (Indonesia), Cham (Vietnam), and Tagalog (the Philippines), and hence launched literacy and literature across a wide swath of Asia.

By the beginning of the Common Era, professional scribes had begun to produce manuscripts with a metal stylus on prepared sheets of bark or palm leaves, tied together with string. Paper and ink first became common on the Indian subcontinent in the thirteenth century C.E.; until then, for more than a millennium, the principal form of a Sanskrit book was a palm-leaf manuscript: though highly perishable, it succeeded in recording an enormous quantity of literature, disseminating Indian epics, lyrics, stories, and plays all over the subcontinent, and well beyond its boundaries.

SOCIETY, POLITICS, AND RELIGION

The first Vedic hymns (ca. 1200 B.C.E.), and the first collection of hymns, the R̥g-veda saṃhitā (ca. 1000 B.C.E.), were most likely composed in Punjab, “the land of five rivers” that are the tributaries of the Indus. Over the next few centuries, the Indo-Aryans pushed farther east, settling on the wider and equally fertile plains surrounding the Ganges river system, up to modern Bihar and Bengal. By the seventh century B.C.E., the expansion of agriculture and cattle breeding produced enough prosperity to support the first towns and cities across northern India, such as Banaras and Ayodhyā (which still flourish today). With this emerged the first recognizable political form in India: the small republic centered around an urban capital, not unlike a city-state, ruled by a lineage of hereditary monarchs. This became both the historical context and the narrative setting of the first Sanskrit epic, the Rāmāyaṇa, begun in the sixth century B.C.E. and composed on the central Gangetic plains.

A couple of centuries later, the small republics started to give way to bigger kingdoms that could garner sufficient surpluses from the land to maintain large armies, and control territories of several hundred square miles. Shortly after Alexander the Great invaded western and northern India, reaching Punjab in 327 B.C.E. and leaving behind a Greek colony in Gandhara (today’s Peshawar and Swat Valley region, in Pakistan), the Maurya dynasty established the subcontinent’s first empire—which stretched from Afghanistan to Bengal, and from the Himalayan foothills to the Deccan Plateau. Situated imaginatively in the transitional period between small republics and a vast empire, the other ancient Sanskrit epic, the Mahabharata (ca. 400

B.C.E.—400 C.E.), represents a world of powerful monarchies and many medium-sized kingdoms, from which the older republican ideal was beginning to fade.

This evolving world was shaped by the religion we now call Hinduism. One of the most influential ideas in Hinduism is that the universe, as it exists, is fashioned in a vast process of self-generation, in which all the primordial substance out of which it is made is godhead itself. Godhead, or “the god beyond god,” is the absolute and undifferentiated original matter of the universe, and it divides itself into everything that exists; it is eternal and indestructible, and hence has no beginning or end in time. God in this view is not a creator god, or an anthropomorphic father, or a wrathful or vengeful deity; godhead is unknowable, unimaginable, and indescribable. Since everything that exists is made out of godhead (and there is no other elemental matter in the universe), god is everywhere and in everything—a view that constitutes pantheism. In some Vedic hymns, this all-pervading godhead is called Puruṣa, “spirit” (in the masculine gender); in the Upaniṣads, it is renamed Brahman (not to be confused with either brāhmaṇa, the priestly caste-group, or Brahmā, the later, anthropomorphic “god of creation”). The soul, spirit, or “self” (ātman) that animates every living creature is nothing but a piece of Puruṣa or Brahman, so it, too, is eternal and indestructible. The universe as we know it has a beginning in cosmic time, and therefore also comes to an end; since godhead cyclically differentiates itself into a particular universe, all its indestructible substance must return to it at the end of a cycle and be reintegrated into its primordial state. Any life-form’s ultimate goal therefore is to be reunited with absolute godhead; for an individual soul or ātman, such a union with the elemental stuff of the universe is possible only if it can achieve mokṣa, or “liberation,” from its differentiated existence.

Works such as the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahabharata further show us that many of Hinduism’s characteristic doctrines follow from this theology of Brahman and ātman. Each of the popular gods in its pantheon becomes an aspect or a manifestation of godhead in an anthropomorphic or concrete form, which is especially useful in making divinity accessible to humans. The great gods Viṣṇu and Śiva are manifestations of godhead in equal measure; though Viṣṇu is often characterized as the god of preservation, and Śiva is distinguished as the god of destruction, each performs all the functions of creation, preservation, and destruction that only pure godhead can perform. The same is true of the anthropomorphic Brahmā, usually called the god of creation; and, by extension—because Hinduism, in the final analysis, does not attribute gender to godhead—it is equally true of the goddesses Lakṣmī, Pārvatī, and Sarasvatī (the consorts of Viṣṇu, Śiva, and Brahmā, respectively), each of whom also is a complete embodiment of godhead. Since godhead can thus take on countless forms, there cannot be any one true representation of divinity; from its earliest phase, Hinduism therefore consistently commits itself to polytheism, the belief that there are many gods. As a result, from its very beginnings in agrarian Indo-Aryan society in northern India, Hinduism emerges as a fundamentally pluralistic religion, tolerant (in principle) of the worship of many different gods in many different ways, and of the pursuit of divergent ways of life, each of which has the potential to discover a path to mokṣa for an individual ātman.

THE RELIGIOUS CONTEXTS OF EPIC AND TALE

Within this broad matrix, India’s early epics and narrative traditions develop along specific religious lines, but also in keeping with the social world shaped by Hinduism. Vālmīki’s Rāmāyaṇa, composed and transmitted orally at the outset, is classified as the first poem in Sanskrit because it emphasizes imaginative and aesthetic excellence outside a religious context; but it also takes the mythology of Viṣṇu and the practices of Hindu society for granted. In this framework, Viṣṇu is the “supreme god” who manifests all aspects of godhead; and Vedic rituals are essential for pleasing various gods and ensuring that individuals can pursue mokṣa. At the same time, the epic depicts a hierarchical society divided into four main caste-groups by birth: brāhmaṇas (priests), kṣatriyas (warriors), vaiśyas (traders), and śūdras (servants and cultivators). Theologically, this separation of castes is part of the primary differentiation of godhead into distinct categories of existence, and hence is divinely ordained and immutable; in most circumstances, an individual therefore cannot migrate from one caste to another on the basis of, say, talent or accomplishment. This structure is maintained by a system of endogamous marriage, in which legitimate spouses must belong to the same caste-group, so that their children are also born into their social category; in such a world, marriage is irrevocable, and miscegenation and adultery across castes can deeply destabilize not only the human order, but the cosmic moral order as well. The Rāmāyaṇa also depicts a society of villages and small republics, in which dynasties of kings do not yet pursue imperial ambitions: their role here is to preserve the divine order of things, in both the mundane world and the cosmos at large, which is populated by human beings, animal, plants, and inanimate things as well as demons, celestial beings, and gods.

In the Mahabharata, composed a little later, village society coexists with a more complex urban world: the land is now divided into many sizable dynastic kingdoms on the verge of imperial formations. The four caste-groups (varṇas) have separated into five, with the addition of “untouchables” and foreigners (such as the Greeks left behind by Alexander’s army); and each caste-group is differentiated into numerous specific castes (jātis). While the Rāmāyaṇa upholds the ideal of monogamous marriage within caste boundaries, the Mahābhārata explores multiple marriages and reproductive relationships, overlaying polygamy with polyandry and complicating issues of legitimacy, illegitimacy, and legacy by birth. Whereas the earlier epic distinguishes sharply between good and evil, the later poem adopts more complex and varying views on how action (karma) can accord with divine law (dharma); as the laws revealed by the gods in the Vedas and explained in later authoritative discourse (such as the śāstras and sūtras) are intricate, many judgments regarding the rightness and wrongness of particular actions founder in uncertainty. The Bhagavad-gītā, which is part of the Mahabharata, tackles the dilemmas of karma in the most difficult of situations: when is war just, how can violence and killing ever be justified, and under what circumstances can human beings even conceive of taking up arms against family and loved ones? The philosophical and theological arguments about the human and the divine, and about social and political organization, launched by the Indo-Aryans toward the end of the second millennium B.C.E., thus reach a poetic culmination in the encyclopedic structure of the Mahabharata a thousand years later.

As this historical overview suggests, for most of the ancient period the Indian subcontinent was not politically united. This pattern was to continue in the Common Era, down to modern times; since the end of British colonial rule (1757–1947), South Asia has come to be divided into seven nations, and its total population is now nearly 1.6 billion people, about three-fourths of whom live in contemporary India. The ancient period also witnessed internal religious division, with Jainism and Buddhism dissenting from Hinduism—a process that was repeated later with the arrival of other faiths, such as Zoroastrianism (ca. eleventh century) and Christianity, and the rise of Sikhism (both sixteenth century). Nevertheless, for the more than three millennia since the establishment of agrarian Indo-Aryan village society, the subcontinent has functioned as a cohesive cultural zone characterized by diversity and pluralism, which define the distinctive context of its early epics and tales.

THE RĀMĀYAṆA OF VĀLMĪKI

ca. 550 B.C.E.

---

The Rāmāyaṇa is many things to many people. It is a tale of adventure across a vast land, from palace to forest to sea; and a love story about an ideal prince and an ideal woman, whose relationship falters late in their marriage. It is a heroic epic about injustice and war, abduction and disinheritance, but also a wondrous tale involving gods, humans, animals, and demons with supernatural powers. It is a religious epic that explains the ways of the gods to human beings, and offers a model of justice and prosperity on earth. Moreover, it is great entertainment: like a roller coaster, it takes us up and down through many facets of human experience, from goodness, beauty, and romance to fear and tragedy.

CONTEXT

All we know about Vālmīki is the little he tells us about himself in his poem. He was an ascetic spiritual practitioner who had renounced normal life in human society, and lived in a small ashram, a hermit's enclave, on the banks of a river. One day he saw a pair of birds making love to each other, but a moment later a hunter shot and killed the male bird with an arrow. Incensed with this violent intrusion into a scene of great natural tenderness and beauty, Vālmīki pronounced an irrevocable curse on the hunter. Reflecting on what he had just uttered, the poet realized that he had spontaneously composed a śloka, an unrhymed metrical verse like a couplet, which fully expressed his compassionate grief for the slaughtered bird. Realizing that this verse form would be a perfect vehicle for story as well as song, Vālmīki set about using the śloka to compose the heroic and romantic tale of Rāma and Sītā, whose twin sons, Lava and Kuśa—by a twist of events—were then being raised in his ashram. Thus, the poet's life and character are fully integrated with the heroic world he creates and the tale he chooses to narrate. In the version of the epic we have inherited, and in the tradition since Vālmīki's time, he is celebrated as “the first poet,” and his Rāmāyaṇa is known as “the inaugural poem” in Indian literature.

Vālmīki's epic tale—nearly one-and-a-half times the combined length of the Iliad and the Odyssey—was originally composed in Sanskrit around the sixth century B.C.E. By that time, a settled society had been in place in northern India for at least a thousand years. Agriculture had become the principal economic activity on the fertile plains around the Indus and Ganges rivers, and it supported a network of prosperous villages, towns, and cities. Society was organized by caste, with priests (brāhmaṇas), warriors (kṣatriyas), and traders (vaiśyas) comprising the three main groups, and the large populace that served them (śūdras) constituting the fourth category in the hierarchy. The caste structure was maintained primarily by a system of arranged marriage, in which, ideally, the bridegroom and the bride belonged to the same caste but not the same clan. Each caste-group had its own laws and moral codes (dharma), which defined its members' duties and obligations, but it also had to obey laws that applied to all of society. These laws were not made by human beings: they were given by the gods, and were contained in scripture.

Hinduism, which was central to upholding this social order, had been established in its early form several centuries before Vālmīki; its scriptural canon included ritual texts (the Vedas) as well as philosophy and theology (the Upaniṣads). In this system of beliefs, human beings could find "salvation" only if they accumulated "good karma" by propitiating the gods and following dharma precisely. But moral laws and codes of conduct are always complex and subtle, and hence easy to violate; numerous rituals are therefore necessary to keep the gods happy, maintain the moral and social orders, and make up for ethical lapses.

The world of the Rāmāyaṇa is structured in a similar way, but it also contains many gods, among whom three are the most important: Brahmā, primarily a benign and paternalistic god of creation; Śiva, chiefly an angry and retributive god who engenders cycles of creation and destruction; and Viṣṇu, mainly a benevolent god who preserves the moral balance of the universe. Much of the flux and dynamism of the universe is due to the perpetual struggle for supremacy between Śiva and Viṣṇu. Śiva intervenes in the human world directly, in his multifaceted anthropomorphic form; Viṣṇu, in contrast, "comes down on earth" in a series of distinct avatars or incarnations, living temporarily among mortal creatures each time for the purpose of destroying a particular source of evil. A vital feature of the Rāmāyaṇa is that it tells the story of Lord Viṣṇu's seventh incarnation, when he embodied himself as prince Rāma, in order to end the demonic king Rāvaṇa's reign of terror on earth and beyond.

The mundane world that Vālmīki's characters inhabit is also a deeply political one, where the two upper caste-groups, the brāhmaṇas (priests) and the kṣatriyas (warriors and rulers), dominate society. The land is divided into small, autonomous republics with prosperous cities for their capitals. The king belongs to a dynasty of warriors, but is not an absolute monarch; his power is mediated by court priests and scholarly brāhmaṇas. He is defined as a "protector of dharma," and his ideal role is to ensure that he and his subjects follow all laws. He is also fully answerable to his subjects; as their moral caretaker, he is obliged to pay attention to their needs, their voices of affirmation and protest. Moreover, the king is further constrained by life in his palace: he is usually polygamous, and has several queens; he is therefore the head of an extended family whose members participate actively in affairs of state. The warrior-dynasties in these republics follow the law of primogeniture, so that the eldest son ascends the throne in the next generation; but the inheritance of the kingdom can be complicated by the protodemocratic politics of the royal family as well as of public opinion, or by the inability of the king and his queens to beget a son. All these aspects of early Indian society, religion, and politics come into play in the dramatic narrative of the Rāmāyaṇa.

WORK

While Vālmīki probably composed his poem around 550 B.C.E., it was expanded and polished anonymously by others over the next five or six hundred years. Since writing systems did not exist in his society, he must have composed the epic orally, using a large repertoire of formulaic expressions. During its first few centuries, the Rāmāyaṇa must have been transmitted with the sophisticated methods of memorization, preservation, and reproduction already used for Hindu scripture. In its modern canonical form, the Sanskrit Rāmāyaṇa contains about 24,000 couplets (ślokas) and is divided into seven books (kāṇḍas), each subdivided into a large number of chapters (sargas), most of which contain between twenty and fifty couplets. The first and last books seem to have been added later; they explicitly interpret Rāma as an avatar of Viṣṇu, and provide a multi-layered narrative frame for the five books in the middle.

The English version of the Rāmāyaṇa reproduced here is not a translation but an adaptation and retelling of Vālmīki's poem. For the most part, it condenses the narrative of each chapter in a style that appeals to modern readers; but, in select passages, especially with important pieces of dialogue, its rendering is closer to the original. Our selection consists of excerpts from books 2, 3, and 6 that capture the key moments of the tale; together, they convey the epic's essential story as Vālmīki probably imagined it.

To understand our selection, it is necessary to know what happens in book 1, Bāla ("Childhood"), which is not represented here. In that book, Rāvaṇa, the brilliant and highly accomplished king of Laṅkā (an island in the south, modern Sri Laṅkā), has become invincible, demonic, and evil. Lord Viṣṇu therefore has to descend to earth in a human form and destroy him, and so takes birth as Rāma, the eldest son of Daśaratha, king of Kosala, and his principal queen, Kausalyā. Daśaratha also has two other queens, who bear him sons (Rāma's half-brothers): Kaikeyī is the mother of Bharata, whereas Sumitrā has twins, Lakṣmaṇa and Śatrughna. All four boys are trained as warriors and future rulers; Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, inseparable since childhood, become the pupils of the sage Viśvāmitra. As teenagers, they travel with Viśvāmitra to the neighboring Videha, where Rāma wins a suitors' contest for Sītā, the foster-daughter of that republic's king but actually a child of the goddess Earth.

Our selection begins with book 2, Ayodhyā, where Daśaratha follows the code of primogeniture and proclaims Rāma as heir apparent to Kosala's throne, and the republic's citizens celebrate the decision enthusiastically. But following an intrigue in the extended family, Daśaratha gives in to the demand that his second son, Bharata, be made king, and that Rāma be exiled for fourteen years. We then see how Rāma responds to this development, and what decisions he, Sītā, Lakṣmaṇa, and Bharata make under the circumstances. The chapters in this book are composed in a realistic style on the whole, and they give us vivid glimpses into the thoughts and feelings of the characters involved in the struggle for power.

The excerpts from the remaining books focus on Rāma, Sītā, and Lakṣmaṇa's fourteen-year exile together, and the narrative now has the atmosphere of fairy tale and fantasy. In book 3, Āraṇya ("The Forest"), the trio pushes deeper into the vast Daṇḍaka forest, south of the River Ganges, whose only inhabitants are animals, ascetics, and demons. We discover how they learn to survive under hostile conditions, and what kinds of dangers and temptations they encounter. While the three are living peacefully in the Pañcavaṭī woodlands (in central India), Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa unwittingly initiate a conflict with Śūrpaṇakhā and her brother Rāvaṇa, the demonic king of Laṅkā. Enraged by their provocation, Rāvaṇa decides to destroy Rāma by abducting Sītā; how he carries out his plan constitutes a pivotal moment in the epic.

When Rāma realizes that Sītā is gone, he virtually goes mad with grief.

Books 4 and 5 (not in the anthology) follow Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa as they search desperately for Sītā. In book 4, Kiṣkindhā (“The Kingdom of the Monkeys”), Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa encounter a tribe of monkeys, whose citadel is at Kiṣkindhā (in southern India). Intervening in the political quarrels among their factions, the princes persuade the monkeys, and one of their powerful leaders, Hanumān, to help them look for her. In book 5, Sundara (“The Sundara Hill” [in Laṅkā]), Hanumān spies on Rāvaṇa’s capital, and discovers where Sītā is held captive. But she refuses to escape with Hanumān for reasons that deepen the moral dimension of the story, and that leave him in a quandary. Hanumān then sets fire to Rāvaṇa’s city as a warning of impending war, and returns to apprise Rāma of the situation.

In book 6, Yuddha (“The War”), the monkeys build a bridge or causeway across the straits to Laṅkā with remarkable inventiveness. One of Rāvaṇa’s brothers betrays him and joins the princes, helping them with their battle plans. After a lengthy conflict, in which Rāvaṇa’s other brothers are killed and Lakṣmaṇa is wounded, Rāma finally confronts the demon king in single combat. When he recovers Sītā, however, he finds himself deeply troubled by the question of whether she has been faithful to him during her long captivity. Resolving his dilemma with a dramatic test of fidelity, Rāma returns to Ayodhyā with Sītā and Lakṣmaṇa, and is crowned king. His reign brings peace, prosperity, and justice to the republic of Kosala, and represents the ideal of kingship.

Our selection ends on this happy note, but the canonical version of Vālmīki’s epic continues further. In book 7, Uttara (“The Final Book”), not included here, Rāma seems set to rule happily for the rest of his days; but people soon begin to gossip viciously about Sītā’s probable infidelity with Rāvaṇa. In a misguided attempt to be morally answerable to his subjects, Rāma banishes Sītā, even though he knows that the rumors are false and that she is pregnant. Sītā takes refuge in the sage Vālmīki’s ashram, where she gives birth to twin boys, Lava and Kuśa. Vālmīki composes a long poem about the life of Rāma; he trains the twins as bards, and teaches them to sing his epic beautifully. One day they sing the tale before the king, who does not know that they are his sons; when he recognizes them, he sends for his beloved queen. Overwhelmed by her suffering by then, however, Sītā asks her mother, the Earth, to take her back; the ground opens beneath her feet, and she disappears forever. Heartbroken, Rāma divides his kingdom between his sons, gives up his life on earth, and returns to heaven in his divine form as Viṣṇu, his task of destroying Rāvaṇa’s evil accomplished.

Vālmīki’s style in the original varies according to narrative mode. Many important events are narrated directly from an omniscient point of view; in contrast, when characters in the story tell a tale or engage in dialogue, the verse is adapted to capture their voices and personalities. In book 2, when the action is situated in the palace, the descriptions are frequently realistic; in books 3 through 5, when the action is set in the forest and focuses on animals, demons, and fantastic events—Rāvaṇa changing his form, Hanumān flying over the sea—the atmosphere and effect are often fantastic. Even in the forest scenes, however, dream-like passages can be interspersed with flashes of realism, indicating how carefully the text is crafted throughout.

Vālmīki’s poem articulates a strong moral vision. It offers us the ideals of Rāma as a son, husband, and king who is serene, courageous, and circumspect; Sītā as a vibrant, thoughtful, and selfless wife and mother; Lakṣmaṇa as a brother and brother-in-law whose first thought is always for his extended family; and Hanumān as a loyal devotee. All these characters are larger than life, but each of them is also flawed or suffers great injustice. Moreover, in a polygamous society, Vālmīki's epic proposes the norm of monogamous marriage based on mutual love between husband and wife; in a world of political conflict, it portrays republics that build alliances for peace, and rulers and subjects who live by the law, aiming for social harmony. It explicitly promotes justice, goodness, balance, and morality in forms that remain valid today, even though we may not always agree on the details from a modern perspective.

As a literary narrative with scripture-like religious authority, the story of Rāma is special because it is fully integrated into the annual Hindu calendar, the way the story of Christ and the rituals of Christmas, Good Friday, and Easter are woven into the Christian calendar. Every year, in the weeks following the autumnal equinox, the public festivals of Dusehrā and Dīvalī mark the anniversaries, respectively, of Rāma's victory over Rāvaṇa and Rāma's return to Ayodhyā. Over the nine nights preceding Dusehrā, thousands of local Hindu communities throughout India perform the Rāma-līlā, "the play of Rāma"; in each community, children, teenagers, and adults enact the full story of Rāma in nightly installments on an amateur stage, culminating in a ritual burning of gigantic effigies representing Rāvaṇa and his brothers. On the next night of the new moon (usually in late October), every Indian village, town, and city celebrates Dīvalī, the festival of lights, a symbolic affirmation of Rāma's coronation as king and the cyclical restoration of goodness and justice in the world.

During the past two millennia, Vālmīki's Rāmāyaṇa has spread astonishingly far. In India, hundreds of translations, imitations, adaptations, and retellings have appeared in the dozens of languages that gradually replaced Sanskrit after the first millennium c.e. Many of these local and regional versions of the epic—such as Kamban's Īrāmatāram (Tamil, twelfth century) and Tulsīdās's Rāmacaritamānasa (Avadhi/Hindi, sixteenth century)—have become literary and religious classics in their own right; and many of them are transmitted orally, in a form called the Rāmākathā ("the story of Rāma"), in public readings and recitations by professional performers sponsored annually by local communities. Outside India, the Rāmāyaṇa has migrated to the Persian, Arabic, and Chinese worlds; the central character of the Monkey King in Journey to the West, one of the four major classical novels in Chinese, is modeled on Hanumān. The epic has also reached every part of Southeast Asia, from Malaysia and Indonesia to the Philippines. Vālmīki's tale (originally a Hindu work) reappears with variations in the Thai Rāmakiern (thirteenth century), the national epic of Thailand; in the relief sculptures at Angkor Wat, the Hindu temple complex in Cambodia (twelfth century onward); in Balinese classical and folk dance, dance drama, and pantomime; and in the spectacular puppet and shadow-puppet theaters of Malaysia and Indonesia (Muslim-majority societies) and Thailand and Cambodia (Buddhist-majority societies). The characters and stories of Rāma and Sītā, Lakṣmaṇa and Hanumān and Rāvaṇa, are among the best known for almost half the world's population today.

From Book 2

Ayodhyā

AYODHYĀ 15–16

The brāhmaṇas<sup>2</sup> had got everything ready for the coronation ceremonies. Gold pots of holy water from all the sacred rivers, most of them gathered at their very source, were ready. All the paraphernalia like the umbrella, the chowries,<sup>3</sup> an elephant and a white horse, were ready, too.

But, the king did not emerge, though the sun had risen and the auspicious hour was fast approaching. The priests and the people wondered: “Who can awaken the king, and inform him that he had better hurry up!” At that moment, Sumantra<sup>4</sup> emerged from the palace. Seeing them, he told them: “Under the king’s orders I am going to fetch Rāma.” But, on second thought, knowing that the preceptors and the priests commanded even the king’s respect, he returned to the king’s presence to announce that they were awaiting him. Standing near the king, Sumantra sang: “Arise, O king! Night has flown. Arise and do what should be done.” The weary king asked: “I ordered you to fetch Rāma, and I am not asleep. Why do you not do as you are told to do?” This time, Sumantra hurried out of the palace and sped to Rāma’s palace.

Entering the palace and proceeding unobstructed through the gates and entrances of the palace, Sumantra beheld the divine Rāma, and said to him: “Rāma, the king who is in the company of queen Kaikeyī desires to see you at once.” Immediately, Rāma turned to Sītā and announced: “Surely, the king and mother Kaikeyī wish to discuss with me some important details in connection with the coronation ceremony. I shall go and return soon.” Sītā, for her part, offered a heartfelt prayer to the gods: “May I have the blessing of humbly serving you during the auspicious coronation ceremony!”

As Rāma emerged from his palace there was great cheer among the people who hailed and applauded him. Ascending his swift chariot he proceeded to the king’s palace, followed by the regalia. Women standing at the windows of their houses and richly adorned to express their joy, showered flowers on Rāma. They praised Kausalyā, the mother of Rāma; they praised Sītā, Rāma’s consort: “Obviously she must have done great penance to get him as her husband.” The people rejoiced as if they themselves were being installed on the throne. They said to one another: “Rāma’s coronation is truly a blessing to all the people. While he rules, and he will rule for a long time, no one will even have an unpleasant experience, or ever suffer.” Rāma too was happy to see the huge crowds of people, the elephants and the horses—indicating that people had come to Ayodhyā from afar to witness the coronation.

AYODHYĀ 17–18

As Rāma proceeded in his radiant chariot towards his father's palace, the people were saying to one another: "We shall be supremely happy hereafter, now that Rāma will be king. But, who cares for all this happiness? When we behold Rāma on the throne, we shall attain eternal beatitude!" Rāma heard all this praise and the people's worshipful homage to him, with utter indifference as he drove along the royal road.<sup>5</sup> The chariot entered the first gate to the palace. From there on Rāma went on foot and respectfully entered the king's apartments. The people who had accompanied him eagerly waited outside.

Rushing eagerly and respectfully to his father's presence, Rāma bowed to the feet of his father and then devoutly touched the feet of his mother Kaikeyī, too. "O Rāma!" said the king: he could not say anything more, because he was choked with tears and grief. He could neither see nor speak to Rāma. Rāma sensed great danger: as if he had trodden on a most poisonous serpent. Turning to Kaikeyī, Rāma asked her: "How is it that today the king does not speak kindly to me? Have I offended him in any way? Is he not well? Have I offended prince Bharata or any of my mothers? Oh, it is agonizing: and incurring his displeasure I cannot live even for an hour. Kindly reveal the truth to me."

In a calm, measured and harsh tone, Kaikeyī now said to Rāma: "The king is neither sick nor angry with you. What he must tell you he does not wish to, for fear of displeasing you. He granted me two boons. When I named them, he recoiled. How can a truthful man, a righteous king, go back on his own word? Yet that is his predicament at the moment. I shall reveal the truth to you if you assure me that you will honor your father's promise." For the first time Rāma was distressed: "Ah, shame! Please do not say such things to me! For the sake of my father I can jump into fire. And, I assure you, Rāma does not indulge in double talk. Hence, tell me what the king wants to be done."

Kaikeyī lost no time. She said: "Long ago I rendered him a great service, and he granted me two boons. I claimed them now: and he promised. I asked for these boons: that Bharata should be crowned, and that you should go away to Daṇḍaka forest now. If you wish to establish that both you and your father are devoted to truth, let Bharata be crowned with the same paraphernalia that have been got ready for you, and go away to the forest for fourteen years. Do this, O best of men, for that is the word of your father; and thus would you redeem the king."

AYODHYĀ 19–20

Promptly and without the least sign of the slightest displeasure, Rāma said: "So be it! I shall immediately proceed to the forest, to dwell there clad in bark and animal skin."<sup>6</sup> But why does not the king speak to me, nor feel happy in my presence? Please do not misunderstand me; I shall go, and I myself will gladly give away to my brother Bharata the kingdom, wealth, Sītā and even my own life, and it is easier when all this is done in obedience to my father's command. Let had to wear tree bark and animal skins. Queen Kaikeyī's demands included requiring Rāma to live the austere life of a hermit.

Bharata be immediately requested to come. But it breaks my heart to see that father does not say a word to me directly.”

Kaikeyī said sternly: “I shall attend to all that, and send for Bharata. I think, however, that you should not delay your departure from Ayodhyā even for a moment. Even the consideration that the father does not say so himself, should not stop you. Till you leave this city, he will neither bathe nor eat.” Hearing this, the king groaned, and wailed aloud: “Alas, alas!” and became unconscious again. Rāma decided to leave at once and he said to Kaikeyī: “I am not fond of wealth and pleasure: but even as the sages are, I am devoted to truth. Even if father had not commanded me, and you had asked me to go to the forest I would have done so! I shall presently let my mother and also Sītā know of the position and immediately leave for the forest.”

Rāma was not affected at all by this sudden turn of events. As he emerged from the palace, with Lakṣmaṇa, the people tried to hold the royal umbrella over him: but he brushed them aside. Still talking pleasantly and sweetly with the people, he entered his mother’s apartment. Delighted to see him, Kausalyā began to glorify and bless him and asked him to sit on a royal seat. Rāma did not, but calmly said to her: “Mother, the king has decided to crown Bharata as the yuvarājā<sup>7</sup> and I am to go to the forest and live there as a hermit for fourteen years.” When she heard this, the queen fell down unconscious and grief-stricken. In a voice choked with grief, she said: “If I had been barren, I would have been unhappy; but I would not have had to endure this terrible agony. I have not known a happy day throughout my life. I have had to endure the taunts and the insults of the other wives of the king. Nay, even he did not treat me with kindness or consideration: I have always been treated with less affection and respect than Kaikeyī’s servants were treated. I thought that after your birth, and after your coronation my luck would change. My hopes have been shattered. Even death seems to spurn me. Surely, my heart is hard as it does not break into pieces at this moment of the greatest misfortune and sorrow. Life is not worth living without you; so if you have to go to the forest, I shall follow you.”

AYODHYĀ 21

Lakṣmaṇa said: “I think Rāma should not go to the forest. The king has lost his mind, overpowered as he is by senility and lust. Rāma is innocent. And, no righteous man in his senses would forsake his innocent son. A prince with the least knowledge of statesmanship should ignore the childish command of a king who has lost his senses.” Turning to Rāma, he said: “Rāma, here I stand, devoted to you, dedicated to your cause. I am ready to kill anyone who would interfere with your coronation—even if it is the king! Let the coronation proceed without delay.”

Kausalyā said: “You have heard Lakṣmaṇa’s view. You cannot go to the forest because Kaikeyī wants you to. If, as you say, you are devoted to dharma, then it is your duty to stay here and serve me, your mother. I, as your mother, am as much worthy of your devotion and service as your father is: and I do not give you permission to go to the forest. If you disobey me in this, terrible will be your suffering in hell. I cannot live here without you. If you leave, I shall fast unto death.”

Rāma, devoted as he was to dharma, spoke: “Among our ancestors were renowned kings who earned fame and heaven by doing their father’s bidding. Mother, I am but following their noble example.” To Lakṣmaṇa he said: “Lakṣmaṇa, I know your devotion to me, love for me, your prowess and your strength. The universe rests on truth: and I am devoted to truth. Mother has not understood my view of truth, and hence suffers. But I am unable to give up my resolve. Abandon your resolve based on the principle of might; resort to dharma;<sup>8</sup> let not your intellect become aggressive. Dharma, prosperity and pleasure are the pursuit of mankind here;<sup>9</sup> and prosperity and pleasure surely follow dharma: even as pleasure and the birth of a son follow a dutiful wife’s service of her husband. One should turn away from that action or mode of life which does not ensure the attainment of all the three goals of life, particularly of dharma; for hate springs from wealth and the pursuit of pleasure is not praiseworthy. The commands of the guru, the king, and one’s aged father, whether uttered in anger, cheerfully, or out of lust, should be obeyed by one who is not of despicable behavior, with a view to the promotion of dharma. Hence, I cannot swerve from the path of dharma which demands that I should implicitly obey our father. It is not right for you, mother, to abandon father and follow me to the forest, as if you are a widow. Therefore, bless me, mother, so that I may have a pleasant and successful term in the forest.”

AYODHYĀ 22–23

Rāma addressed Lakṣmaṇa again: “Let there be no delay, Lakṣmaṇa. Get rid of these articles assembled for the coronation. And with equal expedition make preparations for my leaving the kingdom immediately. Only thus can we ensure that mother Kaikeyī attains peace of mind. Otherwise she might be worried that her wishes may not be fulfilled! Let father’s promise be fulfilled. Yet, so long as the two objects of Kaikeyī’s desire are not obtained, there is bound to be confusion in everyone’s mind. I must immediately leave for the forest; then Kaikeyī will get Bharata here and have him installed on the throne. This is obviously the divine will and I must honor it without delay. My banishment from the kingdom as well as my return are all the fruits of my own doing (kṛtānta: end of action). Otherwise, how could such an unworthy thought enter the heart of noble Kaikeyī? I have never made any distinction between her and my mother; nor has she ever shown the least disaffection for me so far. The ‘end’ (reaction) of one’s own action cannot be foreseen: and this which we call ‘daiva’ (providence or divine will) cannot be known and cannot be avoided by anyone. Pleasure, pain, fear, anger, gain, loss, life and death—all these are brought about by ‘daiva.’ Even sages and great ascetics are prompted by the divine will to give up their self-control and are subjected to lust and anger. It is unforeseen and inviolable. Hence, let there be no hostility towards Kaikeyī; she is not to blame. All this is not her doing, but the will of the divine.”

Lakṣmaṇa listened to all this with mixed feelings: anger at the turn events had taken, and admiration for Rāma's attitude. Yet, he could not reconcile himself to the situation as Rāma had done. In great fury, he burst forth: “Your sense of duty is misdirected, O Rāma. Even so is your estimation of the divine will. How is it, Rāma, that being a shrewd statesman, you do not see that there are self-righteous people who merely pretend to be good for achieving their selfish and fraudulent ends? If all these boons and promises be true, they could have been asked for and given long ago! Why did they have to wait for the eve of coronation to enact this farce? You ignore this aspect and bring in your argument of the divine will! Only cowards and weak people believe in an unseen divine will: heroes and those who are endowed with a strong mind do not believe in the divine will. Ah, people will see today how my determination and strong action set aside any decrees of the divine will which may be involved in this unrighteous plot. Whoever planned your exile will go into exile! And you will be crowned today. These arms, Rāma, are not handsome limbs, nor are these weapons worn by me ornaments: they are for your service.”

AYODHYĀ 24–25

Kausalyā said again: “How can Rāma born of me and the mighty emperor Daśaratha live on food obtained by picking up grains and vegetables and fruits that have been discarded? He whose servants eat dainties and delicacies—how will he subsist on roots and fruits? Without you, Rāma, the fire of separation from you will soon burn me to death. Nay, take me with you, too, if you must go.”

Rāma replied: “Mother, that would be extreme cruelty towards father. So long as father lives, please serve him: this is the eternal religion. To a woman her husband is verily god himself. I have no doubt that the noble Bharata will be very kind to you and serve you as I serve you. I am anxious that when I am gone, you should console the king so that he does not feel my separation at all. Even a pious woman who is otherwise righteous, if she does not serve her husband, is deemed to be sinner. On the other hand, she who serves her husband attains blessedness even if she does not worship the gods, perform the rituals or honor the holy men.”

Seeing that Rāma was inflexible in his resolve, Kausalyā regained her composure and blessed him. “I shall eagerly await your return to Ayodhyā, after your fourteen years in the forest,” said Kausalyā.

Quickly gathering the articles necessary, she performed a sacred rite to propitiate the deities and thus to ensure the health, safety, happy sojourn and quick return of Rāma. “May dharma which you have protected so zealously protect you always,” said Kausalyā to Rāma. “May those to whom you bow along the roads and the shrines protect you! Even so, let the missiles which the sage Viśvāmitra<sup>1</sup> gave you ensure your safety. May all the birds and beasts of the forest, celestial beings and gods, the mountains and the oceans, and the deities presiding over the lunar mansions, natural phenomena and the seasons be propitious to you. May the same blessedness be with you that Indra enjoyed on the destruction of his enemy Vṛtra, that Vinatā bestowed upon her son Garuḍa, that Aditi pronounced upon her son Indra when he was fighting the demons, and that Viṣṇu enjoyed while he measured the heaven and earth.<sup>2</sup> May the sages, the oceans, the continents, the Vedas and the heavens be propitious to you.”<sup>3</sup>

As Rāma bent low to touch her feet, Kausalyā fondly embraced him and kissed his forehead, and then respectfully went round him before giving him leave to go.

AYODHYĀ 26–27

Taking leave of his mother, Rāma sought the presence of his beloved wife, Sītā. For her part, Sītā who had observed all the injunctions and prohibitions connected with the eve of the coronation and was getting ready to witness the auspicious event itself, perceived her divine spouse enter the palace and with a heart swelling with joy and pride, went forward to receive him. His demeanor, however, puzzled her: his countenance reflected sorrow and anxiety. Shrewd as she was she realized that something was amiss, and hence asked Rāma: “The auspicious hour is at hand; and yet what do I see! Lord, why are you not accompanied by the regalia, by men holding the ceremonial umbrella, by the royal elephant and the horses, by priests chanting the Vedas, by bards singing your glories? How is it that your countenance is shadowed by sorrow?”

Without losing time and without mincing words, Rāma announced: “Sītā, the king has decided to install Bharata on the throne and to send me to the forest for fourteen years. I am actually on my way to the forest and have come to say good-bye to you. Now that Bharata is the yuvarājā, nay king, please behave appropriately towards him. Remember: people who are in power do not put up with those who sing others’ glories in their presence: hence do not glorify me in the presence of Bharata. It is better not to sing my praises even in the presence of your companions. Be devoted to your religious observances and serve my father, my three mothers and my brothers. Bharata and Śatrughna should be treated as your own brothers or sons. Take great care to see that you do not give the least offense to Bharata, the king. Kings reject even their own sons if they are hostile, and are favorable to even strangers who may be friendly. This is my counsel.”

Sītā feigned anger, though in fact she was amused. She replied to Rāma: “Your advice that I should stay here in the palace while you go to live in the

The eagle Garuḍa is the mount of Viṣṇu, the god of preservation. In the fifth of his ten incarnations, Viṣṇu took the form of a dwarf (Vāmana), who subsequently grew into the gigantic figure Trivikrama (“the god of three strides”), spanned earth and sky with two strides, then crushed the demon Bali with his third step.

forest is unworthy of a heroic prince like you, Lord. Whereas one's father, mother, brother, son and daughter-in-law enjoy their own good or misfortune, the wife alone shares the life of her husband. To a woman, neither father nor son nor mother nor friends but the husband alone is her sole refuge here in this world and in the other world, too. Hence I shall accompany you to the forest. I shall go ahead of you, clearing a path for you in the forest. Life with the husband is incomparably superior to life in a palace, or an aerial mansion, or a trip to heaven! I have had detailed instructions from my parents on how to conduct myself in Ayodhyā! But I shall not stay here. I assure you, I shall not be a burden, an impediment, to you in the forest. Nor will I regard life in the forest as exile or as suffering. With you it will be more than heaven to me. It will not be the least hardship to me; without you, even heaven is hell."

AYODHYĀ 28–29

Thinking of the great hardships they would have to endure in the forest, however, Rāma tried to dissuade Sītā in the following words: "Sītā, you come of a very wealthy family dedicated to righteousness. It is therefore proper that you should stay behind and serve my people here. Thus, by avoiding the hardships of the forest and by lovingly serving my people here, would you gladden my heart. The forest is not a place for a princess like you. It is full of great dangers. Lions dwell in the caves; and it is frightening to hear their roar. These wild beasts are not used to seeing human beings; the way they attack human beings is horrifying even to think about. Even the paths are thorny and it is hard to walk on them. The food is a few fruits which might have fallen on their own accord from the trees: living on them, one has to be contented all day. Our garments will be bark and animal skins: and the hair will have to be matted and gathered on the top of the head. Anger and greed have to be given up, the mind must be directed towards austerity and one should overcome fear even where it is natural. Totally exposed to the inclemencies of nature, surrounded by wild animals, serpents and so on, the forest is full of untold hardships. It is not a place for you, my dear."

This reiteration on the part of Rāma moved Sītā to tears. "Your gracious solicitude for my happiness only makes my love for you more ardent, and my determination to follow you more firm. You mentioned animals: they will never come anywhere near me while you are there. You mentioned the righteousness of serving your people: but, your father's command that you should go to the forest demands I should go, too; I am your half: and because of this, again I cannot live without you. In fact you have often declared that a righteous wife will not be able to live separated from her husband. And listen! This is not new to me: for even when I was in my father's house, long before we were married, wise astrologers had rightly predicted that I would live in a forest for some time. If you remember, I have been longing to spend some time in the forest, for I have trained myself for that eventuality. Lord, I feel actually delighted at the very thought that I shall at last go to the forest, to serve you constantly. Serving you, I shall not incur the sin of leaving your parents: thus have I heard from those who are well-versed in the Vedas and other scriptures, that a devoted wife remains united with her husband even after they leave this earth-plane. There is therefore no valid reason why you should wish to leave me here and go. If you still refuse to take me with you, I have no alternative but to lay down my life.”

AYODHYĀ 30–31

To the further persuasive talk of Rāma, Sītā responded with a show of annoyance, courage and firmness. She even taunted Rāma in the following words: “While choosing you as his son-in-law, did my father Janaka realize that you were a woman at heart with a male body? Why, then, are you, full of valor and courage, afraid even on my account? If you do not take me with you I shall surely die; but instead of waiting for such an event, I prefer to die in your presence. If you do not change your mind now, I shall take poison and die.” In sheer anguish, the pitch of her voice rose higher and higher, and her eyes released a torrent of hot tears.

Rāma folded her in his arms and spoke to her lovingly, with great delight: “Sītā, I could not fathom your mind and therefore I tried to dissuade you from coming with me. Come, follow me. Of course I cannot drop the idea of going to the forest, even for your sake. I cannot live having disregarded the command of my parents. Indeed, I wonder how one could adore the unmanifest god, if one were unwilling to obey the commands of his parents and his guru whom he can see here. No religious activity nor even moral excellence can equal service of one’s parents in bestowing supreme felicity on one. Whatever one desires, and whatever region one desires to ascend to after leaving this earth-plane, all this is secured by the service of parents. Hence I shall do as commanded by father; and this is the eternal dharma. And you have rightly resolved, to follow me to the forest. Come, and get ready soon. Give away generous gifts to the brāhmaṇas and distribute the rest of your possessions to the servants and others.”

Lakṣmaṇa now spoke to Rāma: “If you are determined to go, then I shall go ahead of you.” Rāma, however, tried to dissuade him: “Indeed, I know that you are my precious and best companion. Yet, I am anxious that you should stay behind and look after our mothers. Kaikeyī may not treat them well. By thus serving our mothers, you will prove your devotion to me.” But Lakṣmaṇa replied quickly: “I am confident, Rāma, that Bharata will look after all the mothers, inspired by your spirit of renunciation and your adherence to dharma. If this does not prove to be the case, I can exterminate all of them in no time. Indeed, Kausalyā is great and powerful enough to look after herself: she gave birth to you! My place is near you; my duty to serve you.”

Delighted to hear this, Rāma said: “Then let us all go. Before leaving I wish to give away in charity all that I possess to the holy brāhmaṇas. Please get them all together. Take leave of your friends and get our weapons ready, too.”

ĀRAṆYA 14–15

Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa and Sītā were proceeding towards Pañcavaṭī.<sup>4</sup> On the way they saw a huge vulture. Rāma's first thought was that it was a demon in disguise. The vulture said: "I am your father's friend!" Trusting the vulture's words, Rāma asked for details of its birth and ancestry.

The vulture said: "You know that Dakṣa Prajāpati<sup>5</sup> had sixty daughters and the sage Kaśyapa married eight of them. One day Kaśyapa said to his wives: 'You will give birth to offspring who will be foremost in the three worlds.' Aditi, Diti, Danu and Kālaka listened attentively; the others were indifferent. As a result, the former four gave birth to powerful offspring who were superhuman. Aditi gave birth to thirty-three gods. Diti gave birth to demons. Danu gave birth to Aśvagrīva. And, Kālaka had Naraka and Kālikā. Of the others, men were born of Manu, and the sub-human species from the other wives of Kaśyapa. Tāmra's daughter was Sukī whose granddaughter was Vinatā who had two sons, Garuḍa and Aruṇa. My brother Sampāti and I are the sons of Aruṇa. I offer my services to you, O Rāma. If you will be pleased to accept them, I shall guard Sītā when you and Lakṣmaṇa may be away from your hermitage. As you have seen, this formidable forest is full of wild animals and demons, too."

Rāma accepted this new friendship. All of them now proceeded towards Pañcavaṭī in search of a suitable place for building a hermitage. Having arrived at Pañcavaṭī, identified by Rāma by the description which the sage Agastya had given, Rāma said to Lakṣmaṇa: "Pray, select a suitable place here for building the hermitage. It should have a charming forest, good water, firewood, flowers and holy grass." Lakṣmaṇa submitted: "Even if we live together for a hundred years, I shall continue to be your servant. Hence, Lord, you select the place and I shall do the needful." Rejoicing at Lakṣmaṇa's attitude, Rāma pointed to a suitable place, which satisfied all the requisites of a hermitage. Rāma said: "This is holy ground; this is charming; it is frequented by beasts and birds. We shall dwell here." Immediately Lakṣmaṇa set about building a hermitage for all of them to live in.

Rāma warmly embraced Lakṣmaṇa and said: "I am delighted by your good work and devoted service: and I embrace you in token of such admiration. Brother, you divine the wish of my heart, you are full of gratitude, you know dharma; with such a man as his son, father is not dead but is eternally alive."

Entering that hermitage, Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa and Sītā dwelt in it with great joy and happiness.

ĀRAṆYA 16

Time rolled on. One day Lakṣmaṇa sought the presence of Rāma early in the morning and described what he had seen outside the hermitage. He said: "Winter, the season which you love most, has arrived, O Rāma. There is dry cold everywhere; the earth is covered with foodgrains. Water is uninviting; and fire is pleasant. The first fruits of the harvest have been brought in; and the agriculturists have duly offered some of it to the gods and the manes, and thus reaffirmed their indebtedness to them. The farmer who thus offers the first fruits to gods and manes is freed from sin.

“The sun moves in the southern hemisphere; and the north looks lusterless. Himālaya, the abode of snow, looks even more so! It is pleasant to take a walk even at noon. The shade of a tree which we loved in summer is unpleasant now. Early in the morning the earth, with its rich wheat and barley fields, is enveloped by mist. Even so, the rice crop. The sun, even when it rises, looks soft and cool like the moon. Even the elephants which approach the water, touch it with their trunk but pull the trunk quickly away on account of the coldness of the water.

“Rāma, my mind naturally thinks of our beloved brother Bharata. Even in this cold winter, he who could command the luxury of a king, prefers to sleep on the floor and live an ascetic life. Surely, he, too, would have got up early in the morning and has perhaps had a cold bath in the river Sarayū. What a noble man! I can even now picture him in front of me: with eyes like the petals of a lotus, dark brown in color, slim and without an abdomen, as it were. He knows what dharma is. He speaks the truth. He is modest and self-controlled, always speaks pleasantly, is sweet-natured, with long arms and with all his enemies fully subdued.<sup>6</sup> That noble Bharata has given up all his pleasures and is devoted to you. He has already won his place in heaven, Rāma. Though he lives in the city; yet, he has adopted the ascetic mode of life and follows you in spirit.

“We have heard it said that a son takes after his mother in nature: but in the case of Bharata this has proved false. I wonder how Kaikeyī, in spite of having our father as her husband, and Bharata as her son, has turned out to be so cruel.”

When Lakṣmaṇa said this, Rāma stopped him, saying: “Do not speak ill of our mother Kaikeyī, Lakṣmaṇa. Talk only of our beloved Bharata. Even though I try not to think of Ayodhyā and our people there, when I think of Bharata, I wish to see him.”

ĀRAṆYA 17–18

After their bath and morning prayers, Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa and Sītā returned to their hermitage. As they were seated in their hut, there arrived upon the scene a dreadful demoness. She looked at Rāma and immediately fell in love with him! He had a handsome face; she had an ugly face. He had a slender waist; she had a huge abdomen. He had lovely large eyes; she had hideous eyes. He had lovely soft hair; she had red hair. He had a lovable form; she had a terrible form. He had a sweet voice; hers resembled the barking of a dog. He was young; she was haughty. He was able; her speech was crooked. He was of noble conduct; she was of evil conduct. He was beloved; she had a forbidding appearance. Such a demoness spoke to Rāma: “Who are you, young men; and what are both of you doing in this forest, with this lady?”

6. A list of the conventional attributes of a handsome, brave, and virtuous warrior.

Rāma told her the whole truth about himself, Lakṣmaṇa and Sītā, about his banishment from the kingdom, etc. Then Rāma asked her: “O charming lady,<sup>7</sup> now tell me who you are.” At once the demoness replied: “Ah, Rāma! I shall tell you all about myself immediately. I am Śūrpaṇakhā, the sister of Rāvaṇa. I am sure you have heard of him. He has two other brothers, Kumbhakarṇa and Vibhīṣaṇa.<sup>8</sup> Two other brothers Khara and Dūṣaṇa live in the neighborhood here. The moment I saw you, I fell in love with you. What have you to do with this ugly, emaciated Sītā? Marry me. Both of us shall roam about this forest. Do not worry about Sītā or Lakṣmaṇa: I shall swallow them in a moment.” But, Rāma smilingly said to her: “You see I have my wife with me here. Why do you not propose to my brother Lakṣmaṇa who has no wife here?” Śūrpaṇakhā did not mind that suggestion. She turned to Lakṣmaṇa and said: “It is all right. You please marry me and we shall roam about happily.” She was tormented by passion.

Lakṣmaṇa said in a teasing mood: “O lady, you see that I am only the slave of Rāma and Sītā. Why do you choose to be the wife of a slave? You will only become a servant-maid. Persuade Rāma to send away that ugly wife of his and marry you.” Śūrpaṇakhā turned to Rāma again. She said: “Unable to give up this wife of yours, Sītā, you turn down my offer. See, I shall at once swallow her. When she is gone you will marry me; and we shall roam about in this forest happily.” So saying, she actually rushed towards Sītā. Rāma stopped her in time, and said to Lakṣmaṇa: “What are you doing, Lakṣmaṇa? It is not right to jest with cruel and unworthy people. Look at the plight of Sītā. She barely escaped with her life. Come, quickly deform this demoness and send her away.”

Lakṣmaṇa drew his sword and quickly cut off the nose and the ears of Śūrpaṇakhā. Weeping and bleeding she ran away. She went to her brother Khara and fell down in front of him.

Summary      Distraught and furious, Śūrpaṇakhā asks her brothers Khara and Dūṣaṇa, who live in nearby Janasthāna, to avenge her insult by killing Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. However, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa kill the brothers and all their troops.

ĀRAṆYA 32–33

Śūrpaṇakhā witnessed the wholesale destruction of the demons of Janasthāna,<sup>9</sup> including their supreme leader Khara. Stricken with terror, she ran to Laṅkā. There she saw her brother Rāvaṇa, the ruler of Laṅkā, seated with his ministers in a palace whose roof scraped the sky.<sup>1</sup> Rāvaṇa had twenty arms, ten heads, was broad-chested and endowed with all the physical qualifications of a monarch. He had previously fought with the gods, even with their chief Indra. He was well versed in the science of warfare and knew the use of the celestial missiles in battle. He had been hit by the gods, even by the discus<sup>2</sup> of lord Viṣṇu, but he did not die. For, he had performed breathtaking austerities for a period of ten thousand years, and offered his own heads in worship to Brahmā the creator and earned from him the boon that he would not be killed by any superhuman or subhuman agency (except by man). Emboldened by this boon, the demon had tormented the gods and particularly the sages.

Śūrpaṇakhā entered Rāvaṇa's presence, clearly displaying the physical deformity which Lakṣmaṇa had caused to her. She shouted at Rāvaṇa in open assembly: "Brother, you have become so thoroughly infatuated and addicted to sense-pleasure that you are unfit to be a king any longer. The people lose all respect for the king who is only interested in his own pleasure and neglects his royal duties. People turn away from the king who has no spies, who has lost touch with the people and whom they cannot see, and who is unable to do what is good for them. It is the employment of spies that makes the king 'far-sighted' for through these spies he sees quite far. You have failed to appoint proper spies to collect intelligence for you. Therefore, you do not know that fourteen thousand of your people have been slaughtered by a human being. Even Khara and Dūṣaṇa have been killed by Rāma. And, Rāma has assured the ascetics of Janasthāna which is your territory, that the demons shall not do them any harm. They are now protected by him. Yet, here you are; reveling in little pleasures!

"O brother, even a piece of wood, a clod of earth or just dust, has some use; but when a king falls from his position he is utterly useless. But that monarch who is vigilant, who has knowledge of everything, through his spies, who is self-controlled, who is full of gratitude and whose conduct is righteous—he rules for a long time. Wake up and act before you lose your sovereignty."

This made Rāvaṇa reflect.

ĀRANYA 34–35

And, Rāvaṇa's anger was roused. He asked Śūrpaṇakhā: "Tell me, who is it that disfigured you thus? What do you think of Rāma? Why has he come to Daṇḍaka forest?"

Śūrpaṇakhā gave an exact and colorful description of the physical appearance of Rāma. She said: "Rāma is equal in charm to Cupid himself. At the same time, he is a formidable warrior. When he was fighting the demons of Janasthāna, I could not see what he was doing; I only saw the demons falling dead on the field. You can easily understand when I tell you that within an hour and a half he had killed fourteen thousand demons. He spared me, perhaps because he did not want to kill a woman. He has a brother called Lakṣmaṇa who is equally powerful. He is Rāma's right-hand man and alter ego; Rāma's own life-force moving outside his body. Oh, you must see Sītā, Rāma's wife. I have not seen even a celestial nymph who could match her in beauty. He who has her for his wife, whom she fondly embraces, he shall indeed be the ruler of gods. She is a fit bride for you; and you are indeed the most suitable suitor for her. In fact, I wanted to bring that beautiful Sītā here so that you could marry her: but Lakṣmaṇa intervened and cruelly mutilated my body. If you could only look at her for a moment, you would immediately fall in love with her. If this proposal appeals to you, take some action quickly and get her here."

Rāvaṇa was instantly tempted. Immediately he ordered his flying chariot to be got ready. This vehicle which was richly adorned with gold, could move freely wherever its owner willed. Its front part resembled mules with fiendish heads. Rāvaṇa took his seat in this vehicle and moved towards the seacoast. The coastline of Laṅkā was dotted with hermitages inhabited by sages and also celestial and semi-divine beings. It was also the pleasure resort of celestials and nymphs who went there to sport and to enjoy themselves. Driving at great speed through them, Rāvaṇa passed through caravan parks scattered with the chariots of the celestials. He also drove through dense forests of sandal trees, banana plantations and cocoanut palm groves. In those forests there were also spices and aromatic plants. Along the coast lay pearls and precious stones. He passed through cities which had an air of opulence.

Rāvaṇa crossed the ocean in his flying chariot and reached the hermitage where Mārīca<sup>3</sup> was living in ascetic garb, subsisting on a disciplined diet. Mārīca welcomed Rāvaṇa and questioned him about the purpose of his visit.

ĀRAṆYA 36–37

Rāvaṇa said to Mārīca: “Listen, Mārīca. You know that fourteen thousand demons, including my brother Khara and the great warrior Triśira, have been mercilessly killed by Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa who have now promised their protection to the ascetics of Daṇḍaka forest, thus flouting our authority. Driven out of his country by his angry father, obviously for a disgraceful action, this unrighteous and hard-hearted prince Rāma has killed the demons without any justification. And, they have even dared to disfigure my beloved sister Śūrpaṇakhā. I must immediately take some action to avenge the death of my brother and to restore our prestige and our authority. I need your help; kindly do not refuse this time.

“Disguising yourself as a golden deer of great beauty, roam near the hermitage of Rāma. Sītā would surely be attracted, and she would ask Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa to capture you. When they go after you, leaving Sītā alone in the hermitage, I shall easily abduct Sītā.” Even as Rāvaṇa was unfolding this plot, Mārīca’s mouth became dry and parched with fear. Trembling with fear, Mārīca said to Rāvaṇa:

“O king, one can easily get in this world a counselor who tells you what is pleasing to you; but hard it is to find a wise counselor who tells you the unpleasant truth which is good for you—and harder it is to find one who heeds such advice. Surely, your intelligence machine is faulty and therefore you have no idea of the prowess of Rāma. Else, you would not talk of abducting Sītā. I wonder: perhaps Sītā has come into this world to end your life, or perhaps there is to be great sorrow on account of Sītā, or perhaps maddened by lust, you are going to destroy yourself and the demons and Laṅkā itself. Oh, no, you were wrong in your estimation of Rāma. He is not wicked; he is righteousness incarnate. He is not cruel-hearted; he is generous to a fault. He has not been disgraced and exiled from the kingdom. He is here to honor the promise his father had given his mother Kaikeyī, after joyously renouncing his kingdom.

“O king, when you entertain ideas of abducting Sītā you are surely playing with fire. Please remember: when you stand facing Rāma, you are standing face to face with your own death. Sītā is the beloved wife of Rāma, who is extremely powerful. Nay, give up this foolish idea. What will you gain by thus gambling with your sovereignty over the demons, and with your life itself? Please consult the noble Vibhīṣaṇa and your virtuous ministers before embarking upon such unwise projects. They will surely advise you against them.”

ĀRĀṆYA 42

Rāvaṇa was determined, and Mārīca knew that there was no use arguing with him. Hence, after the last-minute attempt to avert the catastrophe, Mārīca said to Rāvaṇa: “What can I do when you are so wicked? I am ready to go to Rāma’s āśrama.<sup>4</sup> God help you!” Not minding the taunt, Rāvaṇa expressed his unabashed delight at Mārīca’s consent. He applauded Mārīca and said: “That is the spirit, my friend: you are now the same old Mārīca that I knew. I guess you had been possessed by some evil spirit a few minutes ago, on account of which you had begun to preach a different gospel. Let us swiftly get into this vehicle and proceed to our destination. As soon as you have accomplished the purpose, you are free to go and to do what you please!”

Both of them got into the flying chariot and quickly left the hermitage of Mārīca. Once again they passed forests, hills, rivers and cities: and soon they reached the neighborhood of the hermitage of Rāma. They got down from that chariot which had been embellished with gold. Holding Mārīca by the hand, Rāvaṇa said to him: “Over there is the hermitage of Rāma, surrounded by banana plantations. Well, now, get going with the work for which we have come here.” Immediately Mārīca transformed himself into an attractive deer. It was extraordinary, totally unlike any deer that inhabited the forest. It was unique. It dazzled like a huge gem stone. Each part of its body had a different color. The colors had an unearthly brilliance and charm. Thus embellished by the colors of all the precious stones, the deer which was the demon Mārīca in disguise, roamed about near the hermitage of Rāma, nibbling at the grass now and then. At one time it came close to Sītā; then it ran away and joined the other deer grazing at a distance. It was very playful, jumping about and chasing its tail and spinning around. Sītā went out to gather flowers. She cast a glance at that extraordinary and unusual deer. As she did so, the deer too, sensing the accomplishment of the mission, came closer to her. Then it ran away, pretending to be afraid. Sītā marveled at the very appearance of this unusual deer the like of which she had not seen before and which had the hue of jewels.

ĀRĀṆYA 43

From where she was gathering flowers, Sītā, filled with wonder to see that unusual deer, called out to Rāma: “Come quick and see, O Lord; come with your brother. Look at this extraordinary creature. I have never seen such a beautiful deer before.” Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa looked at the deer, and Lakṣmaṇa’s suspicions were aroused: “I am suspicious; I think it is the same demon Mārīca in disguise. I have heard that Mārīca could assume any form at will, and through such tricks he had brought death and destruction to many ascetics in this forest. Surely, this deer is not real: no one has heard of a deer with rainbow colors, each one of its limbs shining resplendent with the color of a different gem! That itself should enable us to understand that it is a demon, not an animal.”

Sītā interrupted Lakṣmaṇa’s talk, and said: “Never mind, one thing is certain; this deer has captivated my mind. It is such a dear. I have not seen such an animal near our hermitage! There are many types of deer which roam about near the hermitage; this is just an extraordinary and unusual deer. It is superlative in all respects: its color is lovely, its texture is lovely, and even its voice sounds delightful. It would be a wonderful feat if it could be caught alive. We could use it as a pet, to divert our minds. Later we could take it to Ayodhyā: and I am sure all your brothers and mothers would just adore it. If it is not possible to capture it alive, O Lord, then it can be killed, and I would love to have its skin. I know I am not behaving myself towards both of you: but I am helpless; I have lost my heart to that deer. I am terribly curious.”

In fact, Rāma was curious, too! And so, he took Sītā’s side and said to Lakṣmaṇa: “It is beautiful, Lakṣmaṇa. It is unusual. I have never seen a creature like this. And, princes do hunt animals and cherish their skins.<sup>5</sup> By sporting and hunting kings acquire great wealth! People say that that is real wealth which one pursues without premeditation. So, let us try to get the deer or its skin. If, as you say, it is a demon in disguise, then surely it ought to be killed by me, just as Vātāpi who was tormenting and destroying sages and ascetics was justly killed by the sage Agastya.<sup>6</sup> Vātāpi fooled the ascetics till he met the sage Agastya. This Mārīca, too, has fooled the ascetics so far: till coming to me today! The very beauty of his hide is his doom. And, you, Lakṣmaṇa, please guard Sītā with great vigilance, till I kill this deer with just one shot and bring the hide along with me.”

ĀRAṆYA 44–45

Rāma took his weapons and went after the strange deer. As soon as the deer saw him pursuing it, it started to run away. Now it disappeared, now it appeared to be very near, now it ran fast, now it seemed confused—thus it led Rāma far away from his hermitage. Rāma was fatigued, and needed to rest. As he was standing under a tree, intrigued by the actions of the mysterious deer, it came along with other deer and began to graze not far from him. When Rāma once again went for it, it ran away. Not wishing to go farther nor to waste more time, Rāma took his weapon and fitted the missile of Brahmā<sup>7</sup> to it and fired. This missile pierced the illusory deer-mask and into the very heart of the demon.

5. Hermits are required to take a vow of non-violence, but Rāma, a warrior prince, is allowed to carry arms and to hunt.

6. The demon Vātāpi killed ascetics by tricking them. Disguising himself, he would invite innocent wayfarers to a meal. He would magically conceal himself in the food, thus entering his guests’ bellies; he would then kill the men by splitting open their stomachs. The sage Agastya outwitted and killed Vātāpi by digesting his meal, and with it, the demon himself, before he could tear the sage’s stomach open.

7. The creator god in the triad of Hindu great gods.

Mārīca uttered a loud cry, leapt high into the sky and then dropped dead onto the ground. As he fell, however, he remembered Rāvaṇa's instructions and assuming the voice of Rāma cried aloud: "Hey, Sītā; hey, Lakṣmaṇa."

Rāma saw the dreadful body of the demon. He knew now that Lakṣmaṇa was right. And, he was even more puzzled by the way in which the demon wailed aloud before dying. He was full of apprehension. He hastened towards the hermitage.

In the hermitage, both Sītā and Lakṣmaṇa heard the cry. Sītā believed it was Rāma's voice. She was panic-stricken. She said to Lakṣmaṇa: "Go, go quickly: your brother is in danger. And, I cannot live without him. My breath and my heart are both violently disturbed." Lakṣmaṇa remembered Rāma's admonition that he should stay with Sītā and not leave her alone. He said to her: "Pray, be not worried." Sītā grew suspicious and furious. She said to him: "Ah, I see the plot now! You have a wicked eye on me and so have been waiting for this to happen. What a terrible enemy of Rāma you are, pretending to be his brother!" Distressed to hear these words, Lakṣmaṇa replied: "No one in the three worlds can overpower Rāma, blessed lady! It was not his voice at all. These demons in the forest are capable of simulating the voice of anyone. Having killed that demon disguised as a deer, Rāma will soon be here. Fear not." His calmness even more annoyed Sītā, who literally flew into a rage. She said again: "Surely, you are the worst enemy that Rāma could have had. I know now that you have been following us, cleverly pretending to be Rāma's brother and friend. I know now that your real motive for doing so is either to get me or you are Bharata's accomplice. Ah, but you will not succeed. Presently, I shall give up my life. For I cannot live without Rāma." Cut to the quick by these terrible words, Lakṣmaṇa said: "You are worshipful to me: hence I cannot answer back. It is not surprising that women should behave in this manner: for they are easily led away from dharma; they are fickle and sharp-tongued. I cannot endure what you said just now. I shall go. The gods are witness to what took place here. May those gods protect you. But I doubt if when Rāma and I return, we shall find you." Bowing to her, Lakṣmaṇa left.

ĀRAṆYA 46

Rāvaṇa was looking for this golden opportunity. He disguised himself as an ascetic, clad in ochre robes, carrying a shell water-pot, a staff and an umbrella, and approached Sītā who was still standing outside the cottage eagerly looking for Rāma's return. His very presence in that forest was inauspicious: and even the trees and the waters of the rivers were frightened of him, as it were. In a holy disguise, Rāvaṇa stood before Sītā: a deep well covered with grass; a death-trap.

Gazing at the noble Sītā, who had now withdrawn into the cottage and whose eyes were raining tears, Rāvaṇa came near her, and though his heart was filled with lust, he was chanting Vedic hymns. He said to Sītā in a soft, tender and affectionate tone: "O young lady! Pray, tell me, are you the goddess of fortune or the goddess of modesty, or the consort of Cupid himself?" Then Rāvaṇa described her incomparable beauty in utterly immodest terms, unworthy of an anchorite whose form he had assumed. He continued: "O charming lady! You have robbed me of my heart. I have not seen such a beautiful lady, neither a divine or a semi-divine being. Your extraordinary form and your youthfulness, and your living in this forest, all these together agitate my mind. It is not right that you should live in this forest. You should stay in palaces. In the forest monkeys, lions, tigers and other wild animals live. The forest is the natural habitat of demons who roam freely. You are living alone in this dreadful forest: are you not afraid, O fair lady? Pray, tell me, why are you living in this forest?"

Rāvaṇa was in the disguise of a brāhmaṇa. Therefore, Sītā offered him the worship and the hospitality that it was her duty to offer a brāhmaṇa. She made him sit down; she gave him water to wash his feet and his hands. Then she placed food in front of him.

Whatever she did only aggravated his lust and his desire to abduct her and take her away to Laṅkā.

ĀRANYA 47–48

Sītā, then, proceeded to answer his enquiry concerning herself. He appeared to be a brāhmaṇa; and if his enquiry was not answered, he might get angry and curse her.<sup>8</sup> Sītā said: "I am a daughter of the noble king Janaka; Sītā is my name. I am the beloved consort of Rāma. After our marriage, Rāma and I lived in the palace of Ayodhyā for twelve years." She then truthfully narrated all that took place just prior to Rāma's exile to the forest. She continued: "And so, when Rāma was twenty-five and I was eighteen, we left the palace and sought the forest-life.<sup>9</sup> And so the three of us dwell in this forest. My husband, Rāma, will soon return to the hermitage gathering various animals and also wild fruits. Pray, tell me who you are, O brāhmaṇa, and what you are doing in this forest roaming all alone."

Rāvaṇa lost no time in revealing his true identity. He said: "I am not a brāhmaṇa, O Sītā: I am the lord of demons, Rāvaṇa. My very name strikes terror in the hearts of gods and men. The moment I saw you, I lost my heart to you; and I derive no pleasure from the company of my wives. Come with me, and be my queen, O Sītā. You will love Laṅkā. Laṅkā is my capital, it is surrounded by the ocean and it is situated on the top of a hill. There we shall live together, and you will enjoy your life, and never even once think of this wretched forest-life."

Sītā was furious to hear this. She said: "O demon-king! I have firmly resolved to follow Rāma who is equal to the god of gods, who is mighty and charming, and who is devoted to righteousness.<sup>1</sup> If you entertain a desire for me, his wife, it is like tying yourself with a big stone and trying to swim across the ocean: you are doomed. Where are you and where is he: there is no comparison. You are like a jackal; he the lion.<sup>2</sup> You are like base metal; he gold."

8. Priestly brāhmaṇas and sages have the power to curse people as well as to bestow boons.

9. Rāma must have been thirteen and Sītā six years old when they were married. The practice of "child marriage" continued in India until very recently.

1. A special epithet of Rāma. "God of gods": an epithet used for warriors, kings, and heroes. It is a reference to Indra, king of heaven and all the gods.

2. King of animals, the lion represents regal majesty and courage, while the jackal is the embodiment of cunning and deceit.

But Rāvaṇa would not give up his desire. He repeated: “Even the gods dare not stand before me, O Sītā! For fear of me even Kubera the god of wealth abandoned his chariot and ran away to Kailāsa. If the gods, headed by Indra, even sense I am angry, they flee. Even the forces of nature obey me. Laṅkā is enclosed by a strong wall; the houses are built of gold with gates of precious stones. Forget this Rāma, who lives like an ascetic, and come with me. He is not as strong as my little finger!” Sītā was terribly angered: “Surely you seek the destruction of all the demons, by behaving like this, O Rāvaṇa. It cannot be otherwise since they have such an unworthy king with no self-control. You may live after abducting Indra’s wife, but not after abducting me, Rāma’s wife.”

ĀRAṆYA 49–50

Rāvaṇa made his body enormously big and said to Sītā: “You do not realize what a mighty person I am. I can step out into space, and lift up the earth with my arms; I can drink up the waters of the oceans; and I can kill death itself. I can shoot a missile and bring the sun down. Look at the size of my body.” As he expanded his form, Sītā turned her face away from him. He resumed his original form with ten heads and twenty arms. Again he spoke to Sītā: “Would you not like to be renowned in the three worlds? Then marry me. And, I promise I shall do nothing to displease you. Give up all thoughts of that mortal and unsuccessful Rāma.”

Rāvaṇa did not wait for an answer. Seizing Sītā by her hair and lifting her up with his arm, he left the hermitage. Instantly the golden chariot appeared in front of him. He ascended it, along with Sītā. Sītā cried aloud: “O Rāma.” As she was being carried away, she wailed aloud: “O Lakṣmaṇa, who is ever devoted to the elder brother, do you not know that I am being carried away by Rāvaṇa?” To Rāvaṇa, she said: “O vile demon, surely you will reap the fruits of your evil action: but they do not manifest immediately.” She said as if to herself: “Surely, Kaikeyī would be happy today.” She said to the trees, to the river Godāvarī, to the deities dwelling in the forest, to the animals and birds: “Pray, tell Rāma that I have been carried away by the wicked Rāvaṇa.” She saw Jaṭāyu and cried aloud: “O Jaṭāyu! See, Rāvaṇa is carrying me away.”

Hearing that cry, Jaṭāyu woke up. Jaṭāyu introduced himself to Rāvaṇa: “O Rāvaṇa, I am the king of vultures, Jaṭāyu. Pray, desist from this action unworthy of a king. Rāma, too, is a king; and his consort is worthy of our protection. A wise man should not indulge in such action as would disgrace him in the eyes of others. And, another’s wife is as worthy of protection as one’s own. The cultured and the common people often copy the behavior of the king. If the king himself is guilty of unworthy behavior what becomes of the people? If you persist in your wickedness, even the prosperity you enjoy will leave you soon.

“Therefore, let Sītā go. One should not get hold of a greater load than one can carry; one should not eat what he cannot digest. Who will indulge in an action which is painful and which does not promote righteousness, fame or permanent glory? I am sixty thousand years old and you are young. I warn you. If you do not give up Sītā, you will not be able to carry her away while I am alive and able to restrain you! I shall dash you down along with that chariot.”

ĀRAṆYA 51

Rāvaṇa could not brook this insult: he turned towards Jaṭāyu in great anger. Jaṭāyu hit the chariot and Rāvaṇa; Rāvaṇa hit Jaṭāyu back with terrible ferocity. This aerial combat between Rāvaṇa and Jaṭāyu looked like the collision of two mountains endowed with wings. Rāvaṇa used all the conventional missiles, the Nālikas, the Nārācas and the Vikarṇis. The powerful eagle shrugged them off. Jaṭāyu tore open the canopy of the chariot and inflicted wounds on Rāvaṇa himself.

In great anger, Jaṭāyu grabbed Rāvaṇa's weapon (a cannon) and broke it with his claws. Rāvaṇa took up a more formidable weapon which literally sent a shower of missiles. Against these Jaṭāyu used his own wings as an effective shield. Pouncing upon this weapon, too, Jaṭāyu destroyed it with his claws. Jaṭāyu also tore open Rāvaṇa's armor. Nay, Jaṭāyu even damaged the gold-plated propellers of Rāvaṇa's flying chariot, which had the appearance of demons, and thus crippled the craft which would take its occupant wherever he desired and which emitted fire. With his powerful beak, Jaṭāyu broke the neck of Rāvaṇa's pilot.

With the chariot thus rendered temporarily useless, Rāvaṇa jumped out of it, still holding Sītā with his powerful arm. While Rāvaṇa was still above the ground, Jaṭāyu again challenged him: "O wicked one, even now you are unwilling to turn away from evil. Surely, you have resolved to bring about the destruction of the entire race of demons. Unknowingly or wantonly, you are swallowing poison which would certainly kill you and your relations. Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa will not tolerate this sinful act of yours: and you cannot stand before them on the battle-field. The manner in which you are doing this unworthy act is despicable: you are behaving like a thief not like a hero." Jaṭāyu swooped on Rāvaṇa and violently tore at his body.

Then there ensued a hand-to-hand fight between the two. Rāvaṇa hit Jaṭāyu with his fist; but Jaṭāyu tore Rāvaṇa's arms away. However, new ones sprang up instantly. Rāvaṇa hit Jaṭāyu and kicked him. After some time, Rāvaṇa drew his sword and cut off the wings of Jaṭāyu. When the wings were thus cut, Jaṭāyu fell, dying. Looking at the fallen Jaṭāyu, Sītā ran towards him in great anguish, as she would to the side of a fallen relation. In inconsolable grief, Sītā began to wail aloud.

ĀRAṆYA 52–53

As Sītā was thus wailing near the body of Jaṭāyu, Rāvaṇa came towards her. Looking at him with utter contempt, Sītā said: "I see dreadful omens, O Rāvaṇa. Dreams as also the sight and the cries of birds and beasts are clear indicators of the shape of things to come.<sup>3</sup> But you do not notice them! Alas, here is Jaṭāyu, my father-in-law's friend who is dying on my account. O Rāma, O Lakṣmaṇa, save me, protect me!"

Once again Rāvaṇa grabbed her and got into the chariot which had been made airworthy again. The Creator, the gods and the celestials who witnessed this, exclaimed: “Bravo, our purpose is surely accomplished.”<sup>4</sup> Even the sages of the Daṇḍaka forest inwardly felt happy at the thought, “Now that Sītā has been touched by this wicked demon, the end of Rāvaṇa and all the demons is near.” As she was carried away by Rāvaṇa, Sītā was wailing aloud: “O Rāma, O Lakṣmaṇa.”

Placed on the lap of Rāvaṇa, Sītā was utterly miserable. Her countenance was full of sorrow and anguish. The petals of the flowers that dropped from her head fell and covered the body of Rāvaṇa for a while. She was of beautiful golden complexion; and he was of dark color. Her being seated on his lap looked like an elephant wearing a golden sash, or the moon shining in the midst of a dark cloud, or a streak of lightning seen in a dense dark cloud.

The chariot streaked through the sky as fast as a meteor would. On the earth below, trees shook as if to reassure Sītā: “Do not be afraid,” the waterfalls looked as if mountains were shedding tears, and people said to one another, “Surely, dharma has come to an end, as Rāvaṇa is carrying Sītā away.”

Once again Sītā rebuked Rāvaṇa: “You ought to feel ashamed of yourself, O Rāvaṇa. You boast of your prowess; but you are stealing me away! You have not won me in a duel, which would be considered heroic. Alas, for a long, long time to come, people will recount your ignominy, and this unworthy and unrighteous act of yours will be remembered by the people. You are taking me and flying at such speed: hence no one can do anything to stop you. If only you had the courage to stop for a few moments, you would find yourself dead. My lord Rāma and his brother Lakṣmaṇa will not spare you. Leave me alone, O demon! But, you are in no mood to listen to what is good for your own welfare. Even as, one who has reached death’s door loves only harmful objects. Rāma will soon find out where I am and ere long you will be transported to the world of the dead.”

Rāvaṇa flew along, though now and then he trembled in fear.

ĀRANYA 54–55

The chariot was flying over hills and forests and was approaching the ocean. At that time, Sītā beheld on the ground below, five strong vānaras<sup>5</sup> seated and watching the craft with curiosity. Quickly, Sītā took off the stole she had around her shoulders and, removing all her jewels and putting them in that stole, bundled them all up and threw the bundle into the midst of the vānaras, in the hope that should Rāma chance to come there they would give him a clue to her whereabouts.

Rāvaṇa did not notice this but flew on. And now the craft, which shot through space at great speed, was over the ocean; a little while after that, Rāvaṇa entered Laṅkā along with his captive Sītā. Entering his own apartments, Rāvaṇa placed Sītā in them, entrusting her care to some of his chief female attendants. He said to them: “Take great care of Sītā. Let no male approach these apartments without my express permission. And, take great care to let Sītā have whatever she wants and asks for. Any neglect on your part means instant death.”

4. We are reminded here that Viṣṇu incarnated himself as Rāma at the request of the gods, who wished Rāvaṇa to be killed.

5. Some scholars have suggested that vānaras, usually translated as “monkeys” or “apes,” refers to tribal people or apelike human beings. This translator has left the word untranslated.

Rāvaṇa was returning to his own apartments: on the way he was still considering what more could be done to ensure the fulfilment of his ambition. He sent for eight of the most ferocious demons and instructed them thus: “Proceed at once to Janasthāna. It was ruled by my brother Khara; but it has now been devastated by Rāma. I am filled with rage to think that a mere human being could thus kill Khara, Dūṣaṇa and all their forces. Never mind: I shall put an end to Rāma soon. Keep an eye on him and keep me informed of his movements. You are free to bring about the destruction of Rāma.” And, the demons immediately left.

Rāvaṇa returned to where Sītā was and compelled her to inspect the apartments. The palace stood on pillars of ivory, gold, crystal and silver and was studded with diamonds. The floor, the walls, the stairways—everything was made of gold and diamonds. Then again he said to Sītā: “Here at this place there are over a thousand demons ever ready to do my bidding. Their services and the entire Laṅkā I place at your feet. My life I offer to you; you are to me more valuable than my life. You will have under your command even the many good women whom I have married. Be my wife. Laṅkā is surrounded by the ocean, eight hundred miles on all sides. It is unapproachable to anybody; least of all to Rāma. Forget the weakling Rāma. Do not worry about the scriptural definitions of righteousness: we shall also get married in accordance with demoniacal wedding procedure. Youth is fleeting. Let us get married soon and enjoy life.”

ĀRAṆYA 56

Placing a blade of grass between Rāvaṇa and herself,<sup>6</sup> Sītā said: “O demon! Rāma, the son of king Daśaratha, is my lord, the only one I adore. He and his brother Lakṣmaṇa will surely put an end to your life. If they had seen you lay your hands on me, they would have killed you on the spot, even as they laid Khara to eternal rest. It may be that you cannot be killed by demons and gods; but you cannot escape being killed at the hands of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa. Rāvaṇa, you are doomed, beyond doubt. You have already lost your life, your good fortune, your very soul and your senses, and on account of your evil deeds Laṅkā has attained widowhood.<sup>7</sup> Though you do not perceive this, death is knocking at your door, O Rāvaṇa. O sinner, you cannot under any circumstances lay your hands on me. You may bind this body, or you may destroy it: it is after all insentient matter, and I do not consider it worth preserving, nor even life worth living—not in order to live a life which will earn disrepute for me.”

Rāvaṇa found himself helpless. Hence, he resorted to threat. He said: “I warn you, Sītā. I give you twelve months in which to make up your mind to accept me as your husband. If within that time you do not so decide, my cooks will cut you up easily for my breakfast.” He had nothing more to say to her. He turned to the female attendants surrounding her and ordered them: “Take this Sītā away to the Aśoka grove. Keep her there. Use every method of persuasion that you know of to make her yield to my desire. Guard her vigilantly. Take her and break her will as you would tame a wild elephant.”

6. The magical power of Sītā’s virtue allows her to use even a blade of grass as an effective barrier between herself and her abductor.

7. The ancient Indian king was considered to be the husband of the land he ruled, and kingdoms were often personified as a goddess.

The demonesses thereupon took Sītā away and confined her to the Aśoka grove, over which they themselves mounted guard day and night. Sītā did not find any peace of mind there, and stricken with fear and grief, she constantly thought of Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa.

It is said that at the same time, the creator Brahmā felt perturbed at the plight of Sītā. He spoke to Indra, the chief of gods: "Sītā is in the Aśoka grove. Pining for her husband, she may kill herself. Hence, go reassure her, and give her the celestial food to sustain herself till Rāma arrives in Laṅkā." Indra, thereupon, appeared before Sītā. In order to assure her of his identity he showed that his feet did not touch the ground and his eyes did not wink.<sup>8</sup> He gave her the celestial food, saying: "Eat this, and you will never feel hunger or thirst, nor will fatigue overpower you." While Indra was thus talking to Sītā, the goddess of sleep (Nidrā) had overpowered the demonesses.

ĀRAṆYA 57–58

Mārīca, the demon who had disguised himself as a unique deer, had been slain. But Rāma was intrigued and puzzled by the way in which Mārīca died, after crying: "O Sītā, O Lakṣmaṇa." Rāma sensed a deep and vicious plot. Hence he made haste to return to his hermitage. At the same time, he saw many evil omens. This aggravated his anxiety. He thought: "If Lakṣmaṇa heard that voice, he might rush to my aid, leaving Sītā alone. The demons surely wish to harm Sītā; and this might well have been a plot to achieve that purpose."

As he was thus brooding and proceeding towards his hermitage, he saw Lakṣmaṇa coming towards him. The distressed Rāma met the distressed Lakṣmaṇa; the sorrowing Rāma saw the sorrowful Lakṣmaṇa. Rāma caught hold of Lakṣmaṇa's arm and asked him, in an urgent tone: "O Lakṣmaṇa, why have you left Sītā alone and come? My mind is full of anxiety and terrible apprehension. When I see all these evil omens around us, I fear that something terrible has happened to Sītā. Surely Sītā has been stolen, killed or abducted."

Lakṣmaṇa's silence and grief-stricken countenance added fuel to the fire of anxiety in Rāma's heart. He asked again: "Is all well with Sītā? Where is my Sītā, the life of my life, without whom I cannot live even for an hour? Oh, what has happened to her? Alas, Kaikeyī's desire has been fulfilled today. If I am deprived of Sītā, I shall surely die. What more could Kaikeyī wish for? If, when I enter my hermitage, I do not find Sītā alive, how shall I live? Tell me, Lakṣmaṇa; speak. Surely, when that demon cried: 'O Lakṣmaṇa' in my voice, you were afraid that something had happened to me. Surely, Sītā also heard that cry and in a state of terrible mental agony, sent you to me. It is a painful thing that thus Sītā has been left alone; the demons who were waiting for an opportunity to hit back have been given that opportunity. The demons were sore distressed by my killing of the demon Khara. I am sure that they have done some great harm to Sītā, in the absence of both of us. What can I do now? How can I face this terrible calamity?"

Still, Lakṣmaṇa could not utter a word concerning what had happened. Both of them arrived near their hermitage. Everything that they saw reminded them of Sītā.

8. Attributes of the immortals.

ĀRAṆYA 59–60

And, once again before actually reaching the hermitage, and full of apprehension on account of Sītā, Rāma said to Lakṣmaṇa: “Lakṣmaṇa, you should not have come away like this, leaving Sītā alone in the hermitage. I had entrusted her to your care.” When Rāma said this again and again, Lakṣmaṇa replied: “I have not come to you, leaving Sītā alone, just because I heard the demon Mārīca cry: ‘O Lakṣmaṇa, O Sītā’ in your voice. I did so only upon being literally driven by Sītā to do so. When she heard the cry, she immediately felt distressed and asked me to go to your help. I tried to calm her saying: ‘It is not Rāma’s voice; it is unthinkable that Rāma, who is capable of protecting even the gods, would utter the words, ‘save me.’ She, however, misunderstood my attitude. She said something very harsh, something very strange, something which I hate even to repeat. She said: ‘Either you are an agent of Bharata or you have unworthy intentions towards me and therefore you are happy that Rāma is in distress and do not rush to his help.’ It is only then that I had to leave.”

In his anxiety for Sītā, Rāma was unimpressed by this argument. He said to Lakṣmaṇa: “Swayed by an angry woman’s words, you failed to carry out my words; I am not highly pleased with what you have done, O Lakṣmaṇa.”

Rāma rushed into their hermitage. But he could find no trace of Sītā in it. Confused and distressed beyond measure, Rāma said to himself, as he continued to search for Sītā: “Where is Sītā? Alas, she could have been eaten by the demons. Or, taken away by someone. Or, she is hidden somewhere. Or, she has gone to the forest.” The search was fruitless. His anguish broke its bounds. Not finding her, he was completely overcome by grief and he began to behave as if he were mad.<sup>9</sup>

Unable to restrain himself, he asked the trees and the birds and the animals of the forest; “Where is my beloved Sītā?” The eyes of the deer, the trunk of the elephant, the boughs of trees, the flowers—all these reminded Rāma of Sītā. “Surely, you know where my beloved Sītā is. Surely, you have a message from her. Won’t you tell me? Won’t you assuage the pain in my heart?” Thus Rāma wailed. He thought he saw Sītā at a distance and going up to ‘her,’ he said: “My beloved, do not run away. Why are you hiding yourself behind those trees? Will you not speak to me?” Then he said to himself: “Surely it was not Sītā. Ah, she has been eaten by the demons. Did I leave her alone in the hermitage only to be eaten by the demons?” Thus lamenting, Rāma roamed awhile and ran around awhile.

ĀRAṆYA 61–62

Again Rāma returned to the hermitage, and, seeing it empty, gave way to grief again. He asked Lakṣmaṇa: “Where has my beloved Sītā gone, O Lakṣmaṇa? Or, has she actually been carried away by someone?” Again, imagining that it was all fun and a big joke which Sītā was playing, he said: “Enough of this fun, Sītā; come out. See, even the deer are stricken with grief because they do not see you.” Turning to Lakṣmaṇa again, he said: “Lakṣmaṇa, I cannot live without my Sītā. I shall soon join my father in the other world. But, he may be

9. The description of the lover maddened by grief, searching for his beloved, is a theme in many literary traditions: examples include the Greek myth of Orpheus’s search for Eurydice and the Persian story of Majnun (“the mad lover”), who wanders in the wilderness looking for Laila.

annoyed with me and say: 'I told you to live in the forest for fourteen years; how have you come here before that period?' Ah Sītā, do not forsake me."

Lakṣmaṇa tried to console him: "Grieve not, O Rāma. Surely, you know that Sītā is fond of the forest and the caves on the mountainside. She must have gone to these caves. Let us look for her in the forest. That is the proper thing to do; not to grieve."

These brave words took Rāma's grief away. Filled with zeal and eagerness, Rāma along with Lakṣmaṇa, began to comb the forest. Rāma was distressed: "Lakṣmaṇa, this is strange; I do not find Sītā anywhere." But Lakṣmaṇa continued to console Rāma: "Fear not, brother; you will surely recover the noble Sītā soon."

But this time, these words were less meaningful to Rāma. He was overcome by grief, and he lamented: "Where shall we find Sītā, O Lakṣmaṇa, and when? We have looked for her everywhere in the forest and on the hills, but we do not find her." Lamenting thus, stricken with grief, with his intelligence and his heart robbed by the loss of Sītā, Rāma frequently sighed in anguish, muttering: "Ah my beloved."

Suddenly, he thought he saw her, hiding herself behind the banana trees, and now behind the karnikara trees. And, he said to 'her': "My beloved, I see you behind the banana trees! Ah, now I see you behind the karnikara tree: my dear, enough, enough of this play: for your fun aggravates my anguish. I know you are fond of such play; but pray, stop this and come to me now."

When Rāma realized that it was only his hallucination, he turned to Lakṣmaṇa once more and lamented: "I am certain now that some demon has killed my beloved Sītā. How can I return to Ayodhyā without Sītā? How can I face Janaka, her father? Oh, no: Lakṣmaṇa, even heaven is useless without Sītā; I shall continue to stay in the forest; you can return to Ayodhyā. And you can tell Bharata that he should continue to rule the country."

ĀRAṆYA 63–64

Rāma was inconsolable and even infected the brave Lakṣmaṇa. Shedding tears profusely, Rāma continued to speak to Lakṣmaṇa who had also fallen a prey to grief by this time: "No one in this whole world is guilty of as many misdeeds as I am, O Lakṣmaṇa: and that is why I am being visited by sorrow upon sorrow, grief upon grief, breaking my heart and dementing me. I lost my kingdom, and I was torn away from my relations and friends. I got reconciled to this misfortune. But then I lost my father. I was separated from my mother. Coming to this hermitage, I was getting reconciled to that misfortune. But I could not remain at peace with myself for long. Now this terrible misfortune, the worst of all, has visited me.

"Alas, how bitterly Sītā would have cried while she was carried away by some demon. May be she was injured; may be her lovely body was covered with blood. Why is it that when she was subjected to such suffering, my body did not split into pieces? I fear that the demon must have cut open Sītā's neck and drunk her blood. How terribly she must have suffered when she was dragged by the demons.

"Lakṣmaṇa, this river Godāvarī was her favorite resort. Do you remember how she used to come and sitting on this slab of stone talk to us and laugh? Probably she came to the river Godāvarī in order to gather lotuses? But, no: she would never go alone to these places.

"O sun! You know what people do and what people do not do. You know what is true and what is false. You are a witness to all these. Pray, tell me, where has my beloved Sītā gone. For, I have been robbed of everything by this grief. O wind! You know everything in this world, for you are everywhere. Pray, tell me, in which direction did Sītā go?”

Rāma said: “See, Lakṣmaṇa, if Sītā is somewhere near the river Godāvarī.” Lakṣmaṇa came back and reported that he could not find her. Rāma himself went to the river and asked the river: “O Godāvarī, pray tell me, where has my beloved Sītā gone?” But the river did not reply. It was as if, afraid of the anger of Rāvaṇa, Godāvarī kept silent.

Rāma was disappointed. He asked the deer and the other animals of the forest: “Where is Sītā? Pray, tell me in which direction has Sītā been taken away.” He then observed the deer and the animals; all of them turned southwards and some of them even moved southwards. Rāma then said to Lakṣmaṇa: “O Lakṣmaṇa, see, they are all indicating that Sītā has been taken in a southerly direction.”

ĀRAṆYA 64

Lakṣmaṇa, too, saw the animals’ behavior as sure signs indicating that Sītā had been borne away in a southerly direction, and suggested to Rāma that they should also proceed in that direction. As they were thus proceeding, they saw petals of flowers fallen on the ground. Rāma recognized them and said to Lakṣmaṇa: “Look here, Lakṣmaṇa, these are petals from the flowers that I had given to Sītā. Surely, in their eagerness to please me, the sun, the wind and the earth, have contrived to keep these flowers fresh.”

They walked further on. Rāma saw footprints on the ground. Two of them he immediately recognized as those of Sītā. The other two were big—obviously the footprints of a demon. Bits and pieces of gold were strewn on the ground. Lo and behold, Rāma also saw blood which he concluded was Sītā’s blood: he wailed again: “Alas, at this spot, the demon killed Sītā to eat her flesh.” He also saw evidence of a fight: and he said: “Perhaps there were two demons fighting for the flesh of Sītā.”

Rāma saw on the ground pieces of a broken weapon, an armor of gold, a broken canopy, and the propellers and other parts of a flying chariot. He also saw lying dead, one who had the appearance of the pilot of the craft. From these he concluded that two demons had fought for the flesh of Sītā, before one carried her away. He said to Lakṣmaṇa: “The demons have earned my unquenchable hate and wrath. I shall destroy all of them. Nay, I shall destroy all the powers that be who refuse to return Sītā to me. Look at the irony of fate, Lakṣmaṇa: we adhere to dharma, but dharma could not protect Sītā who has been abducted in this forest! When these powers that govern the universe witness Sītā being eaten by the demons, without doing anything to stop it, who is there to do what is pleasing to us? I think our meekness is misunderstood to be weakness. We are full of self-control, compassion and devoted to the welfare of all beings: and yet these virtues have become as good as vices in us now. I shall set aside all these virtues and the universe shall witness my supreme glory which will bring about the destruction of all creatures, including the demons. If Sītā is not immediately brought back to me, I shall destroy the three worlds—the gods, the demons and other creatures will perish, becoming targets of my most powerful missiles. When I take up my weapon in anger, O Lakṣmaṇa, no one can confront me, even as no one can evade old age and death.”

ĀRAṆYA 65–66

Seeing the world-destroying mood of Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa endeavored to console him. He said to Rāma:

“Rāma, pray, do not go against your nature. Charm in the moon, brilliance in the sun, motion in the air, and endurance in the earth—these are their essential nature: in you all these are found and in addition, eternal glory. Your nature cannot desert you; even the sun, the moon and the earth cannot abandon their nature! Moreover, being king, you cannot punish all the created beings for the sin of one person. Gentle and peaceful monarchs match punishment to crime: and, over and above this, you are the refuge of all beings and their goal. I shall without fail find out the real criminal who has abducted Sītā; I shall find out whose armor and weapons these are. And you shall mete out just punishment to the sinner. Oh, no, no god will seek to displease you, O Rāma: Nor these trees, mountains and rivers. I am sure they will all eagerly aid us in our search for Sītā. Of course, if Sītā cannot be recovered through peaceful means, we shall consider other means.

“Whom does not misfortune visit in this world, O Rāma? And, misfortune departs from man as quickly as it visits him. Hence, pray, regain your composure. If you who are endowed with divine intelligence betray lack of endurance in the face of this misfortune, what will others do in similar circumstances?

“King Nahuṣa, who was as powerful as Indra, was beset with misfortune.<sup>1</sup> The sage Vasiṣṭha, our family preceptor, had a hundred sons and lost all of them on one day! Earth is tormented by volcanic eruptions, and earthquakes. The sun and the moon are afflicted by eclipses. Misfortune strikes the great ones and even the gods.

“For, in this world people perform actions whose results are not obvious; and these actions which may be good or evil, bear their own fruits. Of course, these fruits are evanescent. People who are endowed with enlightened intelligence know what is good and what is not good. People like you do not grieve over misfortunes and do not get deluded by them.

“Why am I telling you all this, O Rāma? Who in this world is wiser than you? However, since, as is natural, grief seems to veil wisdom, I am saying all this. All this I learnt only from you: I am only repeating what you yourself taught me earlier. Therefore, O Rāma, know your enemy and fight him.”

ĀRAṆYA 67–68

Rāma then asked Lakṣmaṇa: “O Lakṣmaṇa, tell me, what should we do now?” Lakṣmaṇa replied: “Surely, we should search this forest for Sītā.”

This advice appealed to Rāma. Immediately he fixed the bayonet to his weapon and with a look of anger on his face, set out to search for Sītā. Within a very short time and distance, both Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa chanced upon Jaṭāyu, seriously and mortally wounded and heavily bleeding. Seeing that enormous vulture lying on the ground, Rāma’s first thought was: “Surely, this is the one that has swallowed Sītā.” He rushed forward with fixed bayonet.

Looking at Rāma thus rushing towards him, and rightly inferring Rāma’s mood, Jaṭāyu said in a feeble voice: “Sītā has been taken away by Rāvaṇa. I tried to intervene. I battled with the mighty Rāvaṇa. I broke his armor, his canopy, the propellers and some parts of his chariot. I killed his pilot. I even inflicted injuries on his person. But he cut off my wings and thus grounded me.” When Rāma heard that the vulture had news of Sītā, he threw his weapon away and kneeling down near the vulture embraced it.

1. King Nahuṣa, an ancestor of Rāma, became so powerful that he claimed the throne of Indra, king of gods, but an arrogant act soon effected his fall from his exalted position.

Rāma said to Lakṣmaṇa: “An additional calamity to endure, O Lakṣmaṇa. Is there really no end to my misfortune? My misfortune plagues even this noble creature, a friend of my father’s.” Rāma requested more information from Jaṭāyu concerning Sītā, and also concerning Rāvaṇa. Jaṭāyu replied: “Taking Sītā with him, the demon flew away in his craft, leaving a mysterious storm and cloud behind him. I was mortally wounded by him. Ah, my senses are growing dim. I feel life ebbing away, Rāma. Yet, I assure you, you will recover Sītā.” Soon Jaṭāyu lay lifeless. Nay, it was his body, for he himself ascended to heaven. Grief-stricken afresh, Rāma said to Lakṣmaṇa: “Jaṭāyu lived a very long life; and yet has had to lay down his life today. Death, no one in this world can escape. And what a noble end! What a great service this noble vulture has rendered to me! Pious and noble souls are found even amongst subhuman creatures, O Lakṣmaṇa. Today I have forgotten all my previous misfortunes: I am extremely tormented by the loss of this dear friend who has sacrificed his life for my sake. I shall myself cremate it, so that it may reach the highest realms.”

Rāma himself performed the funeral rites, reciting those Vedic mantras<sup>2</sup> which one recites during the cremation of one’s own close relations. After this, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa proceeded on their journey in search of Sītā.

Summary While searching desperately for Sītā, Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa encounter a tribe of monkeys, whose citadel is at Kiskindhā in southern India. Intervening in the political quarrels among their factions, the princes persuade the monkeys, and one of their powerful leaders, Hanumāna, to help them look for her. Hanumāna eventually discovers where Sītā is held captive, after spying on Rāvaṇa’s capital. Sītā refuses to escape with Hanumāna, insisting instead that Rāma himself must free her from captivity. Hanumāna sets fire to Rāvaṇa’s city as a warning of impending war, and returns to apprise Rāma of the situation. The monkey hordes build a bridge across the straits to Lankā, giving the princes and their army a passage to Lankā, where they begin to wage battle. One of Rāvaṇa’s brothers betrays him and joins Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa against Rāvaṇa. After a lengthy conflict, in which Rāvaṇa’s other brothers are killed and Lakṣmaṇa is wounded, Rāma finally confronts the demon king in single combat.

Yuddha

YUDDHA 109–11

When Rāma and Rāvaṇa began to fight, their armies stood stupefied, watching them! Rāma was determined to win; Rāvaṇa was sure he would die: knowing this, they fought with all their might. Rāvaṇa attacked the standard on Rāma’s car: and Rāma similarly shot the standard on Rāvaṇa’s car. While Rāvaṇa’s standard fell; Rāma's did not. Rāvaṇa next aimed at the "horses" of Rāma's car: even though he attacked them with all his might, they remained unaffected.

Both of them discharged thousands of missiles: these illumined the skies and created a new heaven, as it were! They were accurate in their aim and their missiles unfailingly hit the target. With unflagging zeal they fought each other, without the least trace of fatigue. What one did the other did in retaliation.

Rāvaṇa shot at Mātali<sup>3</sup> who remained unaffected by it. Then Rāvaṇa sent a shower of maces and mallets at Rāma. Their very sound agitated the oceans and tormented the aquatic creatures. The celestials and the holy brāhmaṇas witnessing the scene prayed: "May auspiciousness attend to all the living beings, and may the worlds endure forever. May Rāma conquer Rāvaṇa." Astounded at the way in which Rāma and Rāvaṇa fought with each other, the sages said to one another: "Sky is like sky, ocean is like ocean; the fight between Rāma and Rāvaṇa is like Rāma and Rāvaṇa—incomparable."

Taking up a powerful missile, Rāma correctly aimed at the head of Rāvaṇa; it fell. But another head appeared in its place. Every time Rāma cut off Rāvaṇa's head, another appeared! Rāma was puzzled. Mātali, Rāma's driver, said to Rāma: "Why do you fight like an ordinary warrior, O Rāma? Use the Brahmā-missile; the hour of the demon's death is at hand."

Rāma remembered the Brahmā-missile which the sage Agastya had given him. It had the power of the wind-god for its "feathers"; the power of fire and sun at its head; the whole space was its body; and it had the weight of a mountain. It shone like the sun or the fire of nemesis. As Rāma took it in his hands, the earth shook and all living beings were terrified. Infallible in its destructive power, this ultimate weapon of destruction shattered the chest of Rāvaṇa, and entered deep into the earth.

Rāvaṇa fell dead. And the surviving demons fled, pursued by the vānaras. The vānaras shouted in great jubilation. The air resounded with the drums of the celestials. The gods praised Rāma. The earth became steady, the wind blew softly and the sun was resplendent as before. Rāma was surrounded by mighty heroes and gods who were all joyously felicitating him on the victory.

YUDDHA 112–13

Seeing Rāvaṇa lying dead on the battlefield, Vibhīṣaṇa burst into tears. Overcome by brotherly affection, he lamented thus: "Alas, what I had predicted has come true: and my advice was not relished by you, overcome as you were by lust and delusion. Now that you have departed, the glory of Laṅkā has departed. You were like a tree firmly established in heroism with asceticism for its strength, spreading out firmness in all aspects of your life: yet you have been cut down. You were like an elephant with splendor, noble ancestry, indignation, and pleasant nature for parts: yet you have been killed. You, who were like blazing fire have been extinguished by Rāma."

Rāma approached the grief-stricken Vibhīṣaṇa and gently and lovingly said to him: "It is not right that you should thus grieve, O Vibhīṣaṇa, for a mighty warrior fallen on the battlefield. Victory is the monopoly of none: a hero is either slain in battle or he kills his opponent. Hence our ancients decreed that the warrior who is killed in combat should not be mourned. Get up and consider what should be done next.”

3. Indra, king of the gods, has sent his own charioteer, Mātali, to drive Rāma's chariot in battle.

Vibhīṣaṇa regained his composure and said to Rāma: “This Rāvaṇa used to give a lot in charity to ascetics; he enjoyed life; he maintained his servants well; he shared his wealth with his friends, and he destroyed his enemies. He was regular in his religious observances; learned he was in the scriptures. By your grace, O Rāma, I wish to perform his funeral in accordance with the scriptures, for his welfare in the other world.” Rāma was delighted and said to Vibhīṣaṇa: “Hostility ends at death. Take steps for the due performance of the funeral rites. He is your brother as he is mine, too.”

The womenfolk of Rāvaṇa’s court, and his wives, hearing of his end, rushed out of the palace, and, arriving at the battlefield, rolled on the ground in sheer anguish. Overcome by grief they gave vent to their feelings in diverse heart-rending ways. They wailed: “Alas, he who could not be killed by the gods and demons, has been killed in battle by a man standing on earth. Our beloved lord! Surely when you abducted Sītā and brought her to Laṅkā, you invited your own death! Surely it was because death was close at hand that you did not listen to the wise counsel of your own brother Vibhīṣaṇa, and you ill-treated him and exiled him. Even later if you had restored Sītā to Rāma, this evil fate would not have overtaken you. However, it is surely not because you did what you liked, because you were driven by lust, that you lie dead now: God’s will makes people do diverse deeds. He who is killed by the divine will dies. No one can flout the divine will, and no one can buy the divine will nor bribe it.”

YUDDHA 115–16

Rāma returned to the camp where the vānara troops had been stationed. He turned to Lakṣmaṇa and said: “O Lakṣmaṇa, install Vibhīṣaṇa on the throne of Laṅkā and consecrate him as the king of Laṅkā. He has rendered invaluable service to me and I wish to behold him on the throne of Laṅkā at once.”

Without the least loss of time, Lakṣmaṇa made the necessary preparations and with the waters of the ocean consecrated Vibhīṣaṇa as king of Laṅkā, in strict accordance with scriptural ordinance. Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa and the others were delighted. The demon-leaders brought their tributes and offered them to Vibhīṣaṇa who in turn placed them all at Rāma’s feet.

Rāma said to Hanumān: “Please go, with the permission of king Vibhīṣaṇa, to Sītā and inform her of the death of Rāvaṇa and the welfare of both myself and Lakṣmaṇa.” Immediately Hanumān left for the Aśoka-grove. The grief-stricken Sītā was happy to behold him. With joined palms Hanumān submitted Rāma’s message and added: “Rāma desires me to inform you that you can shed fear, for you are in your own home as it were, now that Vibhīṣaṇa is king of Laṅkā.” Sītā was speechless for a moment and then said: “I am delighted by the message you have brought, O Hanumān; and I am rendered speechless by it. I only regret that I have nothing now with which to reward you; nor is any gift equal in value to the most joyous tidings you have brought me.” Hanumān submitted: “O lady, the very words you have uttered are more precious than all the jewels of the world! I consider myself supremely blessed to have witnessed Rāma’s victory and Rāvaṇa’s destruction.” Sītā was even more delighted: she said, “Only you can utter such sweet words, O Hanumān, endowed as you are with manifold excellences. Truly you are an abode of virtues.”

Hanumān said: “Pray, give me leave to kill all these demonesses who have been tormenting you so long.” Sītā replied: “Nay, Hanumān, they are not responsible for their actions, for they were but obeying their master’s commands. And, surely, it was my own evil destiny that made me suffer at their hands. Hence, I forgive them. A noble man does not recognize the harm done to him by others: and he never retaliates, for he is the embodiment of goodness. One should be compassionate towards all, the good and the wicked, nay even towards those who are fit to be killed: who is free from sin?” Hanumān was thrilled to hear these words of Sītā, and said: “Indeed you are the noble consort of Rāma and his peer in virtue and nobility. Pray, give me a message to take back to Rāma.” Sītā replied: “Please tell him that I am eager to behold his face.” Assuring Sītā that she would see Rāma that very day, Hanumān returned to Rāma.

YUDDHA 117–19

Hanumān conveyed Sītā’s message to Rāma who turned to king Vibhīṣaṇa and said: “Please bring Sītā to me soon, after she has had a bath and has adorned herself.” Immediately Vibhīṣaṇa went to Sītā and compelled her to proceed seated in a palanquin, to where Rāma was. Vānaras and demons had gathered around her, eager to look at Sītā. And Vibhīṣaṇa, in accordance with the tradition, wished to ensure that Sītā was not seen by these and rebuked them to go away. Restraining him, Rāma said: “Why do you rebuke them, O Vibhīṣaṇa? Neither houses nor clothes nor walls constitute a veil for a woman; her character alone is her veil. Let her descend from the palanquin and walk up to me.” So she did.

Rāma said sternly: “My purpose has been accomplished, O Sītā. My prowess has been witnessed by all. I have fulfilled my pledge. Rāvaṇa’s wickedness has been punished. The extraordinary feat performed by Hanumān in crossing the ocean and burning Laṅkā<sup>4</sup> has borne fruit. Vibhīṣaṇa’s devotion has been rewarded.” Rāma’s heart was in a state of conflict, afraid as he was of public ridicule. Hence, he continued: “I wish to let you know that all this was done not for your sake, but for the sake of preserving my honor. Your conduct is open to suspicion, hence even your sight is displeasing to me. Your body was touched by Rāvaṇa: how then can I, claiming to belong to a noble family, accept you? Hence I permit you to go where you like and live with whom you like—either Lakṣmaṇa, Bharata, Śatrughna, Sugrīva or even Vibhīṣaṇa. It is difficult for me to believe that Rāvaṇa, who was so fond of you, would have been able to keep away from you for such a long time.”

Sītā was shocked. Rāma’s words wounded her heart. Tears streamed down her face. Wiping them, she replied: “O Rāma, you are speaking to me in the language of a common and vulgar man speaking to a common woman. That which was under my control, my heart, has always been yours; how could I prevent my body from being touched when I was helpless and under another person's control? Ah, if only you had conveyed your suspicion through Hanumān when he came to meet me, I would have killed myself then and saved you all this trouble and the risk involved in the war." Turning to Lakṣmaṇa, she said: "Kindle the fire, O Lakṣmaṇa: that is the only remedy. I shall not live to endure this false calumny." Lakṣmaṇa looked at Rāma and with his approval kindled the fire. Sītā prayed: "Even as my heart is ever devoted to Rāma, may the fire protect me. If I have been faithful to Rāma in thought, word or deed, may the fire protect me. The sun, the moon, the wind, earth and others are witness to my purity; may the fire protect me." Then she entered into the fire, even as an oblation poured into the fire would. Gods and sages witnessed this. The women who saw this screamed.

YUDDHA 120–21

Rāma was moved to tears by the heart-rending cries of all those women who witnessed the self-immolation of Sītā. At the same time, all the gods, including the trinity—the Creator, the Preserver, and the Redeemer (or Transformer)<sup>5</sup>—arrived upon the scene in their personal forms. Saluting Rāma, they said: "You are the foremost among the gods, and yet you treat Sītā as if you were a common human being!"

Rāma replied to these divinities: "I consider myself a human being, Rāma the son of Daśaratha. Who I am, and whence I am, may you tell me!"

Brahmā the creator said: "You are verily lord Nārāyaṇa.<sup>6</sup> You are the imperishable cosmic being. You are the truth. You are eternal. You are the supreme dharma of the worlds. You are the father even of the chief of the gods, Indra. You are the sole refuge of perfected beings and holy men. You are the Om,<sup>7</sup> and you are the spirit of sacrifice. You are that cosmic being with infinite heads, hands and eyes.<sup>8</sup> You are the support of the whole universe. The whole universe is your body. Sītā is Laksmī<sup>9</sup> and you are lord Viṣṇu, who is of a dark hue, and who is the creator of all beings. For the sake of the destruction of Rāvaṇa you entered into a human body. This mission of ours has been fully accomplished by you. Blessed it is to be in your presence; blessed it is to sing your glories; they are truly blessed who are devoted to you, for their life will be attended with success."

As soon as Brahmā finished saying this, the god of fire emerged from the fire in his personal form, holding up Sītā in his hands. Sītā shone in all her radiance. The god of fire who is the witness of everything that takes place in the world, said to Rāma: "Here is your Sītā, Rāma. I find no fault in her. She has not erred in thought, word or deed. Even during the long period of her detention in the abode of Rāvaṇa, she did not even think of him, as her heart was set on you. Accept her: and I command you not to treat her harshly.”

Rāma was highly pleased at this turn of events. He said: “Indeed, I was fully aware of Sītā’s purity. Even the mighty and wicked Rāvaṇa could not lay his hands upon her with evil intention. Yet, this baptism by fire was necessary, to avoid public calumny and ridicule, for though she was pure, she lived in Laṅkā for a long time. I knew, too, that Sītā would never be unfaithful to me: for we are non-different from each other even as the sun and its rays are. It is therefore impossible for me to renounce her.”

After saying so, Rāma was joyously reunited with Sītā.

YUDDHA 122–23

Lord Śiva then said to Rāma: “You have fulfilled a most difficult task. Now behold your father, the illustrious king Daśaratha who appears in the firmament to bless you and to greet you.”

Rāma along with Lakṣmaṇa saw that great monarch, their father clad in a raiment of purity and shining by his own luster. Still seated in his celestial vehicle, Daśaratha lifted up Rāma and placing him on his lap, warmly embraced him and said: “Neither heaven nor even the homage of the gods is as pleasing to me as to behold you, Rāma. I am delighted to see that you have successfully completed the period of your exile and that you have destroyed all your enemies. Even now the cruel words of Kaikeyī haunt my heart; but seeing you and embracing you, I am rid of that sorrow, O Rāma. You have redeemed my word and thus I have been saved by you. It is only now that I recognize you to be the supreme person incarnated as a human being in this world in order to kill Rāvaṇa.”

Rāma said: “You remember that you said to Kaikeyī, ‘I renounce you and your son’? Pray, take back that curse and may it not afflict Kaikeyī and Bharata.” Daśaratha agreed to it and then said to Lakṣmaṇa: “I am pleased with you, my son, and you have earned great merit by the faithful service you have rendered to Rāma.”

Lastly, king Daśaratha said to Sītā: “My dear daughter, do not take to heart the fire ordeal that Rāma forced you to undergo: it was necessary to reveal to the world your absolute purity. By your conduct you have exalted yourself above all women.” Having thus spoken to them, Daśaratha ascended to heaven.

Before taking leave of Rāma, Indra prayed: “Our visit to you should not be fruitless, O Rāma. Command me, what may I do for you?” Rāma replied: “If you are really pleased with me, then I pray that all those vānaras who laid down their lives for my sake may come back to life. I wish to see them hale and hearty as before. I also wish to see the whole world fruitful and prosperous.” Indra replied: “This indeed is an extremely difficult task. Yet, I do not go back on my word, hence I grant it. All the vānaras will come back to life and be restored to their original form, with all their wounds healed. Even as you had asked, the world will be fruitful and prosperous.”

Instantly, all the vānaras arose from the dead and bowed to Rāma. The others who witnessed this marveled and the gods beheld Rāma who had all his wishes fulfilled. The gods returned to their abodes.

Summary After crowning Vibhīṣaṇa king of Laṅkā, Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa and Sītā fly to Ayodhyā in Rāvaṇa's flying chariot, accompanied by Vibhīṣaṇa, Sugrīva, Hanumān, and the monkey hordes.

YUDDHA 130

Bharata immediately made the reception arrangements. He instructed Śatrughna: "Let prayers be offered to the gods in all temples and houses of worship with fragrant flowers and musical instruments."

Śatrughna immediately gave orders that the roads along which the royal procession would wend its way to the palace should be leveled and sprinkled with water, and kept clear by hundreds of policemen cordoning them. Soon all the ministers, and thousands of elephants and men on horse-back and in cars went out to greet Rāma. The royal reception party, seated in palanquins,<sup>1</sup> was led by the queen-mother Kausalyā herself; Kaikeyī and the other members of the royal household followed—and all of them reached Nandigrāma.<sup>2</sup>

From there Bharata headed the procession with the sandals of Rāma placed on his head, with the white royal umbrella and the other regalia.<sup>3</sup> Bharata was the very picture of an ascetic though he radiated the joy that filled his heart at the very thought of Rāma's return to the kingdom.

Bharata anxiously looked around but saw no signs of Rāma's return! But, Hanumān reassured him: "Listen, O Bharata, you can see the cloud of dust raised by the vānaras rushing towards Ayodhyā. You can now hear the roar of the Puṣpaka flying chariot."

"Rāma has come!"—these words were uttered by thousands of people at the same time. Even before the Puṣpaka landed, Bharata humbly saluted Rāma who was standing on the front side of the chariot. The Puṣpaka landed. As Bharata approached it, Rāma lifted him up and placed him on his lap. Bharata bowed down to Rāma and also to Sītā and greeted Lakṣmaṇa. And he embraced Sugrīva, Jāmbavān, Aṅgada, Vibhīṣaṇa and others. He said to Sugrīva: "We are four brothers, and with you we are five. Good deeds promote friendship, and evil is a sign of enmity."

Rāma bowed to his mother who had become emaciated through sorrow, and brought great joy to her heart. Then he also bowed to Sumitrā and Kaikeyī. All the people thereupon said to Rāma: "Welcome, welcome back, O Lord."

Bharata placed the sandals in front of Rāma, and said: "Rāma, here is your kingdom which I held in trust for you during your absence. I consider myself supremely blessed in being able to behold your return to Ayodhyā. By your grace, the treasury has been enriched tenfold by me, as also the storehouses and the strength of the nation." Rāma felt delighted. When the entire party had disembarked, he instructed that the Puṣpaka be returned to its original owner, Kubera.<sup>4</sup>

YUDDHA 131

The coronation proceedings were immediately initiated by Bharata. Skilled barbers removed the matted locks of Rāma. He had a ceremonial bath and he was dressed in magnificent robes and royal jewels. Kausalyā herself helped the vānara ladies to dress themselves in royal robes; all the queens dressed Sītā appropriately for the occasion. The royal chariot was brought; duly ascending it, Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa and Sītā went in a procession to Ayodhyā, Bharata himself driving the chariot. When he had reached the court, Rāma gave his ministers and counselors a brief account of the events during his exile, particularly the alliance with the vānara chief Sugrīva, and the exploits of Hanumān. He also informed them of his alliance with Vibhīṣaṇa.

At Bharata's request, Sugrīva despatched the best of the vānaras to fetch water from the four oceans, and all the sacred rivers of the world. The aged sage Vasiṣṭha thereupon commenced the ceremony in connection with the coronation of Rāma. Rāma and Sītā were seated on a seat made entirely of precious stones. The foremost among the sages thereupon consecrated Rāma with the appropriate Vedic chants. First the brāhmaṇas, then the virgins, then the ministers and warriors, and later the businessmen poured the holy waters on Rāma.<sup>5</sup> After that the sage Vasiṣṭha placed Rāma on the throne made of gold and studded with precious stones, and placed on his head the dazzling crown which had been made by Brahmā the creator himself. The gods and others paid their homage to Rāma by bestowing gifts upon him. Rāma also gave away rich presents to the brāhmaṇas and others, including the vānara chiefs like Sugrīva. Rāma then gave to Sītā a necklace of pearls and said: "You may give it to whom you like, Sītā." And, immediately Sītā bestowed that gift upon Hanumān.

After witnessing the coronation of Rāma, the vānaras returned to Kiṣkindhā. So did Vibhīṣaṇa return to Laṅkā. Rāma looked fondly at Lakṣmaṇa and expressed the wish that he should reign as the prince regent. Lakṣmaṇa did not reply: he did not want it. Rāma appointed Bharata as prince regent. Rāma thereafter ruled the earth for a very long time.

During the period of Rāma's reign, there was no poverty, no crime, no fear, and no unrighteousness in the kingdom. All the people constantly spoke of Rāma; the whole world had been transformed into Rāma. Everyone was devoted to dharma. And Rāma was highly devoted to dharma, too. He ruled for eleven thousand years.

YUDDHA 131

Rāma's rule of the kingdom was characterized by the effortless and spontaneous prevalence of dharma. People were free from fear of any sort. There were no widows in the land: people were not molested by beasts and snakes, nor did they suffer from diseases. There was no theft, no robbery nor any violence. Young people did not die, making older people perform funeral services for them. Everyone was happy and everyone was devoted to dharma; beholding Rāma alone, no one harmed another. People lived long and had many children. They were healthy and they were free from sorrow. Everywhere people were speaking all the time about Rāma; the entire world appeared to be the form of Rāma. The trees were endowed with undying roots, and they were in fruition all the time and they flowered throughout the year. Rain fell whenever it was needed. There was a pleasant breeze always. The brāhmaṇas (priests), the warriors, the farmers and businessmen, as also the members of the servant class, were entirely free from greed, and were joyously devoted to their own dharma and functions in society. There was no falsehood in the life of the people who were all righteous. People were endowed with all auspicious characteristics and all of them had dharma as their guiding light. Thus did Rāma rule the world for eleven thousand years, surrounded by his brothers.

4. God of wealth.

This holy epic Rāmāyaṇa composed by the sage Vālmīki, promotes dharma, fame, long life and in the case of a king, victory. He who listens to it always is freed from all sins. He who desires sons gets them, and he who desires wealth becomes wealthy, by listening to the story of the coronation of Rāma. The king conquers the whole world, after overcoming his enemies. Women who listen to this story will be blessed with children like Rāma and his brothers. And they, too, will be blessed with long life, after listening to the Rāmāyaṇa. He who listens to or reads this Rāmāyaṇa propitiates Rāma by this; Rāma is pleased with him; and he indeed is the eternal lord Viṣṇu.

LAVA AND KUŚA said: Such is the glorious epic, Rāmāyaṇa. May all recite it and thus augment the glory of dharma, of lord Viṣṇu. Righteous men should regularly listen to this story of Rāma, which increases health, long life, love, wisdom and vitality.

THE BHAGAVAD-GĪTĀ

ca. fourth century B.C.E.–fourth century C.E.

---

The Bhagavad-gītā asks the most difficult of questions. What is a just war, and when can the use of armed conflict to resolve a political stalemate be justified? Under what circumstances is it possible to engage in a violent conflict with family members, clansmen, teachers, and friends—the very people who have nurtured us since infancy—and claim a victory that is morally right? What is such a victory worth if, in the name of life, wealth, or truth, it destroys what we love? As a philosophical poem, the Bhagavad-gītā does not provide simple answers but offers explanations that are appropriately difficult because they involve dilemmas that cannot be resolved once and for all.

CONTEXT

During the past two centuries, it has become commonplace to treat the Bhagavad-gītā as an independent poem, which can be read and understood by itself for its philosophical message as a meditation on universal issues. But the work is actually an integral part of the Mahabharata, and was originally composed as the sixty-third minor book of that epic, and included in its sixth major book, Bhīṣma. Since it is a poem within a poem, the Bhagavad-gītā is best interpreted in relation to the epic's larger narrative, setting, and background.

The Mahabharata is attributed to a single poet or compiler named Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana, but it was composed collaboratively by many generations of poets in Sanskrit between about 400 B.C.E. and 400 C.E. Its main story concerns a protracted conflict between two branches of a royal dynasty in northern India, over the inheritance of a kingdom and the succession to its throne. The embattled groups are the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas, who are paternal cousins; the Kauravas are one hundred brothers, led by their eldest, Duryodhana, whereas the Pāṇḍavas are five half brothers, the three eldest being Yudhiṣṭhira, Bhīma, and Arjuna. Both branches have strong and legitimate claims to the kingdom, and one possible settlement is a division of the dominion, so that each set of cousins can rule its own territory without conflict. But Duryodhana and his brothers, the Kauravas, resist such a solution; using a variety of strategies, they deny the Pāṇḍavas' claim, and send the five brothers and their shared wife (in a polyandrous marriage) into a thirteen-year exile, with the promise to restore their share of territory if they meet several conditions. The Pāṇḍavas complete their exile as required, but when they return to Duryodhana's court, he refuses to honor his word.

At this point in the main narrative,

Lord Kṛṣṇa—a human avatar of Viṣṇu, the god who primarily preserves the moral order of the universe—intervenes on behalf of the Pāṇḍavas. In the course of his life in human form, Kṛṣṇa became a close friend of the third Pāṇḍava, Arjuna, in his youth; now, many years later, when Arjuna and his half brothers find themselves in an impossible situation with their cousins, Kṛṣṇa agrees to serve as their ambassador to Duryodhana. Even though Kṛṣṇa (whose divinity is evident to the other characters in the epic) offers the Kauravas a peaceable solution in accordance with dharma (law, morality, duty, obligation), Duryodhana refuses to give the Pāṇḍavas even five small villages as their share of the kingdom. In consultation with Kṛṣṇa, the Pāṇḍavas decide that the only way in which they can now assert their legitimate claim to the kingdom is by going to war with the Kauravas. This is a just war because their claim is based strictly on the dharma of succession and inheritance; and it is a justifiable war because they have exhausted every possibility of a peaceful resolution of the stalemate with the Kauravas.

The Kauravas and Pāṇḍavas then prepare for armed conflict, and their respective armies gather on the battlefield of Kurukṣetra (about sixty-five miles north of modern Delhi). Arjuna, the most skilled and feared archer of his times, enters the battlefield on a chariot, with Kṛṣṇa serving as his charioteer. But in the moments just before the battle begins, Arjuna looks at the forces arrayed on the enemy side, and sees in their midst all his cousins as well as many people he grew up with—teachers, friends, and members of his clan, people he has known and loved much of his life. Faced with the prospect of shedding their blood, he throws down his weapons and refuses to fight: he cannot imagine how any such war could possibly be good or right. But, in doing so, he immediately places himself in moral jeopardy as a warrior, because dharma requires that a kṣatriya be prepared to wage war whenever necessary, and in this case his cause is just. Caught between his fundamental duty as a warrior and his equally powerful obligation to preserve the lives of those he loves, Arjuna turns to Kṛṣṇa—his friend, aide, and counselor—and asks for his divine advice under the circumstances. The Bhagavad-gītā is the poetic record of that moment of crisis in Arjuna's mind, and of the conversation he has with God on the brink of war.

WORK

The Bhagavad-gītā is divided into eighteen chapters or cantos composed in verse, and its total length runs to seven hundred couplets. In the translation from which our selection of passages is drawn, each canto is called a “chapter”; it contains, in part, Kṛṣṇa's instruction to Arjuna about what is involved in war, violence, duty, courage, life, and death (among other things), and why it is essential to fight a just war, even if it means destroying precious lives.

The structure of the Bhagavad-gītā as a whole has two layers of interspersed dialogue: one between Sañjaya and Dhṛtarāṣṭra, which defines the outer frame of the book, and the other between Arjuna and Kṛṣṇa, which occurs in an inner frame. Dhṛtarāṣṭra is the father of the Kauravas and the current head of the dynasty; he is blind and old, and cannot participate in or even observe the battle. He sits in his chariot on the edge of the battlefield with his charioteer, a youth named Sañjaya; on the eve of the war, Dvaipāyana, the original author of the Mahabharata, grants Sañjaya “celestial vision,” so that he can omnisciently observe everything in the past, present, and future, and everything that happens on the battlefield, in public and in private; throughout the eighteen days of the war, Sanjaya tells the blind Dhṛtarāṣṭra what happens in the war, and we, the readers, also witness the entire conflict through Sañjaya's “visionary eye.” Our excerpts here mostly omit the dialogue between Sañjaya and Dhṛtarāṣṭra in the various cantos; the main exception is the passage from Chapter Eleven, which ends with a portion of Sañjaya's narrative.

In the excerpt from Chapter One we hear Arjuna's voice, explaining to Kṛṣṇa at length why he is unable to take up arms against his blood relatives, mentors, and friends. In the segments from Chapter Two, Kṛṣṇa begins his response to Arjuna's dilemma by explaining the nature of the imperishable self or soul embodied in every human being. In the portions reproduced from Chapter Three, Arjuna raises fresh questions about human action in relation to the inner self and to evil, and Kṛṣṇa teaches him the yoga or discipline of action, especially as it should be practiced by a warrior. In the next excerpt, which jumps ahead to Chapter Six, Kṛṣṇa then explains what self-discipline in general is, and what a man who establishes complete control over himself can accomplish. In the final passage, drawn from Chapter Eleven, Arjuna achieves a comprehensive, new understanding of his task as a warrior, and asks Kṛṣṇa to reveal his full divine form; Kṛṣṇa does so, but the vision is so intense that a merely human eye cannot experience it. The narrator Sanjaya, talking to King Dhṛtarāṣṭra, therefore intercedes with his extraordinary visual capacity, and reports, in part, what Kṛṣṇa reveals to Arjuna.

The passages from the Bhagavad-gītā reproduced here cover only a small portion of Lord Kṛṣṇa's advice to Arjuna on the battlefield of Kurukṣetra. In the course of the eighteen cantos of the book, Kṛṣṇa constructs a long argument, containing many strands, about the justification for violence in the context of a war that is morally right and in complete accordance with all applicable aspects of dharma. Especially when encountered in excerpts, this argument can be, and often has been, easily misunderstood. Kṛṣṇa emphatically does not offer a general justification for violence under all circumstances; the use of violence to settle a major dispute can be justified only when every possible option for a peaceful resolution has been explored within the full scope of the law, and all such options have failed. Moreover, in a just war, only the thoroughly trained and disciplined warrior can use violence, and even he can do so only when he is in complete control of himself, and selflessly pursues his duty as defined by dharma.

From CHAPTER ONE<sup>2</sup>

- 20 “Now Monkey-Bannered Arjuna,<sup>3</sup> seeing his foes drawn up for war, raised his bow, that Son of Pandu,
as the weapons began to clash.
- 21 “Then he said these words to Krishna:<sup>4</sup> ‘Lord of the Earth, Unshaken One, bring my chariot to a halt between the two adverse armies,
- 22 ‘so I may see these men, arrayed here for the battle they desire, whom I am soon to undertake a warrior’s delight in fighting!
- 23 ‘I see those who have assembled,
the warriors prepared to fight, eager to perform in battle for Dhṛtarashtra’s evil son!’<sup>5</sup>
- 24 “When Arjuna had spoken so to Krishna, O Bharata,<sup>6</sup> he, having brought their chariot to a halt between the armies,

1. Translated by Gavin Flood and Charles Martin. Verse numbers run to the left of the text.

2. Most of the Bhagavad-gītā is narrated by Sañjaya; the double quotation marks throughout these excerpts represent Sanjaya’s direct speech, addressed to Dhṛtarāṣṭra. For an explanation of these two characters, who define the outer narrative frame of the poem, see the “Work” section of the headnote. The single quotation marks represent the dialogue between Arjuna and Kṛṣṇa, which takes place within Sanjaya’s narrative.

3. The third of the five sons of Pāṇḍu.

4. An incarnation of Viṣṇu, the preserver god.

5. Duryodhana, the leader of the Kauravas, who is the eldest son of Dhṛtarāṣṭra.

6. An alternate name or epithet for Dhṛtarāṣṭra, who, like his brother Pāṇḍu and their respective sons, is a descendant of Bhārata, the founder of their dynasty of kings.

- 25 “in the face of Bhishma, Drona,<sup>7</sup> and the other Lords of the Earth,<sup>8</sup> said, ‘Behold, O Son of Pritha,<sup>9</sup> how these Kurus<sup>1</sup> have assembled!’
- 26 “And there the son of Pritha saw rows of grandfathers and grandsons; sons and fathers, uncles, in-laws;
teachers, brothers and companions,
- 27 “all relatives and friends of his
in both of the assembled armies.
And seeing them arrayed for war, Arjuna, the Son of Kunti,
- 28 “felt for them a great compassion, as well as great despair, and said, ‘O Krishna, now that I have seen my relatives so keen for war,
- 29 ‘I am unstrung: my limbs collapse beneath me, and my mouth is dry, there is a trembling in my body,
and my hair rises, bristling;
- 30 ‘Gandiva, my immortal bow,<sup>2</sup> drops from my hand and my skin burns, I cannot stand upon my feet, my mind rambles in confusion—
- 31 ‘All inauspicious are the signs that I see, O Handsome-Haired One!<sup>3</sup> I foresee no good resulting from slaughtering my kin in war!
- 32 ‘I have no wish for victory, nor for kingship and its pleasures!
O Krishna, what good is kingship?
What good even life and pleasure?
- 33 ‘Those for whose sake we desire kingship, pleasures and enjoyments, are now drawn up in battle lines,
their lives and riches now abandoned:

7. Droṇa was the teacher or guru of both the Kauravas and the Pāṇḍavas; Bhīṣma is the granduncle of both these branches of the family.

8. “Lord of the earth” is a common epithet for a king in epic Sanskrit.

9. Another name for Kuṇṭī, the mother of Arjuna and the Pāṇḍavas.

1. Another name for the Kauravas.

2. A powerful celestial bow of great antiquity and renown that Arjuna won from the fire god, Agni.

3. Kṛṣṇa is often depicted with long, flowing hair.

- 34 'fathers, grandfathers; sons, grandsons;
my mother's brothers and the men who taught me in my youth; brothers-and fathers-in-law: kinsmen all!
- 35 'Though they are prepared to slay us, I do not wish to murder them, not even to rule the three worlds—how much less one earthly kingdom?
- 36 'What joy for us in murdering Dhritarashtra's sons, O Krishna?
for if we killed these murderers, evil like theirs would cling to us!
- 37 'So we cannot in justice slay our kinsmen, Dhritarashtra's sons, for, having killed our people, how could we be pleased, O Madhava?<sup>4</sup>
- 38 'Even if they, mastered by greed, are blind to the consequences of the family's destruction, of friendships lost to treachery,
- 39 'how are we not to comprehend that we must turn back from evil?
The wrong done by this destruction is evident, O Shaker of Men.
- 40 'For with the family destroyed, its eternal laws must perish;
and when they perish, lawlessness overwhelms the whole family.
- 41 'Whelmed by lawlessness, the women of the family are corrupted; from corrupted women comes the intermingling of classes.<sup>5</sup>
- 42 'Such intermingling sends to hell
the family and its destroyers:

4. One of Viṣṇu's 1,008 names in Hindu ritual and mythology, meaning "the one sweet as honey."

5. "Intermingling" here refers to miscegenation, and "classes" to caste-groups. The caste system is based on endogamy, or marriage within a caste-group (varṇa) or caste (jāti); only if both partners come from the same social category can that category be reproduced in the next generation. Here Kṛṣṇa affirms that if two spouses belong to different social categories (varṇa or jāti), then their children do not belong to the same category as their parents, and hence undermine the "laws of caste."

their ancestors fall then, deprived of rice and water offerings.<sup>6</sup>

- 43 ‘Those who destroy the family, who institute class-mingling, cause the laws of the family and laws of caste to be abolished.
- 44 ‘Men whose familial laws have been obliterated, O Krishna, are damned to dwell eternally in hell, as we have often heard.
- 45 ‘It grieves me that as we intend to murder our relatives in our greed for pleasures, kingdoms, we are fixed on doing evil!
- 46 ‘If the sons of Dhritarashtra, armed as they are, should murder me weaponless and unresisting, I would know greater happiness!’
- 47 “And having spoken, Arjuna collapsed into his chariot, his bow and arrows clattering, and his mind overcome with grief.”

From CHAPTER TWO

* * *

“The Lord<sup>7</sup> said:

- 11 ‘Although you seem to speak wisely,
you have mourned those not to be mourned:
the wise do not grieve for those gone or for those who are not yet gone.
- 12 ‘There was no time when I was not,
nor you, nor these lords around us, and there will never be a time henceforth when we shall not exist.
- 13 ‘The embodied one passes through childhood, youth, and then old age, then attains another body;
in this the wise are undeceived.<sup>8</sup>

6. Hindus are required to make these ritual offerings to their ancestors.

7. Lord Kṛṣṇa, who now addresses Arjuna.

8. Here Kṛṣṇa explains the process of reincarnation, emphasizing the identity of the seemingly finite embodied soul (ātman) with the infinite and imperishable universal spirit or godhead (Brahman).

- 14 'Contacts with matter by which we feel heat and cold, pleasure and pain, are transitory, come and go:
these you must manage to endure.
- 15 'Such contacts do not agitate a wise man, O Bull among Men, to whom pleasure and pain are one.
He is fit for immortality.
- 16 'Non-being cannot come to be,
nor can what is come to be not.
The certainty of these sayings is known by seers of the truth.
- 17 'Know it as indestructible, that by which all is pervaded;
no one may cause the destruction of the imperishable one.
- 18 'Bodies of the embodied one, eternal, boundless, all-enduring,
are said to die; the one cannot:
therefore, take arms, O Bharata!
- 19 'This man believes the one may kill;
That man believes it may be killed;
both of them lack understanding:
it can neither kill nor be killed.
- 20 'It is not born, nor is it ever mortal, and having been, will not pass from existence;
ancient, unborn, eternally existing,
it does not die when the body perishes.
- 21 'How can a man who knows the one to be eternal (both unborn and without end) murder or cause another to? Whom does he kill?
- 22 'Someone who has abandoned worn-out garments sets out to clothe himself in brand-new raiment;
just so, when it has cast off worn-out bodies,
the embodied one will encounter others.
- 23 'This may not be pierced by weapons, nor can this be consumed by flames;
flowing waters cannot drench this,
nor blowing winds desiccate this.
- 24 'Not to be pierced, not to be burned, neither drenched nor desiccated—eternal, all-pervading, firm, unmoving, everlasting this!

- 25 ‘This has been called unmanifest, unthinkable and unchanging;
therefore, because you know this now,
you should not lament, Arjuna.
- 26 ‘But even if you think that this is born and dies time after time, forever, O great warrior, not even then should you mourn this.
- 27 ‘Death is assured to all those born, and birth assured to all the dead;
you should not mourn what is merely inevitable consequence.
- 28 ‘Beginnings are unmanifest, but manifest the middle-state, and ends unmanifest again;
so what is your complaint about?
- 29 ‘Somebody looks upon this as a marvel, and likewise someone tells about this marvel,
and yet another hears about this marvel,
but even having heard it, no one knows it.
- 30 ‘The one cannot ever perish
in a body it inhabits, O Descendent of Bharata;
and so no being should be mourned.
- 31 ‘Nor should you tremble to perceive your duty as a warrior;
for him there is nothing better than a battle that is righteous.
- 32 ‘And if by chance they will have gained the wide open gate of heaven, O Son of Pritha, warriors rejoice in fighting such as that!
- 33 ‘If you turn from righteous warfare, your behavior will be evil, for you will have abandoned both your duty and your honored name.
- 34 ‘People will speak of your disgrace forever, and an honored man who falls from honor into shame suffers a fate much worse than death.

* * *

47 “Your concern should be with action, never with an action’s fruits;
these should never motivate you, nor attachment to inaction.

48 ‘Established in this practice, act without attachment, Arjuna, unmoved by failure or success!
Equanimity is yoga.

49 ‘Action is far inferior to the practice of higher mind; seek refuge there, for pitiful are those moved by fruit of action!

50 ‘One disciplined by higher mind here casts off good and bad actions;
therefore, be yoked to discipline;
discipline is skill in actions.

51 ‘Having left the fruit of action, the wise ones yoked to higher mind are freed from the bonds of rebirth, and go where no corruption is.

52 ‘When your higher mind has crossed over the thicket of delusion, you will become disenchanted with what is heard in the Vedas.<sup>9</sup>

53 ‘When, unvexed by revelation, your higher mind is motionless and stands fixed in meditation, then you will attain discipline.’

“Arjuna asked,

54 “Tell me, Krishna, how may I know the man steady in his wisdom, who abides in meditation?
How should that one sit, speak and move?”

“The Blessed Lord replied,

55 ‘When he renounces all desires entering his mind, Arjuna,

9. Kṛṣṇa suggests here that the older ritualistic knowledge embodied in the Vedas is useless for the liberation of the individual self or soul from the bondage of karma.

and his self rests within the Self,<sup>1</sup> then his wisdom is called steady.

56 ‘He who is not agitated by suffering or by desires, freed from anger, fear and passions, is called a sage of steady mind.

57 ‘Who is wholly unimpassioned, not rejoicing in the pleasant, nor rejecting the unpleasant, is established in his wisdom.

58 ‘And when this one wholly withdraws all his senses from their objects, as a tortoise draws in its limbs, his wisdom is well-established.’”

* * *

From CHAPTER THREE

“Arjuna said:

1 ‘If you regard the intellect as superior to action, why urge me, O Handsome-Haired One, into actions so appalling?

2 ‘By your equivocating speech, my mind is, as it were, confused.
Tell me this one thing, and clearly:
By what means may I reach the best?’

“The Blessed Lord said:

3 ‘As I have previously taught, there are two paths, O Blameless One:
there is the discipline of knowledge and the discipline of action.

4 ‘Not by not acting in this world does one become free from action, nor does one approach perfection by renunciation only.

5 ‘Not even for a moment does someone exist without acting.

1. This is a play on the word ātman, which means both “the self” (soul) and “oneself.” Kṛṣṇa now begins to describe the techniques for and effects of “withdrawing” one’s senses from interaction with the external world and focusing them instead on the interior self.

Even against one's will, one acts by the nature-born qualities.<sup>2</sup>

- 6 'He who has restrained his senses, but sits and summons back to mind the sense-objects, is said to be a self-deluding hypocrite.
- 7 'But he whose mind controls his senses, who undertakes the discipline of action by the action-organs, without attachment, is renowned.
- 8 'You must act as bid, for action is better than non-action is:
not even functions of the body could be sustained by non-action.
- 9 'This world is bound by action, save for action which is sacrifice;
therefore, O Son of Kunti, act without attachment to your deeds.
- 10 'When Prajapati brought forth life, he brought forth sacrifice as well, saying, "By this may you produce, may this be your wish-fulfilling cow."<sup>3</sup>
- 11 'Nourish the gods with sacrifice, and they will nourish you as well.
By nourishing each other, you will realize the highest good.
- 12 'Nourished by sacrifice, the gods will give the pleasures you desire.
One who enjoys such gifts without repaying them is just a thief.
- 13 'The good, who eat of the remains from sacrifice, rise up faultless.
But the wicked, who cook only for their own sakes, eat their own filth.
- 14 'Beings come to exist by food, which emanates from the rain god, who comes to be by sacrifice, which arises out of action.

2. There are three such primary qualities: sat-tva (purity, light), rajas (passion, heat), and tamas (inertia, darkness).

3. In Vedic religion, Prajapati is the god (creator) of all mortal creatures. In Hindu mythology generally, kāmadhenu is a celestial cow who has the power to fulfill the wishes of anyone who worships her. Here Prajāpatī suggests that the act of sacrificing is itself like a wish-granting kāmadhenu. In the Vedic worldview, the preservation of the universe depends on the sacrifices made to the gods, and such ritual was at the center of the religion.

- 15 'Know that action comes from Brahman, Brahman comes from the eternal;
so the all-pervading Brahman is based in sacrifice forever.
- 16 'One who in this world does not turn the wheel, thus setting it in motion, lives uselessly, O Son of Pritha, a sensual, malicious life.
- 17 'But the man whose only pleasure and satisfaction is the self, which is his sole contentment too,
has no task he must accomplish.
- 18 'That man finds no significance in what has, or has not, been done; moreover, he does not depend on any being whatsoever.
- 19 'Therefore, act without attachment
in whatever situation, for by the practice of detached action, one attains the highest.
- 20 'Only by action Janaka<sup>4</sup> and the others reached perfection.
In order to maintain the world,
your obligation is to act.
- 21 'Whatever the best leader does the rank and file will also do; everyone will fall in behind the standard such a leader sets.
- 22 'O Son of Pritha, there is nought that I need do in the three worlds,<sup>5</sup> nor anything I might attain;
and yet I take part in action.
- 23 'For if I were not always to engage in action ceaselessly, men everywhere would soon follow in my path, O Son of Pritha.
- 24 'Should I not engage in action, these worlds would perish, utterly;
I would cause a great confusion, and destroy all living beings.
- 25 'The unwise are attached to action
even as they act, Arjuna;

4. Celebrated character in the dialogues of the Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad; an exemplar of the warrior-king who is also a man of discipline (a yogi).

5. Heaven, earth, and the underworld.

so, for the welfare of the world, the wise should act with detachment.’”

* * *

“Arjuna said:

- 36 ‘Say what impels a man to do such evil, Krishna, what great force urges him, forces him into it, even if he is unwilling?’

“The Blessed Lord said:

- 37 ‘Know that the enemy is this:
desire, anger, whose origins are in the quality of passion, all consuming, greatly harmful.
- 38 ‘As fire is obscured by smoke, or by dust, a mirror’s surface, or an embryo by its membrane, so this is covered up by that.
- 39 ‘Knowledge is constantly obscured by this enemy of the wise, by this insatiable fire whose form, Arjuna, is desire.
- 40 ‘The senses, mind, and intellect are its abode, as it is said.
Having obscured knowledge with these,
it deludes the embodied one.
- 41 ‘When you have subdued your senses, then, O Bull of the Bharatas, kill this demon, the destroyer of all knowledge and discernment.
- 42 ‘Senses are said to be important, but mind is higher than they are,
and intellect is above mind;
but Self is greater than all these.
- 43 ‘So knowing it to be supreme,
and sustaining the self with Self, slay the foe whose form is desire,
so hard to conquer, Arjuna.’”

From CHAPTER SIX

* * *

- 10 “‘The yogi should be self-subdued always, and stand in solitude, alone, controlled in thought and self,

without desires or possessions.

- 11 'Having established for himself a steady seat in a pure place, neither too high nor yet too low, covered with grass, deer hide and cloth,
- 12 'with his mind sharpened to one point,
with thought and senses both subdued, there he should sit, doing yoga so as to purify the self,
- 13 'keeping his head, neck and body aligned, erect and motionless, gaze fixed on the tip of his nose,
not looking off distractedly,
- 14 'now fearless and with tranquil self,
firm in avowed celibacy,
with his thought focused on myself,
he should sit, devoted to me.
- 15 'Thus always chastening himself the yogi's mind, subdued, knows peace, whose farthest point is cessation;
thereafter, he abides in me.
- 16 'Yoga is not for the greedy, nor yet for the abstemious;
not for one too used to sleeping, nor for the sleepless, Arjuna.
- 17 'Yoga destroys the pain of one temperate in his behavior, in his food and recreation,
and in his sleep and waking too.
- 18 'After his thought has been subdued, and abides only in the Self,
free from all longing and desire,
then he is said to be steadfast.
- 19 "“Like a lamp in a windless place unflickering,” is the likeness of the yogi subdued in thought, performing yoga of the Self.
- 20 'Where all thought comes to cease, restrained by the discipline of yoga, where, by the self, the Self is seen,
one is satisfied in the Self.
- 21 'When he knows that eternal joy grasped only by the intellect, beyond the senses where he dwells,

he does not deviate from truth;

- 22 'having attained it, he believes there is no gain superior; abiding there, he is unmoved even by profound suffering.
- 23 'Let him know that the dissolving of the union with suffering is called yoga, to be practiced with persistence, mind undaunted.
- 24 'Having abandoned all desires born to satisfy intentions, and having utterly restrained
the many senses by the mind,
- 25 'Gradually let him find rest,
his intellect under control, his mind established in the Self,
not thinking about anything.
- 26 'Having subdued the unsteady mind in motion, he should lead it back from wherever it strays to,
into the domain of the Self.
- 27 'Supreme joy comes to the yogi of calm mind and tranquil passion, who has become one with Brahman and is wholly free of evil.
- 28 'Constantly controlling himself, the yogi, freed from evil now, swiftly attains perpetual joy of contact here with Brahman.
- 29 'He whose self is yoked by yoga and who perceives sameness always, will see the Self in all beings and see all beings in the Self.
- 30 'I am not lost for someone who perceives my presence everywhere, and everything perceives in me,
nor is that person lost for me.
- 31 'The yogi firmly set in oneness who worships me in all beings, whatever the path that he takes,
will nonetheless abide in me.
- 32 'The yogi who sees all the same analogous to his own Self in happiness or suffering is thought supreme, O Arjuna.’”

Summary In Chapters Seven through Ten, Krishna explains diverse aspects of the nature of the infinite spirit, gradually unveiling the mystery of his own identity as the highest manifestation of that universal spirit and thus leading up to the revelation of his cosmic form in Chapter Eleven.

From CHAPTER ELEVEN

“Arjuna said,

- 1 ‘As a result of your kindness in speaking of that greatest secret recognized as the Supreme Self,
I have been left undeluded.
- 2 ‘I have, in detail, heard you speak Of creatures’ origins and ends, and of your eternal greatness, O One of Lotus-Petal-Eyes.
- 3 ‘This is just as you have spoken about yourself, O Supreme Lord.
I desire to behold your lordly form, O Supreme Spirit.
- 4 ‘If you think it is possible for me to see this, then, O God, O Lord of Yoga, allow me to behold your eternal Self!’

“The Blessed Lord said,

- 5 ‘O Son of Pritha, look upon my hundredfold, no, thousandfold forms various and celestial, forms of diverse shapes and colors!
- 6 ‘Behold the Adityas and Vasus, the Rudras, Ashvins and Maruts,<sup>6</sup> many unseen previously!
Behold these wonders, Arjuna!
- 7 ‘Here behold all the universe, beings moving and motionless,
standing as one in my body,
and all else that you wish to see!
- 8 ‘Because you are unable to behold me with your mortal eye,
I give you one that is divine:
Behold my majestic power!’”

6. Groups of Hindu deities: Adityas are sun gods; Vasus are elemental deities; Rudras are wind gods; the Ashvins are twin gods of sunrise and sunset; and the Maruts are storm gods.

Sanjaya<sup>7</sup> said,

- 9 “And after saying this, O King,

Early Chinese Literature and Thought

Many great civilizations have perished with little consequence. What we know of them comes from the imaginative reconstructions of scholars, from inscriptions, and from the accounts of early travelers. Civilizations like those of ancient Egypt and Mesopotamia left extensive written records that were swept aside by other civilizations; the very names by which we refer to them—Egypt and Mesopotamia—are Greek. This is not the case with China, the oldest surviving civilization, whose literary tradition stretches over more than three thousand years. Its earliest literature set patterns and posed questions that shaped the actions and values of the Chinese people for thousands of years, serving as the connective tissue that gave its civilization a sense of unity and continuity.

Throughout China's long history, its territories, ruling classes, capitals, religions, and customs kept changing with the rise and fall of ruling dynasties; and its peoples have spoken a great number of widely divergent Chinese dialects as well as many non-Chinese languages from the Turkic, Mongolian, and even Indo-European language families. Thus, China might easily have become fragmented by regional interests and linguistic differences like Europe after the fall of the Roman Empire. But whereas Rome was truly a conquest empire, a political center that ruled over many peoples, each with its own sense of distinct ethnic identity, traditional China was an idea tied to cultural values and the power of the written word. Certainly, Chinese emperors did at certain times in history conquer territories as remote as Korea, Vietnam, Tibet, and Taiwan. But China could survive periods of turmoil and even rule by non-Chinese conquerors such as the Mongols and the Manchus because peoples on the margins of the ancient heartland had for centuries been adopting China's writing, cultural values, and institutions, and had thus become "Chinese." Many times in China's history, regional identity has become subordinate to a belief in cultural and political unity.

BEGINNINGS: EARLY SAGE RULERS

Although China has always been in contact with western parts of the Eurasian landmass, it developed independently from the earlier Mesopotamian, Egyptian, and Indus Valley city civilizations. By the third millennium B.C.E. at least a dozen Neolithic (New Stone Age) cultures flourished along the Yellow River in the north and the Yangtze River in the south. By the second millennium B.C.E. most settlements had defensive walls made of rammed earth, a sign of the increasing influence of military elites, who defended the populace against other rising city-states. Later Chinese historians placed into this early period a lineage of sage rulers who laid the foundations for Chinese civilization. Fu Xi reputedly taught people how to raise silkworms. He also invented the eight trigrams, symbols consisting of three broken or unbroken (Yin and Yang) lines each, which became the basis for China's canonical divination text, the Classic of Changes (Yijing). Shennong invented the plow and instructed people in the use of medicinal herbs. Huangdi, the "Yellow Emperor," was a patron of medicine and agriculture. His scribe, Cang Jie, invented writing by creating graphs that imitated the articulate tracks of birds, realizing that the new technology "could regulate the various professions and keep under scrutiny the various kinds of people." A later sage ruler, Yao, disinherited his inept son and chose a commoner to succeed him on the throne, thus establishing the principle of virtue and merit over blood lineage. This commoner, Shun, was an ideal ruler and a model of filial piety (he remained true to his parents despite their repeated attempts to kill him). His successor, the Great Yu, showed exemplary dedication to the welfare of his people and invented irrigation, constructing channels to tame the Great Flood that occurred during his reign.

Encapsulated in this lineage of legendary rulers are fundamental values of Chinese civilization: the importance of writing and divination; an economy based on intensive agriculture and silk production; a political philosophy of virtue that emphasizes fixed social roles; and practices of self-cultivation and herbal medicine.

EARLIEST DYNASTIES: CHINA DURING THE BRONZE AGE AND THE BEGINNING OF WRITING

China's Bronze Age began around 2000 B.C.E. By 1200 B.C.E., cultures in several regions of China made ample use of bronze for the molding of more-effective weapons, for the new technology of spoke-wheel chariots, and for the production of ritual bronze vessels used in ceremonies honoring gods and ancestors. A small area in the Yellow River basin of north-central China is the best known of these Bronze Age cultures: thanks to the groundbreaking archaeological discovery of inscriptions on tortoiseshells and cattle bones in 1898, this area could be identified as the so-called second dynasty—the Shang (ca. 1500–1045 B.C.E.). The first dynasty is traditionally identified as the Xia, whose name and list of kings are recorded in later texts, but whose existence hasn't been linked to any of the known Bronze Age archaeological sites.

This tortoiseshell, inscribed with writing dating from ca. 1200 B.C.E., was used for ceremonial divination.

The Shang was a loose confederation of city-states with a complex state system, large settlements, and, most important, a common writing system. Although it remains unclear when the Chinese script began to be developed, it appeared as a fully functional writing system during the later period of the Shang dynasty. To date, more than 48,000 fragments of inscribed shells and bones have been found. These so-called oracle bone inscriptions are usually short records of divination rituals. Ritual specialists and the Shang kings would apply heat to the bones and use the resulting cracks to interpret or predict events: determining weather, harvest, floods, or tribute payments; divining the outcome of imminent war or the birth of male offspring; or even finding the causes for the toothache of a royal family member. Thus, writing was part of ritual practices that guided political decision making and harmonized the relation between human beings and the world of unpredictable spiritual forces in the cosmos. Its use was a prerogative of the Shang king and his elites.

From the inscriptions we can see that the Shang kings paid meticulous attention to the veneration of their dead ancestors and various gods, including the highest god, Di, who also commanded rain and thunder. They used war captives as slaves and sacrificial victims and employed conscript workers for monumental labor projects. For example, the sumptuous grave site of Lady Hao, one of the prominent Shang king Wu Ding's many wives, contained hundreds of bronze objects.

Among the many objects fashioned out of bronze during the Shang Dynasty were “fangding,” ritual vessels for cooking and presenting food. This fangding is the only extant example that is decorated with a human face.

THE ZHOU CONQUEST AND THE “MANDATE OF HEAVEN”

Around 1045 B.C.E. the Zhou people overthrew the Shang. The Zhou were an agrarian people and former allies of the Shang. Their justification of the conquest set the model for subsequent dynastic shifts in Chinese history. Texts recorded during the first centuries of Zhou rule claimed that a new power, “Heaven,” transferred the mandate to rule to the Zhou, because the moral worth of the Shang had declined and the last Shang rulers were decadent tyrants without regard for the people. In turn, the first rulers of the Zhou, King Wen (the “cultured” or “civilized” king) and his son King Wu (the “martial” king), who completed the conquest, were praised as paragons of virtue and “sons of Heaven” deserving of the mandate. After the Zhou conquest, the claim to power in China depended on the claim to virtuous rule, which in large measure meant holding to the statutes and models of the earliest sage rulers and the virtuous early Zhou kings.

THE DECLINE OF THE EASTERN ZHOU AND THE AGE OF CHINA’S PHILOSOPHICAL MASTERS

After their conquest, the early Zhou kings rewarded their allies with gifts of land. But initially strong personal ties between the Zhou kings and their allies weakened over the centuries, and in 771 B.C.E. some vassals joined forces with nomadic tribesmen and killed the king. The Zhou court fled and moved the capital to the east. Historians thus distinguish between the Western Zhou (1045–771 B.C.E.) and the Eastern Zhou (770–256 B.C.E.) periods. The Zhou kings never regained full control over their vassals. Although its kings continued to rule for another five centuries, the Eastern Zhou Dynasty lacked strong central authority, allowing its former vassals to build up their domains into belligerent independent states. On the southern and western borders of the old Zhou domain, powerful new states arose: Chu, Wu, and Yue in the south and Qin in the west. Although many of these new kingdoms had their distinct traditions, they gradually absorbed Zhou culture, and their rulers often sought to trace their descent either from the Zhou royal house or from more ancient, northern Chinese ancestors. Just before the defeat of the Western Zhou, there were around two hundred lords with domains of varying size, all under the titular rule of the Zhou king. By the third century B.C.E., only seven powerful states were left in the struggle over supremacy, and in 256 B.C.E. the last Zhou king was killed.

The Eastern Zhou Period was one of the most formative periods in Chinese history. The Eastern Zhou rulers built new institutions, and among its vassal states a lively interstate diplomacy unfolded; new military technology revolutionized warfare, and the old aristocracy was gradually dismantled and replaced by a new class of advisers and strategists. During the earlier part of the Eastern Zhou Period, the so-called Spring and Autumn Annals Period (722–481 B.C.E., named after the court chronicle of Confucius’s home state of Lu in eastern China), the old aristocracy in their chariots were still central to combat, and an honor code of military conduct was respected. Battles started with an agreement on both sides, states that were in mourning for their rulers were not attacked, and, if a state was defeated, the conqueror respectfully continued the ancestral sacrifices for the vanquished ruling lineage. This changed dramatically during the latter half of the Eastern Zhou, the so-called Warring States Period (403–221 B.C.E., named after a collection of stories about political intrigues between the Zhou states): mass infantry armies built on coercive drafts replaced the old aristocracy; raw power politics and strategic deception became the norm; the newly invented crossbow allowed soldiers to kill their enemies at greater distance, not in noble close combat; and rulers of the larger Zhou states started to call themselves kings, indicating that they not only defied the authority of the Zhou king but also intended to replace him as ruler over all of China.

It was in this climate that Confucius, and the philosophical masters who followed in his wake, formulated visions of how to live and govern well in a corrupt world. Chinese call this the period when “a hundred schools of thought bloomed.” The Eastern Zhou Period coincides with the period when the religions and philosophies of ancient India, Greece, Persia, and Israel took shape, and scholars have compared the social and political conditions facilitating this flourishing in these different civilizations. In China, rulers of the feudal states employed able advisers, or “masters,” to help them gain more resources, territory, and power, and the Chinese masters often moved between states in search for employment and patronage.

Chinese call the texts written by masters or compiled by their disciples “Masters Literature.” This name derives from scenes that show a charismatic master in vivid conversation with disciples, rulers, or other contemporaries. Masters Literature flourished from the time of Confucius through the Han Dynasty (206 B.C.E.–220 C.E.). This rich corpus of texts, represented in this anthology by selections from the Analects and Laozi, reveals the broad spectrum of opinions on fundamental questions: How can we create social order in a society that is incessantly at war? How can we become exemplary, fulfilled human beings in a less-than-ideal society? How can we make use of history and existing precedents to create a better future? How should we use words, and what impact can words and ideas have on social reality?

Later Chinese texts divided the masters and their followers into schools of thought, although the boundaries between their positions were often more fluid than the labels suggest. The most prominent schools were the Confucians, the Mohists (named after their master, Mozi), the Daoists, the Logicians, the Legalists, and the Yin-Yang Masters, each advocating its own programs, adopting different styles of argument, and engaging the rival camps in polemical disputes. The schools had varied degrees of success: while Confucianism and Daoism became the intellectual and religious backbone of traditional China (joined by Buddhism after it reached China from India around the Common Era), the Mohists and Logicians died out, the Yin-Yang Masters produced specialists in divination and calendrical science, and the Legalists, who advocated authoritarian rule through harsh laws, became the black sheep of early Chinese thought. They were openly decried as tyrannical and inhuman, but many of their ideas and methods were used by the architects of the Chinese empire throughout the centuries.

Confucius, the first and most exemplary master whose sayings are preserved in the Analects, believed that a return to the values of the virtuous early Zhou kings, a respect for social hierarchies, self-cultivation through proper ritual behavior, and the study of ancient texts could bring order. The most radical opponents of Confucius and his followers were thinkers who advocated passivity and following of the natural “way,” or dao. The Daoists had a deep mistrust of human-made things: conscious effort, artifice, and words. Laozi, a collection of poems and the foundational text of Daoism, proposed passivity as a means of ultimately prevailing over one’s opponents and gaining spiritual and political control.

FOUNDATIONS OF IMPERIAL CHINA: THE QIN AND THE HAN

The state of Qin, which had a reputation for ruthlessness and untrustworthiness, but whose armies were well disciplined and well supplied, destroyed the Zhou royal domain in 256 B.C.E. and conquered the last of the independent states in 221 B.C.E. That year is one of the most important dates in Chinese history. Conscious of the historical moment’s weight, the king of Qin conferred the title “First Emperor of Qin” upon himself to mark the novelty of his achievement. Although the Qin was a short-lived dynasty, many of its measures—designed to create a new type of state with a strong centralized bureaucracy—were adopted and adapted by the rulers of the subsequent Han Dynasty (206 B.C.E.–220 C.E.). With the Qin unification, China was finally an empire. Imperial China, with its upheavals, dynastic shifts, and momentous changes, would last another 2,100 years—until the Republican Revolution of 1911.

The First Emperor’s megalomania became legendary in later Chinese history, exerting as much fascination as horror. Though much of his statecraft was subtle, many of his most famous policies had a chilling simplicity. Some, such as unifying the currency, the various scripts, and the weights and measures used in different states, deserve credit. But his solution to intellectual disagreement was the suppression of scholars and the burning of all books except for practical manuals of medicine, agriculture, and divination and for the historical records of Qin. The “Qin Burning of the Books,” of 213 B.C.E., was one of the most traumatic events in Chinese history.

After the death of the First Emperor, rebellions broke out. Many of the rebels tried to restore the old pre-Qin states, but the final winner, a simple commoner named Liu Bang, became the first emperor of the Han Dynasty and continued the centralized government strategy of the Qin, while eliminating its unpopular features, loosening some particularly cruel laws, cutting taxes, and refraining from the constant labor mobilizations that the Qin emperor had forced on his people.

The Han Dynasty lasted more than four hundred years. The Han was the crucial phase of imperial consolidation that set patterns for future Chinese dynasties. During this period China expanded its boundaries into Central Asia and parts of modern Korea and Vietnam. Han emperors learned to deal with the challenging threat of northern frontier tribes, developing strategies that proved effective for subsequent empires: fight them, pay them off, or appease them with marriage alliances, offering Chinese princesses as brides to the tribal chieftains.

The most influential Han ruler was Emperor Wu, whose long reign lasted from 141 to 87 B.C.E. He undertook costly campaigns to expand the empire and established government monopolies on the production of iron, salt, and liquor to finance them. He was a generous patron of the arts, of music, and of scholarship. Although he was intrigued by immortality techniques, portents, and the occult, he was the first emperor to privilege Confucian scholars, founding a state academy for the education of government officials and setting up positions for professors to teach the so-called Five Classics: the Classic of Changes, used for divination; the Classic of Documents, a collection of proclamations by early sage kings and ministers; the Classic of Poetry, a collection of poetry including hymns to the Zhou ancestors and ballads recounting the history of the Zhou; the Spring and Autumn Annals, a historical chronicle; and the Record of Rites, the most important of several works on ritual.

Early China was a groundbreaking period of enduring influence on all subsequent periods of Chinese history. These first 1,500 years of Chinese history, from the Shang Dynasty to the end of the Han Dynasty, saw the emergence of enduring political institutions and ideologies, of moral standards and social manners. The literature produced during this period encapsulates these values and formative patterns and is still the canonical foundation of Chinese civilization.

CLASSIC OF POETRY

ca. 1000–600 B.C.E.

Standing at the beginning of China’s three-millennia-long literary tradition, the Classic of Poetry (also known as Book of Songs or Book of Odes) is the oldest poetry collection of East Asia. Its poems reflect the breadth of early Chinese society. Some poems convey the history and values of the earlier part of the Zhou Dynasty (ca. 1045–256 B.C.E.), whose founding kings set a standard of ideal governance for later generations. Others treat themes familiar from folk ballads: courtship, marriage and love, birth and death, and the stages of the agricultural cycle such as planting and harvesting. Filled with images of nature and the plain life of an agricultural society, the Classic of Poetry offers a distinctive, fresh simplicity. Because of the collection's canonical status, centuries of commentary and interpretation have accrued around it, adding to its meaning and significance and endowing the simple scenes in the poems with moral or political purpose. The anthology has had a profound impact on the literatures of Korea, Japan, and Vietnam and was an important element of the traditional curriculum throughout East Asia until the beginning of the twentieth century.

THE ANTHOLOGY AND ITS SIGNIFICANCE

While other ancient literary traditions were founded on epics about gods and heroes, or sprawling legends about the origins of the cosmos, the Classic of Poetry provided a different sort of foundation for Chinese literature, made up of the compact and evocative form of lyric poetry. Because Chinese literature originated with the Classic of Poetry, short verse gained a degree of political, social, and pedagogical importance in East Asia that it has not enjoyed anywhere else in the world.

The Classic of Poetry contains 305 poems and consists of three parts, the "Airs of the Domains" (Guofeng, 160 poems), the "Odes/Elegances" (Ya, 105 poems), and the "Hymns" (Song, 40 poems). The "Hymns" are the oldest part and contain songs used in ritual performances to celebrate the Zhou royal house. Next are the "Odes," narrative ballads about memorable historical events. The youngest poems are the

"Airs of the Domains," based on folk ballads from some fifteen domains of the Zhou kingdom. (The early Zhou kings gave lands to their loyal vassals and gradually built a multistate system of "domains" extending from modern-day Beijing far beyond the Yangtze River in the south.) Tradition credited Confucius, the most important of the early philosophical masters, with the compilation of the Classic of Poetry. He allegedly selected the poems in the collection from three thousand poems he found in the archives of the Zhou kingdom. Therefore, the choice and arrangement of the poems were seen as an expression of Confucius's philosophy. Confucius believed that political order depended on the ability of individuals in society to cultivate their moral virtue and thus contribute to social order. We know from the Analects, a collection containing Confucius's sayings, that Confucius thought highly of the Classic of Poetry. He advised his own son to study the Classic of Poetry to enhance his ability to express his opinions, he praised disciples who quoted passages from the Classic of Poetry to make a particular point, and he saw a comprehensive educational program in the anthology: "The Classic of Poetry can provide you with stimulation and with observation, with a capacity for communion, and with a vehicle for grief. At home, they [the poems] enable you to serve your father, and abroad, to serve your lord. Also, you will learn there the names of many birds, animals, plants, and trees." Confucius's high opinion of the Classic of Poetry led to its inclusion in the canon of "Confucian Classics." The other classics are the Classic of Changes, used for divination; the Classic of Documents, a collection of sayings by early kings and ministers; the Spring and Autumn Annals, a historical chronicle of Confucius's home state of Lu; and the Record of Rites, the most important of a few books on ritual. The Confucian Classics became the curriculum of the state academy that Emperor Wu of the Han Dynasty founded in 124 B.C.E.

As a further sign of the Classic of Poetry's canonization during the Han Dynasty, a "Great Preface" written for the anthology became the single most fundamental statement about the nature and function of poetry in East Asia. Written more than half a millennium after the anthology's compilation, the "Great Preface" claimed that there were "six principles" (liu yi) of poetry: the three categories in which the poems were placed ("Airs of the Domains," "Odes," and "Hymns") and the three rhetorical devices of "enumeration" (fu), "comparison" (bi), and "evocative image" (xing). Scholars and poets have debated the usefulness and precise meaning of these principles for the last two millennia, but on a basic level the principles illuminate rhetorical patterns that distinguish the Classic of Poetry and even later Chinese poetry. The concept of feng is a good case in point: it refers to the "Airs of the Domains" section of the anthology, but it also contains a rich web of associations that grew up around its literal meaning, "wind": Like wind that causes grass to sway, the ruler can "influence" (feng) his people and instill virtuous behavior in them through poetry. For their part, his subjects can express their dissatisfaction with their ruler through "criticism" (feng). In reality, most poems in the anthology contain at best indirect criticism. But the idea that poetry and song can bridge the gulf between social classes, that they can serve as a tool for mutual "influence" and "criticism" and give the people a voice, helping them keep bad rulers in check, was central to the Confucian understanding of poetry and society. Poetry made room for social critique and created the institution of "remonstration," the duty of officials in the bureaucracy to speak out against abuses of power.

THE POEMS

Our selections come from the "Odes" section ("She Bore the Folk") and the "Airs" section (all other poems), and conclude with the "Great Preface." Although almost all poems in the Classic of Poetry are anonymous, they give voice to many different players in Zhou society, such as kings, aristocrats and peasants, men and women in love, and, collectively, to communities as they celebrate harvest or worship their ancestors. Poems put into the mouths of peasants or soldiers show considerable literary skill, which suggests that a member of the educated elite at the courts of the Zhou domains must have given them their final shape.

The constraints imposed by society and the conflict between individual desire and social expectations are important themes in the "Airs" section. Marriage is often praised as a sanctioned form of sexual relation, but some poems also celebrate the pleasures of transgression. "Boat of Cypress" is a remarkable outcry of a heart that refuses to bend to society's wishes. Unlike the virtuous Zhou Dynasty, the domain of Zheng and its music were associated with sensual pleasures: "Zhen and Wei," for example, depicts a festival scene along two rivers. Although its frolicking man and woman do not go beyond politely exchanging flowers as courtship gifts, the scene is highly charged with eroticism.

The protagonists in the romantic plots that appear in the poems of the "Airs of the Domains" could be from any culture past or present, but the extensive tradition of commentaries endowed these poems with specific moral and historical significance. According to the canonical "Mao commentary," "Fishhawk," the first poem of the Classic of Poetry, in which a young man is tormented by his desire for a girl, is not a simple romantic folk song. Instead, the commentary claims that the poem praises the consort of King Wen for being free from jealousy when her husband takes a new consort, a typical situation in traditional Chinese society, where men could have several wives. This counterintuitive reading of the poem established “Fishhawk” as a model of exemplary female behavior for all times and embedded it in the history of the early Zhou kings.

The central stylistic device of the Classic of Poetry is repetition with variation. Many of the poems consist of three rhyming stanzas of four or six lines with four syllables each. The stanza format encourages line repetitions, which give the poems melodic rhythm and, with the introduction of small variations, additional meaning. In “Plums Are Falling,” the fruits become fewer with each repetition until the woman has finally decided whom among her suitors she wants to marry. In “Peach Tree Soft and Tender,” the peach tree goes through the natural cycle of bearing blossoms, fruits, and leaves while a new bride, who it is hoped will bear many descendants for the family line, is introduced into the household. Far from being a simplistic rhetorical device, repetition with variation gives compelling shape to a suitor’s intrusive desire and his lover’s fear of scandal in “Zhongzi, Please.” As the insolent Zhongzi systematically advances stanza by stanza from the village wall to the family’s fence and through the garden towards his lover’s bedchamber, the helpless woman, fearing her parents’ and brothers’ reproach and society’s disapproval, fends her lover off by promising to keep him in her thoughts.

Among the rhetorical devices listed in the “Great Preface” to the Classic of Poetry, “exposition” (fu) and “affective image” (xing) are particularly interesting. Exposition, the enumeration of sequences of events in straightforward narrative fashion, structures longer odes like “She Bore the Folk,” a poem on the miraculous birth of Lord Millet, the inventor of agriculture and legendary ancestor of the Zhou people. Lord Millet’s birth to a resourceful mother who steps into a god’s footprint and his subsequent development into the Zhous’ ancestor and cultural hero are recounted through vivid enumeration. The ritual acts that the Zhou people perform to celebrate the harvest and commemorate their ancestor are also related through “exposition.” Poems from the “Airs” section, by contrast, mostly employ “comparisons” (bi) and “affective images.” Comparisons are like similes: “Huge Rat” compares an exploitative lord directly to a voracious rodent. Affective images are much more elusive and do not easily translate into any rhetorical trope in the Western tradition. Xing, the term rendered as “affective image,” literally means “stimulus” or “excitement.” Xing brings natural images into suggestive resonance with human situations, stimulating the imagination and pushing perception beyond a simple comparison of one thing to another. Often, the animals or plants used to evoke human situations appear in the same scene with the human protagonists, but the relation between the animals or plants and the humans is mysterious. For example, in “Dead Roe Deer” the reader sees a landscape in which a girl, a “maiden white as marble,” who has just been seduced by a man, hovers next to a dead deer “wrapped in white rushes.”

The resonant, elusive imagery of the Classic of Poetry has enticed readers through the ages. The poet and critic Ezra Pound (1885–1972), attracted to and inspired by the use of imagery in Chinese poetry, spearheaded the new movement of “imagism” in the 1910s, experimenting with the poetic power that sparse juxtaposition of images whose relation remains obscure can produce. His adoption of such poetic techniques in turn profoundly influenced modernist writers such as T. S. Eliot and James Joyce. Although Pound did not know Chinese, he eventually produced a poetic rendering of the Classic of Poetry in collaboration with the Harvard sinologist Achilles Fang. Because of their divergence from the wording of the originals, Pound's versions might better be conceived as English poems in their own right than translations. Yet they can come close to the Chinese originals in other ways. In Pound's version, the second stanza of "Dead Roe Deer" reads, "Where the scrub elm skirts the wood, be it not in white mat bound, as a jewel flawless found, dead as doe is maidenhood." Death hovers ominously over the deer, the woman, and her maidenhood. Here we see the drama of the distinctive Chinese trope of xing in full play, transposed into the English language.

The Classic of Poetry has left deep traces in the literary cultures of East Asia into the modern period. Because its compilation was attributed to Confucius and its traditional interpretations emphasized Confucian values, it was part and parcel of the education of political elites. Yet, despite the dominant moralizing interpretations, the poems of the Classic of Poetry have retained their pristine simplicity and have lost nothing of their evocative power to voice fundamental human emotions and challenges.

she well befits this house.

Peach tree soft and tender, its leaves spread thick and full.
The bride is going to her home, she well befits these folk.

XX. Plums Are Falling

Plums are falling,
seven are the fruits;
many men want me,
let me have a fine one.

Plums are falling,
three are the fruits;
many men want me,
let me have a steady one.

5

Plums are falling,
catch them in the basket;
many men want me,
let me be bride of one.

10

XXIII. Dead Roe Deer

A roe deer dead in the meadow, all wrapped in white rushes.
The maiden's heart was filled with spring;
a gentleman led her astray.

Undergrowth in forest,
dead deer in the meadow,
all wound with white rushes,
a maiden white as marble.

5

Softly now, and gently, gently,
do not touch my apron, sir, and don't set the cur to barking. 10

XXVI. Boat of Cypress

That boat of cypress drifts along, it drifts upon the stream.
Restless am I, I cannot sleep,
as though in torment and troubled.
Nor am I lacking wine 5
to ease my mind and let me roam.

This heart of mine is no mirror,
it cannot take in all.
Yes, I do have brothers,
but brothers will not be my stay. 10
I went and told them of my grief and met only with their rage.

This heart of mine is no stone;
you cannot turn it where you will.
This heart of mine is no mat; 15
I cannot roll it up within.
I have behaved with dignity,
in this no man can fault me.

My heart is uneasy and restless,
I am reproached by little men. 20
Many are the woes I've met,
and taken slights more than a few.
I think on it in the quiet,
and waking pound my breast.

Oh Sun! and you Moon! 25
Why do you each grow dim in turn?
These troubles of the heart are like unwashed clothes.
I think on it in the quiet,
I cannot spread wings to fly away. 30

XLII. Gentle Girl

A gentle girl and fair awaits by the crook of the wall;
in shadows I don't see her;
I pace and scratch my hair.

A gentle girl and comely 5 gave me a scarlet pipe;

scarlet pipe that gleams—
in your beauty I find delight.

Then she brought me a reed from the pastures, it was truly beautiful and rare.
Reed—the beauty is not yours—
you are but beauty's gift.

LXIV. Quince

She cast a quince to me, a costly garnet I returned;
it was no equal return,
but by this love will last.

She cast a peach to me, costly opal I returned;
it was no equal return,
but by this love will last.

5

She cast a plum to me,
a costly ruby I returned;
it was no equal return,
but by this love will last.

LXXVI. Zhongzi, Please

Zhongzi, please don't cross my village wall, don't break the willows planted there.
It's not that I care so much for them,
but I dread my father and mother;
Zhongzi may be in my thoughts,
but what my father and mother said—
that too may be held in dread.

Zhongzi, please
don't cross my fence,
don't break the mulberries planted there.
It's not that I care so much for them,
but I dread my brothers;
Zhongzi may be in my thoughts,
but what my brothers said—
that too may be held in dread.

10

Zhongzi, please
don't cross into my garden,
don't break the sandalwood planted there.
It's not that I care so much for them,
but I dread others will talk much;

20

Zhongzi may be in my thoughts, but when people talk too much—
that too may be held in dread.

XCV. Zhen and Wei

O Zhen and Wei together, swollen now they flow.
Men and maids together,
chrysanthemums in hand.
The maid says, "Have you looked?" 5
The man says, "I have gone."
"Let's go then look across the Wei,
it is truly a place for our pleasure."
Man and maid together
each frolicked with the other 10 and gave as gift the peony.

O Zhen and Wei together, flowing deep and clear.
Men and maids together,
teeming everywhere. 15
The maid says, "Have you looked?"
The man says, "I have gone."
"Let's go then look across the Wei,
it is truly a place for our pleasure."
Man and maid together 20
each will frolic with the other and give as gift the peony.

CXIII. Huge Rat

Huge rat, huge rat,
eat my millet no more,
for three years I've fed you,
yet you pay me no heed.

I swear that I will leave you 5
and go to a happier land.
A happy land, a happy land,
and there I will find my place.

Huge rat, huge rat,
eat my wheat no more, 10
for three years I've fed you and you show no gratitude.

I swear that I will leave you
and go to a happier realm.
A happy realm, a happy realm, 15
there I will find what I deserve.

Huge rat, huge rat,
eat my sprouts no more,
for three years I have fed you, and you won't reward my toil. 20

I swear that I will leave you
and go to happy meadows.
Happy meadows, happy meadows where none need wail and cry.

CCXLV. She Bore the Folk

She who first bore the folk—Jiang it was, First Parent.
How was it she bore the folk?— she knew the rite and sacrifice.
To rid herself of sonlessness 5 she trod the god's toepoint and she was glad.
She was made great, on her luck settled,
the seed stirred, it was quick.
She gave birth, she gave suck, 10 and this was Lord Millet.

When her months had come to term,
her firstborn sprang up.
Not splitting, not rending, working no hurt, no harm. 15
He showed his godhead glorious,
the high god was greatly soothed.
He took great joy in those rites and easily she bore her son.

She set him in a narrow lane, 20
but sheep and cattle warded him.
She set him in the wooded plain,
he met with those who logged the plain.
She set him on cold ice, birds sheltered him with wings. 25
Then the birds left him and Lord Millet wailed.
This was long and this was loud;
his voice was a mighty one.

And then he crept and crawled, 30
he stood upright, he stood straight.
He sought to feed his mouth, and planted there the great beans.
The great beans' leaves were fluttering, the rows of grain were bristling. 35 Hemp and barley dense and dark, the melons, plump and round.

Lord Millet in his farming had a way to help things grow:
 He rid the land of thick grass, 40
 he planted there a glorious growth.
 It was in squares, it was leafy,
 it was planted, it grew tall.
 It came forth, it formed ears, it was hard, it was good. 45
 Its tassels bent, it was full, he had his household there in Dai.

He passed us down these wondrous grains:
 our black millets, of one and two kernels, millets whose leaves sprout red or white, 50
 he spread the whole land with black millet, and reaped it and counted the acres, spread it with millet sprouting red or white, hefted on shoulders, loaded on backs,
 he took it home and began this rite. 55

And how goes this rite we have?—
 at times we hull, at times we scoop, at times we winnow, at times we stomp, we hear it slosh as we wash it,
 we hear it puff as we steam it. 60
 Then we reckon, then we consider, take artemisia, offer fat.
 We take a ram for the flaying, then we roast it, then we sear it, to rouse up the following year. 65

We heap the wooden trenchers full, wooden trenchers, earthenware platters.
 And as the scent first rises
 the high god is peaceful and glad.
 This great odor is good indeed, 70 for Lord Millet began the rite, and hopefully free from failing or fault,
 it has lasted until now.

From The Great Preface

“Fishhawk” is the virtue of the Queen Consort and the beginning of the “Airs” [Feng, the first large section of the Classic of Poetry].<sup>1</sup> It is the means by which the world is influenced (feng) and by which the relations between husband and wife are made correct. Thus it is used in smaller communities, and it is used in

1. “The Great Preface” is attached to “Fishhawk,” the first poem of the Classic of Poetry. In traditional Confucian interpretations, the poem was understood as celebrating the virtue of the queen consort of King Wen of the Zhou Dynasty.

larger domains. “Airs” (Feng) are “Influence” (feng); it is to teach. By influence it stirs them; by teaching it transforms them.<sup>2</sup>

The poem is that to which what is intently on the mind (zhi) goes. In the mind, it is “being intent” (zhi); coming out in language, it is a “poem.”

The affections are stirred within and take on form in words. If words alone are inadequate, we speak it out in sighs. If sighing is inadequate, we sing it. If singing is inadequate, unconsciously our hands dance it and our feet tap it.<sup>3</sup>

Feelings emerge in sounds; when those sounds have patterning, they are called “tones.” The tones of a well-managed age are at rest and happy: its government is balanced. The tones of an age of turmoil are bitter and full of anger: its government is perverse. The tones of a ruined state are filled with lament and brooding: its people are in difficulty.<sup>4</sup>

Thus to correctly present achievements and failures, to move Heaven and Earth, to stir the gods and spirits, there is nothing more appropriate than poetry. By it the former kings managed the relations between husbands and wives, perfected the respect due to parents and superiors, gave depth to human relations, beautifully taught and transformed the people, and changed local customs.

Thus there are six principles in the poems: (1) Airs (Feng); (2) “exposition” (fu); (3) “comparison” (bi); (4) “affective image” (xing); (5) Odes (Ya); (6) Hymns (song).<sup>5</sup>

By feng, those above transform those below; also by feng, those below criticize those above. When an admonition is given that is governed by patterning, the one who speaks it has no culpability, yet it remains adequate to warn those who hear it. In this we have feng.<sup>6</sup>

When the Way of the Kings declined, rites and moral principles were abandoned; the power of government to teach failed; the government of the domains changed; the customs of the family were altered. And at this point the changed Feng (“Airs”) and the changed Ya (“Odes”) were written. The historians of the domains understood clearly the marks of success and failure; they were pained by the abandonment of proper human relations and lamented the severity of punishments and governance. They sang their feelings to criticize (feng) those above, understanding the changes that had taken place and thinking about former customs. Thus the changed Feng emerge from the affections, but they go no further than rites and moral principles.

2. Feng, a central term of “The Great Preface,” literally means “wind.” By extension, it means “influence” (like wind bending the grasses) and “Airs,” the poetry in the first part of the Classic of Poetry that was understood as a means to positively influence people’s behavior.

3. Although qi, “vital breath,” is not directly mentioned, the psychology of poetic composition described here relies on the notion that a release of vital breath results in ever stronger forms of outward expression: words, sighs, songs, or dance.

4. Since the poems in the Classic of Poetry were performed to music, the “tones” that reveal the social and political conditions under which the poems were composed became manifest in both the words and the music.

5. The “six principles” consist of the three main parts of the Classic of Poetry (the “Airs,” “Odes,” and “Hymns”) and three modes of expression (“exposition,” “comparison,” and “affective image”). “Exposition” describes poems with a longer narrative of events, “comparison” describes poems that use similes, and “affective image” describes poems that use natural imagery that parallels a human situation and should stir the emotions. The “six principles” became staple terms in discussions of poetry in East Asia.

6. A last addition to the many meanings of feng: ministers or simple people can “criticize” their rulers or superiors through this kind of poetry.

That they should emerge from the affections is human nature; that they go no further than rites and moral principles is the beneficent influence of the former kings.

Thus the affairs of a single state, rooted in the experience of a single person, are called Feng. To speak of the affairs of the whole world and to describe customs (feng) common to all places is called Ya. Ya means “proper.” These show the source of either flourishing or ruin in the royal government. Government has its greater and lesser aspects: thus we have a “Greater Ya” and a “Lesser Ya.” The “Hymns” give the outward shapes of praising full virtue, and they inform the spirits about the accomplishment of great deeds. These are called the “Four Beginnings” and are the ultimate perfection of the Poems.

CONFUCIUS

---

To this day there is virtually no aspect of East Asia on which Confucius and his ideas have not had some impact. When Confucius died in 479 B.C.E., he was a relatively little-known figure, having failed to find a ruler willing to implement his philosophical vision. Although he had attracted quite a few followers and had even established a school toward the end of his life, nobody could have anticipated then how this man’s legacy would shape the destiny of China, East Asia, and the world. About 350 years later, Confucian values were not only widely known and revered but had also become the basis for official Chinese state ideology during the Han Dynasty (206 B.C.E.–220 C.E.). Twenty-five hundred years later, Confucius is a national icon for China’s venerable past, although Confucianism, the system of beliefs and practices that developed on the basis of Confucius’s ideas, took a severe beating in mainland China during much of the twentieth century.

LIFE AND TIMES

Confucius was born in the northeastern state of Lu in today’s Shandong Province. Confucius came from the lower ranks of hereditary nobility. Like other masters during the fifth to the third centuries B.C.E., a period of heated intellectual debates comparable to the contemporary flourishing of Greek philosophy, he was eager to put his talents at the disposal of an able ruler who would implement his ideas. But the rulers of Lu were often at the mercy of powerful clans whose arrogance scandalized Confucius. For example, Confucius took offence when one of the great local clans in Lu used eight rows of dancers for the ceremonies at their ancestral temple, a lavish number that only the Zhou king had the prerogative to use. In Confucius’s mind, this was not a simple breach of superficial protocol but a blatant symptom of the rottenness of the political system. Disgusted with the situation in his home state, Confucius left Lu and spent many years wandering from court to court, in search of a ruler who would appreciate his talents and political vision. He finally returned to Lu and lived out his life as a teacher, gathering a considerable following.

THE ZHOU HERITAGE AND CONFUCIUS'S INNOVATION

Confucius's philosophical vision brims with admiration for the values of the early Zhou rulers. The Zhou Dynasty (ca. 1045–256 B.C.E.), by Confucius's time already five centuries old, began with two exemplary rulers, King Wen and King Wu. King Wu had destroyed the last remnants of the reputedly despised Shang Dynasty in the eleventh century B.C.E., and instituted a new government that took pride in showing concern for the people and enforcing wise policies. After King Wu's death his brother, the Duke of Zhou, conducted government affairs for the duke's young nephew, King Cheng, who was still a child. Besides King Wen, the Duke of Zhou had particular importance for Confucius, not just because he was the ancestor of the ducal family of Confucius's home state. The Duke of Zhou also protected his nephew from rebellions and challenges to the newly founded dynasty and was an exemplary regent, with an eye on the welfare of the dynasty, not on his personal ambitions. But the splendor of the dynastic founders vanished over the next half millennium, as the Zhou kings increasingly lost control over the feudal lords, who had started out as their allies in the war against the Shang. By Confucius's time the Zhou kings had only nominal power and China consisted of rival states, whose rulers competed for territory and power. In the Analects Confucius often sharply criticizes the irreverent behavior of the feudal lords toward the Zhou king and showcases their corruption to explain his vision of proper government.

Although Confucius claims in the Analects that he is merely the “transmitter” of Zhou values and not an “innovator,” he actually built a new tradition. Confucius's conviction that the political chaos he perceived around him could be avoided by returning to the moral values of the venerable founders of the Zhou Dynasty, Kings Wu and Wen and the Duke of Zhou, paid homage to tradition but was also visionary, even revolutionary. His emphasis on the importance of social roles and rituals could reinforce existing hierarchies, but at the same time it allowed individuals to develop their inner potential and find a meaningful place in society. His pedagogical program, which promoted the reading of a group of texts, later called “Confucian Classics,” and their application to life's challenges, could lead to mindless memorization designed merely for career advancement, but it also enabled people to better understand and take control of their lives by following the moral models, historical precedents, and words of wisdom contained in these canonical texts.

DIVERSITY AND CORE VALUES IN THE ANALECTS

Confucius's vision has been extraordinarily influential over the past two and a half millennia and has profoundly shaped the societies not just of China but also of Korea, Japan, and Vietnam. The Analects, best translated as “Collected Sayings,” convey the power of Confucius's vision. A collection of brief quotations, conversations, and anecdotes from the life of Confucius, the Analects were not written by the master himself, but compiled by later generations of disciples. They probably reached their current form only during the second century B.C.E., when Confucius's ideas were gaining influence and it became necessary to create a representative collection of his sayings out of the vast body of Confucius lore that circulated in various other books. Later it became the key text to understanding the great master's character and ideas. The Analects throw light on people, concrete situations, and above all the exemplary model of Confucius himself, instead of supplying systematic expositions of his ideas or abstract definitions of moral philosophy. When commenting on central concepts such as "goodness" or "humanity" (ren), "ritual" (li), and "respect for one's parents" (xiao), Confucius might utter different, even contradictory maxims: sometimes he claims that anybody who wants to can become "humane" in a moment, but at other times he turns the concept into a distant ideal. He also explains that his answers sometimes differ, because an overeager disciple needs to be held back, while a timid one needs to be encouraged. Another explanation for the widely divergent pieces of advice to be found in the Analects is that it was compiled over several centuries and thus includes the changing opinions of the compilers.

RITUAL

Despite the diversity of views expounded in the Analects, it is possible to identify a core set of values. First, there is Confucius's emphasis on ritual. Everything we do in life is a ritual, whether we greet each other with a handshake or mark life's important moments, such as birth and death, with special observances. Although Confucius briefly refers to earlier notions of the powers of Heaven and declares that he respects the gods and spirits, his concern is with our world, the world of human society. Rituals are thus used not to communicate with divine powers, but instead to make social life meaningful. One learns and perfects these rituals in one's community through continuous practice and self-cultivation. The person who has perfected himself in this manner is the junzi—the "superior person," or "gentleman." The word referred originally to a prince of aristocratic birth, but Confucius boldly applies it to moral, not hereditary, superiority. Although Confucius at times denies having reached the stage of junzi himself, he makes clear that anybody can become a junzi, and that everyone should strive to reach that ideal. The Analects also idealize historical figures whom Confucius considers models of exemplary moral conduct. Even before the sage rulers of the Zhou, there were the sage emperors of highest antiquity, including Emperor Shun, whose moral charisma was so overwhelming that it sufficed for him to sit in proper ritual position on his throne to induce spontaneous order in his empire. In Confucianism, models of proper ritual behavior are crucial to guiding one's moral self-cultivation, and book 10 of the Analects enshrines the master himself as such a model actor: it is the only book in which the master does not speak, but is simply shown in silent ritual action. That the compilers of the Analects' twenty books shows that they admired Confucius not just for what he said, but for his exemplary conduct throughout his life.

SOCIAL ROLES

A second recurrent concern in the Analects is Confucius's attention to social roles. In his words humans owe each other "goodness" or "humanity" (ren)—that is, empathy and reciprocal concern, mutual respect and obligation. Some later Confucians, such as Mencius (ca. 372–289 B.C.E.), believed that this natural ability for empathy was even more important than ritual. The natural and spontaneous basis for respect is the relation between child and parent. From this experience, respect is extended to other figures, such as elder siblings, seniors, and rulers.

Although Confucius endorses social hierarchies, he abhorred any form of force and coercion. Because Confucianism and its canonical texts became the basis for the recruitment of bureaucrats and part of the ideology of government in imperial China, it is sometimes portrayed as a philosophy that, in contrast to Daoism, puts social duty over natural desires. Yet the stance of Confucius in the Analects is much more complex. He often navigates between the instincts of inborn nature and the need for cultivation, the power of spontaneous action and the importance of patient learning, the pleasures of a life in harmony with one's wishes and the duties of a life devoted to political service. In book 18 we see Confucius attracted to recluses, dropouts who reject life in society; another time Confucius praises the view of a disciple who values ritual celebration and joyful singing with friends over petty state service. At yet another point Confucius recommends avoiding government service unless a virtuous ruler is on the throne.

EFFICIENT ACTION

Goodness, ritual, and attention to social roles create order in society; efficient action, another major Confucian concern, helps to maintain it and to effect change in the world. One of Confucius's most attractive ideas is his promise that it is possible to harmonize one's natural impulses with social norms and thus become an efficient, harmonious agent in society. He himself apparently reached this balance only in old age: "At seventy I follow all the desires of my heart without breaking any rule." Throughout the Analects, Confucius is fascinated with various kinds of efficiency. Emperor Shun, facing south on his throne and thereby creating order in the world, is the prime incarnation of minimalist action put to great effect. The notion that the moral charisma of a sage ruler can be so powerful that there is no need to resort to lowly means of war and violence became the basis of the traditional Chinese view of rulership. Confucius's admiration for efficient thinking is best exemplified by his praise of his favorite disciple Yan Hui: "When he is told one thing he understands ten." The master of efficient speech, Confucius himself seems always to know more than he says: his utterances can be so short that they verge on the obscure. Sometimes he even speaks of his desire to reject language altogether.

THE IMPORTANCE OF CANONICAL TEXTS IN CONFUCIANISM

Confucius and his followers, called Ru, or "traditionalist scholars," considered the study of the ancient texts that contained the legacy of the Zhou as paramount to self-cultivation. Confucius is traditionally associated with the composition of the Classic of Poetry, Classic of History, Record of Ritual, Spring and Autumn Annals, and Classic of Changes, which were later called the "Confucian Classics." Today hardly anybody believes that they were written or compiled by Confucius. These books became the curriculum in the first Chinese state university, founded in 124 B.C.E. by Emperor Wu of the Han Dynasty. Later the Confucian Classics and other canonical Confucian texts such as the Analects formed the basis for the all-important civil service examination system, which allowed hundreds of thousands of individuals to attain office in the expansive bureaucracy of the Chinese empire. For more than two millennia these texts were the backbone of the training of political and cultural elites throughout East Asia and Confucius was venerated in temples as "the foremost teacher," a deity of moral perfection and learning.

Throughout its long history, Confucianism has served many political, social, and religious causes, and it has therefore also met with strident criticism. Already in the late fifth century B.C.E., Mozi, the first forceful critic of Confucius, wrote a devastating piece, “Against the Confucians,” in which he parodied Confucians as “beggars, greedy hamsters, and staring he-goats who puff themselves up like wild boars.” Their clothes, cries Mozi, are hopelessly old-fashioned, and they cling to the importance of ritual only because they hope to get a good meal out of the sacrificial food prepared for the occasion.

In the twentieth century, Chinese intellectuals and the Communist Party waged mass campaigns against Confucianism, considering it the utmost evil and blaming it for everything that supposedly went wrong with China’s modernization. Yet many public intellectuals in Taiwan and the United States have been propagating “Neo-Confucianism” and are convinced that it can help renew humanistic values in today’s harsh and cynical world. Since the 1990s the Confucius temples in mainland China have been rebuilt. Confucius is now discussed on television talk shows in China, and the Chinese government uses his name to represent China in the world. References to Confucius hovered over the Beijing Olympics of 2008, and in the first decade of the twenty-first century the government founded several hundred “Confucius Institutes” around the world, thus using the old sage as an icon for the propagation of Chinese language and culture. The future of Confucius’s legacy is as bright as ever.

From Analects<sup>1</sup>

From Book I

1.1. The Master said: “To learn something and then to put it into practice at the right time: is this not a joy? To have friends coming from afar: is this not a delight? Not to be upset when one’s merits are ignored: is this not the mark of a gentleman?”

1.4. Master Zeng said: “I examine myself three times a day. When dealing on behalf of others, have I been trustworthy? In intercourse with my friends, have I been faithful? Have I practiced what I was taught?”

1.11. The Master said: “When the father is alive, watch the son’s aspirations. When the father is dead, watch the son’s actions. If three years later, the son has not veered from the father’s way, he may be called a dutiful son indeed.”

1.15. Zigong said: “‘Poor without servility; rich without arrogance.’ How is that?” The Master said: “Not bad, but better still: ‘Poor, yet cheerful; rich, yet considerate.’” Zigong said: “In the Poems, it is said: ‘Like carving horn, like sculpting ivory, like cutting jade, like polishing stone.’ Is this not the same idea?” The Master said: “Ah, one can really begin to discuss the Poems with you! I tell you one thing, and you can figure out the rest.”

1. Translated by Simon Leys.

From Book II

2.1. The Master said: “He who rules by virtue is like the polestar, which remains unmoving in its mansion while all the other stars revolve respectfully around it.”

2.2. The Master said: “The three hundred Poems<sup>2</sup> are summed up in one single phrase: “Think no evil.”

2.4. The Master said: “At fifteen, I set my mind upon learning. At thirty, I took my stand. At forty, I had no doubts. At fifty, I knew the will of Heaven. At sixty, my ear was attuned. At seventy, I follow all the desires of my heart without breaking any rule.”

2.7. Ziyou asked about filial piety. The Master said: “Nowadays people think they are dutiful sons when they feed their parents. Yet they also feed their dogs and horses. Unless there is respect, where is the difference?”

2.11. The Master said: “He who by revising the old knows the new, is fit to be a teacher.”

2.19. Duke Ai<sup>3</sup> asked: “What should I do to win the hearts of the people?” Confucius replied: “Raise the straight and set them above the crooked, and you will win the hearts of the people. If you raise the crooked and set them above the straight, the people will deny you their support.”

From Book III

3.5. The Master said: “Barbarians who have rulers are inferior to the various nations of China who are without.”

3.21. Duke Ai asked Zai Yu which wood should be used for the local totem. Zai Yu replied: “The men of Xia used pine; the men of Yin used cypress; the men of Zhou used fir, for (they said) the people should fear.”<sup>4</sup>

The Master heard of this; he said: “What is done is done, it is all past; there would be no point in arguing.”

3.24. The officer in charge of the border at Yi requested an interview with Confucius. He said: “Whenever a gentleman comes to these parts, I always ask to see him.” The disciples arranged an interview. When it was over, the officer said to them: “Gentlemen, do not worry about his dismissal. The world has been without the Way for a long while. Heaven is going to use your master to ring the tocsin.”

2. Another name for the Classic of Poetry.

3. Ruler of the dukedom of Lu, Confucius's home state.

4. Zai Yu, one of Confucius's disciples, replies to the duke with a pun: in the original text the chestnut tree (li), translated here as “fir,” puns on “fear” (li).

From Book IV

4.8. The Master said: “In the morning hear the Way; in the evening die content.”

4.15. The Master said: “Shen, my doctrine has one single thread running through it.” Master Zeng Shen replied: “Indeed.”

The Master left. The other disciples asked: “What did he mean?” Master Zeng said: “The doctrine of the Master is: Loyalty and reciprocity, and that’s all.”

From Book V

5.9. The Master asked Zigong: “Which is the better, you or Yan Hui?”<sup>5</sup>—“How could I compare myself with Yan Hui? From one thing he learns, he deduces ten; from one thing I learn, I only deduce two.” The Master said: “Indeed, you are not his equal, and neither am I.”

5.10. Zai Yu was sleeping during the day. The Master said: “Rotten wood cannot be carved; dung walls cannot be troweled. What is the use of scolding him?”

The Master said: “There was a time when I used to listen to what people said and trusted that they would act accordingly, but now I listen to what they say and watch what they do. It is Zai Yu who made me change.”

5.20. Lord Ji Wen<sup>6</sup> always thought thrice before acting. Hearing this, the Master said: “Twice is enough.”

5.26. Yan Hui and Zilu were in attendance. The Master said: “How about telling me your private wishes?”

Zilu said: “I wish I could share my carriages, horses, clothes, and furs with my friends without being upset when they damage them.”

Yan Hui said. “I wish I would never boast of my good qualities or call attention to my good deeds.”

Zilu said: “May we ask what are our Master’s private wishes?”

The Master said: “I wish the old may enjoy peace, friends may enjoy trust, and the young may enjoy affection.”

From Book VI

6.3. Duke Ai asked: “Which of the disciples has a love of learning?” Confucius replied: “There was Yan Hui who loved learning; he never vented his frustrations upon others; he never made the same mistake twice. Alas, his allotted span of life was short; he is dead. Now, for all I know, there is no one with such a love of learning.”

6.12. Ran Qiu said: “It is not that I do not enjoy the Master’s way, but I do not have the strength to follow it.” The Master said: “He who does not have the strength can always give up halfway. But you have given up before starting.”

5. Confucius’s most beloved disciple.

6. Grand officer of the state of Lu, who lived before Confucius’s time.

6.13. The Master said to Zixia: “Be a noble scholar, not a vulgar pedant.”

6.18. The Master said: “When nature prevails over culture, you get a savage; when culture prevails over nature, you get a pedant. When nature and culture are in balance, you get a gentleman.”

6.20. The Master said: “To know something is not as good as loving it; to love something is not as good as rejoicing in it.”

6.22. Fan Chi asked about wisdom. The Master said: “Secure the rights of the people; respect ghosts and gods, but keep them at a distance—this is wisdom indeed.”

Fan Chi asked about goodness. The Master said: “A good man’s trials bear fruit—this is goodness indeed.”

6.23. The Master said: “The wise find joy on the water, the good find joy in the mountains. The wise are active, the good are quiet. The wise are joyful, the good live long.”

From Book VII

7.1. The Master said: “I transmit, I invent nothing. I trust and love the past. In this, I dare to compare myself to our venerable Peng.”<sup>7</sup>

7.3. The Master said: “Failure to cultivate moral power, failure to explore what I have learned, incapacity to stand by what I know to be right, incapacity to reform what is not good—these are my worries.”

7.5. The Master said: “I am getting dreadfully old. It has been a long time since I last saw in a dream the Duke of Zhou.”<sup>8</sup>

7.16. The Master said: “Even though you have only coarse grain for food, water for drink, and your bent arm for a pillow, you may still be happy. Riches and honors without justice are to me as fleeting clouds.”

7.21. The Master never talked of: miracles; violence; disorders; spirits.

From Book VIII

8.5. Master Zeng said: “Competent, yet willing to listen to the incompetent; talented, yet willing to listen to the talentless; having, yet seeming not to have; full, yet seeming empty; swallowing insults without taking offense—long ago, I had a friend who practiced these things.”

7. Identifications of this figure vary, but venerable Peng might have been a virtuous official of the Shang Dynasty (ca. 1500–1045 B.C.E.).
8. Son of King Wen, who together with King Wu founded the Zhou Dynasty (1045–256

B.C.E.). He laid the groundwork for basic institutions of the Zhou Dynasty and is the founding ancestor of the state of Lu, Confucius’s home state.

8.8. The Master said: “Draw inspiration from the Poems; steady your course with the ritual; find your fulfillment in music.”

8.13. The Master said: “Uphold the faith, love learning, defend the good Way with your life. Enter not a country that is unstable; dwell not in a country that is in turmoil. Shine in a world that follows the Way; hide when the world loses the Way. In a country where the Way prevails, it is shameful to remain poor and obscure; in a country which has lost the Way, it is shameful to become rich and honored.”

8.17. The Master said: “Learning is like a chase in which, as you fail to catch up, you fear to lose what you have already gained.”

From Book IX

9.5. The Master was trapped in Kuang. He said: “King Wen is dead: is civilization not resting now on me? If Heaven intends civilization to be destroyed, why was it vested in me? If Heaven does not intend civilization to be destroyed, what should I fear from the people of Kuang?”<sup>9</sup>

9.6. The Grand Chamberlain asked Zigong: “Is your Master not a saint? But then, why should he also possess so many particular aptitudes?” Zigong replied: “Heaven indeed made him a saint; but he also happens to have many aptitudes.”

Hearing of this, the Master said: “The Grand Chamberlain truly knows me. In my youth, I was poor; therefore, I had to become adept at a variety of lowly skills. Does such versatility befit a gentleman? No, it does not.”

9.12. The Master was very ill. Zilu organized the disciples in a retinue, as if they were the retainers of a lord. During a remission of his illness, the Master said: “Zilu, this farce has lasted long enough. Whom can I deceive with these sham retainers? Can I deceive Heaven? Rather than die amidst retainers, I prefer to die in the arms of my disciples. I may not receive a state funeral, but still I shall not die by the wayside.”

9.14. The Master wanted to settle among the nine barbarian tribes of the East. Someone said: “It is wild in those parts. How would you cope?” The Master said: “How could it be wild, once a gentleman has settled there?”

9.17. The Master stood by a river and said: “Everything flows like this, without ceasing, day and night.”

9.23. The Master said: “One should regard the young with awe: how do you know that the next generation will not equal the present one? If, however, by the age of forty or fifty, a man has not made a name for himself, he no longer deserves to be taken seriously.”

9. Kuang was a border town where Confucius nearly fell into the hands of a lynch mob who mistook him for an adventurer who had sacked the region. Confucius uses a pun in making his point: the name of King Wen, the founder of the Zhou Dynasty, also means “civilization” (wen).

From Book X

10.2. At court, when conversing with the under ministers, he was affable; when conversing with the upper ministers, he was respectful. In front of the ruler, he was humble yet composed.

10.4. When entering the gate of the Duke's palace, he walked in discreetly. He never stood in the middle of the passage, nor did he tread on the threshold.

When he passed in front of the throne, he adopted an expression of gravity, hastened his step, and became as if speechless. When ascending the steps of the audience hall, he lifted up the hem of his gown and bowed, as if short of breath; on coming out, after descending the first step, he expressed relief and contentment.

At the bottom of the steps, he moved swiftly, as if on wings. On regaining his place, he resumed his humble countenance.

From Book XI

11.9. Yan Hui died. The Master said: "Alas! Heaven is destroying me. Heaven is destroying me!"

11.10. Yan Hui died. The Master wailed wildly. His followers said: "Master, such grief is not proper." The Master said: "In mourning such a man, what sort of grief would be proper?"

11.26. Zilu, Zeng Dian, Ran Qiu, and Gongxi Chi were sitting with the Master. The Master said: "Forget for one moment that I am your elder. You often say: 'The world does not recognize our merits.' But, given the opportunity, what would you wish to do?"

Zilu rushed to reply first: "Give me a country not too small,<sup>1</sup> but squeezed between powerful neighbors; it is under attack and in the grip of a famine. Put me in charge: within three years, I would revive the spirits of the people and set them back on their feet."

The Master smiled. "Ran Qiu, what about you?"

The other replied: "Give me a domain of sixty to seventy—or, say, fifty to sixty leagues; within three years I would secure the prosperity of its people. As regards their spiritual well-being, however, this would naturally have to wait for the intervention of a true gentleman."

"Gongxi Chi, what about you?"

"I don't say that I would be able to do this, but I would like to learn: in the ceremonies of the Ancestral Temple, such as a diplomatic conference for instance, wearing chasuble and cap, I would like to play the part of a junior assistant."

"And what about you, Zeng Dian?"

Zeng Dian, who had been softly playing his zithern, plucked one last chord and pushed his instrument aside. He replied: "I am afraid my wish is not up to those of my three companions." The Master said: "There is no harm in that! After all, each is simply confiding his personal aspirations."

1. Literally, "a country of a thousand chariots."

"In late spring, after the making of the spring clothes has been completed, together with five or six companions and six or seven boys, I would like to bathe in the River Yi, and then enjoy the breeze on the Rain Dance Terrace, and go home singing." The Master heaved a deep sigh and said: "I am with Dian!"

The three others left; Zeng Dian remained behind and said: "What did you think of their wishes?" The Master said: "Each simply confided his personal aspirations."

"Why did you smile at Zilu?"

"One should govern a state through ritual restraint; yet his words were full of swagger."

"As for Ran Qiu, wasn't he in fact talking about a full-fledged state?"

"Indeed; have you ever heard of 'a domain of sixty to seventy, or fifty to sixty leagues'?"

"And Gongxi Chi? Wasn't he also talking about a state?"

"A diplomatic conference in the Ancestral Temple! What could it be, if not an international gathering? And if Gongxi Chi were there merely to play the part of a junior assistant, who would qualify for the main role?"

From Book XII

12.2. Ran Yong asked about humanity. The Master said: "When abroad, behave as if in front of an important guest. Lead the people as if performing a great ceremony. What you do not wish for yourself, do not impose upon others. Let no resentment enter public affairs; let no resentment enter private affairs."

Ran Yong said: "I may not be clever, but with your permission I shall endeavor to do as you have said."

12.5. Sima Niu was grieving: "All men have brothers; I alone have none." Zixia said: "I have heard this: life and death are decreed by fate, riches and honors are allotted by Heaven. Since a gentleman behaves with reverence and diligence, treating people with deference and courtesy, all within the Four Seas are his brothers. How could a gentleman ever complain that he has no brothers?"

12.7. Zigong asked about government. The Master said: "Sufficient food, sufficient weapons, and the trust of the people." Zigong said: "If you had to do without one of these three, which would you give up?"—"Weapons."—"If you had to do without one of the remaining two, which would you give up?"—"Food; after all, everyone has to die eventually. But without the trust of the people, no government can stand."

12.11. Duke Jing of Qi asked Confucius about government. Confucius replied: "Let the lord be a lord; the subject a subject; the father a father; the son a son." The Duke said: "Excellent! If indeed the lord is not a lord, the subject not a subject, the father not a father, the son not a son, I could be sure of nothing anymore—not even of my daily food."

12.18. Lord Ji Kang was troubled by burglars. He consulted with Confucius. Confucius replied: "If you yourself were not covetous, they would not rob you, even if you paid them to."

12.19. Lord Ji Kang asked Confucius about government, saying: “Suppose I were to kill the bad to help the good: how about that?” Confucius replied: “You are here to govern, what need is there to kill? If you desire what is good, the people will be good. The moral power of the gentleman is wind, the moral power of the common man is grass. Under the wind, the grass must bend.”

From Book XIII

13.1. Zilu asked about government. The Master said: “Guide them. Encourage them.” Zilu asked him to develop these precepts. The Master said: “Untiringly.”

13.3. Zilu asked: “If the ruler of Wei were to entrust you with the government of the country, what would be your first initiative?” The Master said: “It would certainly be to rectify the names.” Zilu said: “Really? Isn’t this a little farfetched? What is this rectification for?” The Master said: “How boorish can you get! Whereupon a gentleman is incompetent, thereupon he should remain silent. If the names are not correct, language is without an object. When language is without an object, no affair can be effected. When no affair can be effected, rites and music wither. When rites and music wither, punishments and penalties miss their target. When punishments and penalties miss their target, the people do not know where they stand. Therefore, whatever a gentleman conceives of, he must be able to say; and whatever he says, he must be able to do. In the matter of language, a gentleman leaves nothing to chance.”

13.10. The Master said: “If a ruler could employ me, in one year I would make things work, and in three years the results would show.”

13.11. The Master said: “‘When good men have been running the country for a hundred years, cruelty can be overcome, and murder extirpated.’ How true is this saying!”

13.12. The Master said: “Even with a true king, it would certainly take one generation for humanity to prevail.”

13.20. Zigong asked: “How does one deserve to be called a gentleman?” The Master said: “He who behaves with honor, and, being sent on a mission to the four corners of the world, does not bring disgrace to his lord, deserves to be called a gentleman.”

“And next to that, if I may ask?”

“His relatives praise his filial piety and the people of his village praise the way he respects the elders.”

“And next to that, if I may ask?”

“His word can be trusted; whatever he undertakes, he brings to completion. In this, he may merely show the obstinacy of a vulgar man; still, he should probably qualify as a gentleman of lower category.”

“In this respect, how would you rate our present politicians?”

“Alas! These puny creatures are not even worth mentioning!”

From Book XIV

14.24. The Master said: “In the old days, people studied to improve themselves. Now they study in order to impress others.”

14.35. The Master said: “No one understands me!” Zigong said: “Why is it that no one understands you?” The Master said: “I do not accuse Heaven, nor do I blame men; here below I am learning, and there above I am being heard. If I am understood, it must be by Heaven.”

14.38. Zilu stayed for the night at the Stone Gate. The gatekeeper said: “Where are you from?” Zilu said: “I am from Confucius’s household.”—“Oh, is that the one who keeps pursuing what he knows is impossible?”

14.43. Yuan Rang sat waiting, with his legs spread wide. The Master said: “A youth who does not respect his elders will achieve nothing when he grows up, and will even try to shirk death when he reaches old age: he is a parasite.” And he struck him across the shin with his stick.

From Book XV

15.3. The Master said: “Zigong, do you think that I am someone who learns a lot of things and then stores them all up?”—“Indeed; is it not so?” The Master said: “No. I have one single thread on which to string them all.”

15.5. The Master said: “Shun<sup>2</sup> was certainly one of those who knew how to govern by inactivity. How did he do it? He sat reverently on the throne, facing south—and that was all.”

15.7. The Master said: “How straight Shi Yu was! Under a good government, he was straight as an arrow: under a bad government, he was straight as an arrow. What a gentleman was Qu Boyu!<sup>3</sup> Under a good government, he displayed his talents. Under a bad government, he folded them up in his heart.”

15.31. The Master said: “In an attempt to meditate, I once spent a whole day without food and a whole night without sleep: it was no use. It is better to study.”

From Book XVII

17.4. The Master went to Wucheng, where Ziyou was governor. He heard the sound of stringed instruments and hymns. He was amused and said with a smile: “Why use an ox-cleaver to kill a chicken?” Ziyou replied: “Master, in the past I have heard you say: ‘The gentleman who cultivates the Way loves all men; the small people who cultivate the Way are easy to govern.’” The Master said: “My friends, Ziyou is right. I was just joking.”

17.9. The Master said: “Little ones, why don’t you study the Poems? The Poems can provide you with stimulation and with observation, with a capacity for communion, and with a vehicle for grief. At home, they enable you to serve your father, and abroad, to serve your lord. Also, you will learn there the names of many birds, animals, plants, and trees."

17.19. The Master said: "I wish to speak no more." Zigong said: "Master, if you do not speak, how would little ones like us still be able to hand down any teachings?" The Master said: "Does Heaven speak? Yet the four seasons follow their course and the hundred creatures continue to be born. Does Heaven speak?"

17.21. Zai Yu asked: "Three years mourning for one's parents—this is quite long. If a gentleman stops all ritual practices for three years, the practices will decay; if he stops all musical performances for three years, music will be lost. As the old crop is consumed, a new crop grows up, and for lighting the fire, a new lighter is used with each season. One year of mourning should be enough." The Master said: "If after only one year, you were again to eat white rice and to wear silk, would you feel at ease?"—"Absolutely."—"In that case, go ahead! The reason a gentleman prolongs his mourning is simply that, since fine food seems tasteless to him, and music offers him no enjoyment, and the comfort of his house makes him uneasy, he prefers to do without all these pleasures. But now, if you can enjoy them, go ahead!"

Zai Yu left. The Master said: "Zai Yu is devoid of humanity. After a child is born, for the first three years of his life, he does not leave his parents' bosom. Three years mourning is a custom that is observed everywhere in the world. Did Zai Yu never enjoy the love of his parents, even for three years?"

From Book XVIII

18.5. Jieyu, the Madman of Chu, went past Confucius, singing:

Phoenix, oh Phoenix!
The past cannot be retrieved,
But the future still holds a chance
Give up, give up!
The days of those in office are numbered!

Confucius stopped his chariot, for he wanted to speak with him, but the other hurried away and disappeared. Confucius did not succeed in speaking to him.

18.6. Changju and Jieni were ploughing together. Confucius, who was passing by, sent Zilu to ask where the ford was. Changju said: "Who is in the chariot?" Zilu said: "It is Confucius." "The Confucius from Lu?" "Himself."—"Then he already knows where the ford is."

Zilu then asked Jieni, who replied: "Who are you?"—"I am Zilu."—"The disciple of Confucius, from Lu?"—"Yes."—"The whole universe is swept along by the same flood; who can reverse its flow? Instead of following a gentleman who keeps running from one patron to the next, would it not be better to follow a gentleman who has forsaken the world?" All the while he kept on tilling his field.

Zilu came back and reported to Confucius. Rapt in thought, the Master sighed: "One cannot associate with birds and beasts. With whom should I keep company, if not with my own kind? If the world were following the Way, I would not have to reform it."

Circling the Mediterranean: Europe and the Islamic World

The word “Mediterranean” comes from Latin, meaning “in the middle of the lands.” From antiquity through the Middle Ages, the centrally located Mediterranean Sea—also called by those who lived along its shores Mare nostrum, or “our sea”—facilitated trade and exchange. Not only commodities but also stories and songs continually circulated from place to place, crisscrossing the water to link nations in Europe, North Africa, and the Near and Middle East. Port cities all around the Mediterranean were sites of particularly intense cultural and economic interaction, collectively making up a single complex web that knit together distant lands.

While earlier generations of historians have tended to see the diverse cultures of the Mediterranean region in monolithic terms, conceiving of an Islamic world and a Christian world that were fundamentally opposed, more recent research has unearthed the intimate links between the various cultures of the region. There was both a great deal of interaction between the cultural spheres conventionally marked as “Europe” and “the Islamic world” and, on the other hand, a great deal of diversity within each one of these apparently undifferentiated units. “Europe,” as a multinational concept, almost never appeared during the Middle Ages; people referred to themselves as “English,” “Franks,” “Normans,” and “Lombards,” not as “Europeans.” “The Islamic world” was similarly divided by rival efforts to lead the Muslim community in the caliphates of Damascus, Baghdad, and Cairo, as well as by the Mongol invasions of the thirteenth century. The opposition of “the Islamic world” and “Europe” is a modern invention: it was not the way medieval people described themselves or the world they lived in.

The false division between Europe and the Islamic world enabled a misleading view of history in which Christian Europe was seen as the sole heir to a rich legacy of Greco-Roman philosophy and literature, uncontaminated by Arabic or Persian influences—an uninterrupted cultural bloodline, so to speak, reaching back from Aquinas to Aristotle, from Dante to Virgil. Nothing could be further from the truth. The Arabic translations of ancient Greek philosophy and science that made the work of Plato, Aristotle, and Ptolemy available to Europeans as they slowly emerged from a long period of intellectual dormancy were not just passive vessels that transmitted ancient knowledge to an awakening Europe on the cusp of the Renaissance: on the contrary, the cultural ferment of the Islamic world was an essential element in the emergence of the early modern West. The story of premodern history and literature is, therefore, above all a story of connections, interaction, and mutual influence.

This image, from an illuminated thirteenth-century Arabic manuscript, depicts the Greek philosopher Socrates discoursing with his students.

CHRISTIANITY AND PLATONISM

By the year 100, broad changes were under way in the lands circling the Mediterranean Sea. The Roman Empire, which had reached its pinnacle of cultural and military supremacy during the reign of Augustus Caesar, had expanded to the point that unrest in the eastern provinces was a perpetual worry. In the Roman-ruled province of Judea (roughly, modern Israel), the suppression by the civil authorities of a loosely organized rebellion culminated in the destruction of Jerusalem and scattering (or “diaspora”) of the Jewish community in 70 C.E. Those exiled from the region included the Jewish followers of James and John who had embraced the message of the gospel, as well as those mixed Jewish and Gentile communities that took up the intensely hellenized brand of Christianity developed by Paul and his followers, which drew on the philosophy of Plato as well as of mystical Neoplatonists such as Plotinus and Porphyry. Not until about three centuries later would this heterogeneous collection of new religious orientations become codified as a single Christian doctrine, encapsulated in Jerome’s production of the Latin (or “Vulgate”) Bible and in Augustine’s masterful synthesis of Christian doctrine and Greek philosophy.

Augustine’s autobiography, the Confessions, pays tribute to the theologian’s engagement with the philosophy and literature of the Roman world: he paraphrases Seneca and Cicero, and movingly describes the tears he shed while reading Virgil’s account of Dido in the Aeneid. These moments illustrate the imaginative pull of classical literature, which persisted during the period of Christianity’s emergence. The values of Rome, its celebration of the arts and worldly pleasures, were very much at odds with a Christian ethic that demanded a rejection of the things of this world. Music, art, and poetry were to be avoided, unless they were explicitly in the service of God: liturgical music, as part of the act of communal worship, along with painted images of the crucified Christ, the Virgin Mary, and apostles, became increasingly important in early Christianity, while the classical principles of poetic composition were applied to new types of writing such as religious hymns and saints’ lives. Writers found that poetry could be made to serve Christ, in the same way that figurative parables could disseminate the eternal truths of scripture. Jesus had told illustrative anecdotes, such as the parable of the Sower or the parable of the Wise and Foolish Virgins: preachers therefore believed that they too were authorized to use fictions, as long as the effort was wholly in the service of the Lord and not intended to seduce the soul with bodily pleasures.

The yearning for a mystical faith that would provide a sense of purpose was ubiquitous in the late Roman Empire. Christianity was just one of a number of religious cults that had fashioned a kind of cultural compromise with the philosophical orientation of the period; but it thrived as no other religion did, ultimately becoming the state religion of the Roman Empire under the rule of Constantine in the fourth century. While the Italian city of Rome remained the seat of imperial power in the West, the capital city of Byzantium (modern Istanbul, in Turkey) represented Rome in the East. Renamed “Constantinople” (Constantine’s city) by the Christian emperor of Rome, the city would be simply known as “al-Rum” (Rome) to speakers of Arabic and Persian. An empire stretched so widely that it had two capitals, one in the West and one in the East, was ripe for dissolution: sooner or later in the history of every empire, things fall apart. The waves of invasion of Italy by Germanic tribes came to a head in the fifth century, when Rome endured a series of weak rulers. The eastern Roman capital of Constantinople, by contrast, remained intact until the end of the Middle Ages, though during that time its character had changed very substantially from what it had been in the age of the Caesars. Both Augustine and Boethius, writing in the fifth and sixth centuries, bear witness to the decay of Rome—and to the birth of something entirely new, as a Christian culture, various and diffuse, rose out of the ashes of empire.

The diaspora—literally, “scattering” (Greek)—of Jews from Jerusalem in 70 C.E. not only facilitated the spread of Christianity throughout the Roman Empire but also created a new cultural environment that would lead to the development of rabbinic Judaism. The simultaneous emergence of rabbinic Judaism and Christianity can be described as a kind of twin birth, both of them formed in the crucible of Roman aggression in the first century. Beyond the physical experience of exile, the figurative concept of diaspora—like the ancient paradigm of the mass movement of people described in Exodus, which recounts the migration of the Jewish nation from Egypt to the promised land after many years of exile—provided an enormously powerful model for thinking about the movement of peoples in the early Middle Ages. Whereas the Jewish people were thought to be consigned to a permanent state of diaspora, endlessly wandering in the desert of the wide world, other communities sometimes claimed for themselves the role of the “true Israel”: for medieval Christians, thinking of themselves as the true Israel meant identifying themselves as a chosen people. But their promised land was not to be found on the earth—it was the Heavenly Jerusalem, whose pleasures would be enjoyed only in the afterlife. National histories, too, made the history of the Jewish people into a template for their own myths of origin: this can be seen in medieval chronicles that liken accounts of the Trojans, who fled the ruins of Troy to found the great city of Rome, to accounts of the Jews in the diaspora.

THE SPREAD OF ISLAM

Like the emergence of Christianity in the wake of the Jewish diaspora, the dissemination of the Qur'an by Muhammad and his followers in the seventh century and the subsequent formation of an Islamic community had a dramatic effect on the development of Mediterranean culture. In his account of Muhammad's life, the early biographer Ibn Ishaq describes a community struggling to form itself not only in accord with the explicit dictates found in its holy book, the Qur'an, but also in conformity with the exemplary life led by its prophet, Muhammad. These two models, the revealed book and the life perfectly led, were the religious guidelines of an empire that grew almost overnight to dominate large swathes of the Middle East and North Africa: in 750, little more than a century after Muhammad began delivering the Qur'an in 610, Islamic rule extended westward through Spain into southern France and eastward through Persia (modern Iran) into India. The spread of Islam took place not only through cultural and religious means but also through direct military conquest, such as the assault on the Byzantine Christian empire that culminated in the Battle of Yarmūk in 636: after that time, the southern regions of Anatolia (modern Turkey) and virtually the whole of the Levant (modern Near East) were under the control of the armies of Islam. In spite of its military successes and dynamic expansion, this new empire was far from monolithic: after the fall of the Umayyad caliphate (literally, “headship”) that had been based in Damascus, the Abbasid caliphate was established at Baghdad, where it endured for more than five hundred years until the Mongol invasions from Central Asia in the mid-thirteenth century. Even after their fall from power in the East, however, the Umayyads retained control in the West, where they continued to rule the Spanish provinces they had named “al-Andalus.”

In addition to the political divisions centered on the caliphates, religious divisions also cut across the nations gathered under Islamic rule. The most important of these is the division of Sunni from Shi'a Islam: the former centers on a strict conformity to the exemplary life of the Prophet Muhammad and a literal reading of the Holy Book; the latter instead prescribes a special veneration of the family of the Prophet, especially his daughter Fatima, her husband (who was also the Prophet's cousin) Ali, and their sons Hasan and Hussain. The highly emotional, affective quality of Shi'a Islam is expressed in devotional stories and plays chronicling the martyrdom of the members of the Prophet's family, as well as in the later medieval emergence of Sufi mysticism; the mystics used figurative poetic language to convey the soul's experience of the divine. Both Shi'a veneration of the family of the Prophet and Sufi poetic expressions of religious devotion were regarded with suspicion wherever Sunni practice was the norm; the literature of Shi'a and Sufi piety, however, has continued to be widely popular not only in the Arabic and Persian-speaking populations of the Near and Middle East but also—in translation—throughout the world.

Divisions, both political and religious, persisted throughout the lands of medieval Islam: in response to the alienation of the Shi'a community by the Abbasids who ruled from Baghdad, a separate Fatimid caliphate that was Shi'a in orientation arose in Cairo. Internal squabbling finally gave way to utter chaos with the invasion of the Mongols in the early thirteenth century and their seizure of Baghdad in 1258. The Mongols soon converted to Islam, following the same pattern of rule through assimilation that led to their long domination of East Asia, centered on the powerful regional force of China. Successive Islamic dynasties ended, at last, when the Ottomans invaded and consolidated their power in the eastern Mediterranean with the conquest of Constantinople in 1453. The Ottomans remained in a position of strength in the region: their siege of Vienna in 1683 was an assault on the gates of early modern Europe, and they went on to establish diplomatic relations with several European nations.

Regardless of where the dominant caliphate was based—Damascus, Baghdad, or Cairo—the various nations yoked under Islamic rule shared one crucial element: the Arabic language. It served not only as the standard language of administration but also as the language of religious observance (all Muslims were urged to memorize the Qur'an, at least short sections that could be recited within the daily prayers), as well as the common vernacular that straddled national borders. Arabic was the standard language of conversation, administration, and poetic composition not only for Muslims but also for Christians and Jews who lived in regions under Islamic rule, such as al-Andalus. In this way, the Arabic language served to unify diverse populations, in much the same way as Greek had done in the ancient eastern Mediterranean and Latin would do in medieval Europe. Poetic traditions in Arabia before the revelation of the Qur'an had placed special value on recitation and the musical quality of verse, its rhythmic repetitions and use of end rhyme. Because the Qur'an itself conformed to many of these pre-Islamic norms, it became a standard model for poetic excellence while maintaining its preeminent theological value.

The influence of Islamic literature was felt not only through the exalted union of philosophy and theology with poetics but also on a more mundane, vernacular level. The vibrant tradition of frame-tale narratives, in which an outer layer organizes a series of nested narratives that are contained within the frame like the layers of an onion, had a long history in the Mediterranean region: writers as early as Ovid and Apuleius, in the first and second centuries, had relied on nested narratives. But with the arrival of more elaborate frame-tale models—especially Kalila wa Dimna, a series of animal fables based on the Indian Pañcatantra—the genre took off in Persian and Arabic literatures. Perhaps the best-known example of the frame tale, The Thousand and One Nights, survives in its earliest versions in the Persian language; these were soon supplemented by a range of retellings in Arabic. The Nights circulated about the Mediterranean, with bits and pieces of it finding its way into other collections and its frame-tale form serving as the inspiration for many European manifestations of the genre, including Chaucer's Canterbury Tales.

THE INVENTION OF THE WEST

For writers in the Islamic world, “the West” (al-maghrib) was the northern coast of Africa and al-Andalus, a region that was recognized as at once part of the Islamic sphere of influence and yet culturally and regionally distinctive. The idea of the West as a synonym for Christian Europe—which seems so natural and familiar to modern readers—did not even begin to emerge until the late Middle Ages. Medieval inhabitants of Europe instead categorized themselves in different ways: in terms of their ethnic origin or “nation,” in terms of their primary language, and—above all—in terms of their religion. Unlike in the areas under Islamic rule, where Jews and Christians were tolerated albeit subject to special taxation and restrictions (so-called dhimmi rule), in Christian Europe Jews were only sporadically tolerated, and Muslims were virtually unknown. We can thus infer that Europe exhibited much more religious homogeneity, at least until the first glimmerings of early Protestant reform impulses in the late fourteenth century. Uniformity of religion was further strengthened by uniformity of language, as Latin was used not only for all religious but also all political and administrative purposes, just as Arabic was in the Islamic world. Indeed, Latin's cultural hold was stronger: medieval Christians used it exclusively to compose their philosophical and scientific works, while both Arabic and Persian functioned as languages of literature and learning for Muslims. Beginning in the ninth century, however, and with increasing frequency from the twelfth century onward, vernacular languages such as English, French, German, Italian, and Spanish became more common vehicles for poetic composition.

Medieval people defined themselves first of all by their religious orientation and next by ethnic origin, relying not at all on the categories familiar to modern readers. This perspective on the place of the self in the world is well illustrated on the medieval world maps, or mappae-mundi, that were used not as practical guides to navigation but rather as abstract overviews of both the literal shape of the world and its metaphorical meaning. Accordingly, such maps conventionally place Jerusalem at the exact center, marking the site of Christ's crucifixion as the fixed point about which the whole world revolves. The mappamundi itself is almost always oriented toward the east (Latin oriens), rather than toward the north as on modern maps, so that its easternmost point, the Garden of

The so-called Hereford Mappamundi, ca. 1300. Jerusalem sits at the center of this medieval map; Asia occupies most of the top half; and Europe is in the lower-left quadrant.

Eden, appears—appropriately—as both the beginning of space and the beginning of time. Asia, Europe, and Africa, the three known continents, are depicted symmetrically on the map. Asia takes up twice as much space as the other two, dominating the top half of the world sphere; Europe is tucked away at the lower left; and “the West” (Latin occidentis) lies, rather forlornly, at the bottom.

The medieval map, with its deeply religious imaginative geography and central focus on Jerusalem, illuminates the ways in which the repeated cycles of European warfare around the Mediterranean and into the Middle East—called “Crusades,” after the cross (Latin crux) sewn by the warriors onto their garments—functioned not just as actual military campaigns but also as symbolic assaults designed to reclaim control of the spiritual homeland of the medieval Christian. The First Crusade, launched in 1095, included a violent assault on Jerusalem that ended with the slaughter of most of the city’s inhabitants and the establishment of the “Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem”: a significant outpost of Europeans occupying Jerusalem itself together with additional European fortifications in adjoining towns along the coast (most importantly Acre, which remained in European hands until 1291). Although expeditions continued to be launched intermittently until the end of the Middle Ages—including the dramatic Third Crusade, which united the English army of Richard the Lion-Hearted with the armies of Philip of France and Frederick Barbarossa of Germany—no later military successes matched those of the First Crusade that began them all. The Crusades functioned mainly as opportunities for economic development and international cooperation among the nations of Europe, helping to unify these disparate Christian nations through their shared opposition to the Muslim enemy. The passions stirred by this effort to stimulate political unity through religious fervor came at a high price: with each successive call to crusade, violent attacks were made on the only locally available non-Christian populations within the cities of Europe—that is, the Jews. Anti-Muslim violence in the form of crusade was therefore closely linked with the persecution of Jews and the early emergence of anti-Semitism.

A detail from a page of the Luttrell Psalter (ca. 1300) depicts Richard I and Saladin jousting during the Third Crusade. Saladin is drawn with a grotesque blue face—a rendering that makes it all the easier for the psalter's Christian readers to see the conflict as a clearly defined battle between good and evil.

The opposition of Christian and non-Christian, so fundamental to the ideology of crusade, permeates the epic literature of the Middle Ages that began to emerge, originally in oral form and subsequently in written texts, by the ninth century. The Anglo-Saxon Beowulf describes a shadowy era in which myth and history are intertwined; for its anonymous author Christianity is an innovation applied as a veneer on a pagan Germanic past. The Germanic notion of wyrd or fate is aligned, by the Beowulf-poet, with Christian notions of divine providence, but it remains clear that the two concepts are far from identical. Epic, whether in England or in Persia, thus creates a sense of national identity by evoking a common historical origin, but it also grafts upon the rootstock of native myth new forms of identity—especially religious forms imported from outside the borders of the nation.

Epic is often opposed to romance: the former is portrayed as a masculine genre dedicated to the deeds of knights and the matter of war, the latter as a feminine genre that focuses on the relations of the lady and her lover, confined to the domestic sphere of the court. However, both genres, which rose to prominence in the twelfth century, share the idealized image of the knight: if he expresses his chivalry on the field of battle, the work is epic, but if his prowess is displayed in the private space of the bedchamber, the work is romance. The romances of Chrétien de Troyes, like the shorter romance works or lais of his predecessor, Marie de France, highlight this idealized role of the knight, which is also seen in the later medieval English, German, and Italian romances that were adapted from French originals. The French origins of the romance genre are also closely tied to the emergence of French as a literary language. Latin was unquestionably the primary language of scholarly learning, whether theological, philosophical, or scientific, but vernacular or spoken languages increasingly came to be the first choice for poetic composition. In the twelfth century, French was the first of the European languages to be elevated in this way; by the fourteenth century, other vernaculars had also begun to be widely used. Explicitly, in his treatise on languages (De vulgari eloquentia), and implicitly, in his Divine Comedy, Dante Alighieri stakes a claim for the local Florentine dialect of Italian as the “most illustrious vernacular,” while Chaucer will make similar claims for English in his Canterbury Tales.

In spite of this ongoing shift, Latin experienced an important revival in the fourteenth century. Paradoxically at just the moment when literature in the vernacular was reaching new levels of sophistication with works such as Boccaccio’s Decameron and Chaucer’s Canterbury Tales, classical forms of Latin were being championed in humanistic circles under the guiding hand of Petrarch. Ambivalence about the competing claims of a revived classical Latin, on the one hand, and the potent spontaneity of the vernacular, on the other hand, is evident in the work of Petrarch himself: the author of several Latin treatises and a powerful advocate for classical scholarship, his exquisite lyrics in Italian would exert a powerful influence on the rise of Renaissance lyric not only in Italy but also in France and England. This paradox is reflected in modern scholarship, which tends to label Petrarch, who wrote in the early fourteenth century, as a “Renaissance” poet and his friend and disciple Boccaccio, who wrote in the mid-fourteenth century, as a “medieval” writer. The example of these two contemporaries illustrates the ways in which period divisions, like geographical divisions, sometimes obscure the profound continuities that underlie literary history.

Though Boccaccio wrote his masterwork, the Decameron, in Italian, he also composed (at the encouragement of Petrarch) several treatises in Latin. Chaucer did not write in Latin, but he shared Boccaccio’s consciousness of the importance of the legacy of Roman antiquity and Latin literature; he produced several English translations of Latin works, including Boethius’s Consolation of Philosophy. In late medieval French circles too, as illustrated in the mythographic works of Christine de Pizan written under the influence of Boccaccio, the Greco-Roman past loomed large. In all three of these major writers, the yearning for a revival of classical antiquity reveals the extent to which the wholehearted embrace of the ancient past that we tend to associate exclusively with the Renaissance was amply foreshadowed in the work of at least some late medieval authors, especially those whose perspective was particularly cosmopolitan, rooted in the experience of the city as a cultural, economic, linguistic, and—above all—literary crossroads.

THE CHRISTIAN BIBLE: THE NEW TESTAMENT GOSPELS

ca. first century C.E.

For some readers, the Bible is to be read as sacred history and divine revelation, as a book whose truth is grounded by religious faith. For others, it is a rich trove of cultural history, sometimes supported by archaeology and other corroborating evidence, sometimes not. Beginning in the nineteenth century, however, readers started to also think of the Bible as a work of literature, analyzing it in terms of genre and poetics and comparing it to other literary works written around the same time. The Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, for instance, all of which retell the life of Jesus, can be read as examples of Greco-Roman biography as practiced around the Mediterranean during the first century C.E. The metaphorical language of the Gospel of John reflects the strong influence of Platonic philosophy on Jewish communities within the Roman Empire. This literary approach to the Bible has inspired recent generations of modern intellectuals, writers, and artists—sometimes from a devout perspective, sometimes not. Yet it is crucial to realize that considering the Christian Bible as literature is not a modern novelty: over the past two thousand years, poets have constantly quoted and paraphrased the Gospels in order to enrich their own work with the resonant, messianic tone and powerful turns of phrase that appear in what is arguably the single most influential text of world literature.

CHRISTIAN CULTURE IN THE ROMAN EMPIRE

Jesus was born in the town of Bethlehem, a town located in the province of Judea in the eastern part of the Roman Empire. While Latin was the language mainly used in Rome itself, in far-off Judea the language of administration was Greek. For most local inhabitants, however, the vernacular was Aramaic, a language related to Hebrew but sufficiently different from it that Aramaic speakers would not necessarily have understood Hebrew. The polyglot nature of the region was mirrored in the wide range of ethnicities and religious orientations found there. Judea and the surrounding lands had formerly been part of the vast empire established by Alexander the Great, under whose influence the local Jewish population—especially the more affluent and educated classes—had embraced Greek literature and philosophy. This religious and cultural ferment gave rise to a variety of religious groups; some became marginalized and died out, but others (including Christianity and rabbinic Judaism) would live on.

From Roman administrative records, we know that there was a historical Jesus, a disruptive rabble-rouser who attracted the attention of the local authorities and was ultimately executed. Yet the Jesus of the gospel accounts is something far more complex, more a phenomenon than a man. It is clear that the events of his life rapidly led to the establishment of not just a single community but a number of communities organized around the symbolic significance that could be assigned to this man, his words, and his deeds. These included both Jewish communities, for whom Jesus was to be identified with the long-awaited Messiah, and non-Jewish (or “Gentile”) communities around the Mediterranean Sea. The dating system we use today reflects the fundamental break in time that early Christians believed had taken place. Dates in the Roman Empire were ordinarily based on the number of the year in the reign of the individual ruler, but Christians viewed Jesus as a divine lord whose authority surmounted that of any earthly kingdom or empire. Consequently, they began to number the years “A.D.”—that is, Anno Domini, or “In the year of the Lord.” Today, we more often use the more inclusive abbreviation C.E. for the Common Era, but we continue to number years from the birth of Jesus—a practice that reflects the early Christians’ profound sense of a temporal rupture, the belief that a new age had dawned.

WORK

Together with the Gospel of Mark, the three books of the Bible excerpted here—the Gospels of Matthew, Luke, and John—form the core of the collection of twenty-seven books that Christians call the New Testament. This label, taken with the “Old Testament,” encapsulates the Christian perspective on the relationship of Jesus’ mission to the history of the Jewish people recounted in the Hebrew Bible, comprising the Pentateuch (the first five books, or Torah), the books of prophets and history, and the poetic books. For Christians, the old covenant established by God with Abraham and, after the flood, reestablished with Noah was merely a prefiguration, the first stage of a process that would be fulfilled only with the advent of Jesus and subsequent rise of Christianity. In some ways, this perspective honors and elevates the role of the Jewish people; in other ways, it denigrates Judaism, relegating it to a subordinate position in the divine plan for humanity.

Although the Gospels present themselves as eyewitness testimony to events in the life of Jesus, they were actually committed to written form decades after his death. The earliest of them, the Gospel of Mark, probably dates to about 70 C.E.; the latest, the Gospel of John, dates to about 100 C.E. The sequence of four gospels was established relatively early on, as was the authoritativeness of their testimony. The second-century theologian Irenaeus of Lyons declared that there are only four gospels, just as there are only four corners of the earth, and four winds in the heavens. This declaration served to exclude the many alternative accounts of the life of Jesus that were also in circulation, and to give a more specific structure to the teachings of Jesus and his authorized followers; the final result was a codified form of the New Testament and, ultimately, Christian theology. The Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke are called the Synoptic Gospels, because they give a panorama or overview (synopsis) of the life of Jesus, all telling the same story but from rather distinctive perspectives. The Gospel of John also recounts the life of Jesus, but with a very different narrative line and a deep concern to integrate Platonic philosophy and mysticism into the expression of divinity in the person of Jesus Christ, identified as the Word of God.

The Synoptic Gospels have a number of episodes in common, of which the most important are the Sermon on the Mount, the Last Supper, and the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus. Yet each of the three gospels also has its own individual character: Luke tells us the most about the childhood and parentage of Jesus, and his work is closely related to the noncanonical tradition of “infancy gospels”—stories about the life of Jesus as a child that survive in Arabic as well as in Greek and Syriac versions. Mark provides the tightest and most focused account, placing special emphasis on the death of Jesus and recounting his biography in simpler, more primitive language. Mark appears to be addressing a Gentile audience, and his gospel is sometimes associated with the early foundation of Christian communities in Rome or, at least, in the regions of the Roman Empire lying to the west of Judea. Matthew, conversely, clearly directs his biography at an audience that is quite familiar with the Hebrew Bible: he gives a very detailed account of Jesus' preaching mission and his role as the long-awaited Messiah. Matthew exhibits a special interest in the ways in which Jewish history is fulfilled in the coming of Jesus Christ, and in the ways in which the old covenant established between God and man is renewed in and superseded by the new covenant established with the sacrifice of Christ in the crucifixion.

Matthew also displays a central concern with the ways in which Jesus preached, especially his use of parables: little stories that reveal profound spiritual truths through metaphorical, even allegorical language. The excerpts presented here include parables of Jesus as recounted both by Matthew and by Luke, passages of the Gospels that are among those with the most profound literary influence on writers throughout the Middle Ages. The figurative, philosophical language of the Gospel of John would also go on to be highly influential, disseminated through a wide range of poetic evocations of the divine nature. John's account of the birth of Christ, excerpted here, seemingly describes the same transformative event narrated in the infancy chapters of Luke. Yet the two accounts could not be more different, as they represent two totally different perspectives on the nature of Jesus Christ, understood as that deepest of all paradoxes, the being who is at once both God and man. For John, Christ is the Word through which God creates all things, a mediator between matter and spirit, the temporal and the eternal. For Luke, he is Jesus of Nazareth, whose divine nature smoothly coexists with his human status, rooted in the cultural norms and social structures of first-century Judea.

The Gospels as we have them today reflect a complex and intertwined linguistic history: Jesus and his apostles would have spoken Aramaic, which we hear when Jesus cries out on the crucifix, "Eli, eli, lama sabachthani?" ("My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" [Matthew 27.46]). However, the Gospels were written down in koine Greek, the vernacular that was the lingua franca of the eastern Mediterranean. This was a language meant to travel, and so the Gospels did: they were swiftly passed on in both oral and written form across the Mediterranean Sea, through Asia, Europe, and northern Africa. Latin translations of the Gospels soon began to be produced, and in 382 Pope Damasus asked the theologian Jerome to prepare a full, authorized translation into Latin. This version, known as the Vulgate, would become the standard version of the Bible read for more than a thousand years in the West, until new versions of the sacred text began to be produced at the dawn of the Reformation. Over the five hundred years since then, translations of the Bible have multiplied exponentially, as every spoken language has produced its own version of holy scripture. Most recently, modern writers and artists have moved the Bible into new formats such as the graphic novel, used by devout Christians to educate their children and enjoyed by a wide range of nonreligious readers.

Luke 2<sup>1</sup>[The Birth and Youth of Jesus]

It happened in those days that a decree went forth from Augustus Caesar<sup>2</sup> that all the world should be enrolled in a census. This was the first census, when Quirinius was governor of Syria. And all went to be enrolled, each to his own city. And Joseph also went up from Galilee,<sup>3</sup> from the city of Nazareth, to Judaea, to the city of David<sup>4</sup> which is called Bethlehem, because he was of the house and family of David; to be enrolled with Mary his promised wife, who was pregnant. And it happened that while they were there her time was completed, and she bore a son, her first-born, and she wrapped him in swaddling clothes and laid him in a manger, because there was no room for them in the inn. And there were shepherds in that region, camping out at night and keeping guard over their flock. And an angel of the Lord stood before them, and the glory of the Lord shone about them, and they were afraid with a great fear. The angel said to them: Do not be afraid; behold, I tell you good news, great joy which shall be for all the people; because this day there has been born for you in the city of David a savior who is Christ the Lord. And here is a sign for you; you will find a baby wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger. And suddenly with the angel there was a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying: Glory to God in the highest and peace on earth among men of good will. And it happened that after the angels had gone off from them into the sky, the shepherds began saying to each other: Let us go to Bethlehem and see this thing which has happened, which the Lord made known to us; and they went, hastening, and found Mary and Joseph, and the baby lying in the manger; and when they had seen, they spread the news about what had been told them concerning this baby. And all who heard wondered at what had been told them by the shepherds; and Mary kept in mind all these sayings as she pondered them in her heart. And the shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God over all they had heard and seen, as it had been told them.

And when eight days were past, for his circumcision, his name was called Jesus, as it was named by the angel before he was conceived in the womb.

And when the days for their purification<sup>5</sup> according to the Law of Moses had been completed, they took him up to Jerusalem to set him before the Lord, as it has been written in the Law of the Lord: Every male child who opens the womb shall be called sacred to the Lord; and to give sacrifice as it is stated in the Law of the Lord, a pair of turtle doves or two young pigeons. And behold, there was a man in Jerusalem whose name was Simeon, and this man was righteous and virtuous and looked forward to the consolation of Israel, and the Holy Spirit was upon him; and it had been prophesied to him by the Holy Spirit that he should not look upon his death until he had looked on the Lord's Anointed. And in the spirit he went into the temple; and as his parents brought in the child Jesus so that they could do for him what was customary according to the law, Simeon himself took him in his arms and blessed God and said: Now, Lord, you release your slave, in peace, according to your word; because my eyes have looked on your salvation, what you made ready in the presence of all the peoples; a light for the revelation to the Gentiles, and the glory of your people, Israel. And his father and his mother were in wonder at what was being said about him. And Simeon blessed them and said to Mary his mother: Behold, he is appointed for the fall and the rise of many in Israel; and as a sign which is disputed; and through your soul also will pass the sword; so that the reasonings of many hearts may be revealed. And there was Anna, a prophetess, the daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Asher. And she was well advanced in years, having lived with her husband seven years from the time of her maidenhood, and now she was eighty-four years a widow. And she did not leave the temple, serving night and day with fastings and prayers. And at this same time she came near and gave thanks to God and spoke of the child to those who looked forward to the deliverance of Jerusalem.

And when they had done everything according to the Law of the Lord, they went back to Galilee, to their own city, Nazareth.

And the child grew in stature and strength as he was filled with wisdom, and the grace of God was upon him.

Now his parents used to journey every year to Jerusalem for the feast of the Passover.<sup>6</sup> And when he was twelve years old, when they went up according to their custom for the festival and had completed their days there, on their return the boy Jesus stayed behind in Jerusalem, and his parents did not know it. And supposing that he was in their company they went a day's journey and then looked for him among their relatives and friends, and when they did not find him they turned back to Jerusalem in search of him. And it happened that after three days they found him in the temple sitting in the midst of the masters, listening to them and asking them questions. And all who heard him were amazed at his intelligence and his answers. And they were astonished at seeing him, and his mother said to him: Child, why did you do this to us? See, your father and I have been looking for you, in distress. He said to them: But why were you looking for me? Did you not know that I must be in my father's house? And they did not understand what he had said to them. And he returned with them and came to Nazareth, and was in their charge. And his mother kept all his sayings in her heart. And Jesus advanced in wisdom and stature, and in the favor of God and men.

Matthew 5–7

[The Sermon on the Mount]

And seeing the multitudes he went up onto the mountain, and when he was seated, his disciples came to him, and he opened his mouth and taught them, saying:

Blessed are the poor in spirit, because theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven.

Blessed are they who sorrow, because they shall be comforted.

Blessed are the gentle, because they shall inherit the earth.

Blessed are they who are hungry and thirsty for righteousness, because they shall be fed.

Blessed are they who have pity, because they shall be pitied.

Blessed are the pure in heart, because they shall see God.

Blessed are the peacemakers, because they shall be called the sons of God.

Blessed are they who are persecuted for their righteousness, because theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven.

Blessed are you when they shall revile you and persecute you and speak every evil thing of you, lying, because of me. Rejoice and be glad, because your reward in heaven is great; for thus did they persecute the prophets before you.

You are the salt of the earth; but if the salt loses its power, with what shall it be salted? It is good for nothing but to be thrown away and trampled by men. You are the light of the world. A city cannot be hidden when it is set on top of a hill. Nor do men light a lamp and set it under a basket, but they set it on a stand, and it gives its light to all in the house. So let your light shine before men, so that they may see your good works and glorify your father in heaven.

Do not think that I have come to destroy the law<sup>1</sup> and the prophets. I have not come to destroy but to complete. Indeed, I say to you, until the sky and the earth are gone, not one iota or one end of a letter must go from the law, until all is done. He who breaks one of the least of these commandments and teaches men accordingly shall be called the least in the Kingdom of Heaven; he who performs and teaches these commandments shall be called great in the Kingdom of Heaven. For I tell you, if your righteousness is not more abundant than that of the scribes and the Pharisees,<sup>2</sup> you may not enter the Kingdom of Heaven.

You have heard that it was said to the ancients: You shall not murder. He who murders shall be liable to judgment. I say to you that any man who is angry with his brother shall be liable to judgment; and he who says to his brother, fool, shall be liable before the council; and he who says to his brother, sinner, shall be liable to Gehenna.<sup>3</sup> If then you bring your gift to the altar, and there remember that your brother has some grievance against you, leave your gift before the altar, and go first and be reconciled with your brother, and then go and offer your gift. Be quick to be conciliatory with your adversary at law when you are in the street with him, for fear your adversary may turn you over to the judge, and the judge to the officer, and you be thrown into prison. Truly I tell you, you cannot come out of there until you pay the last penny.

You have heard that it has been said: You shall not commit adultery. I tell you that any man who looks at a woman so as to desire her has already committed adultery with her in his heart. If your right eye makes you go amiss, take it out and cast it from you; it is better that one part of you should be lost instead of your whole body being cast into Gehenna. And if your right hand makes you go amiss, cut it off and cast it from you; it is better that one part of you should be lost instead of your whole body going to Gehenna. It has been said: If a man puts away his wife, let him give her a contract of divorce. I tell you that any man who puts away his wife, except for the reason of harlotry, is making her the victim of adultery; and any man who marries a wife who has been divorced is committing adultery. Again, you have heard that it has been said to the ancients: You shall not swear falsely, but you shall make good your oaths to the Lord. I tell you not to swear at all: not by heaven, because it is the throne of God; not by the earth, because it is the footstool for his feet; not by Jerusalem, because it is the city of the great king; not by your own head, because you cannot make one hair of it white or black. Let your speech be yes yes, no no; more than that comes from the evil one.

You have heard that it has been said: An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. I tell you not to resist the wicked man; but if one strikes you on the right cheek, turn the other one to him also; and if a man wishes to go to law with you and take your tunic, give him your cloak also, and if one makes you his porter for a mile, go with him for two. Give to him who asks, and do not turn away one who wishes to borrow from you. You have heard that it has been said: You shall love your neighbor and hate your enemy. I tell you, love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you, so that you may be sons of your father who is in heaven, because he makes his sun rise on the evil and the good, and rains on the just and the unjust. For if you love those who love you, what reward do you have? Do not even the tax collectors do the same? And if you greet only your brothers, what do you do that is more than others do? Do not even the pagans do the same? Be perfect as your father in heaven is perfect.

Take care not to practice your righteousness publicly before men so as to be seen by them; if you do, you shall have no recompense from your father in heaven. Then when you do charity, do not have a trumpet blown before you, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and the streets, so that men may think well of them. Truly I tell you, they have their due reward. But when you do charity, let your left hand not know what your right hand is doing, so that your charity may be in secret; and your father, who sees what is secret, will reward you. And when you pray, you must not be like the hypocrites, who love to stand up in the synagogues and the corners of the squares to pray, so that they may be seen by men. Truly I tell you, they have their due reward. But when you pray, go into your inner room and close the door and pray to your father, who is in secret; and your father, who sees what is secret, will reward you. When you pray, do not babble as the pagans do; for they think that by saying much they will be heard. Do not then be like them; for your father knows what you need before you ask him. Pray thus, then:<sup>4</sup> Our father in heaven, may your name be hallowed, may your kingdom come, may your will be done, as in heaven, so upon earth. Give us today our sufficient bread, and forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors. And do not bring us into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For if you forgive men their offenses, your heavenly father will forgive you; but if you do not forgive men, neither will your father forgive you your offenses. And when you fast, do not scowl like the hypocrites; for they make ugly faces so that men can see that they are fasting. Truly I tell you, they have their due reward. But when you fast, anoint your head and wash your face, so that you may not show as fasting to men, but to your father, in secret; and your father, who sees what is secret, will reward you.

Do not store up your treasures on earth, where the moth and rust destroy them, and where burglars dig through and steal them; but store up your treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust destroys them, and where burglars do not dig through or steal; for where your treasure is, there also will be your heart. The lamp of the body is the eye. Thus if your eye is clear, your whole body is full of light; but if your eye is soiled, your whole body is dark. If the light in you is darkness, how dark it is. No man can serve two masters. For either he will hate the one and love the other, or he will cling to one and despise the other; you cannot serve God and mammon.<sup>5</sup> Therefore I tell you, do not take thought for your life, what you will eat, or for your body, what you will wear. Is not your life more than its food and your body more than its clothing? Consider the birds of the sky, that they do not sow or harvest or collect for their granaries, and your heavenly father feeds them. Are you not preferred above them? Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit to his growth? And why do you take thought about clothing? Study the lilies in the field, how they grow. They do not toil or spin; yet I tell you, not even Solomon<sup>6</sup> in all his glory was clothed like one of these. But if God so clothes the grass of the field, which grows today and tomorrow is thrown in the oven, will he not much more clothe you, you men of little faith? Do not then worry and say: What shall we eat? Or: What shall we drink? Or: What shall we wear? For all this the Gentiles study. Your father in heaven knows that you need all these things. But seek out first his kingdom and his justice, and all these things shall be given to you. Do not then take thought of tomorrow; tomorrow will take care of itself, sufficient to the day is its own evil.

Do not judge, so you may not be judged. You shall be judged by that judgment by which you judge, and your measure will be made by the measure by which you measure. Why do you look at the straw which is in the eye of your brother, and not see the log which is in your eye? Or how will you say to your brother: Let me take the straw out of your eye, and behold, the log is in your eye. You hypocrite, first take the log out of your eye, and then you will see to take the straw out of the eye of your brother. Do not give what is sacred to the dogs, and do not cast your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet and turn and rend you. Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and the door will be opened for you. Everyone who asks receives, and he who seeks finds, and for him who knocks the door will be opened. Or what man is there among you, whose son shall ask him for bread, that will give him a stone? Or ask him for fish, that will give him a snake? If then you, who are corrupt, know how to give good gifts to your children, by how much more your father who is in heaven will give good things to those who ask him. Whatever you wish men to do to you, so do to them. For this is the law and the prophets.

Go in through the narrow gate; because wide and spacious is the road that leads to destruction, and there are many who go in through it; because narrow is the gate and cramped the road that leads to life, and few are they who find it. Beware of the false prophets, who come to you in sheep's clothing, but inside they are ravening wolves. From their fruits you will know them. Do men gather grapes from thorns or figs from thistles? Thus every good tree produces good fruits, but the rotten tree produces bad fruits. A good tree cannot bear bad fruits, and a rotten tree cannot bear good fruits. Every tree that does not produce good fruit is cut out and thrown in the fire. So from their fruits you will know them. Not everyone who says to me Lord Lord will come into the Kingdom of Heaven, but he who does the will of my father in heaven. Many will say to me on that day: Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name, and in your name did we not cast out demons, and in your name did we not assume great powers? And then I shall admit to them: I never knew you. Go from me, for you do what is against the law.

Every man who hears what I say and does what I say shall be like the prudent man who built his house upon the rock. And the rain fell and the rivers came and the winds blew and dashed against that house, and it did not fall, for it was founded upon the rock. And every man who hears what I say and does not do what I say will be like the reckless man who built his house on the sand. And the rain fell and the rivers came and the winds blew and battered that house, and it fell, and that was a great fall.

And it happened that when Jesus had ended these words, the multitudes were astonished at his teaching, for he taught them as one who has authority, and not like their own scribes.

[Parables]

All the tax collectors and the sinners kept coming around him, to listen to him. And the Pharisees and the scribes muttered, saying: This man receives sinners and eats with them. But he told them this parable, saying: Which man among you who has a hundred sheep and has lost one of them will not leave the ninety-nine in the wilds and go after the lost one until he finds it? And when he does find it, he sets it on his shoulders, rejoicing, and goes to his house and invites in his friends and his neighbors, saying to them: Rejoice with me, because I found my sheep which was lost. I tell you that thus there will be joy in heaven over one sinner who repents, rather than over ninety-nine righteous ones who have no need of repentance. Or what woman who has ten drachmas,<sup>1</sup> if she loses one drachma, does not light the lamp and sweep the house and search diligently until she finds it? And finding it she invites in her friends and neighbors, saying: Rejoice with me, because I found the drachma I lost. Such, I tell you, is the joy among the angels of God over one sinner who repents.

And he said: There was a man who had two sons. And the younger of them said to his father: Father, give me my appropriate share of the property. And the father divided his substance between them. And not many days afterward the younger son gathered everything together and left the country for a distant land, and there he squandered his substance in riotous living. And after he had spent everything, there was a severe famine in that country, and he began to be in need. And he went and attached himself to one of the citizens of that country, who sent him out into the fields to feed the pigs. And he longed to be nourished on the nuts that the pigs ate, and no one would give to him. And he went and said to himself: How many hired servants of my father have plenty of bread while I am dying of hunger here. I will rise up and go to my father and say to him: Father, I have sinned against heaven and in your sight, I am no longer worthy to be called your son. Make me like one of your hired servants. And he rose up and went to his father. And when he was still a long way off, his father saw him and was moved and ran and fell on his neck and kissed him. The son said to him: Father, I have sinned against heaven and in your sight, I am no longer worthy to be called your son. But his father said to his slaves: Quick, bring the best clothing and put it on him, and have a ring for his hand and shoes for his feet, and bring the fatted calf, slaughter him, and let us eat and make merry because this man, my son, was a dead man and came to life, he was lost and he has been found. And they began to make merry. His older son was out on the estate, and as he came nearer to the house he heard music and dancing, and he called over one of the servants and asked what was going on. He told him: Your brother is here, and your father slaughtered the fatted calf, because he got him back in good health. He was angry and did not want to go in. But his father came out and entreated him. But he answered and said to his father: Look, all these years I have been your slave and never neglected an order of yours, but you never gave me a kid so that I could make merry with my friends. But when this son of yours comes back, the one who ate up your livelihood in the company of whores, you slaughtered the fatted calf for him. But he said to him: My child, you are always with me, and all that is mine is yours; but we had to make merry and rejoice, because your brother was a dead man and came to life, he was lost and has been found.

[Why Jesus Teaches in Parables]

On that day Jesus went out of the house and sat beside the sea; and a great multitude gathered before him, so that he went aboard a ship and sat there, and all the multitude stood on the shore. And he talked to them, speaking mostly in parables: Behold, a sower went out to sow. And as he sowed, some of the grain fell beside the way, and birds came and ate it. Some fell on stony ground where there was not much soil, and it shot up quickly because there was no depth of soil, but when the sun came up it was parched, and because it had no roots it dried away. Some fell among thorns, and the thorns grew up and stifled it. But some fell upon the good soil and bore fruit, some a hundredfold, some sixtyfold, some thirtyfold. He who has ears, let him hear. Then his disciples came to him and said: Why do you talk to them in parables? He answered them and said: Because it is given to you to understand the secrets of the Kingdom of Heaven, but to them it is not given. When a man has, he shall be given, and it will be more than he needs; but when he has not, even what he has shall be taken away from him. Therefore I talk to them in parables, because they have sight but do not see, and hearing but do not hear or understand. And for them is fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah,<sup>1</sup> saying: With your hearing you shall hear and not understand, and you shall use your sight and look but not see. For the heart of this people is stiffened, and they hear with difficulty, and they have closed their eyes; so that they may never see with their eyes, or hear with their ears and with their hearts understand and turn back, so that I can heal them.

Blessed are your eyes because they see, and your ears because they hear. Truly I tell you that many prophets and good men have longed to see what you see, and not seen it, and to hear what you hear, and not heard it. Hear, then, the parable of the sower. To every man who hears the word of the Kingdom and does not understand it, the evil one comes and seizes what has been sown in his heart. This is the seed sown by the way. The seed sown on the stony ground is the man who hears the word and immediately accepts it with joy; but he has no root in himself, and he is a man of the moment, and when there comes affliction and persecution, because of the word, he does not stand fast. The seed sown among thorns is the man who hears the word, and concern for the world and the beguilement of riches stifle the word, and he bears no fruit. And the seed sown on the good soil is the man who hears the word and understands it, who bears fruit and makes it, one a hundredfold, one sixtyfold, and one thirtyfold.

He set before them another parable, saying: The Kingdom of Heaven is like a man who sowed good seed in his field. And while the people were asleep, his enemy came and sowed darnel in with the grain, and went away. When the plants grew and produced a crop, the darnel was seen. Then the slaves of the master came to him and said: Master, did you not sow good grain in your field? Where does the darnel come from? He said to them: A man who is my enemy did it. His slaves said: Do you wish us to go out and gather it? But he said: No, for fear that when you gather the darnel you may pull up the grain with it. Let them both grow until harvest time, and in the time of harvest I shall say to the harvesters: First gather the darnel, and bind it in sheaves for burning, but store the grain in my granary.

He set before them another parable, saying: The Kingdom of Heaven is like a grain of mustard, which a man took and sowed in his field; which is the smallest of all seeds, but when it grows, it is the largest of the greens and grows into a tree, so that the birds of the air come and nest in its branches.

He told them another parable: The Kingdom of Heaven is like leaven, which a woman took and buried in three measures of dough, so that it all rose.

All this Jesus told the multitudes in parables, and he did not talk to them except in parables; so as to fulfill the word spoken by the prophet, saying: I will open my mouth in parables, and pour out what has been hidden since the creation. Then he sent away the multitudes and went to the house. And his disciples came to him and said: Make plain to us the parable of the darnel in the field. He answered them and said: The sower of the good seed is the son of man; the field is the world; the good seed is the sons of the Kingdom; the darnel is the sons of the evil one, and the enemy who sowed it is the devil; the harvest time is the end of the world, and the harvesters are angels. Then as the darnel is gathered and burned in the fire, so it is at the end of the world. The son of man will send out his angels, and they will gather from his Kingdom all that misleads, and the people who do what is not lawful, and cast them in the furnace of fire; and there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Then the righteous men will shine forth like the sun in the Kingdom of their father. He who has ears, let him hear. The Kingdom of Heaven is like a treasure hidden in the field, which a man found and hid, and for joy of it he goes and sells all he has and buys that field. Again, the Kingdom of Heaven is like a trader looking for fine pearls; he found one of great value, and went and sold all he had and bought it. Again, the Kingdom of Heaven is like a dragnet cast into the sea and netting every kind of fish; and when it is full they draw it out and sit on the beach and gather the good ones in baskets, but the bad they throw away. So will it be at the end of the world. The angels will go out and separate the bad from the midst of the righteous, and cast them in the furnace of fire; and there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Do you understand all this? They said to him: Yes. And he said to them: Therefore every scribe who is learned in the Kingdom of Heaven is like a man who is master of a house, who issues from his storehouse what is new and what is old.

1. See Isaiah 6.9–10.

Matthew 27–28

[Crucifixion and Resurrection]

When morning came, all the high priests and elders of the people held a meeting against Jesus, to have him killed. And they bound him and took him away and gave him over to Pilate the governor.<sup>1</sup>

Then when Judas, who had betrayed him, saw that he had been condemned, he repented and proffered the thirty pieces of silver back to the high priests and the elders, saying: I did wrong to betray innocent blood. They said: What is that to us? You look to it. And he threw down the silver pieces in the temple and went away, and when he was alone he hanged himself. The high priests took up the silver pieces and said: We cannot put them in the treasury, since it is blood money. Then they took counsel together and with the money they bought the potter's field<sup>2</sup> to bury strangers in. Therefore that field has been called the Field of Blood, to this day. Then was fulfilled the word spoken by Jeremiah the prophet,<sup>3</sup> saying: I took the thirty pieces of silver, the price of him on whom a price was set, whom they priced from among the sons of Israel, and I gave the money for the field of the potter, as my Lord commanded me.

Now Jesus stood before the governor; and the governor questioned him, saying: Are you the King of the Jews? Jesus answered: It is you who say it. And while he was being accused by the high priests and the elders he made no answer. Then Pilate said to him: Do you not hear all their testimony against you? And he made no answer to a single word, so that the governor was greatly amazed.

For the festival, the governor was accustomed to release one prisoner for the multitude, whichever one they wished. And they had at that time a notorious man, who was called Barabbas.<sup>4</sup> Now as they were assembled Pilate said to them: Which one do you wish me to release for you, Barabbas, or Jesus, who is called Christ? For he knew that it was through malice that they had turned him over. Now as he was sitting on the platform, his wife sent him a message, saying: Let there be nothing between you and this just man; for I have suffered much today because of a dream about him. But the high priests and the elders persuaded the crowd to ask for Barabbas and destroy Jesus. Then the governor spoke forth and said to them: Which of the two shall I give you? They answered: Barabbas. Pilate said to them: What then shall I do with Jesus, who is called Christ? They all said: Let him be crucified. But Pilate said: Why? What harm has he done? But they screamed all the more, saying: Let him be crucified. And Pilate, seeing that he was doing no good and that the disorder was growing, took water and washed his hands before the crowd, saying: I am innocent of the blood of this man. You see to it. And all the people answered and said: His blood is upon us and upon our children. Then Pilate gave them Barabbas, but he had Jesus flogged, and gave him over to be crucified.

Then the soldiers of the governor took Jesus to the residence, and drew up all their battalion around him. And they stripped him and put a red mantle about him, and wove a wreath of thorns and put it on his head, and put a reed in his right hand, and knelt before him and mocked him, saying: Hail, King of the Jews. And they spat upon him and took the reed and beat him on the head. And after they had mocked him, they took off the mantle and put his own clothes on him, and led him away to be crucified. And as they went out they found a man of Cyrene, named Simon. They impressed him for carrying the cross.

Then they came to a place called Golgotha, which means the place of the skull, and gave him wine mixed with gall to drink. When he tasted it he would not drink it. Then they crucified him, and divided up his clothes, casting lots, and sat there and watched him. Over his head they put the label giving the charge against him, where it was written: This is Jesus, the King of the Jews. Then there were crucified with him two robbers, one on his right and one on his left. And those who passed by blasphemed against him, wagging their heads, and saying: You who tear down the temple and rebuild it in three days, save yourself, and come down from the cross, if you are the son of God. So too the high priests, mocking him along with the scribes and the elders, said: He saved others, he cannot save himself. He is King of Israel, let him come down from the cross and we will believe in him. He trusted in God, let him save him now, if he will; for he said: I am the son of God. And the robbers who were crucified with him spoke abusively to him in the same way.

But from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour. But about the ninth hour Jesus cried out in a great voice, saying: Elei elei

4. Bar-Abbas, meaning “son of Abbas” (literally, “son of the Father”). John 18.40 calls Barabbas a “bandit” (lēstēs), a term often applied to the Jewish revolutionaries who defied Roman rule (Mark 15.7 refers to his involvement in “sedition”).

lema sabachthanei?<sup>5</sup> Which is: My God, my God, why have you forsaken me? But some of those who were standing there heard and said: This man calls to Elijah.<sup>6</sup> And at once one of them ran and took a sponge, soaked it in vinegar and put it on the end of a reed, and gave it to him to drink. But the rest said: Let us see if Elijah comes to save him.

Then Jesus cried out again in a great voice, and gave up his life. And behold, the veil of the temple<sup>7</sup> was split in two from top to bottom, and the earth was shaken, and the rocks were split, and the tombs opened and many bodies of the holy sleepers rose up; and after his resurrection they came out of their tombs and went into the holy city, and were seen by many. But the company commander and those with him who kept guard over Jesus, when they saw the earthquake and the things that happened, were greatly afraid, saying: In truth this was the son of God. And there were many women watching from a distance there, who had followed Jesus from Galilee, waiting on him. Among them were Mary the Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and Joseph, and the mother of the sons of Zebedee.

When it was evening, there came a rich man of Arimathaea, Joseph by name, who also had been a disciple of Jesus. This man went to Pilate and asked for the body of Jesus. Then Pilate ordered that it be given up to him. And Joseph took the body and wrapped it in clean linen, and laid it in his new tomb, which he had cut in the rock, and rolled a great stone before the door of the tomb, and went away. But Mary the Magdalene and the other Mary were there, sitting before the tomb. On the next day, which is the day after the Day of Preparation, the high priests and the Pharisees gathered in the presence of Pilate, and said: Lord, we have remembered how that impostor said while he was still alive: After three days I shall rise up. Give orders, then, that the tomb be secured until after the third day, for fear his disciples may come and steal him away and say to the people: He rose from the dead. And that will be the ultimate deception, worse than the former one. Pilate said to them: You have a guard. Go and secure it as best you can. And they went and secured the tomb, sealing it with the help of the guard.

Late on the sabbath, as the light grew toward the first day after the sabbath, Mary the Magdalene and the other Mary came to visit the tomb. And behold, there was a great earthquake, for the angel of the Lord came down from heaven and approached the stone and rolled it away and was sitting on it. His look was like lightning, and his clothing white as snow. And those who were on guard were shaken with fear of him and became like dead men. But the angel spoke forth and said to the women: Do not you fear; for I know that you look for Jesus, who was crucified. He is not here. For he rose up, as he said. Come here, and look at the place where he lay. Then go quickly and tell his disciples that he has risen from the dead, and behold, he goes before you into Galilee. There you will see him. See; I have told you. And quickly leaving the tomb, in fear and great joy, they ran to tell the news to his disciples. And behold, Jesus met them, saying: I give you greeting. They came up to him and took his feet and worshipped him.

his return was prophesied to herald the coming of the Messiah (Malachi 3.1; 4.5).

7. The veil covering the door of the inner sanctuary of the Temple (Exodus 26.31–34), where God was said to appear (Leviticus 16.2).

Then Jesus said to them: Do not fear. Go and tell my brothers to go into Galilee, and there they will see me. And as they went on their way, behold, some of the guards went into the city and reported to the high priests all that had happened. And they met with the elders and took counsel together, and gave the soldiers a quantity of money, saying: Say that the disciples came in the night and stole him away while we were sleeping. And if this is heard in the house of the governor, we shall reason with him, and make it so that you have nothing to fear. And they took the money and did as they were instructed. And this is the story that has been spread about among the Jews, to this day.

Then the eleven disciples went on into Galilee, to the mountain where Jesus had given them instructions to go; and when they saw him, they worshipped him; but some doubted. And Jesus came up to them and talked with them, saying: All authority has been given to me, in heaven and on earth. Go out, therefore, and instruct all the nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all that I have taught you. And behold, I am with you, all the days until the end of the world.

John 1

[The Word]

In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God. He was in the beginning, with God. Everything came about through him, and without him not one thing came about. What came about in him was life, and the life was the light of mankind; and the light shines in the darkness, and the darkness did not understand it.

There was a man sent from God; his name was John. This man came for testimony, to testify concerning the light, so that all should believe through him. He was not the light, but was to testify concerning the light. The light was the true light, which illuminates every person who comes into the world. He was in the world, and the world came about through him, and the world did not know him. He went to his own and his own people did not accept him. Those who accepted him, he gave them power to become children of God, to those who believed in his name, who were born not from blood or from the will of the flesh or from the will of man, but from God.

And the word became flesh and lived among us, and we have seen his glory, glory as of a single son from his father, full of grace and truth. John bears witness concerning him, and he cried out, saying (for it was he who was speaking): He who is coming after me was before me, because he was there before I was; because we have all received from his fullness, and grace for grace. Because the law was given through Moses; the grace and the truth came through Jesus Christ. No one has ever seen God; the only-born God who is in the bosom of his father, it is he who told of him.

And this is the testimony of John, when the Jews sent priests and Levites<sup>1</sup> from Jerusalem to ask him: Who are you? And he confessed, and made no denial, but confessed: I am not the Christ. And they asked him: What then? Are you Elijah? And he said: I am not. Are you the prophet? And he answered: No. Then they said to him: Who are you? So that we can give an answer to those who sent us. What do you say about yourself? He said: I am the voice of one crying in the desert: Make straight the way of the Lord; as Isaiah the prophet said. Now they had been sent by the Pharisees. And they questioned him and said to him: Why then do you baptize, if you are not the Christ, or Elijah or the prophet? John answered them saying: I baptize with water; but in your midst stands one whom you do not know, who is coming after me, and I am not fit to untie the fastening of his shoe. All this happened in Bethany beyond the Jordan,<sup>2</sup> where John was baptizing.

The next day he saw Jesus coming toward him and said: See, the lamb of God who takes away the sinfulness of the world. This is the one of whom I said: A man is coming after me who was before me, because he was there before I was. And I did not know him. But so that he might be made known to Israel, this was why I came baptizing with water. And John bore witness, saying: I have seen the Spirit descending like a dove from the sky, and it remained upon him; and I did not know him, but the one who sent me to baptize with water was the one who said to me: That one, on whom you see the Spirit descending and remaining upon him, is the one who baptizes with the Holy Spirit. And I have seen, and I have borne witness that this is the son of God.

The next day John was standing with two of his disciples, and he saw Jesus walking about and said: See, the lamb of God. His two disciples heard what he said and followed Jesus. Jesus turned about and saw them following him and said: What are you seeking? They said to him: Rabbi (which translated means master), where are you staying? He said to them: Come and see. So they came, and saw where he was staying, and stayed with him for that day. It was about the tenth hour. Andrew, one of the two who heard Jesus and followed him, was the brother of Simon Peter. He went first and found his brother Simon and said to him: We have found the Messiah (which is, translated, the Christ). He took him to Jesus. Jesus looked at him and said: You are Simon, the son of John. You shall be called Cephas<sup>3</sup> (which means Peter).

The next day Jesus wished to go out to Galilee. And he found Philip and said to him: Follow me. Philip was from Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter. Philip found Nathanael and said to him: We have found the one of whom Moses wrote in the law, and the prophets: Jesus the son of Joseph, from Nazareth. And Nathanael said to him: Can anything good come from Nazareth? Philip said to him: Come and see. Jesus saw Nathanael coming toward him and said of him: See, a true son of Israel, in whom there is no guile. Nathanael said to him: How is it that you know me? Jesus answered and said to him: I saw you when you were under the fig tree, before Philip called you. Nathanael answered: Master, you are the son of God, you are the King of Israel. Jesus answered and said to him: Because I told you I saw you under the fig tree, you believe? You will see greater things than that. And he said to him: Truly truly I tell you, you will see the heaven open and the angels of God ascending and descending to the son of man.<sup>4</sup>

AUGUSTINE

When Augustine lay dying in August of 430, Vandal armies were besieging the African city of Hippo (modern Annaba, Algeria), where Augustine was the spiritual leader of a vibrant community of Christians living under the rule of the Roman Empire. Within weeks, Hippo would fall; the great city of Rome itself would be captured within thirty years. Born into the culture of antiquity but laying the foundations for the medieval millennium that was just about to begin, Augustine stands with one foot in each world. His monumental autobiography, the Confessions, constantly draws on the rich literature of the Roman orators and prose writers, especially Cicero. Yet it also reaches forward, innovatively exploring the ways in which the reader—like Augustine himself—might find that the Word of God has all along been lodged within his innermost soul.

LIFE AND TIMES

Augustine was a native of the northern African regions that were part of the Roman Empire. Yet the empire was in a gradual state of collapse throughout Augustine's lifetime: strong military leaders were running the government in all but name from 395 onward, and the final Roman emperor would be deposed by rebellious mercenary troops in 476. It was a transitional period—a time of great instability and, simultaneously, cultural and religious ferment. Mystery and cult religions were particularly popular, as witnessed by Augustine's account of his years with the Manichaeans. Despite the instability and uncertainty of the period, the administrative and economic structures of the empire were still healthy enough to ease travel between its various parts, allowing Augustine to journey throughout northern Africa and Italy.

Augustine spent his early years in Africa, where there were several provincial cities of substantial size. Born at Thagaste (modern Souk-Ahras, Algeria), he had his first schooling at the nearby town of Madaurus and, later, at the sophisticated cultural capital of Carthage. There, Augustine became intrigued by Manichaeism, a dualistic religion that resembled early Christianity in emphasizing the life of the mind and the drive toward increasing spiritual purity, though the two religions differed very significantly in their views of the nature of God. Augustine quickly rose to the top of his profession as an educator and public speaker, teaching grammar at his birthplace of Thagaste and, later, rhetoric at Carthage. These provincial successes impelled him to Rome, where he established a school of rhetoric; he was then invited to come to Milan, which had become a capital of the Western Roman Empire, to take on the chair of rhetoric and such duties as writing honorific speeches to be presented at court. At Milan, Augustine entered into a very sophisticated intellectual community, where he became deeply involved in Neoplatonism both as a philosophy and as a quasi-religious form of mysticism. He also came to know Ambrose, the Roman Catholic bishop of Milan. At the time, Augustine says, he told himself that he was attending Ambrose's sermons simply to judge his excellence as a public speaker. In fact, Augustine was becoming increasingly drawn to Christianity, a religion to which his mother, Monica, had vainly tried to introduce him since he was a young child.

The bond between Augustine and Ambrose was strengthened enormously by Monica, who had followed her son to Milan and become close to Ambrose; the bishop reciprocated, constantly telling his friend Augustine what a treasure he had in his faithful and devout mother. The Confessions shows that Monica played a major role in her son's spiritual growth, which culminated in Augustine's conversion and baptism on Easter 386, at the age of thirty-two. This was a moment of complete change for Augustine, not just spiritually but also practically: he gave up his chair in rhetoric at the imperial court of Milan, withdrew from his engagement to marry, and went with his mother to the port of Ostia to return to Africa. But before they could sail from Italy, Monica died, as did Augustine's son, Adeodatus, who had been born in Carthage to Augustine's longtime mistress, traveled to Italy with Augustine, and undergone baptism alongside his father. Alone back in Thagaste, Augustine surrounded himself with spiritual brothers—members of the growing Christian community in the region—and transformed his family home into a monastery. When he paid a visit to a friend at Hippo in 391, Augustine found that his reputation as a spiritual leader had preceded him. The community at Hippo begged Augustine to remain with them, and he was ordained a priest at their request. By 396, he was bishop of Hippo, a position he held until his death.

WORK

Augustine probably began work on the Confessions in 397, when he was forty-three years old. He seems to have been suffering from a terrible case of writer's block, with several half-finished pieces of work on hand. The experience of writing the Confessions apparently cured it, for almost immediately after completing it Augustine went on to produce an extraordinarily large number of works. The Confessions is, as the name suggests, autobiographical, the story of one man's life in his own words. But it is also confessional in the sense of being a full account of one's sins; a story addressed first of all to God, the hearer who is able to forgive the transgressions that Augustine recounts. At the same time, the Confessions has a secondary addressee, as Augustine himself acknowledges: other would-be Christians who might be able to trace the path of their own spiritual journey as a result of having read about the struggles of another. Of the thirteen books of the Confessions, only the first nine are autobiographical, covering the period from Augustine's early childhood memories to his stay in Ostia in 387, as he waits for the boat that would take him home. The autobiographical genre, almost without precedent in this period, is perhaps Augustine's greatest literary legacy. We hear nothing from Augustine about his later years in Africa; instead, the final books of the Confessions are an analysis of the account of creation in Genesis, along with a sustained meditation on the nature of time and memory. The overall effect of the Confessions is to turn the reader inward, away from the individual journey of Augustine and toward the collective journey of humanity toward the divine.

Surprisingly for a book dedicated to the relationship of the soul to God, the most moving parts of the Confessions focus on Augustine's relationship to other human beings—not just his mother, Monica, who was so instrumental to Augustine's conversion to Christianity, but also his beloved son, Adeodatus, and the unnamed mistress who was Augustine's companion from age seventeen (when he first went to Carthage) until his mother persuaded him to enter into an arranged marriage in 385, shortly before his conversion. This woman, whom

Augustine simply calls “the One,” faithfully followed him on his journeys, first to Rome and then to Milan. When Augustine finally renounced his relationship with her, she returned to Africa, “vowing before you never to know any other man.” All of these human relationships, however passionate, are in the end subsumed within Augustine’s all-consuming relationship with God. He addresses God familiarly throughout the Confessions, as if he were an intimate friend who knew all Augustine’s secrets, but who also had the terrifying capacity to destroy, inspiring both adoration and fear.

Augustine writes frankly about his self-fashioning within the various communities to which he belonged, from his involvement in a gang of undisciplined youths to his immersion in the Manichaean community at Carthage, his time among the Neoplatonists in Milan, and his final place of rest among the Christian community at Hippo. His journey is, at a deep level, a search for the self, which he comes to find only after long struggle, and only through the companionship of others. Augustine comes home first spiritually, with a conversion inspired by the supernatural voice of a child, and then physically, sailing from Ostia to Thagaste, where he will make a new spiritual home filled with Christian believers among the bricks and mortar of his childhood house. Desire and longing structure the narrative of the Confessions, from Augustine’s heady days in Carthage, at the theater by day and in the arms of his mistress by night, to his patient vigil at the port of Ostia, consumed at once by sorrow for the death of Monica and joy in his discovery of Christ. Caught between his love for human beings and his longing for the divine, Augustine is never more present to us than when, shortly before his conversion, he cries out to God, “Grant me chastity and continance, only not yet.” Augustine’s painstaking examination of his innermost self, racked with contradictions and unexplained desires, had a profound influence not only on the medieval Christians who sought, like Augustine, to purge their souls of sin but also on the secular self-examination of early modern writers such as Montaigne and Rousseau.

[Childhood]

[6. 7] For what do I wish to say, Lord, except that I do not know from where I came into what I call this dying life, or living death; I do not know. But the consolation of Your mercies uplifted me, as I heard from the father and mother of my flesh, out of whom and in whom You formed me at the appropriate time, for I do not remember it myself. I was embraced by the comforts of human milk, but neither my mother nor my nurses filled their own breasts for me. It was You Who through them gave me the food of my infancy according to Your ordinance and the riches spread throughout the essence of all things. You also granted me to want no more than You gave, and granted that my nurses wanted to give me what You had given them, for they sought to give me by divine ordination what they had received in abundance from You. But the good that came to me from them was also good for them, though it did not come from them but through them; for from You, O God, come all good things, and from my God is my entire salvation.<sup>2</sup> This I learned only later, when, through all the inner and outer things You bestow, You called to me; for then I only knew how to suckle, content in what was pleasurable and crying at what offended my flesh, and nothing more.

[6. 8] Later I began to smile—first in sleep, then waking. At least that is what I was told about myself and I believe it, for this is what we see in infants, though I do not remember it about myself. Gradually I began to perceive where I was, and to want to express my needs to those who could fulfill them; but I could not express them, for the needs were inside me, and the other people outside; nor were they able with any of their senses to enter my soul. So I kicked and shouted; these were the few signs I could make that resembled my wishes, though they did not really resemble them. And when I was not obeyed, either because I was not understood or because what I wanted might harm me, I became indignant with the adults for not submitting to me, indignant with those who were not my slaves for not serving me, and avenged myself by crying. That is how infants are, as I learned from those I have been able to observe; the infants who knew nothing showing me better than my experienced nurses that I too had been like that.

[8. 13] On my way to the present I passed from infancy to boyhood. Or is it not that boyhood came to me, succeeding infancy? Not that infancy departed, for where would it have gone? Yet suddenly it was no more, for I was no longer an infant who could not talk but had become a boy speaking.<sup>3</sup> This I remember; but how I learned to speak I found out only later. I was not taught to speak by adults presenting me with words in a certain fixed order, as they would do somewhat later with letters. But with the mind that You gave me, my God, I myself learned through cries and all kinds of sounds and motions of my limbs, to express the feelings of my heart so that my wishes would be fulfilled. But I was not able to express everything I wanted to express to whomever I wanted. I managed to remember whenever adults called a thing something; and when, along with their voice, they moved their bodies toward a certain object I would see and retain the sounds with which they expressed the object. Moreover, what they wanted to express was clear from their gestures, which are the natural language of all races and are expressed in the face, the eyes, and movements of the limbs, and tones of voice that indicate the state of a person's mind as it strives toward, takes hold of, rejects, or shuns a thing. In this way, by repeatedly hearing words as they were positioned in various sentences, I gradually connected them with the things they signified, and so trained my mouth to express my desires through these signs. In this way I communicated the signs of my desires to the people I was among, and so entered into the tempests of society; yet I was still dependent on the authority of my parents and the will of the adults around me.

2. Throughout the Confessions Augustine quotes liberally from the Bible. When a quotation bears on Augustine's situation, it is annotated.

3. The English word infant comes from the Latin infans, "speechless."

[9. 14] O God, my God, what miseries I now experienced, what follies, when as a boy it was put before me that the only way of living right was to obey those who were instructing me to excel in this world by using the skill of language<sup>4</sup> to secure worldly honors and spurious wealth. I was sent to school to learn to read and write, the uses of which, poor wretch that I was, I did not know, and whenever I lagged in my studies I was beaten. This was extolled by adults, many previous generations having laid out the difficult path we were made to tread, increasing the toil and suffering of the sons of Adam. But, Lord, we also came upon men who prayed to You, and from them we learned, as far as we were able, to imagine You as some great being who, though we could not see You, would hear and help us. Thus I began as a boy to pray to You, my aid and refuge, and invoking You unraveled the knots of my tongue, a small boy but with great love, praying to You that I not be beaten in school.<sup>5</sup> And when You did not hear me—which saved me from the folly of praying to You for trifles—the adults, including my parents, laughed, though not unkindly, at the beatings I received, which at the time were a great and heavy sorrow to me.

[9. 15] Is there anyone, O Lord, any mind so great, so close to You in powerful love? Is there anyone, I ask, so close to You in piety and magnanimous love that he will think lightly (and not because his wits are dull) of the racks and hooks<sup>6</sup> and other torments that men in this world pray to You with such dread to escape, but who mock the torments they so bitterly fear, just as our parents mocked the torments our tutors inflicted on us as boys? For we did not fear our torments less, nor did we pray less to You to escape them. But still we transgressed, for we wrote, read, and studied less than was demanded of us. Not that we lacked the ability or memory, O Lord, which You willed us to have in ample measure for our age. But we delighted in amusements, for which we were punished by those who also delighted in amusements—yet the amusements of adults are called “business,” while those of children are punished by the adults, and no one pities either the children or the adults. Perhaps some fine arbiter might approve of my having been beaten because my playing with a ball hindered the pace of the learning that I was to use as an adult to play reprehensible games. Was he who flogged me any better? If a fellow tutor should trump him on some trifling matter, was he any the less angry or jealous than I was when a playmate beat me at ball?

[12. 19] Yet even in childhood, when my family feared less for me than in my youth, I did not like to study, and hated being forced to do so. But I was forced, and it was good for me. Not that it was I who was doing good, because I would not have studied had I not been compelled to. No one does good when he does it against his will, even if he is doing a good thing—yet neither were they who were forcing me doing good. What was good came to me from You, my God, for they did not consider how I should later use what they forced me to learn

4. I.e., the study of rhetoric, which was the passport to eminence in public life.

5. Augustine recognizes the necessity of this rigorous training; that he never forgot its harshness is clear from his remark in the City of God (21.14): “If a choice were given him between suffering death and living his early years over again, who would not shudder and choose death?”

6. The instruments of torture and public execution.

other than to satiate the insatiable desires of an impoverished wealth and an ignominious glory. But You, Who number the hairs of our head,<sup>7</sup> used for my good the error of all those who urged me to learn; and You used my own error in not wanting to learn to punish me, a punishment I deserved, so small a boy and yet so great a sinner. You did me good through those who did not do good, and for my own sin You exacted a just retribution: for You have commanded, and it is so, that every disordered soul will be its own punishment.

[13. 20] I have still not managed to fathom the reasons why I hated Greek,<sup>8</sup> which I studied as a boy. Yet Latin I truly loved; not what my first masters taught me, but what I later learned from the men we call grammarians. For I considered my first lessons of reading, writing, and arithmetic as great a burden and punishment as any Greek lesson. And yet, as I was flesh, a passing breath that does not return, did this not come from the sin and vanity of life? The first lessons were in fact better than the later ones, because they were more sound. Through them I acquired, and still retain, the ability to read whatever I find written and to write whatever I want; whereas in my later lessons I was forced to retain the strayings of an Aeneas<sup>9</sup> I did not know, forgetting my own, and to weep over a dead Dido<sup>1</sup> who killed herself for love; while I, without a tear, was prepared to pitifully die away from You through such works, my God, my life.

[13. 21] What is more pitiable than a pitiful being who does not pity himself but weeps at the death of Dido for love of Aeneas; a pitiful being who does not weep over the death he is suffering because he does not love You, O God, light of my heart, bread of the mouth deep within my soul, vigor that impregnates my mind and the vessel of my thoughts. I did not love You, and fornicated against You,<sup>2</sup> and as I did so I heard from all around cries of “Well done! Well done!” for the friendship of this world is fornication against You; and “Well done! Well done!” is what they shout in order to shame a man who is not like them. For all this I did not weep, but wept for Dido, “who with a dagger did the lowest ends pursue,”<sup>3</sup> just as I, having forsaken You, pursued the lowest of Your creations, dust turning to dust. Had I been forbidden to read these works I would have suffered at not being able to read what made me suffer. And such foolishness is considered a higher and better education than that by which I learned to read and write.

[13. 22] But now may my God call out in my soul, Your truth proclaiming to me, “This is wrong, this is wrong! Your first lessons were better by far!” For I would readily forget the strayings of Aeneas rather than forget how to read and write. The doors of the grammarians’ schools are indeed hung with precious curtains,<sup>4</sup> but this is not so much a sign of high distinction as a cloak for their errors. Let not those whom I no longer fear cry out against me while

7. I.e., who knows and attends to the smallest detail of each life (cf. Matthew 10.30).

8. The study of Greek was important not only for gaining knowledge of Greek literature but also because it was the official language of the Eastern Roman Empire. Augustine never really mastered Greek, though his remark elsewhere that he had acquired so little Greek that it amounted to practically none is overmodest.

9. Virgil’s Aeneid 3.

1. Queen of Carthage whose unrequited love for the Trojan warrior Aeneas ended in her untimely death; Aeneas was obliged to pursue his destiny to be the founding father of Rome (Virgil, Aeneid, esp. book 4).

2. Here, metaphorically.

3. Virgil, Aeneid 6.457.

4. In Augustine’s time, school entrances were covered by veils with an attendant standing by to make sure that only those who paid tuition were admitted; the veil was also a symbol of the hidden knowledge that lay beyond the threshold.

I confess to You what my soul seeks, finding peace in condemning my evil ways and loving Your good ways. Let not the sellers and buyers of high learning cry out against me. If I ask them whether it is true that Aeneas once came to Carthage, as the poet says, the less learned will reply that they do not know, while the more learned will say that he never did. But if I ask with what letters the name “Aeneas” is written, everyone who has learned this will answer me correctly, according to the agreement and decision that men have reached concerning these signs. Likewise, if I should ask which was the greater inconvenience, forgetting how to read and write or forgetting those poetic fictions, who would not know what answer someone in possession of his senses would give? Thus as a boy I sinned, preferring empty learning to learning that was more useful, going so far as to love the former and hate the latter. “One plus one is two, two plus two is four” was a hateful incantation, while the sweetest dream of my vanity was the wooden horse filled with armed men, the burning of Troy, and even the ghost of Creusa.<sup>5</sup>

[17. 27] Permit me, my God, also to say something about my innate talent, Your gift, and the foolishness on which I squandered it. I was set a task that greatly worried me because of the prospect of praise or shame, and the dread of being beaten: the task was to speak the words of Juno as she raged and grieved, unable as she was to “keep the Prince of Troy from seeking the shores of Italy,”<sup>6</sup> even though I knew she had never spoken such words. But we were forced to go astray in the footsteps of those poetic creations, and to say in plain speech what Virgil had said in verse. The declaimer who was most praised was the one who best brought forth, shrouded in the most fitting words, the grandeur of the feigned characters in their passion of rage and grief. What is it to me, my God and true life, that my declamation was applauded over that of so many of the pupils of my age and in my class? Is all this not smoke and wind? Was there nothing else on which to exercise my talent and my tongue? Your praises, Lord, Your praises through Your Scriptures, would have trellised the young vines of my heart, and foolish nonsense would not have snatched at it, vile prey for winged scavengers. There is more than one way for man to pay homage to fallen angels.

FROM BOOK II

[The Pear Tree]

[1. 1] I recall my past impurity and the carnal corruptions suffered by my soul, not because I love them but so that I may love You, my God. It is out of love for Your love that in the bitterness of my memory I seek to recall the most

5. While at a feast held in his honor by Dido, Aeneas tells the story of the fall of Troy and his escape from the burning city, during which he lost his wife, Creusa (Virgil, Aeneid, book 2, esp. 2.772).

6. Augustine was assigned the task of delivering a prose paraphrase of Juno's angry speech in

Aeneid 1. In it she complains that her enemies, the Trojans under Aeneas, are on their way to their destined goal in Italy in spite of her resolution to prevent them. Rhetorical exercises such as this were common in the schools, because they served the double purpose of teaching both literature and rhetorical composition.

terrible things I did, so that Your sweetness will flow into me, O God, O Sweet One Who never fails, Sweet One serene and untroubled, Who gathered up the pieces into which I had been scattered when I turned away from You, the One, only to waste myself among the many. For in my youth I burned fervently to satisfy my hellish desires, wallowing in sensual and shadowy loves, my beauty wasting away; before Your eyes I was putrid, while I sought pleasure for myself and to please the eyes of others.

[2. 2] What was it that I delighted in, if not loving and being loved? But there was no path from soul to soul, no luminous links of friendship, it was only vapors rising from the slimy lusts of the flesh and the gushings of puberty that beclouded my heart, so that I was not able to discern the bright serenity of love from the hazy mists of lust. Both love and lust raged in turmoil within me, dragging me in my weak youth into the chasms of sin, plunging me into the raging abyss of disgrace. Your wrath was growing, though I did not know it. The clanking chains of my mortal flesh had rendered me deaf, punishing me for the pride of my soul, and I strayed ever further from You, and You let me. I was hurled and scattered in all directions, dissipating myself in my fornications, while You, O my belated joy, were silent! You were silent then, and in proud degradation and restless despondence I strayed ever further from You, the seed of my sorrow ever more sterile.

[2. 4] Where was I, how far was I exiled from the delights of Your House, in that sixteenth year of the age of my flesh? The madness of lust raised its scepter over me and I had relinquished myself to it entirely, condoned as it was by the turpitude of man, yet forbidden by Your laws. Meanwhile, my family did not seek through marriage to keep me from plunging into the abyss; their only concern was that I should learn to excel in discourse and be persuasive as an orator.

[4. 9] Your law punishes theft, O Lord, as does the law written in the hearts of men that even wickedness cannot erase, for what thief will gladly bear another thief robbing him, even if he is rich and the one robbing him is in need? But I wanted to steal and I did, driven not by any need, but by a lack of regard for justice and an abundance of wickedness. For I stole something of which I had plenty and far better; nor did I seek to enjoy what I had stolen, only the theft and the sin itself. Near our vineyard was a pear tree heavy with fruit that did not tempt with either color or taste. Late one night, I and some wicked youths, still seeking fun in our usual haunts, as was our foul habit, set about to shake the pears off the tree and carry them away, taking with us a huge load, not to eat, but to throw to the pigs. If we ate a few of the pears it was only to relish the wrongness of what we had done. Such was my heart, O God, such was my heart, which You took pity on in the profoundest depths of the abyss. Let my heart tell You now what it sought there, being wicked for no reason and having no cause to do ill except wickedness itself. It was detestable, but I delighted in it. I delighted in my undoing, I delighted in my eclipse, not that for which I was eclipsed but the eclipse itself, a depraved soul falling from Your firmament to its destruction, not seeking anything through my shamefulfulness but shame itself.

[5. 10] Just as beauty can be seen in lovely objects, in gold and silver and such things, and just as the harmony of objects is vital to our sense of touch, each of our other senses have their own response. Transient honor too, such as the powers of ruling and command, has its splendor, which also give rises to man's urge to claim his rights. And yet in our quest for these things we must not depart from You, O Lord, nor deviate from Your law. The life we live in this world also has its appeal through a certain beauty of its own and a harmony with all the beautiful things here below, as does friendship, tied with its sweet and precious knot that unites many souls. Yet all of this can lead to sin when through an unrestrained urge for good things that are the lowest things of Your creation, forsaking things that are better and higher, forsaking You, our Lord God, Your truth, and Your law. For the lower things have their delights, but not like my God, Who made all things, and in Whom those who are righteous delight, and Who is the joy of those upright in heart.

[5. 11] When we ask why a crime was committed, we tend not to believe the answer unless there seems to have been a desire to obtain—or a fear of losing—some of the things I have called a lower good. This lower good is beautiful and appealing, though when compared with higher and blessed good, it is base and vile. A man has committed a murder; why did he do it? Perhaps he loved the murdered man's wife, or his property, or he robbed the man to secure his livelihood, or feared that he might be robbed of his livelihood by the man he murdered; or, wronged, he burned to be avenged. Would anyone commit murder for no reason, simply delighting in murder? Who would believe such a thing? Yet it has been said<sup>7</sup> of a certain crazed man of boundless cruelty that he was cruel and evil without cause, though a reason was also cited: Lest through idleness his hand or heart should wilt. And yet, we should ask why was this man so cruel? It was so that through his acts of crime he might seize Rome and attain honors, power, and wealth, and free himself from fear of the laws, the dangers of poverty, and the offenses he had committed. Hence not even this man, Catiline, loved his deeds, but loved something else for the sake of which he did them.

[6. 12] Wretch that I was, what did I love in you, my theft, O deed committed in that night of my sixteenth year? It is not that you were beautiful, for you were a theft. Are you even a thing, that I can speak to you? Beautiful were the fruits we stole, for they were Your creation, O Most Beautiful of all, Creator of all, O God that is good, God the highest Good and my true Good. Beautiful were those fruits, but it was not them that my wretched soul desired, for I had plenty better, and the ones I plucked I plucked only so that I might steal. No sooner had I plucked them than I threw them away, my sin being the only feast I rejoiced in. And the few bites of fruit that did enter my mouth were seasoned with sin. And now, O Lord my God, I ask You what it was in that theft that delighted me. It had no beauty: I do not mean beauty as in the beauty of justice or judiciousness, nor such beauty as is in the mind of man, in the memory, the senses, or blossoming life; nor as the stars are beautiful and splendid in the sky, nor as the earth and sea are filled with new life, through birth replacing what has died; not even the false beauty lurking in shadows that belongs to vice.

7. By the Roman historian Sallust (Catiline 16). Cataline was a Roman politician whose conspiracy against the state was foiled by the consul Cicero in 63 B.C.E.

[6. 13] This too is the way that pride imitates lofty elegance, whereas You alone are God, exalted above all. What does vanity seek but honors and glory, whereas You alone are to be honored and glorious in eternity. The cruelty of powerful men aims to be feared, but who is to be feared other than the one and only God? What can be seized or robbed of his power—when, where, how, or by whom? Tender caresses aim to spark love, yet nothing is more tender than Your love, nor is anything loved with more wholesomeness than Your truth, beautiful and bright above all. Curiosity poses as a desire for knowledge, whereas You Who are above all know all. Ignorance and foolishness hide behind the names of simplicity and innocence, but there is no greater simplicity than You, no greater innocence, for sinners are harmed by their own deeds. Idleness poses as a desire for calm, but what calm is there other than the Lord? Extravagance strives to be called abundance and plenty, but You are plenitude and the unfailing plenteousness of imperishable delight. Prodigality seeks to array itself in the glow of generosity, but it is You Who are the supremely abundant giver of all good. Greed seeks to possess much, but You possess all. Jealousy strives for excellence, but what is more excellent than You? Anger seeks revenge, but who avenges with greater justice than You? Fear recoils from things that are unaccustomed and unexpected, things that endanger what is beloved, and fear takes precautions for the safety of what it loves. But to You what is unaccustomed? What is unexpected? Who can take from You what You love? Where other than with You is enduring safety? Sadness pines for things lost in which cupidity delighted, insisting that nothing be taken from it, just as nothing can be taken from You.

[6. 14] Thus the soul that turns away from You fornicates, seeking outside You that which is clear and pure, but which it can only find when it returns to You. All those have erred who seek to imitate You perversely, having distanced themselves from You and extolling themselves in pride against You. But even by seeking to imitate You they admit that You are the creator of the entire universe and that it is not possible for them to distance themselves from You entirely. What then did I love in that theft, and how did I, albeit perversely and in error, imitate my Lord? Did I delight in breaking Your law at least furtively, as I lacked power, like a slave who steals with impunity, attaining a shadowy semblance of omnipotence? Behold the servant fleeing his Lord and seeking a shadow! O putridness! O monstrous life and chasm of death! Was I drawn to what was forbidden just because it was forbidden?

[Student at Carthage]

[1. 1] I came to Carthage<sup>8</sup> and was immersed in a seething cauldron of illicit loves. I had not yet loved but was burning to experience love, and, consumed by an inner craving, was vexed at myself for not craving more. In love with love, I sought an object of love, but shunned a path that had no snares. I was consumed by hunger, deprived of inner food, deprived of You, my God, and yet it was not for You that I hungered; I lacked all desire for incorruptible sustenance, not because I was sated by it, but the emptier I was the more I disdained it. And so my soul sickened, and, covered in pustules, gushed forth, wretchedly striving to be soothed by sensual objects. Yet if these objects had not had a soul they would not have been objects of love. To love and be loved was all the sweeter to me if I could delight in the body of the beloved. So I sullied the clear spring of friendship with the filth of carnality, dulling its brightness with infernal lust, and though I was base and vile, in my vanity I paraded myself as refined and urbane. So I flung myself into that love by which I so longed to be seized. My God, my Mercy! In Your goodness how much gall did You sprinkle on that sweetness! For I was loved, and secretly attained the fetters of delight, rejoicing in being enmeshed in the tangle of misery, to be scourged with the burning rods of jealousy, suspicion, fear, anger, and contention.

8. The provincial capital city (in modern-day Tunisia), where Augustine went to study rhetoric.

[2. 2] I was captivated by theatrical spectacles filled with images of my miseries, which poured fuel on my fire. Why is it that man wants to sorrow by watching distressing and tragic things that he would not want to endure? And yet he wants to endure this sorrow as a spectator, and this sorrow is his delight. What is this if not utter folly? Indeed, the more a man is moved by such suffering, the less free he is of it himself, for when one is suffering it is called misery, while when one feels sympathy for the suffering of others it is called compassion. But what sort of compassion is this for things that are feigned and staged? The spectator is not summoned to help but only to grieve, and the more he grieves the more he applauds the actor of these representations. But if the misfortunes, whether of ancient times or invented, are acted in such a way that the spectator does not grieve, he leaves the theater filled with disappointment and anger, but if he does grieve he delights in his tears.

[2. 3] Thus sorrows are also loved. But people want to enjoy themselves; no one likes to be miserable, even if he likes to commiserate: so do we love sorrows because commiserating cannot exist without misery?

[3. 6] My supposedly respectable studies<sup>9</sup> had the aim of achieving excellence in the courts of litigation, where the greater the deceit, the greater the praise. Such is the blindness of men that they glory in blindness. And I was the foremost pupil in the school of rhetoric. I was puffed up with pride and rejoiced in vanity, though I was more restrained by far than my fellow students, Lord, as You know, keeping my distance from the destructiveness of the Destroyers,<sup>1</sup> who sported this sinister and devilish name as a sign of urbanity. I lived among them shamelessly ashamed that I was not like them. I was with them, and at times enjoyed their friendship, though I always abhorred the deeds with which they shamelessly persecuted shy new students, attacking them and jeering at them for no reason, feeding their own malicious delight. Nothing resembles the actions of devils more than theirs, so what better name can there be for them than “the Destroyers,” destroyed and corrupted as they are by the deceitful spirits that secretly deride and waylay them with the same deeds with which they taunt and deceive others.

[4. 7] Its was among them, at my tender age, that I studied the books of eloquence by which I longed to distinguish myself, driven by delight in human vanity, a damnable and empty aim. In the course of my studies I had come upon a book by a certain Cicero, whose tongue<sup>2</sup> almost everyone admires, though not so much his heart. The book is called Hortensius,<sup>3</sup> and contains an exhortation to study philosophy. It altered my state of mind and my prayers, making them turn to You, Lord, changing my longings and desires. Suddenly every vanity became worthless, and with a fire raging in my heart I longed for the immortality of wisdom, rousing me to return to You. I did not immerse myself in this book to perfect my style, something I was pursuing in those days when I was nineteen with my mother's funds, as my father had died two years before. No, it was not to perfect my style, for it was not the book's style that swayed me but its words.

[5. 9] I was therefore determined to apply my mind to the Holy Scripture in order to see what it was, and what I saw was something not discernible by the proud, nor open to the young, its entrance modest but its inner halls exalted and veiled with mysteries. I was not one who was able to enter or to bow my head and proceed. I did not feel then when I approached the Scripture what I feel now, but it struck me as unworthy of comparison to the distinction of a Cicero. My strutting pride shunned the simplicity of the Scripture, my eye not keen enough to penetrate its interior. Yet the Scripture is such that it grows with those who are simple.<sup>4</sup> But I disdained the thought of being simple, and, swollen with pride, perceived myself as great.

[Augustine Leaves Carthage for Rome]

[8. 14] You led me so that I should be persuaded to go to Rome, to teach there what I was teaching in Carthage, and I will not omit confessing to You how I was persuaded to this, because in that, too, Your most profound recesses and Your mercy most present to us must be reflected on and confessed. I did not want to go to Rome simply because my friends urged me to, assuring me that in Rome I would garner greater profit and honor, though those things did influence my mind at the time. My main, and almost my only, reason was that I had heard that young men studied there more peaceably and were subjected to more rigorous discipline, not all rushing wildly into the class of a master whose pupils they were not; in Rome they were not even admitted into a class without a master's permission. In Carthage, on the other hand, there is an uncouth and unruly excess among pupils. They brazenly interrupt classes, and with crazed rowdiness bring turmoil to the order that the masters have established for the good of their students. With surprising foolishness they wreak mayhem that would be punishable by law if custom did not protect them, and they are the more wretched in that they do as lawful what will never be lawful by Your eternal law; and they believe that they are doing this with impunity, whereas they are punished with the blindness by which they do it, and suffer incomparably worse consequences than what they wreak. Such practices, which as a student I had refused to engage in, I had to endure in others as a teacher, and so I was happy to go to a place where those who knew assured me that such things were not done. But it was in truth You, my hope and my portion in the land of the living, who wanted me to change my earthly dwelling for the salvation of my soul, and in Carthage You goaded me so that I would tear myself away from it, and for Rome You placed before me enticements that would draw me there with the advice of Manichean friends who loved a dead life, doing mad things in this life, hoping for vain things in the next. To set my steps aright, You secretly used their and my perverseness; for those who disturbed my calm were blinded by a disgraceful frenzy, while those who summoned me away loved only this world. Yet I, who detested true misery here, sought false happiness there.

[8. 15] You knew, God, why I left Carthage and went to Rome, but You did not reveal the reason either to me or my mother, who bitterly lamented my leaving and followed me as far as the shore.<sup>5</sup> She clung to me in desperation, seeking either to keep me there or to come with me, but I deceived her, pretending that I had a friend I was seeing off with whom I had to wait until he had a good wind to sail. I lied to my mother—lied to such a mother—and so escaped. This too You have mercifully forgiven me, I who was filled with abhorrent foulness, preserving me from the waters of the sea for the waters of Your grace that would cleanse me<sup>6</sup> and dry my mother's streaming eyes, with which she daily watered before You the ground on which she stood. But she refused to return home without me, and I barely managed to persuade her to stay that night in a place near our ship where there was a sanctuary in memory of the blessed Saint Cyprian.<sup>7</sup> But that night I secretly departed without her as she remained behind, weeping and praying. What was she asking of You with so many tears, my God, but that You would not let me sail? Yet You, in Your high mindfulness, hearing the core of her desire, did not heed what she was asking, so that You could make out of me exactly what she had always asked. The wind blew and swelled our sails and the shore receded from our sight, and on the following morning my mother came there raving with sorrow, filling Your ears with complaints and lamentations to which You paid no heed, while You allowed me to be transported by my desires in order to extinguish those desires, and my mother's earthly longing for me was rightly chastened by the scourge of sorrow. For she loved my being with her, as mothers do, though much more than many others, and she did not know what great joy You were preparing for her by my absence. She did not know, which is why she wept and sobbed, and through these torments she manifested the inheritance of Eve, seeking as she did with pain what with pain she had brought forth. And yet, after accusing me of deception and cruelty, she again turned to interceding for me with You, and went back home while I went on to Rome.

Strong in her piety, my mother had now come to me, following me over sea and land, confident in You in every danger she faced, and even on the perilous sea she comforted the sailors, who are more used to reassuring frightened passengers unaccustomed to the sea. She promised them a safe arrival, for You had assured her of this in a vision. She found me in great peril and in despair that I would ever find truth, though when I revealed to her that I was no longer a Manichean<sup>8</sup> though not yet a true Christian, she did not leap with joy as if my words were unexpected. But she was now reassured concerning that part of my misery for which she had wept over me as one dead, though to be reawakened by You, and on a bier of her thoughts she offered me to You that You might say to the son of this widow, "Young man, I say to you, arise!"<sup>9</sup> And her son would come to life again and begin to speak, and You would deliver him to his mother.

[13. 23] I was continually being urged to take a wife. I made a proposal and it was accepted, largely through my mother's efforts, for she hoped that once I was married baptism with its salvation would cleanse me,<sup>1</sup> and she was delighted that I was more receptive with every day, and she saw that her prayers and Your promises were being fulfilled in my faith. At my bidding and through her longing she begged of You every day, with cries from her heart, that You reveal to her in a vision something about my future marriage, but You never did. What she saw were empty and fantastic visions fueled by the passion of the human spirit striving for answers; she told me about these visions, discounting them, as she did not have the same confidence in them that she had when it was You Who sent them. For she said that she could discern by some

The Manicheans believed that the world was a battleground for the forces of good and evil; redemption in a future life would come to the elect, who renounced worldly occupations and possessions and practiced a severe asceticism (including abstention from meat). strange sensation, which she could not explain in words, the difference between Your revelations and the dreams of her own soul. Nevertheless, the pressure on me to marry continued and a maiden was asked for in marriage; she was two years under marriageable age, but as she was thought suitable all were prepared to wait.<sup>2</sup>

[14. 24] We were a group of several friends who detested the turbulence and trouble of life, and we discussed and debated and had almost resolved to live in contemplation far removed from the bustling crowd, and this was how we intended to attain such a life: we would bring together whatever each of us was able to contribute, and from that create a single household, so that in our true friendship nothing would belong only to one person or another but would be a single possession gathered from all, and as a whole would belong to each, and all to all. We concluded that we could bring some ten men into this fellowship, some of whom were very wealthy, especially our townsman Romanianus, whom the burdensome tangle of his affairs had brought to the courts, and who from childhood had been a close friend of mine. He was the most zealous advocate of this plan, and his voice was of great weight because his wealth far exceeded that of any of us. We had also decided that two of us would be elected every year, the way magistrates are, to attend to everything, the rest of the group remaining free from such cares. But when we began to give thought as to whether wives, which some of us already had and others were hoping to attain, would agree to what we were planning with such care, it fell to pieces in our hands, and, our plans crushed, we cast them aside. And so we returned to our sighs and laments, our steps following the broad and well-trodden paths of the world,<sup>3</sup> for many thoughts were in our hearts, but Your counsel abides in all eternity. And yet through that counsel You laughed at our designs and prepared Your own to grant us nourishment in due season and fill our souls with blessing.

[15. 25] In the meantime my sins were multiplying, and when the woman with whom I shared my bed was torn from my side for being an impediment to my marriage,<sup>4</sup> my heart that clung to her was rent and bled. She returned to Africa, vowing before You never to know any other man, leaving with me the natural son I had had by her. But wretch that I was, I could not follow that woman's example. Impatient at the delay of my marriage, since it would be two years before I could have what I wanted, I procured for myself another woman, though not a wife; for I was not a lover of marriage but a slave to lust, so that the sickness of my soul was sustained and prolonged, remaining intact, even heightened, so that my habit could be guarded and tended until I reached the state of matrimony. Nor had the wound made by the parting with my former lover healed, but after inflammation and piercing pain it festered, and though the pain dulled, it also became more desperate.

[Conversion]

[11. 25] This was how ill and tormented I was, accusing myself more bitterly than ever, twisting and wrenching to break free of my chains that were easing but still held me fast. And You, Lord, penetrated my hidden depths with severe mercy, redoubling the lashes of fear<sup>5</sup> and shame lest I should succumb and not break the last frail fetters that remained, allowing them to grow strong once more and bind me all the tighter. And I said to myself deep inside, “Act now, the time to act is now.” In my words I was already resolved. I almost acted, but did not; however, I did not fall back into my former state, but kept close and recovered my breath. I tried once more and came even closer, and closer, I could almost touch it, almost take hold of it, yet I could not reach it, neither touching nor taking hold of it, hesitating to die to death and to live to life. Greater was the sway of the evil to which I was accustomed than the goodness to which I was unaccustomed, and the more the moment neared in which I was to become another man, the more I was struck by horror; yet horror did not strike a decisive blow, nor did it turn me away, but held me suspended.

[11. 26] I was being held in check by vain trifles and trifling vanities, my longstanding paramours tearing at my garment of flesh and whispering: “Will you send us away? From that moment on we shall never again be with you. From that moment on you will never again be allowed this and that.” And what they meant by “this and that”! What were they suggesting, my God! Let Your mercy repulse it from Your servant’s soul! What filth they were proposing, what infamy! Now I less than half heard them, and they did not dare come out to contradict me openly but muttered as if behind my back, plucking at me almost furtively so I would turn and look; but they managed to hold me back and delay me from tearing myself away and shaking myself free from them, and making the leap to where I was being summoned, while the force of my habits called out to me, “Do you think you can bear being without them?”

[11. 27] But the force of my habit said this now quite faintly, for in the direction to which I had turned my face and to which I feared to go, Continen<sup>6</sup> had now appeared before me, chaste and dignified, serene, cheerful though without allurements, beckoning me with sincerity to come and not to doubt, her holy hands reaching out to receive and embrace me with a profusion of honest examples: so many youths and maidens, so many people of every age, sober widows and aged virgins, and among them stood Continen<sup>6</sup> herself, not barren but a fertile mother of children, with joys granted her by You, Lord, her Husband. And she smiled, both teasing and encouraging me, as if she were saying: “Can you not do what these youths and maidens can? Do you think they managed on their own without the help of the Lord their God? The Lord their God gave me to them. Why do you persist on your own where you cannot persist? Cast yourself upon Him, do not be afraid. He will not withdraw and let you fall. Cast yourself upon Him without fear—He will receive and will heal you.” I truly blushed, for I was also still listening to the whisperings of frivolity, and so lingered and delayed, and again it was as if Continen<sup>6</sup> were saying: "Shut your ears to your impure limbs that are upon the earth, so that they will be mortified. They speak to you of delights, but not as does the law of the Lord your God." This dispute within my heart was merely myself battling myself, and Alypius,<sup>7</sup> who was at my side, waited in silence for the end of my unusual agitation.

[12. 28] From hidden depths a profound introspection had gathered together and amassed all my misery before my heart's eye, and now a violent tempest arose within me, bringing a mighty shower of tears, and I got up and hastened away from Alypius so that my storm could gush forth with all its sounds and voices. Solitude seemed to me more fit for weeping, and I moved far enough away from him so that his presence would not burden me. That was the state I was in, and Alypius sensed it, for as I got up I think I said something in which my voice was choked with tears. Confounded, Alypius remained where we had sat. I collapsed beneath a fig tree, I do not remember how, and let my tears flow, streams pouring from my eyes, an acceptable sacrifice to You, and I said many things to You, not in these exact words, but to this purpose: "But You, O Lord, for how long? For how long, Lord? Will You be angry forever? Remember not our former iniquities."<sup>8</sup> For I felt that these iniquities were holding me in their grip. I uttered these wretched words: "How long, how long? Ever tomorrow and tomorrow? Why not right away? Why cannot my baseness come to an end this instant?"

[12. 29] I was speaking and weeping in the most bitter contrition of my heart, when I suddenly heard from a nearby house a voice—that of a boy or a girl, I could not tell—repeating in a singsong, "Pick up and read, pick up and read." That instant, my countenance changed and I began to wonder intently whether there could be some kind of game in which children sang such words, but I could not remember there being such a game. I checked the torrent of my tears and rose, concluding that these words were clearly a divine command that I open the Book and read the first line I found. I had heard how Saint Anthony<sup>9</sup> had come upon a reading of the Gospel and had understood the words he heard being read out as an admonition, as if they were being spoken to him: "Go, sell all you have and give it to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me."<sup>1</sup> With these divine words he was immediately converted to You. So I hastened back to the place where Alypius was sitting, for it was there that I had laid down the volume of the Apostle<sup>2</sup> when I had arisen. I seized it, opened it, and in silence read the verse upon which my eyes first fell: "Not in revelry and drunkenness, not in lewdness and lust, not in strife and envy. But put on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh in its concupiscences." I neither wished nor needed to read further. Instantly, at the end of these lines, it was as if a light of serenity was pouring into my heart, and all the darkness of uncertainty dispersed.

[12. 30] I shut the Book, putting my finger or some other mark between the pages, and with a calm countenance told Alypius what had happened. But he also apprised me of the change within him, of which I had not been aware. He asked to see what verse I had read. I showed it to him and he read it, and read further than I had; I did not know the verse that followed. What followed was, “Receive one who is weak in the faith,” and Alypius told me that he was applying this to himself. This admonition gave him strength in his pious resolution and purpose, which truly corresponded to his character, in which he had always very much differed from me for the better, and without turbulent hesitation he joined me. We go inside to my mother, we tell her, she rejoices; we recount how it had come to pass; she exults, jubilates, and praises You Who are able to do beyond that which we desire or understand. She saw that You had granted her far more for me than she had begged for in her sad and tear-filled laments to You, for You had converted me to you so that I now sought neither a wife nor any ambition of this world, and stood firm upon that rule of faith as You had shown me to my mother in a dream so many years before.<sup>3</sup> And You converted her mourning into joy even more abundantly than she had hoped, and in a way that was much more precious and pure than she had sought in having grandchildren of my flesh.

[Death of His Mother]

[8. 17] We were together, and were resolved to dwell together in our holy cause. In seeking a place where we could serve You to the best purpose, we all decided to return to Africa. We had just reached Ostia,<sup>4</sup> by the mouth of the Tiber, when my mother died. I have passed over so much, as I have written in haste—receive my avowals and my gratitude, my God, for the countless things about which I have been silent—but I will not pass over all that my mind can bring forth concerning Your handmaid who brought me forth, both in the flesh so that I might be born into this temporal light, and in the soul so that I might be born to eternal light. I will not speak of her gifts, but of Your gifts to her, for neither did she create nor raise herself. It was You Who created her; nor did her father and mother know who it was that had been born to them, and it was the rod and the staff of Your Christ that had reared her in holy fear—the discipline of Your only Son—in her father’s Christian household at the hand of a certain virtuous member of Your Church. She commended her mother’s attentiveness for the devout training she received, but commended even more the training she received from a very old servant, who had carried her father on her back when he had been a child, in the way that children used to be carried by girls who were a little older. For this reason, and because of the servant's great age and excellent morals, she was greatly respected by the masters of that Christian household, which also accounted for the daughters of the house being left in her care. This task she undertook with great diligence, disciplining the girls with ardent and holy severity when it was necessary, and training them with profound attention. For example, beyond the hours in which they were fed with great moderation at their parents' table, though they might be burning with thirst she would not allow them to drink even water, thus forestalling an evil habit and adding these wise words: "You want to drink water now because you do not have recourse to wine, but when you come to be married and are made mistresses of your own pantries and cellars, you will dislike water, but still your habit of drinking it will remain." By this kind of instruction and the authority with which she commanded, she restrained the gluttony of tender years, and tempered the very thirst of the girls to such excellent moderation that they did not strive for anything that was not seemly.

[8. 18] And yet my mother's love for wine, as she, Your handmaid, confided in me her son, her love for wine had crept up on her, for when her parents, believing her to be a temperate girl, sent her to draw wine out of the barrel, she would hold the bowl under the spigot and, before pouring the wine into the pitcher, would take a little sip with pursed lips, for more than a sip she found repellent. And yet she had not done this out of a passion for drink but out of the ebullience of youth, in which the kind of playful impulses boil over that are usually kept in check by the authority of elders. But by always adding a little more to that daily sip—for one who despises small things will fall little by little—she had fallen into the habit of drinking entire cups of unmixed<sup>5</sup> wine. Where then was that watchful old woman with her strict restraint? But there would have been no remedy against this hidden disease if Your healing, Lord, did not preside over us. When father, mother, and nurses are away, You are present, You Who created us, who call us, who through those placed above us induce the salvation of our souls. What did You do then, my God? How did You cure her? How did You heal her? Did You not bring forth from the soul of another a sharp reproach, like a surgeon's knife from Your secret store, and with a single slash remove all the festering putrescence? A servant with whom she used to go to the barrel happened to quarrel with her little mistress when they were alone, deriding her for her deeds with bitter insult, calling her a drunken sot. The insult stung the little girl to the quick, and she reflected on the shameful thing she had done, instantly condemning and abandoning her habit. Just as flattering friends lead to ruin, so accusing enemies often lead to reform. Yet it is not for what You do through people that You reward them, but for what people do of their own volition. The servant in her anger had sought to hurt her young mistress, not to mend her ways, and she spoke her words in secret, either in the heat of quarrel or because she might be called to account for not having said anything earlier. But You, Lord, Ruler of heaven and earth, turn to Your purposes the course of the deepest torrents, and order the turbulence of the tide of time. Through the affliction of one soul You gave health to another, and all who hear this must realize that they must not attribute a person's reform to their own powers, when someone whom they wish to reform is reformed through words they have spoken.

5. I.e., unmixed with water.

[9. 19] So my mother was brought up in modesty and sobriety, and she was made obedient by You to her parents rather than being made obedient by her parents to You, so that as soon as she was of full age to be a bride she was bestowed upon a man whom she served as her lord. And she did everything in her power to win this man over to You, speaking to him of You through the qualities by which You had made her beautiful, filling her husband with respect and love for her as well as admiration. She tolerated his infidelity so that there would never be any animosity between them, for she was awaiting Your mercy upon him, that in believing in You he might become chaste. Furthermore, he was as exceptionally kind as he was hot-tempered, but she had learned not to cross an angry husband in word or deed. It was only when his temper had settled, and he was calm and approachable, that she would explain her actions if he had happened to be too quick to flare up in anger. Many other wives who had gentler husbands bore shameful marks of beatings on their faces, and among their friends would blame their husbands' ways. But she would blame the women's tongues, giving the women as if in jest the solemn advice that the instant they had heard the marriage contract read out to them, they should have recognized that they were now slaves, and, remembering their station, it would have been more fitting for them not to take on airs before their lords. When her friends found out what a violent husband she had, they were amazed that nobody had ever heard of Patricius<sup>6</sup> raising his hand to her or that she never bore the marks of a beating, and that there had never been discord among them even for a day. Asked how this could be, she told her friends her custom of responding to her husband's ire which I have mentioned above. The women who followed her example were to thank her, while those who did not suffered and remained oppressed.

[9. 20] Her mother-in-law had initially been incited against her by the insinuations of malicious servants, but was assuaged by the young wife's gentle, yielding manner and her steadfast forbearance, so that she herself revealed to her son that meddling tongues had disrupted the peace in the home, causing trouble between her and her daughter-in-law, and she insisted that he punish the wrongdoers. Patricius respected his mother's wish, ensuring that discipline and peace returned to his home, and he had the maids whipped as his mother had asked, and she promised the same payment to any servant seeking to ingratiate herself by saying evil things about her daughter-in-law. As no servant now dared speak ill of her, they all lived pleasantly and amicably together.

[9. 21] To this good handmaid of Yours in whose womb You created me, my God, my Mercy, You granted her another great gift, that of being a peacemaker to quarreling people whenever she could. When she heard bitter words bursting forth from both sides in bilious anger, when a friend spewed out acrid rage against an absent enemy, she would only reveal to either one whatever words might lead to their reconciliation. I might have considered this a minor gift had I not had the painful experience of encountering so many people, who by some horrendous and rampant pestilence of sin not only disclose to an irate person what their irate enemy said about them, but add things that were never said, whereas it ought to be clear to any humane person that he must not incite hostility between people through hostile words, if he cannot bring himself to use benign words to extinguish the hostility. That was how she was, for You had been the inner Teacher in the school of her heart.

[9. 22] Finally, toward the very end of her husband's life on earth, she converted him to You, and once he was a believer he no longer gave her cause to lament what she had had to bear before he had become a believer. She was also the servant of Your servants, of whom all who knew her greatly praised and honored and loved You in her; they felt Your presence in her heart, which was attested by the fruits of her devout comportment, for she had been the wife of one man, had honored her debt to her parents and run her house piously, had testimony for her good works, and she had brought up children, of whom she labored as if in birth whenever she saw them straying from You.<sup>7</sup> Lastly she took care of all of us,<sup>8</sup> Your servants, Lord, for Your gift allows me to speak on behalf of us all, who, before she closed her eyes in sleep, all lived united in You since we had received the grace of Your baptism. She cared for us as though she had given birth to us all, yet served us as though she had been the daughter of every one of us.

[10. 23] With the day looming on which she was to depart this life, a day that You knew but we did not, Your hidden ways arranged that she and I would stand alone gazing out of a window that overlooked the garden of the house in which we were staying in Ostia, by the mouth of the Tiber. In this house, far from all the noise and commotion, we were recuperating from the exertions of our long journey before we set sail across the sea. She and I were talking alone, in sweet conversation, forgetting the past and reaching out for what lay ahead, she and I wondering in the presence of the Truth, which You are, what the eternal life of saints would be like, which neither eye has seen nor ear has heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man. The mouth of our hearts opened wide to drink in those celestial streams of Your fountain, the fountain of life, which is with You, so that fortified to the extent that we could be, we might to some degree contemplate such a profound matter.

[10. 24] And when in our conversation we reached the conclusion that the greatest delight of the bodily senses, the greatest corporeal light, is not worthy of comparison to the sweetness of the eternal life of saints, not worthy even of mention, we were lifted with a greater glowing love toward God, the Selfsame.<sup>9</sup> We rose by degrees past everything corporeal to the very heaven where sun and moon and stars shine upon the earth, and ascended even higher with our thoughts and words, with our marveling at Your works, reaching these in our minds and transcending them, coming to that region of unceasing plenty where You feed Israel in eternity with the food of truth,<sup>1</sup> where life is the Wisdom through which all these things are made, all things that have been and shall be. But Wisdom is not made: Wisdom is as it has been and ever shall be. For there is no was or will be in Wisdom, only being, as Wisdom is eternal. For was and will be are not eternal. While we were discussing and longing for Wisdom, we touched it lightly with the most ardent effort of our hearts, and we sighed and left behind us the first-fruits of the Spirit, returning to the mere sounds of our mouths, where words have a beginning and an end, and how can these words be compared to Your Word, our Lord, who remains in Himself without age and renews all things?

[10. 25] So we said: "If the commotion of the flesh were to fall silent in a man, silent the images of the earth and the waters and the air, and silent the heavens, and the soul were silent to itself and by not thinking of itself would surpass itself, if all dreams and imaginary revelations were silent, and silent every tongue and every sign and all that exists only transiently, since if anyone could hear these things then this is what they all would say: 'We did not make ourselves, but He who abides in eternity made us.' If having said this they fell silent, having led us to open our ears to Him who made these things, and He alone would speak through Himself and not through them so that we would hear His Word not through a tongue of flesh, nor through an Angel's voice, nor through the thundering sound from the clouds, nor through an obscure enigma,<sup>2</sup> but we might hear Him whom in these things we love, hear Him without these things, just as we now reached out and in swift thought touched the Wisdom that abides over all things in eternity. If this could continue, and other visions that were far inferior could be withdrawn, and could this vision ravish and absorb and envelop its beholder in inward joys, so that eternal life would be like that one moment of understanding for which we longed, then would this not mean: 'Enter into the joy of your Lord'? And when would that be? When we shall all rise again, though we shall not all be changed?"<sup>3</sup>

[10. 26] Such were the things that I was saying, and even if not exactly in this way or with those words, yet, Lord, You know that it was on that day when we were speaking, and, as she and I spoke, this world with all its delights became contemptible to us, and she said, "My son, as for me, I no longer delight in anything in this life anymore. I do not know what I am still doing here, or why I am here now, since my hopes in this world have all expired. The one thing for which I wanted to linger a while longer in this life was that I might see you a true Christian before I died, but my God has granted my wish in greater abundance than I had sought, for I now see that you despise earthly happiness and have become His servant. What am I doing here?"

[11. 27] I do not remember what I answered, but within five days, not much more, she fell sick of a fever, and one day in her illness she fainted and for a moment lost consciousness. We rushed to her side, but she was soon revived, and seeing me and my brother near her, asked, "Where was I?" And then, looking straight at us as we stood there stunned with grief, she said, "It is here that you will bury your mother." I remained silent, refraining from tears, but my brother spoke, saying he would be happier if she did not die in a strange land but in her own. Hearing his words she looked at him anxiously, her eyes admonishing him because such things were still important to him, and then looking at me said, “Do you hear what your brother says?” and turning to us both, “Bury this body anywhere, and do not worry about such trifles. The only thing I ask of you is that wherever you may be, you will remember me at the Lord’s altar.” And having expressed her feeling in such words as she could still utter, she fell silent, overwhelmed by her growing illness.

[11. 28] But as I thought of Your gifts, O invisible God, which You plant in the hearts of those faithful to You and from which wondrous fruits spring, I rejoiced and gave thanks to You, recalling the worry that had burned within her about arranging and preparing a tomb next to her husband’s body. Since they had lived together in great harmony, she had also wished to have this addition to that happiness and to have this commemorated among men—so slightly is the human mind able to embrace divine things—wishing that after her pilgrimage beyond the sea the same earth should cover her and her husband’s earthly remains. I did not know when, through the wealth of Your goodness, these empty trifles had begun to subside in her heart, but I rejoiced, surprised at what she had divulged to me, even if in our conversation by the window, when she had said, “I do not know what I am still doing here,” she no longer appeared to desire to die in her own country. I was to hear later, too, that while we were at Ostia she had one day, when I was absent, spoken with a mother’s confidence to some of my friends about her contempt for this life and the goodness of death. Amazed at the courage You had given to a woman, they had asked whether she was not afraid to leave her body so far from her own city, to which she replied: “Nothing is far away from God, nor is it to be feared that at the ends of the earth He would not know from where He should resurrect me.” Then on the ninth day of her illness, in the fifty-sixth year of her life and the thirty-third of mine, that pious and religious soul was freed from her body.

[12. 29] I closed her eyes, and pouring into my heart was a vast sorrow that overflowed into tears, though my eyes, under the strict command of my mind, redrank the fountain dry, the struggle causing great strife within me. At her last breath my son Adeodatus<sup>4</sup> broke into laments, but, checked by us all, fell silent. In the same way, the child within me strove toward weeping but was checked and silenced by the voice of my heart, for we did not think it was fitting to celebrate the funeral with tearful cries and lamentations, as in this way so many people lament the misery of the state of death, or death as complete eradication, whereas she was neither unhappy in her death, nor entirely dead: of this we were certain because of the evidence of the life she had led and her unfeigned faith.

[12. 30] What was it that was hurting me so grievously within if not the fresh wound caused by the sudden shattering of the sweetest and most beloved custom of our life together? I was delighted with her words when, in her final illness, she countered my attentions with endearments and said that I was an affectionate son, avowing with great emotion and love that she had never heard from my mouth a single harsh or reproachful word against her. And yet, my God Who has made us, what comparison could there be between the esteem I showed her and her selfless servitude to me? My soul was wounded, losing such a great solace in her. It was as if my life was torn in two, since her life and mine had been as one.

[12. 31] My son having been stopped from weeping, Euodius took up the Psalter and began to chant, our whole household answering him: “I will sing of mercy and justice to You, O Lord.”<sup>5</sup> The news spread and many brethren and religious women gathered, and while those whose office it was began to prepare the burial, I withdrew to another part of the house where, with friends who deemed I should not be left alone, I could aptly speak about matters suitable to the moment. The balm of truth soothed my torment that was known to You but unknown to them, and they listened to me intently, supposing that I felt no sorrow. But in Your ears, where none of them could hear, I blamed the weakness of my feelings and restrained my flow of grief, which for a while ceded to my will; yet its force overcame me once more, though not as tears bursting forth or my countenance changing. But I knew what I was suppressing within my heart. I was extremely unhappy with myself that these human matters, which in the due order and lot of our condition inevitably fall to us, could have such power over me and with new grief I grieved over my grief, and so was consumed by a double sorrow.

[12. 32] When her body was carried out for burial, we went and returned without tears. I did not weep during the prayers we poured forth to You when the sacrifice of our redemption<sup>6</sup> was offered for her, nor during the prayers when her body was placed beside the tomb before being interred, as is the custom; but the entire day I was profoundly sad within, and with troubled mind prayed to You as best I could that You would heal my sorrow, though You did not, impressing by this lesson upon my memory, I believe, the strength of the chains of habit upon the mind, even when it does not feed on deceit. It seemed also good to me to go and bathe, having heard that the Latin word for bath, balneum, had its name from the Greek balaneion,<sup>7</sup> casting anguish from the mind. This too I avow to Your mercy, Father of orphans, that I bathed and was the same as I had been before I bathed, for the bitterness of sorrow did not exude from my heart. Then I slept, woke up, but found that my grief had not softened at all. Alone as I lay in my bed, I remembered those true verses of Your Ambrose,<sup>8</sup> for You are

God, Creator of all things, Ruler of Heaven who vests
The day with beauteous light
The night with reposing sleep
Loosening man’s limbs in rest Restoring them, refreshed for labor Relieving the minds of the wearied Untangling the sorrows of the distressed.

[12. 33] Then gradually I returned to my former thoughts of Your handmaid, remembering her pious attachment to You and the holy helpfulness and

and ania (“sorrow”).

tenderness to us of which I was suddenly deprived: and I wanted to weep in Your sight for her and on her account, for myself and on my account. And I released the tears I had restrained, letting them pour forth, strewing them out so that my heart could rest in them, and my heart found repose for it was in Your ears, not in those of man who would have eyed my tears with scorn. And now, Lord, I confess this to You in writing: let him read it who will and interpret it how he may, and if he finds it to be sinful that I wept for my mother for a few minutes, the mother who was now dead to my eyes and who for many years had wept for me that I might live in Your eyes, let him not scorn me, but rather if he is a man of great love, let him weep for my sins before You, the Father of all the brethren of Your Christ.

[13. 34] Now, my heart healed of that wound in which I could be blamed of a fleshly state of mind, before You, our God, I shed very different tears for Your maidservant, tears flowing from a spirit shaken by the thoughts of the danger every soul that dies in Adam faces,<sup>9</sup> though she had been made alive in Christ even before she was released from the flesh; for she had lived so that Your name would be praised in her faith and the life she led. But I do not dare claim that from the moment You regenerated her through baptism no word against Your precepts issued from her mouth. Your Son, the Truth, has said, "Whoever shall say to his brother 'you fool' shall be in danger of the fire of Gehenna."<sup>1</sup> And woe even to commendable lives of men, if You should examine their lives casting mercy aside. But because You do not fiercely scrutinize our sins, we hope with confidence to find some place with You. But whoever enumerates his real merits to You is merely enumerating Your gifts. If only men would know themselves to be but men, and that he who glories would glory in the Lord.

[13. 35] Therefore, God of my heart, my Praise and my Life, laying aside for a while my mother's good deeds for which I give thanks to You with joy, I now beseech You for her sins. Hear me by the Healer of our wounds<sup>2</sup> Who hung upon the cross and sits at Your right hand interceding with You on our behalf! I know that she always acted with compassion, and from her heart forgave her debtors their debts. Forgive her debts too, Lord, if she contracted any in the many years since she received the water of salvation. Forgive, Lord, forgive, I beseech You, and enter not into judgment with her. May mercy exalt above justice, since Your words are true and You have promised mercy to the merciful. That the merciful be so was Your gift to them, You Who will have mercy on whom You will have mercy and will have compassion on whom You have compassion.

[13. 36] And I believe that You have already done what I am begging of You, but accept, Lord, the willing offerings of my mouth, for as the day of her release was imminent she gave no thought to having her body sumptuously wrapped or embalmed with perfumes, nor did she ask for an excellent monument or seek to be buried in her native land. She did not enjoin us to do these things, but asked only to be remembered at Your Altar at which she had served without missing a single day, for she knew that it is there that the holy sacrifice is dispensed through which the handwriting of the decree against us is blotted out.<sup>3</sup> It is there that the enemy summing up our sins and seeking with what to charge us is vanquished, finding nothing in Him in Whom we are victors. Who will restore to Him His innocent blood? Who will repay Him the price with which He bought us and so take us from Him? To the Sacrament of this price Your handmaid bound her soul by the bond of faith. Let none sever her from Your protection. Let neither the lion nor the dragon<sup>4</sup> interpose themselves by force or trickery. She will reply that she owes nothing, lest she be refuted and seized by the wily accuser. She will reply that her debts have been forgiven her by Him to Whom none can repay the price that He, Who owed nothing, paid for us.

[13. 37] So may she rest in peace with the husband before and after whom she had no other, whom she served bringing forth with patience fruit unto You, that she might also gain him for You. Inspire, my Lord, my God, inspire Your servants my brethren, Your sons my masters, whom I serve with voice and heart and pen, that all who read this may at Your altar remember Monnica Your maidservant, with Patricius who was once her husband, by whose flesh You brought me into this life, how I do not know.<sup>5</sup> May they all remember with pious affection those who were my parents in this transient light and all my brethren under You our Father in our mother the Christian Church, and my fellow-citizens in that eternal Jerusalem<sup>6</sup> for which Your wandering people are yearning from their exodus to their return. This way my mother's last request of me will, through my confessions, be far more abundantly fulfilled by the prayers of many, than by my prayers alone.

FROM BOOK XI

[Time]

[14. 17] Hence there was no time when you had not made something, because You had made time itself. And no times are coeternal with You, because You abide, but if they were to abide they would not be times. For what is time? Who can explain this simply and in a few words? Who can comprehend it in thought so as to express it in words? And yet, when we converse, do we ever speak of anything with greater familiarity than of time? And we know what time is when we speak of it, just as we do when we hear another speak of it. So what is time? If no one asks me this, then I know; but if I am forced to explain it to someone who asks, then I do not know, though I will boldly maintain that I do know: that if nothing passed there would be no past time, and if nothing were to come then there would be no future, and if nothing is, then there would be no present time. So how do those two times—the past and the future—exist if the past does not exist now and the future does not yet exist? As for the present, if it were always present and never passed into the past, it would be not time, but eternity. Thus if the present, in order to be time, only comes into being because it passes into the past, how can we maintain that it exists if the aim of its being is that it will not be. Can we in truth maintain that time exists because its aim is not to exist?

[18. 23] Permit me, my Lord and my Hope, to seek further. Let not my quest be confounded. For if past and future things exist I want to know where they are, which if I am still unable to know, at least I know that wherever they are, they are not there as future or past, but as present; for if they are also there as future, they are not yet there, and if they are also there as past, they are no longer there. Thus wherever and whatever they are, they only exist as present. When true things are recounted from the past, it is not the past things themselves that are brought forth from the memory, but words generated from their images that, as they passed through the senses, were fixed as imprints in the mind. Hence my childhood, which now no longer exists, is in the past that now no longer exists: but as I recall and recount its image, I behold it in the present because it still exists in my memory. Whether there is a similar process in foretelling things of the future, if one can preview the images of things that do not yet exist, I confess, my God, I do not know. What I do know is that we often first think our future actions through, and that this thinking through is present, but the action we are thinking through does not yet exist because it is a future action. It is only once we have embarked on this action, and have begun to do what we were thinking through, that this action exists, because then it is no longer future, but present.

[18. 24] Whatever the nature of this mysterious sensing of future things, nothing can be seen that does not exist. But what now exists is not future, but present. Thus when things of the future are said to be seen, it is not the actual things that are seen, which do not yet exist—that is, which are future—but perhaps what is seen is their causes or signs that already exist. Hence these things are not future but are present to those who see the things from which the future, being generated in the mind, is foretold. Such generated things already exist, and those who foretell the future behold them as present before them. Let me take one example from a great number of examples: I see daybreak and predict the rising of the sun. What I see is present, what I foresee is future—not the sun being future, as it already exists, but its rising, which has not yet occurred. If I could not imagine in my mind the rising itself, as I do now in speaking of it, I would not be able to foretell it. Yet the daybreak that I see in the sky is not the sunrise, though it precedes it, just as the imagining of it in my mind is not the sunrise either. Both of these are discerned as present, so that the future sunrise can be foretold. Hence future things do not yet exist, and if they do not yet exist, they do not exist and cannot be seen. But they can be foretold from things that are present, which do exist and so can be seen.

[20. 26] What is now clear and plain is that neither future things nor things of the past exist, nor can one rightly say, “There are three times: past, present, and future,” though one might rightly say, “There are three times: a present of things past, a present of things present, and a present of things future.” These three do in some way exist in the mind, for I do not see them anywhere else: The present of things past is memory, the present of things present is what I am seeing, and the present of things future is expectation. If I can express myself in these terms, I see three times, and I acknowledge that there are three. But we can actually say, “There are three times: past, present, and future.” It is wrong, but that is how we say it. I do not take offense or find fault with what is said in this way if it is understood to mean that neither the future nor the past are present now. There is so little that we name correctly—most things we do not—but we do manage to impart what we mean.

* * *

[26. 33] Does not my soul confess to You in all truth that I measure time? Is it, my God, that I am measuring and do not know what I am measuring? If I am measuring the movement of a body in time, am I not measuring time itself? Would I be able to measure the movement of a body, the duration of the movement, and how long it takes to move from one place to another, without measuring the time in which it moves? So how do I measure time itself? Do we use a shorter time to measure a longer time, the way we measure the length of a crossbar in cubits? We also tend to use the length of a short syllable to measure the length of a long syllable, calling it twice as long. We measure the length of poems by the length of the lines, and the length of the lines by the length of the feet, and the length of the feet by the length of the syllables, and the length of long syllables by the length of short. We do not measure the poem by its pages, for that way we would be measuring space, not time, but once we have declaimed the poem’s words and they pass on, we say, “It is a long poem, because it is made up of so many lines; the lines are long, because they are made up of so many feet; they are long feet, since they stretch over so many syllables; it is a long syllable because it is twice as long as the syllable that is short.” But even in this way we cannot determine a precise measurement of time, because it could be that a shorter line is spoken with more gravity and so takes up more time than a longer line declaimed with urgency. The same is true for a poem, a foot, a syllable. This has led me to believe that time is simply a distention, but of what I do not know, though it would be surprising if it were not of the mind itself. For I beseech You, my God, what is it that I am measuring, when I say either indefinitely, “This time is longer than that time,” or definitely “This time is twice that”? I know that I measure time, but I do not measure the future, because it does not yet exist, nor do I measure the present, because it does not extend over any expanse, nor do I measure the past, because it no longer exists. So what is it that I am measuring? Perhaps the passing times, not those that have passed? This is what I have said before.

[31. 41] Lord my God, how deep are the recesses of Your mysteries, and how far from them have I been cast by the consequences of my errors! Heal my eyes so that with Your Light I can rejoice! If a mind existed that was graced with such great knowledge and prescience so as to know all things past and future, the way I know a well-known hymn, that mind would be most miraculous and awe-inspiring, for nothing that has taken place and nothing that is to come in future ages would elude this mind, just as when I sing that hymn it would not elude me how much of it had passed since I had begun singing, and what and how much of the hymn still remained. But far be it that You, the Creator of the universe, the Creator of minds and bodies, far be it that You should know all things future and past in that way: You know them far more wonderfully and mysteriously. Someone who sings or hears a hymn he knows will feel his perception change and expand as he anticipates the words to come and remembers the words that have past. But this is not so with You Who are unchangeably eternal, the eternal Creator of minds. Just as You knew in the Beginning the heaven and the earth without any change of Your knowledge, so You made in the Beginning the heaven and the earth without Your action expanding. Let him who understands confess to You, and let him who does not understand confess to You. How exalted You are and yet You dwell in those who are humble in heart! You raise up all who are cast down, and those whose sublimity you are do not fall.

THE QUR'AN

---

The word qur'an literally means “the recitation.” For Muslims, the Qur'an is not so much a book as a living and vibrant act of speech that has been passed down through an unbroken chain of human beings from the time of Muhammad, who with his companions in seventh-century Arabia formed the first community of Muslims. At the same time, the Qur'an is also conceived of as a book: not a literal object on the shelf but a divine work that exists only in the heavenly realm of paradise. Any physical copy of the Arabic text is thought of as a pale reflection of that ideal book, a tool to enable the reader to memorize and then recite the Qur'anic text. As divine speech, moreover, the Qur'an can never be rendered perfectly in the medium of the human voice, a deficiency that testifies to its fundamental inimitability, or i'jaz. In accord with this view of the nature of the Qur'an, no translation into any other language is thought of as actually being the holy book itself. The most that any translation can be, for the believer, is an aid to understanding the original.

The Qur'an presents itself as the last of a sequence of revealed holy books, including the Torah (in Arabic, Tawrat), the Psalms (Zabur), and the Gospels (Injil). Similarly, Muhammad is presented as one in a lineage of prophets (that is, those who have received communications directly from God) that begins with the first man, Adam. Earlier holy books each have an associated prophet: for the Torah, Moses; for the Psalms, David; and for the Gospels, Jesus and also Mary—who, despite being female, is also recognized as part of the prophetic lineage. Indeed, a minority of classical Muslim scholars, including Ibn Hazm (d. 1065), considered her to be a prophet outright. Stories and characters from Jewish and Christian scripture reappear in the Qur'an, as seen in the chapters (or surahs) on Joseph and Mary. When hearing these verses, the earliest converts to Islam, drawn from the local Christian and Jewish communities located in Arabia, would have marveled at the different perspective brought to bear on familiar stories by this new revelation. The Qur'an recognizes the followers of other monotheistic religions, such as Jews and Christians, as "people of the Book"—those who follow the word of God as revealed by his prophets. From the point of view of Islam, the people of the Book who lived before the revelation of the Qur'an were also followers of islam, in the literal sense of "submission" to God's will. Those who continued to reverence their own, pre-Islamic holy books, such as Jews and Christians, could be tolerated within the Muslim community, but this inclusiveness of monotheism had its limits. Muslims generally viewed their Prophet as the last of his kind, "the seal of prophets," and the Qur'an as the last holy book that would ever be revealed to humanity. The Torah and the Gospels, while divine in their inspiration, had become corrupt over time. Only through submission to the divine will as revealed in the Qur'an, Muslims believed, could the faithful be sure they would enter into paradise and avoid the punishments of hell.

Only from the nineteenth century on has the Bible begun to be read as a work of literature as well as a divinely inspired text, and so too this dual focus on the Qur'an has been recent. From the Middle Ages to the twenty-first century, Western readers of the Qur'an have all too often condemned what they saw as its theological deviance and narrative incoherence. As a result, Muslims have hesitated to offer up the Qur'an for study within the framework of literary history or to allow it to move beyond the conservative framework of faith-based perspectives. This attitude has begun to change, however, because of innovative approaches to Qur'anic interpretation on the part of Muslim communities and an increasing willingness to place the Qur'an into dialogue with other sacred scriptures. The Qur'an itself invites comparison with other literary traditions—most explicitly, the rich traditions of oral poetry found in pre-Islamic Arabia. In that context, it appears as a marvel of literature whose divine inspiration is manifest in the form of lyrical chant and resonant verse. Reading the Qur'an on the page, in translation, weakly conveys its virtue, which can be appreciated only in the musical oral recitation (tajwid) that reveals the rhythmic quality of the verse and the haunting repetition of syllables at the ends of successive lines. It is possible to get a sense of this music in the repeated refrain of the surah "The All-Merciful" ("Ar Rahman"), translated below.

The Qur'an is divided into 144 surahs, some of which are quite short; others are very long, resembling a biblical book in form. Each surah is made up of a number of verses (ayat; singular aya). The Qur'an is also conventionally divided up into thirty sections (ajza'; singular juz') of roughly equal length to facilitate recitation of the entire work over the period of one month. Because of the emphasis placed on its oral recitation, which must be performed as part of the five daily prayers, Muslims begin to memorize the Qur'an at a young age; they start with the introductory surah, "The Opening" ("Al-Fatiha"), and continue on with the short Meccan surahs that are concentrated near the end of the Qur'an, including "Purity" ("Al-Ikhlās"). Instead of being arranged in the order that Muhammad received them, the surahs are arranged as Muhammad said he had been instructed by God. Some of the surahs were revealed at Mecca, when the Muslim community was starting to develop, and others at Medina, where the persecuted community took refuge; the two types tend to differ not only in length but also in subject matter and in tone. Instead of being carefully separated, however, the Meccan and Medinan surahs are intermingled, and many of the Meccan surahs dating from early in Muhammad's prophetic mission appear near the end of the text. The effect is one of fragments arranged in a mosaic—yet that mosaic has a very clearly defined form, delineated by strands running throughout. The repetition of phrases and motifs across surahs, often from different periods, creates a pattern as intricate as a woven tapestry.

With the exception of "Light" and "The All-Merciful," which were revealed at Medina, the excerpts reproduced here are Meccan surahs, which tend to be relatively short. Our aim was to provide entire chapters rather than abbreviated selections, so that the highly structured nature of the surahs could be grasped. The tightly ordered form illustrated on the level of the individual surah is also evident more generally in the Qur'an, in which the parts all contribute to make up the whole, but each part can also stand for the whole. Several of the surahs are known by another name, reflecting this part-whole relationship: "The Opening," which is the first surah, is also known as "The Mother of the Book," while surah "Ya Sin" is sometimes called "The Heart of the Qur'an." One of the last surahs, "Purity," was described by Muhammad himself as being "one-third of the Qur'an," because its highly condensed verses on the unity of God encapsulate the very core of Islamic theology. Other surahs, such as "Joseph" and "Mary," illuminate the extent to which the Qur'an is intertwined with Jewish and Christian faith traditions. Similarly, "Light" provides an Islamic vision of the divine that resonates with both the Neoplatonic concept of intellectual illumination and the Zoroastrian veneration of fire.

The Qur'an was received by Muhammad through the mediation of the angel Gabriel (Jibreel) over a period of about twenty-three years, beginning when he was forty years old and ending with his death in 632. During that time, the Qur'an existed as an oral recitation, repeated both by Muhammad himself and by the growing community of Muslims. After Muhammad's death, the community recognized the need to record the oral text to ensure that errors not creep into the recitation. The closest companions of Muhammad, under the supervision of the first caliph (or ruler) of the Muslim community, Abu Bakr, assembled the Qur'an in written form. The third caliph, Uthman, supervised the finalized version of the text, which was completed in 651, and then ordered all imperfect copies to be destroyed. It is this version of the Qur'an that we read today. Translations began to be produced almost immediately, beginning with a rendering of "The Opening" into the Persian language by Salman, one of the companions of the Prophet Muhammad. A full Persian translation of the Qur'an was made in the ninth century, attesting to the rapid embrace of Islam by the inhabitants of Persia (modern Iran). As is the case today, these translations were not made with the purpose of substituting Qur'anic verses in the local vernacular for the Arabic originals during prayer; instead, they were aids to understanding intended to enable fuller assimilation of the Arabic scripture within a new culture. Western audiences started to read the Qur'an in the Middle Ages, beginning with Robert of Ketton's Latin translation in 1143. The Qur'an is never accompanied by pictorial illustrations, in keeping with the Islamic practice of iconoclasm (the prohibition of any representation of living things, thereby avoiding the temptation of idolatry). It is, however, often rendered in elaborate calligraphy, a style of writing so ornate that it becomes art, fusing word with image in the aural masterpiece that is the Qur'an.

The Qur'an

Surah 1: The Opening<sup>1</sup>

1. In the Name of God, the All-Merciful, Ever-Merciful;<sup>2</sup>
2. All praise to God, Lord of the universe,<sup>3</sup>
3. the All-Merciful, Ever-Merciful;
4. Ruler on the Day of Reckoning
5. You alone we worship; and You alone we implore for help.
6. Guide us to the straight path,
7. the path of those whom You have favoured, not of those who have incurred Your wrath, nor of those who have gone astray.

Surah 12: Yusuf, or Joseph<sup>1</sup>

In the Name of God, the All-Merciful, Ever-Merciful

I

1. Alif Lam Ra.<sup>2</sup>
These are the verses of the Manifest Book.

2. We<sup>3</sup> have sent it as an Arabic Qur'an, so you might understand.

3. We narrate to you the sublimest of narratives in revealing to you this Qur'an,
though before this, you were indeed
among the heedless.

1. Translated by M. A. R. Habib and Bruce B. Lawrence.

2. Though it appears at the outset of every chapter in the 114 chapters of the Qur'an except one (Q 9), it is only here that the basmala—"In the Name of God"—is treated as a verse. Its importance is underscored by its two qualifiers, "All-Merciful, Ever-Merciful" (ar-Rahman and ar-Rahim), derived from ar-rahmah (the mercy), which in turn derives from ar-raham (the womb).

3. Literally, "the worlds, or all worlds" ('Alamin, pl. of 'alam), including both Jinn and angels (see multiple references in the Qur'an, especially Q55 below on the Jinn).

1. Cf. Genesis 37.9–11.

2. Alif Lam Ra are an instance of what is known as the disaggregated or disconnected letters. They occur in 29 chapters, always at the beginning, and include about one half, or 14, of the 28 letters in the Arabic alphabet.

3. Throughout the Qur'an, "We" is used to express the voice of God (in Arabic "Allah").

4. When Joseph said to his father: "My father, I saw, in a dream, eleven stars and the sun and moon:
I saw them bowing down
before me,"

5. he replied: "My son, don't narrate this dream to your brothers, lest they plan a plot against you; for surely Satan is a manifest adversary to humankind."

6. "Thus will your Lord choose you, and teach you
the deeper meaning of events, and perfect His favor upon you and the family of Jacob, as He perfected it
before, upon your fathers both, Abraham and Isaac<sup>4</sup> for truly your Lord is the Knowing, the Wise."

II

7. Surely, in [the story of] Joseph and his brothers are signs for those who ask.

8. [His brothers] said: "Joseph and his brother are dearer to father than we,
though we are a larger body;
our father is in manifest error."

9. "Kill Joseph or cast him out in some far land,
so your father will turn his face to you alone; and after this, you can be a righteous community."

4. Isaac is Jacob's father, and Abraham is his grandfather; all three are recognized as prophets in Islam.

10. One of them said: "Don't kill Joseph; if you must act on this, throw him down to the well's dark depth, so some caravan will pick him up."

11. They said: "Father, why won't you trust us with Joseph? For truly, we have good will for him."

12. "Send him tomorrow with us; so he'll enjoy himself and play, and we'll be sure we guard him well."

13. [Jacob] said: "It truly grieves me that you take him, for I fear the wolf might eat him while you're not heeding him."

14. They said: "If the wolf should eat him —though we are a large body— we would surely be among the lost."

15. So they took him, and they all agreed to throw him down to the well's dark depth. But We inspired him: "You will surely in time apprise them of this deed of theirs when they have grown unaware."

16. They came, then, to their father in the evening, weeping.

17. They said: "Father, we went racing, and left Joseph with our things; then the wolf devoured him. You won't believe us, even though we speak the truth.

18. They showed his shirt, soiled with false blood. "No!" He cried, "Your minds have enticed you to some misdeed. But patience is beautiful and [I invoke] the help of God against what you plead.”

19. And a caravan came, travelers, who sent to the well their water-carrier,
and he lowered his bucket.
“What good luck,” he cried,
“Here is a boy!”
And they stowed him in their merchandise. And God is Aware of what they do.

20. They sold him for a low price,
for a few silver coins,
such low regard
they had for him.

III

21. The man—Egyptian—who bought him
told his wife: “Make easeful his lodging; perhaps he’ll profit us or we’ll adopt him as a son.”
And so We settled
Joseph in the land, that We might teach him
the deeper meaning of events.
And so God prevails in His affairs; but most people do not know.

22. When he reached his prime,
We endowed him
with sound judgment and knowledge:
so We reward those who do good.

23. The woman, in whose house he stayed, tried to seduce him;<sup>5</sup> she secured the doors and said, “Come close!” “God forbid!” he said, “He is my lord; he made pleasant my lodging. Those who do wrong will surely not prosper.”

5. Cf. Genesis 39.7–41.45.

24. She lusted for him, and he would have lusted for her, had he not seen proof
from his Lord; so We kept evil and unclean deeds away from him, for he was one of Our pure servants.

25. And they both raced for the door, and she tore his shirt from behind, and they both found her husband by the door.
“What penalty can there be,”
she cried, “for one who designed evil against your wife, but prison or torture?”

26. [Joseph] said: “It was she who tried to seduce me.” Someone from her family bore witness:
“If his shirt is torn from the front, then she speaks truthfully
and he is a liar.”

27. “But if his shirt
is torn from behind,
then she is lying,
and he is truthful.”

28. So when [the husband] saw his shirt torn from behind, he said: “This is your women’s guile, your guile is great indeed.”

29. “Joseph, let this pass, and wife, beg forgiveness for your wrong; you surely are a sinner.”

IV

30. Women gossiped in the city:
“The governor’s wife sought to seduce her manservant who has inflamed her with love: we see her openly straying.”

31. When she heard their gossip, she sent for them and prepared for them a banquet. She gave each of them a knife; and said to Joseph:
 "Come before them!"
 When they saw him,
 they so marveled at him,
 they cut their hands, remarking:
 "God save us! This is no mortal—this is none other than a noble angel!"

32. She said: "This is the man on whose account you reproved me!
 Yes, I tried to seduce him but he refused.
 Yet, if he does not do what I command, he'll be thrown into prison, ignominious."

33. He said: "My Lord, prison is dearer to me
 than what they call me to;
 unless You turn away
 their guile from me,
 I might succumb to them,
 in ignorance."

34. So his Lord answered him and turned their guile away from him. He is indeed the Hearing, the Knowing.

35. Then it occurred to them, after they had seen the signs [of his virtue],
 to imprison him awhile.

v

36. Entering the prison with him were two young men. One of them said: "I dreamt that I was pressing wine." The other said: "I dreamt that I was carrying, on my head, some bread, which birds were pecking.

Tell us the deeper meaning for we see you are one of those who do good."

37. He said: "Surely, no food will come to sustain you before I inform you
of the dreams' deeper meaning.
This is part of what my Lord has taught me.
I have left the creed of a people who disbelieve in God and who deny the hereafter."

38. "And I follow the creed of my forefathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; it is not for us to ascribe to God partners of any kind—through God's Grace upon us, and upon humankind, though most of humankind are ungrateful."

39. "My fellow prisoners, which is better: many lords differing among themselves, or the One God,
the Omnipotent?"

40. "Besides Him, you worship nothing but names—named by you—you and your forefathers—for which God has revealed no sanction. Judgment belongs to none but God. He commands that you worship none but Him. This is the right religion, though most of humankind
do not know.

41. "Fellow prisoners, one of you will serve his lord with wine; the other will be crucified, and birds will peck at his head.
This is the decree
in the matter on which you both inquired."

42. And he said to the one he thought would go free,
 "Mention me to your lord."
 But Satan made him forget to mention him to his lord.
 So [Joseph] remained in prison a few years more.

VI

43. The king said:
 "I saw, in a dream,
 seven fat cows, which seven lean ones devoured;
 and seven ears of corn, green,
 and seven others, withered.
 Counselors, explain to me my dream, if you can indeed interpret dreams."

44. They said: "A confusing miscellany of dreams; and we are not versed in the deeper meaning of dreams."

45. He, of the two, who was freed now remembered, after all this time, and said: "I shall disclose to you its deeper meaning.
 Dispatch me, then [to visit Joseph,
 whom he then asked]:

46. "Joseph, you who are truthful, explain to us the meaning [of a dream] of seven fat cows
 which seven lean ones devour, and of seven ears of corn, green,
 and seven others, withered,
 so I may return to the people, so they may know."

47. He replied: "You will sow, as usual, for seven years,
 and what you reap, you will store, leaving it in the ear, all but a little, from which you will eat."

48. "After that shall come seven harsh years which shall consume
what you have prepared for them, all but a little, which you will preserve."

49. "Then after that shall come a year in which the people shall have abundant rain and will press grapes."

VII

50. So the king said:
"Bring him to me."
But when the envoy
came to [Joseph, Joseph] said:
"Return to your lord,
and ask him the mind
of the women who
cut their hands.
Surely my Lord is Aware of their guile."

51. The king said to the women:
"Tell me of the time
when you tried to seduce Joseph?" They said:
"God forbid, we learned nothing evil about him."
The governor's wife said:
"Now the truth is out:
It was I who tried to seduce him;
and he, without doubt, is telling the truth."

52. [Joseph said;]<sup>6</sup>
"By this, my master may know that I never was faithless to him in his absence, and that God will not guide the guile of the treacherous."

53. "And I do not absolve my own soul; the soul
is ever prone to evil,
unless my Lord affords

6. Some translators attribute these words to the governor's wife.

mercy. My Lord is Forgiving, Ever-Merciful.”

54. And the king said:
“Bring him to me;
so I may keep him
for myself.”
So when he had spoken
with him, he said:
“Today, we confer on you power and trust.”

55. Joseph said: “Let me oversee the granaries of the land: I will be a wary custodian.”

56. So We gave Joseph power in the land, to live wherever he wished. We bestow Our mercy on whom
We will, nor will We forsake the reward of those who do good.

57. But the reward of the Hereafter is better, for those who believe and are mindful of God.

VIII

58. And the brothers of Joseph arrived, and came before him,<sup>7</sup> and he recognized them, but they did not know him.

59. And when he had provided them with supplies, he said: “Bring to me
a brother of yours,
born of your own father.<sup>8</sup> Do you not see that I trade fairly, in full measure, and that I am most gracious as a host?”

7. Cf. Genesis 42.3–46.7.

8. Benjamin, Joseph's full brother; his other brothers have different mothers.

60. "But if you don't bring him to me,
you'll have no further measure of corn from me, nor shall you come near [me]."

61. They replied: "We'll try to wrest him from his father; we'll surely do that."

62. And Joseph told his servants:
"Place the goods they bartered back in their saddle-bags, so they'll recognize them when they return to their people, so they might come back."

63. And when they returned to their father, they said:
"Father, we've been denied any further measure of corn;
send with us our brother,
so we may procure our measure;
we'll be sure to protect him."

64. He said: "Shall I trust you with him, as I trusted you with his brother before?
Yet God is the Best of Protectors, and He is the Most Merciful
of the merciful."

65. And when they opened their baggage, they found their goods returned to them.
They said: "Father, what more can we want? Our goods here are returned to us:
we'll get food for our household,
we'll protect our brother;
and we'll get an extra camel-load of grain, an easy load!"

66. Jacob answered: "Never will he be sent with you, until you make a pledge to me—by God—that you'll bring him to me, unless you're besieged."
So when they had made their pledge,

he said: "God is Custodian over all we say."

67. And: "My sons, don't enter by one gate, but various gates; yet I can't help you in any way against [the Will of] God.
Judgment belongs to God alone:
in Him I put my trust,
and let all who trust trust in Him."

68. And when they entered from where their father had directed, it helped them in no way against [the Will of] God, for it was but a need in Jacob, which he fulfilled. For he possessed knowledge, on account of what We taught him. But most of humankind does not know.

IX

69. And when they came before Joseph, he drew his brother to him: "I am your own brother! So don't grieve over
what they've been doing,"

70. And while he was preparing their supplies, he planted a drinking cup in his brother's saddle-bag.
Then a town-crier cried aloud:
"You, in the caravan!
You are surely thieves!"

71. They said, turning towards them:
"What are you missing?"

72. They said: "We're missing the chalice of the king; whoever brings it will be given a camel-load, I pledge."

73. [The brothers] said: "By God!
You well know, we haven't come to make mischief in the realm, nor are we thieves!"

74. They said: "Then what penalty should there be for this, should you be lying?"

75. [The brothers] said:
"As penalty, the person who's found with it in his saddle-bag, should be held to account. That's how we punish wrongdoers."

76. So Joseph began with their bags, before searching the bag of his brother; at length, he lifted it out of his brother's bag. So We contrived things for Joseph, else he could not detain his brother within the law of the king, without God's will. We raise in station whom We will; over all who know is the All-Knowing.

77. They said: "If he has stolen, well, he has a brother who stole before him." But Joseph said to himself, not disclosing it to them:
"Your status is one of evil,<sup>9</sup> and God knows best concerning what you claim."

78. They said: "Governor, he has a father, truly advanced in age; so take one of us in his place; for we can see, truly, you are one of those who do good."

79. He said: "God forbid we detain any but the one on whom we found our possession; we would then be doing wrong."

X

80. So when they lost hope with him, they conferred

9. Literally, "in the worst place or situation."

in private. The eldest spoke:
 "Do you not know
 your father took a pledge from you, in the name of God, and before this, you were careless with Joseph? I shall not leave this land until my father gives me leave or God decrees thus for me, for He is the Best of Judges."

81. "[As for the rest of you] Go back to your father, and say, 'Father of ours, your son has been stealing.
 We are witnesses only to what we know; and we could hardly guard against the unforeseen.'

82. 'Ask in the town where we were, and the caravan we came with; for we are telling the truth.'"

83. [When they said this to their father] Jacob replied: "No, your minds have enticed you to some misdeed. But patience is beautiful;
 perhaps God will bring them all back to me. For He is the Knowing, the Wise."

84. And he turned away from them, and sighed:
 "How great is my grief over Joseph!" His eyes grew white in sorrow,
 and he grieved inside,
 in silence.

85. They said: "By God, will you not cease to remember Joseph till you reach the frailest edge of illness, or till you are deceased?"

86. He said: "I complain only of my grief, my sorrow, to God, and I know from God what you do not.”

87. “My sons, go, inquire after Joseph and his brother, and don’t despair of God’s Grace.
None despairs of God’s Grace, except unbelievers.”

88. So when they came before Joseph, they entreated: “Governor, adversity has touched us, our family.
We bring but meager wares, yet remit a full measure to us, show charity to us, for God surely rewards the charitable.”

89. He said: “Do you know what you did with Joseph and his brother, in your ignorance?”

90. They said: “Are you Joseph, really?” [He replied]: “I am Joseph, and this is my brother:
God has been gracious toward us. For those who are pious and patient, He does not forsake
the reward of those
who do good.”

91. They said: “By God!
God surely has preferred you over us, and we have been sinners.”

92. He said: “Let no reproach weigh upon you this day. May God forgive you, for He is the Most Merciful
of the merciful.”

93. “Go, with this shirt of mine, and throw it over my father’s face: sight will light up his eyes.
Then come back with your entire family.”

XI

94. After the caravan had journeyed, their father said: "I detect the scent of Joseph, though you might think me a dotard."

95. [People] said: "By God, you're still indeed in your old error."

96. Then, when the bearer of good news came,
he threw [the shirt]
over Jacob's face; he regained his vision, saying:
"Did I not say to you,
I know from God
what you do not?"

97. They said: "Father,
